An adviser to Allen, speaking on condition of anonymity because his boss had not formally decided to end the campaign, said the senator wanted to wait until most of canvassing was completed before announcing his decision, possibly as early as Thursday evening.

The adviser said that Allen was disinclined to request a recount if the final vote spread was similar to that of election night.

The victory puts Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., in line to become Senate majority leader. He has led the Democrats since Tom Daschle, D-S.D., was defeated two years ago.

Report: Allen Set To Concede (WT)

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

U.S. Sen. George Allen, R-Va., reportedly plans to concede, as news organizations late Thursday projected Democrat Jim Webb has won their Senate contest.

A Webb victory would hand control of the Senate over to the Democrats.

NBC News Wednesday said Webb had enough votes to win. Sources within the Allen campaign told CNN Wednesday that Allen might concede Thursday because a Wednesday canvas of votes suggested there was little chance that a recount would change the outcome.

"The senator has no intention of dragging this out," the source told CNN.

Webb appeared before supporters early Wednesday and told them, "I'd like to say the votes are counted, and we won."

DOJ_NMG_0092357

With 99 percent of the vote in, Webb led Allen by 50 percent to 49 percent with just a few thousand separating the two. Under Virginia law, the second-place vote-getter is entitled to a recount if the winning margin is less than 1 percent of all the votes cast.

The Washington Post said voter turnout was moderate to heavy in the Washington suburbs of Northern Virginia, which would be good news for Webb.

In Alexandria, Arlington and Falls Church, registrars said voter turnout may have broken records for a midterm election.

Allen was expected to show strength in the other areas of Virginia, where returns are traditionally slow.

The war in Iraq was a central issue in the race, the Post said. Webb portrayed Allen as a rubber-stamp senator for President George W. Bush's war strategy -- forcing Allen to moderate his support for the war and say "mistakes have been made."

Virginia's Next Senator (WP)

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

CONTROL OF the U.S. Senate now hangs precariously on Democrat James Webb's slim lead over Republican Sen. George Allen in Virginia -- an edge of about 7,000 votes out of more than 2.3 million cast. Unsurprisingly, for those who remember the Florida playbook from 2000, the party that's ahead is acting as if the result is a foregone conclusion, while the party that's trailing is positioning itself for challenges by raising doubts about malfunctioning voting machines and other supposed problems. Only this time, with the Democrats poised for victory and the Republicans on the ropes, the roles are reversed.

There is cause for concern here but also reason for relative confidence. The concern stems from the fact that with the stakes so high, lawyers from both parties will be pouring into the state, threatening to make a spectacle of an election that -- so far, at least -- seems to have been well run, fair and an accurate measure of the voters' will. The good news is that recent history in Virginia suggests the state knows a thing or two about how to conduct an orderly, circumscribed, confidence-building election review -- and produce an unblemished winner.

Just a year ago, the campaign for Virginia's attorney general yielded a Republican victory in a race much closer than the Webb-Allen contest. But even after six weeks of post-election scrutiny, retabulation, double-checking, error-spotting and an official recount, the victor's final margin -- 360 votes out of 1.94 million cast -- had shifted by scarcely 1,000 votes from that recorded 24 hours after the polls closed. Compared with that, Mr. Webb has chalked up a landslide. Moreover, Virginia's procedures for reviewing, verifying and recounting the vote, spelled out in state law, leave precious little room for mischief and far-fetched legal challenges.

Yesterday, Ed Gillespie, the former Republican National Committee chairman who is advising Mr. Allen, suggested that the GOP is not ready to concede a victory by Mr. Webb. Despite the absence of any reported major irregularities in Tuesday's vote, he mentioned unspecified problems with voting machines; power outages in some polling stations; and a vote shift in Stafford County's tally that favored Mr. Allen. "Let the process play itself out in a dignified manner," said Mr. Gillespie, who was a key GOP strategist during the Florida recount of 2000. "The votes need to be accurately counted. Only at the end of that process is a winner declared."

Fine: The canvassing should proceed. State law allows for a recount in tight races, and that might be justified providing Mr. Allen can show some real reason for it. Inevitably as the votes are retallied, some human error will turn up -- it always does. But it is critical to bear in mind that not a scrap of evidence has emerged so far to challenge the basic integrity of Virginia's Senate vote on Tuesday. Barring some significant error or surprise, Mr. Webb will be the state's next junior senator.

Democrats Claim Senate Control (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, expected to become the next speaker, vowed yesterday to put aside partisanship and usher into Congress fiscal discipline and ethical integrity, while her party put the final touch on its electoral victory by apparently winning control of the Senate.

Democratic electoral gains grew yesterday to 29 House seats, with 10 other races still in doubt. On the Senate side, they claimed victory yesterday in the last three states needed to take their gains to six seats.

Missouri Sen. Jim Talent conceded defeat to Democrat Claire McCaskill this morning.

Montana Republican Sen. Conrad Burns did not throw in the towel despite trailing Jon Tester in the final unofficial tally. Virginia Sen. George Allen was close enough to Democrat James H. Webb Jr. that he could demand a recount. But several news organizations, including the Associated Press, called the two races for the Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0092358

"This new Democratic majority has heard the voices of the American people," Mrs. Pelosi said yesterday, one day after Democrats stripped Republicans of about 30 House seats and staked a claim to the final three seats needed to take the Senate.

"We will make this the most honest, ethical and open Congress in history," she said, alluding to promises the Republican class of 1994 made but failed to deliver on.

As Mrs. Pelosi laid out her vision for the 110th Congress, stunned House Republicans began behind-the-scenes maneuvers for a major shake-up of their leadership.

By midafternoon, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said he would quit the top post and other Republicans emerged to challenge current party leaders.

"The days of the do-nothing Congress are over," Sen. Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, in line to become majority leader, said in a statement issued after the AP called the Virginia race for Mr. Webb.

Earlier yesterday, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican whip and in line to head his party because Majority Leader Bill Frist is retiring, played down the impact of possibly losing the chamber.

"In the Senate, the minority is never irrelevant unless it falls down into the very small numbers. I don't think, as a practical matter, it's going to make a whole lot of difference in the Senate, being at 49," he said.

Republicans, including party leaders, acknowledged yesterday that the party had wandered far from its commitment 12 years ago to clean up corruption, shrink the federal government and slash irresponsible spending. Majority Leader John A. Boehner, who announced yesterday that he would run for minority leader in Republican leadership elections next week, said the party must recommit itself to those principles.

"Our voters stopped thinking of us as the party of principle because we lost our commitment to and confidence in our core principles," the Ohio Republican said in a letter to his colleagues yesterday. "We fell into the trap of exploiting the marginal advantages of majority control instead of constantly advancing those principles.

"Many of our voters wondered whether instead of changing Washington, Washington had changed us," he said, reminding fellow Republicans that he'd been part of the 1994 takeover of Congress. "And the [Rep. Mark] Foley scandal, along with other brazen betrayals of the public trust by other members, cemented in voters' minds the picture of a party that had lost its way. The renewal of our reform commitment was too late, and too limited, to reverse our party's fate."

Rep. Mike Pence, an Indiana Republican who announced yesterday that he would challenge Mr. Boehner for the party's top post in the House, was no less scathing.

"We did not just lose our majority, we lost our way," he said. "While the scandals of the 109th Congress harmed our cause, the greatest scandal in Washington, D.C., is runaway federal spending."

Sen. Tom Coburn, the Oklahoma Republican who has railed against Republican-sponsored pork barrel spending such as the $200 million "bridge to nowhere," said this week's election results were "a rejection of corrupt, complacent and incompetent government."

"This election does not show that voters have abandoned their belief in limited government; it shows that the Republican Party has abandoned them," Mr. Coburn said. "In fact, these results represent the total failure of big-government Republicanism."

Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, yesterday restated her commitment to accomplishing five major goals within the first 100 hours of Democratic reign in the House. Democrats promise to immediately enact all the September 11 commission recommendations for fighting terrorism, raise the minimum wage, cut interest rates on student loans, provide more funding for embryonic stem-cell research and repeal some subsidies for the oil industry.

She also promised to include Republicans in the process of drafting and passing legislation more than the Republican majority had included Democrats.

"Democrats are not about getting even," she said. "Democrats are about helping the American people get ahead, and that's what our agenda is about."

The San Francisco lawmaker repeated her previous warnings that calls by some liberals to impeach President Bush are "off the table." She and Mr. Bush plan to have lunch today at the White House.

She will also have to contend with a caucus that includes many more conservative Democrats who bridle at many of her liberal positions. In his statement announcing that he would step down, Mr. Hastert gave a nod to those Democrats who toppled so many Republicans.

"I take some comfort in the fact that a majority of the winning candidates ran on a platform of common-sense conservatism, be they Republican or Democrat," said the Illinois Republican. "That bodes well for the future of our nation."

Mrs. Pelosi is expected to be formally re-elected as House Democratic leader and nominated for speaker when the party caucus meets Nov. 16. Mrs. Pelosi is likely to be unopposed, but other Democratic leadership posts may be contested. Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland and John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania are expected to vie for the majority leader post.

DOJ_NMG_0092359

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who led the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, blamed the Republican losses on a number of factors, including ethics and their "blind loyalty" to Mr. Bush.

"Every member or district that had an issue related to the professional conduct of that member switched and became Democratic," the Illinois Democrat said. "That was eight seats, half of the 15 you needed" for Democrats to take control.

As clearly elated as Mr. Emanuel was yesterday, he couldn't help but enjoy a bit of self-deprecating humor.

"Democrats haven't been this happy since 2000 when CNN declared Florida for Al Gore," he said. But "that only lasted an hour for us."

Mr. Emanuel's counterpart, New York Republican Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, had far less to celebrate but took a stab of his own at humor when he arrived late for a press conference.

"I would have been here just a little quicker, but I had to get my life preserver, life jacket, off," he said, intended as a reference to the downpour outside. Reporters assumed, however, it was an analogy for his own electoral survival.

Asked whatever happened to the "permanent majority" Republicans have promised, Mr. Reynolds replied: "We're going to take a two-year hiatus."

Webb's Small Lead Holding Up As 'Senator-Elect' Starts Staffing (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Lisa Rein

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

RICHMOND, Nov. 8 -- Virginia's Democratic Senate candidate, James Webb, claimed the title of senator-elect Wednesday and began organizing his congressional staff, while Republican incumbent George Allen declined to concede but was described as "realistic" about the outcome if he seeks a recount challenging Webb's thin lead.

With control of the U.S. Senate hanging in the balance, Allen dispatched teams of lawyers and operatives across Virginia in search of the votes he would need to win. Early in the day, Allen did not appear ready to relinquish his claim to an office he once saw as a springboard to the White House.

"Let the process play itself out in a dignified manner," said Ed Gillespie, a former national Republican Party chairman, speaking for the Allen campaign in front of the Virginia party headquarters. "The votes need to be accurately counted. Only at the end of that process is a winner declared."

But Webb continued to lead by approximately 7,300 votes with virtually all of Virginia's 2.3 million ballots counted Wednesday evening, and Republicans said there appeared to be little hope that glitches or math errors might uncover new GOP votes. Gillespie said Allen was "realistic," and an e-mail sent late Wednesday said the senator would make a statement "at the conclusion" of the statewide canvass of votes. The e-mail said "more details will follow from the campaign" early Thursday.

Several Republicans who are close to Allen or involved in a potential recount said privately that they doubted Allen could overcome Webb's lead, which stood at 13 times as large as George W. Bush's lead over Al Gore in Florida in 2000.

"I don't see the votes there," said one Washington Republican who has been advising Allen and spoke on condition of anonymity because he didn't want to undermine the senator's message. "It's like the old saying: 'If you're not the lead dog, the view doesn't change.' "

On Wednesday night, the Associated Press called the election for Webb, after the wire service contacted election officials in all of Virginia's 134 localities and said about half had completed their post-election canvass. The AP showed Webb beating Allen by 7,236 votes.

At Webb headquarters in Arlington, sleepy volunteers answered constantly ringing phones with a cheery new greeting: "Hello, Senator-elect Webb's office."

Still, teams of Democratic and Republican lawyers and volunteers traveled across Virginia to monitor the canvass, in which the preliminary tallies from Tuesday night are confirmed or adjusted over the next several days.

Jean Jensen, the secretary of the State Board of Elections, said the local boards would mail the final results to her by 5 p.m. Monday. There is not likely to be much significant movement in the vote totals until then, if at all. Jensen must officially certify the results by Nov. 27.

Aides said a weary Webb was spending time with his family and friends. Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner (D) spoke with reporters on Webb's behalf.

"I know that Senator-elect Webb is looking forward to joining Senator John Warner [R-Va.] and, I think, working on the issues he talked about in the campaign, ranging from how we deal with Iraq to economic fairness to trying to make sure we get our country fixed," Warner said. "I think he will be a great addition to the United States Senate."

Warner said Webb was moving forward as a newly elected senator, despite the fact that Allen had not conceded. "Our expectation is that this will continue to be a margin of thousands," Warner said.

DOJ_NMG_0092360

Late Wednesday afternoon, Webb announced that his transition team would include state Del. A. Donald McEachin (D-Richmond); Owen Pickett, who represented the Hampton Roads area in Congress from 1987 to 2000; and Tom Lehner, who was chief of staff to former senator Charles S. Robb (D-Va.).

Within hours, Webb issued his first official statement, praising President Bush's decision to accept the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Webb's campaign platform included a new course in Iraq, but he had declined to call for Rumsfeld's firing.

"I am pleased that we will have a new secretary of defense, but I believe that the new Senate should be the body that examines Bob Gates' qualifications for confirmation," he said in a reference to Bush's choice to succeed Rumsfeld.

Gillespie declined to say whether he thought Webb's quick action was appropriate. "The fact is, we always knew this was going to be close," he said. "It's a closely divided commonwealth. We're not surprised by the outcome."

County election boards throughout the state began the canvass Wednesday, a procedure that state officials said is undertaken regardless of the margin of victory or the possibility of a recount.

In a stuffy third-floor conference room at the Fairfax County Government Center, 12 two-person teams started examining returns generated by 1,230 voting machines in the county's 225 precincts. The process is expected to take three days, and officials plan to certify the results and ship them to the state by Sunday.

"The canvass is not over until everything has been checked and double-checked," said Margaret Luca, secretary of the Fairfax Electoral Board.

Seated at four rows of desks, the canvassers examined piles of paper strips that looked like last week's grocery receipts -- printouts of vote totals from each machine.

They were checked against tallies kept in poll books, the computer printouts listing everyone registered in a given precinct, and a form called the official statement of results, which is filled out by the chief election officer at the end of the evening.

Statewide, things seemed to be moving along with only minor incidents. In the basement of the Prince William County courthouse, for example, election workers found that one precinct had underreported its Webb vote by 10.

Lawyers for both parties said those kinds of tiny changes would not alter the election's outcome. But Gillespie charged that the Allen campaign had received initial word of other, more serious problems, including broken-down voting machines, power outages and other irregularities.

He noted that a precinct in Stafford had overstated votes for Webb by about 1,300 votes Tuesday night. The error was corrected Wednesday morning, leaving Webb with his 7,300-vote lead. "It was me," said Stafford County Registrar Ray Davis, who acknowledged accidentally writing the wrong number onto his tally sheet. "I was fatigued. We didn't check the figures last night."

Jensen, a Democrat appointed by Warner, denied the Allen camp's claims of voting machine breakdowns and other serious problems, calling them routine Election Day glitches that were quickly resolved.

"I get a little concerned that they're exaggerating, when there were lawyers for both parties in my office all day and into the night," Jensen said. Reported problems ranged from sample ballots printed in the wrong color to scattered malfunctions of voting machines that were replaced with backups. "They all got fixed."

The last of the absentee votes was counted by Wednesday afternoon, Jensen said. The only community that still had not reported complete results by last night was Isle of Wight, a county on the James River in Tidewater where a voting machine froze and has not been able to print out the tallies. About 200 votes are outstanding, officials said.

Also outstanding are provisional ballots, which are given to voters whose names do not appear on voter rolls but who say they should. Such people are allowed to vote on a paper ballot, subject to later verification of their right to vote. In last year's governor's race, there were about 5,000 provisional ballots cast, but only 18 percent were confirmed, Gillespie said.

Jensen said she did not know how many provisional ballots had been cast on Tuesday.

Some alarmed observers called the Board of Elections late Wednesday to report that several counties suddenly showed new, unreported precincts. Jensen said the precincts were added in preparation for tallying provisional ballots.

But the frantic questions from the public highlighted the intensity and the stakes of the Virginia race. Asked how she would handle a possible recount in a race the country is watching closely, Jensen said, "Sure, I'm nervous." But she said last year's recount in the contest for attorney general would serve as a dry run.

"I'm nervous about dealing with all the lawyers," she said. "They will FOIA [submit Freedom of Information Act requests for] everything but the pictures on the wall. That will be the biggest challenge."

Webb Claims Victory, But Counting Continues In Va. (USAT)

By Mimi Hall And Laura Parker

USA Today, November 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092361

RICHMOND, Va. — Democrat Jim Webb laid claim to a Virginia Senate seat Wednesday, but Republican Sen. George Allen refused to yield as elections workers across the state double-checked returns in a razor-close election.

The Associated Press declared Webb the winner late Wednesday after canvassing elections officials statewide. That result would leave Democrats with control of the Senate — and therefore the entire Congress. If Allen prevailed in a vote challenge, the houses would be split between the parties.

Both candidates kept quiet Wednesday after an emotional and frustrating election night that saw them trading miniscule leads hour-by-hour. Webb inched ahead at the very end, culminating a sometimes vicious campaign marked by character attacks and negative ads.

On Wednesday morning, Allen's supporters were quick to point out that Webb had an exceptionally thin lead — the Associated Press reported 7,236 votes separated the two out of 2.3 million cast, just three-tenths of 1%. Unofficial tallies on the Commonwealth of Virginia's website indicated late Tuesday that roughly 5% of precincts hadn't yet reported.

Michael Traugott, a University of Michigan political science professor who worked for the now-defunct Voter News Service, pointed out that the AP relied on actual votes for its call, not exit polls. That, he said, is reassuring.

But Traugott said he is concerned that about half the localities contacted by the AP had not completed their canvassing. He said the political leanings of those localities are crucial in determining whether the call for Webb was a smart one.

Former Virginia governor Mark Warner, a Democrat, declared that Webb "will be a great addition to the United States Senate."

And in a page from President Bush's political playbook from the contested 2000 election, Webb took steps to try to seize victory before it had been officially declared. Early in the day Wednesday he named three members of his transition team, and his campaign headquarters staff started referring to him as "Senator-elect."

Even after the Associated Press called the race in Webb's favor, Allen said he wouldn't back down until a canvassing effort by state officials was over.

"At the conclusion of those efforts, Senator George Allen plans to make a statement regarding the outcome," read a statement released by the Allen campaign.

Allen adviser Ed Gillespie said Allen picked up nearly 1,500 votes that had inadvertently been awarded to Webb in one county.

Allen's "mood is realistic," Gillespie said of the one-term senator who saw a solid lead evaporate in August amid charges of racism. But "obviously when you're operating with a margin of three-tenths of 1%, there's reason for hope."

Once the canvassing operation is complete, the state's elections board will prepare to meet on Nov. 27 to certify the election. Only after that can the presumed loser request a recount.

Gillespie wouldn't say whether Allen would demand a recount.

"It's conceivable to me that on Nov. 27, you'll be asking Mr. Webb whether he will be seeking a recount," he said.

No candidate who has gone into a statewide recount ahead by several thousand votes has ever come out on the losing end when it was over, Warner said.

In Virginia Race, 'Gail For Rail' May Be A Spoiler Candidate Says She Offered To Endorse Webb, Allen; 26,000 Votes Went Green (WSJ)

By JUNE KRONHOLZ And AMY SCHATZ

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

Gail Parker may have helped decide which of two Virginia gentlemen goes to Washington, which goes home and who controls the U.S. Senate.

Two weeks ago, Ms. Parker, a 59-year-old Independent Green Party of Virginia candidate, says she offered to swing her support in the Virginia Senate race to either the Democratic or Republican candidate. In return, she wanted them to back her pet issue: high-speed rail across the traffic-clogged state.

"I was willing to endorse the candidate who would earn it the old-fashioned way," says Ms. Parker.

But neither man was much interested in her offer, she says. Now it looks like her "Gail for Rail" campaign could have been a factor in deciding which party controls the U.S. Senate.

On Tuesday, Ms. Parker collected about 26,000 votes -- which could have given either Republican Sen. George Allen or Democratic challenger Jim Webb a decisive victory.

As it is, Mr. Webb seems set to replace Mr. Allen after taking a lead of just 7,000 or so votes. With most precincts reporting, Mr. Webb led Mr. Allen with a vote of 1,173,805 to 1,166,488, and the Associated Press last night declared Mr. Webb the winner, based on its survey and analysis of votes counted and ballots remaining. A Webb victory would give Democrats control of the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0092362

Mr. Allen refused to concede yesterday and said he would wait for a full review of the vote, but it didn't seem likely that the totals could change significantly. Absentee ballots have already been counted. That leaves in doubt only the provisional ballots -- that is, those cast by voters who, for one reason or another, may not be eligible to vote.

Such votes are collected locally, so there was no way to know yesterday how many are outstanding. In the 2004 presidential election, the Virginia state elections board says, 4,000 provisional ballots were cast, and only 700 accepted -- not enough to overcome Mr. Webb's lead.

Ms. Parker acknowledged from the beginning that her campaign lacked the steam to win, but says she hoped it would work up enough noise about rail travel to prompt the two leading candidates to pledge support.

Transportation is a hot topic in Virginia, where rapid growth has left taxpayers sitting in traffic. The Census Bureau says the typical Northern Virginia commute is at least a half hour. Virginia's budget for rail transport is $23 million a year.

Since January, Ms. Parker, a retired Air Force Reserves major, says she has logged more than 40,000 miles campaigning around the state in her gray Volkswagen Jetta. She had no paid staffers and personally collected 8,000 of the 10,000 signatures that she needed to get on the ballot.

She says she raised just $1,200 in donations and according to a Federal Election Commission report, she financed much of her campaign through an $18,472 personal loan. "Maybe I should have spent more time trying to raise money," she said yesterday.

Ms. Parker, who ran unsuccessfully for the Virginia General Assembly last year, says she ran a few radio ads during her Senate bid, but mostly campaigned by greeting voters personally. She printed her pamphlets at Staples and ran the campaign from her Alexandria condo. Her campaign photo was taken last December at Glamour Shots, a mall photo studio that specializes in soft-focus, windswept portraits. Even before the last votes were counted yesterday, Ms. Parker and her Jetta had left the state to visit her daughter in Oklahoma.

"Our campaign was about faith, about family and about being fiscally conservative. I have faith we can balance the budget and also build high-speed rail in Virginia," she said in an interview, staying on message even after the campaign had ended.

The Webb campaign says it did try negotiating with Ms. Parker but came to the conclusion she wasn't seriously interested in endorsing him. "There never seemed to be any clear intent on her part to endorse," says Webb campaign spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd. She says that Mr. Webb is in favor of finding ways to improve the state's traffic congestion and "obviously, he respects [Ms. Parker's] opinion on the matter and her passion for the issue."

Calls to Mr. Allen's campaign, press and Senate offices weren't returned.

Ms. Parker attended Mr. Webb's pre-election rally Monday in Roanoke in a subtle show of support, she says, but didn't endorse him. She bristles at suggestions that her quixotic campaign might help decide control of the Senate. "This is politics," she says. "This country is about discussing issues and informing voters."

Ralph Nader, whose own third-party candidacy in 2000 is thought by some commentators to have helped swing that race to President Bush, agrees with her.

"Everyone has an equal right to run," he says. "Obviously, Webb and Allen took a lot more votes from her than she took from them."

Ms. Parker's votes represent 1% of the state's total.

The congressional elections' most successful independent candidates were Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman and Vermont's Bernie Sanders. An Illinois Green Party candidate, Rich Whitney, also turned in a respectable performance with 342,000 votes, or 10% of the state's total. Maryland Green Party candidate, Kevin Zeese, director of a national antiwar group, collected 2% of the state's vote.

Mr. Allen's chances of overturning his apparent loss seem unlikely. In Virginia, a recount "is largely about checking the math," says James Alcorn, a lawyer with the Virginia State Board of Elections.

Voters in much of the state used touch-screen voting machines, which record votes on memory cards with a backup count on an internal memory. The state's 2006 election law says that in a recount, the vote totals from the memory cards are to be looked at again to make sure they were read correctly the first time.

The memory cards in each machine record an image or "screen shot" of each ballot. But there's no provision in the law for looking at the image during a recount. And in any event, only the machine makers could do that because they have kept access to their software a trade secret.

Challenges based on the state's voting equipment also seem fairly remote. Mr. Webb's last name didn't appear on the summary page of many voting machines -- a glitch that brought howls from his campaign before the election. But at least initially, Mr. Allen seems to have faced no similar disadvantage that might be the basis for a challenge.

DOJ_NMG_0092363

Ms. Parker says she plans to write thank-you notes to supporters when she returns from Oklahoma and will run for office again -- although she's not sure for what job. "Politics in Virginia is a noble pursuit," she says.

Elections Help Sort Out Playing Field For 2008 (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — The elections this week transformed not only Congress but the playing field for the 2008 presidential race. Some contenders self-destructed, one went home and a meteor streaked onto the radar in the form of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama.

There were two things, however, that didn't change: the contenders leading the polls on both sides.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., won a resounding re-election victory after raising nearly $40 million — more than any other Senate candidate this year. She isn't yet talking about her future, which is widely presumed to include a presidential bid but could involve a leadership role in a possibly Democratic Senate.

Some analysts praise her campaign skills but say they wouldn't be surprised if she chooses the latter, given the difficulties of a White House run. “She comes with baggage that no other candidate has and the ability to mobilize Republicans against her that none of the other Democrats can match,” says Peverill Squire, a political scientist at the University of Iowa.

The Republican front-runner, Arizona Sen. John McCain, campaigned and raised money for candidates nationwide while also building a network for his White House bid. Though supportive of President Bush on Iraq, his disagreements with Bush about immigration policy, prisoner abuse and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's performance kept his maverick image alive.

While former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani also does well in polls and barnstormed the country, “right now it's hard to see another Republican who has similar stature” to McCain, Squire says.

A lesser known Democratic hopeful, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, is forming a presidential campaign committee today, the Des Moines Register reported, making him first into the race on either side. “He wanted to make sure we had a good result in Iowa before taking the official step,” Vilsack aide Jeff Link told the paper. Democrats took over the Iowa Legislature and Democrat Chet Culver was elected to succeed Vilsack.

One Republican who had laid foundations for a national campaign now faces political oblivion: Virginia Sen. George Allen, whom the Associated Press declared the loser Wednesday in his re-election race against Democrat Jim Webb, based on a canvass of election officials. Allen's candidacy unraveled after he called an Indian-American “macaca,” triggering examinations of his racial views, and reacted with anger and bad jokes to questions about his mother's newly revealed Jewish roots.

Another politician who pushed the self-destruct button: Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry. His remark appearing to denigrate the education level of troops in Iraq, which he called a bungled joke, reminded Democrats of Kerry's shortcomings as their 2004 nominee. The Iraq comment was “the final straw” for some, says Dean Spiliotes, a political scientist at Saint Anselm College in Manchester, N.H.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who is going home to Tennessee in January to ponder a GOP presidential run, presided over a loss of seats and controversies such as congressional intervention in end-of-life decisions for Terri Schiavo, the Florida woman in a vegetative state. Frist's association with Bush and his performance as leader also could hurt him. “He handled the job badly,” Squire says.

Republicans lost governorships under Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's leadership of the Republican Governors Association. At home, Romney is being succeeded by a Democrat, Deval Patrick.

Two red-state Democrats, former North Carolina senator John Edwards and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, solidified their standing in ways that may pay off later.

Edwards fought for minimum-wage hikes and strengthened ties with labor. Bayh helped Indiana Democrats oust three House Republicans and helped Democrats capture the legislature in Iowa, a key primary-season state.

Illinois' Obama, who is half Kansan and half Kenyan, generated big crowds even as his short résumé raised questions.

If the freshman senator decides to proceed, says Squire, “he's going to find out that it's a tough business. He's had the fun part already, and the painful part is coming up.”

Outcome Shakes Up '08 Calculus For McCain, Clinton And Others (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Tuesday's election earthquake is recasting the 2008 campaign landscape, leaving both parties' early presidential front-runners on firmer ground while exposing fault lines that could upend their campaigns.

DOJ_NMG_0092364

The power shift that gave Democrats control of the House of Representatives and possibly the Senate was a clear call by voters for new -- and bipartisan -- approaches on issues ranging from the Iraq war to fiscal discipline to ethics in government. That realignment could open the door to candidates who are independent, unorthodox or have a history of working across party lines.

Sen. John McCain, an early Republican favorite, proved more popular on the stump with his party's candidates than President Bush did -- newly-elected Republican Gov. Charlie Crist skipped a last-minute rally in Florida with the president to tour that state with the Arizona lawmaker. Mr. McCain also raised millions of dollars for his colleagues. But his advocacy for continuing the Iraq campaign -- and perhaps sending in more troops -- sharply conflicts with the antiwar message sent by voters this week.

Democratic Sen. Hillary Clinton was also a popular fundraiser on the campaign stump, and she transferred millions of dollars from her bulging campaign account to candidates and party committees to help the Democratic team. She was re-elected in New York by a landslide, with 67% of the vote -- including support from 20% of Republicans and 25% of conservatives, demonstrating a potential for broad appeal. But the sudden rise of Illinois Democratic Sen. Barack Obama threatens her superstar status and could produce a formidable primary challenger for the nomination. And she too has some baggage from her vote to authorize the Iraq invasion.

The 2008 presidential campaign landscape was changed in other substantial ways by this week's midterm elections. Voters showed impatience with partisanship, negative attacks and corruption, which ranked in exit polls on a par with Iraq among voters. Nearly every candidate tainted by scandal was vanquished by voters bent on sending Washington a message and cleaning house.

Indeed, the results could be seen as an opening for a third-party presidential campaign, and one politician who has generated considerable speculation about his intentions is New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg. The Republican mayor of a majority Democratic city is a social moderate and a fiscal conservative, who is seen as having a successful record of management and coalition-building. And he has a large personal fortune to underwrite a campaign.

ELECTION FALLOUT

· Webb Wins Virginia Senate Race1
· Election Q&A: What Happens Next?2
· Chief Concerns: Who Heads Key Committees?3
· What a Democratic House Means for Industry Interests4
· What Business Can Expect in Next Congress5
· Will Bush, Pelosi Be Able to Cooperate?6
· In Virginia Race, 'Gail for Rail' May Be a Spoiler7
· Blue Regime Augurs A Shift in Chairs8
· Democrats Ride Social, Environment Issues to Religious Gains9
· Democrats Gain Power From Statehouse Shifts10
· Michigan Turns Back College Affirmative Action11
· Vote Is a Blow to Republican Pursuit of Hispanics12

FOLLOW THE VOTE

· Exit poll analysis: Five states13; national data14
· Vote-tallies, map15
· For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election200616.

The internal forces in the Democratic and Republican parties were also shaken up by the campaign. Democratic presidential primaries tend to force candidates to cater to the liberal base, but the party won big Tuesday in part by recruiting more-conservative candidates. And party leaders think the election gives them an opening to build stronger links with the white and Hispanic voters who backed their candidates in greater numbers in this election.

The Republican coalition appears to be fracturing, with social conservatives possibly weakened. Indeed, the two leading social-conservative candidates in the Republicans' presidential-contender roster -- Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum and Virginia Sen. George Allen -- were knocked out of the running. Mr. Santorum was defeated; Mr. Allen is trailing and the Associated Press last night predicted from returns that he had lost, even though he has yet to concede. "The picture is pretty obscure for '08 from our perspective," said Tom Minnery, an aide to Focus on the Family founder James C. Dobson, a leading voice in the party's social-conservative wing.

Mr. Allen's diminished standing also removes the favorite candidate of many fiscal conservatives. He is one of only two senators endorsed by Club for Growth, an activist Republican antitax group. "We're waiting" to see a new candidate emerge, says Pat Toomey, the club's president. Mr. McCain, who initially opposed the Bush tax cuts, is deemed insufficiently reliable.

DOJ_NMG_0092365

Mr. Toomey said his wing of the party is still reviewing the record of Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who also impressed party activists with his midterm campaigning. They remain skeptical that a law adopted on Mr. Romney's watch penalizing businesses that don't provide health-care coverage will meet their standards.

To fill those holes, social conservatives began taking another look at Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, both of whom would have to drastically ratchet up their presidential-campaign machinery to become competitive. On the fiscal side, activists may try to recruit South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford, who was re-elected on Tuesday and hails from a state in the party's early primary lineup.

The election fallout also could encourage a long-shot candidate such as former House Speaker Newt Gingrich to jump into the race. On the flip side, the diminished influence of the religious right on the midterms could buoy the camp of moderate former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, another sought-after personality this cycle.

The Democrats' candidate roster was also rearranged some.

An eleventh-hour gaffe by Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry hurt his positioning as the alternative to Sen. Clinton. In a campaign rally, Mr. Kerry seemed to suggest the soldiers in Iraq are uneducated. Conservatives and the White House seized on the comment, which the senator said was actually a botched joke about the brainpower of President Bush. Still, he was forced to apologize and his party was knocked off its message in the critical final week of the campaign.

"John Kerry was scoring a lot of points in New Hampshire," says party activist Jim Demers. "He was helping out candidates and doing very well. His statement just sent shockwaves through the party."

The Democrats also are without a high-profile antiwar candidate who could harness the activist and voter support for that position evident in the campaigns. North Carolina's John Edwards could be best positioned to do that. He has forthrightly said his vote authorizing the war was a mistake and he was a popular fund-raising headliner throughout the midterm campaign.

Mr. Obama could also try to woo that constituency. He wasn't in the Senate at the time of the war vote. Bob Borosage, co-director of the Campaign for America's Future, a liberal activist group, said Mr. Obama had his members "eating out of his hand" during one recent appearance, but the senator gave little hint of his ideas on Iraq. "Once he starts taking positions, it might get more difficult," Mr. Borosage said.

Beyond the personalities, the results could recolor the 2008 electoral map.

A string of Democratic gubernatorial victories in the Midwest could provide a Democratic nominee with strong allies and networks in Republican strongholds. The most notable victory was in Ohio, a state Mr. Bush won by a tiny margin in 2004.

Democrat Eliot Spitzer's victory in New York is likely to help boost the party's coffers, Republican finance experts concede. That could be critical because political-money experts are predicting that serious contenders are expected to have raised $100 million by the end of next year -- nearly $10 million a month. The reason for the escalating cost is that no serious candidate is expected to sign up for matching public dollars, which are given to candidates who agree to limit their spending.

The rise of a Democratic-controlled Congress also means the debate over dominant issues such as Iraq will necessarily change. John Samples, an analyst at the libertarian-leaning CATO Institute, said Republicans may be more anxious to find a way to resolve the Iraq situation "so they don't have to go through this again in 2008, so they can take it off the table."

Iraq makes the campaign tricky for both Mr. McCain and Ms. Clinton. In 2004, Mr. McCain appeared with Mr. Bush on the campaign trail, lending his considerable credibility on war issues to the Iraq mission. This cycle, the former Navy officer and Vietnam War prisoner did so again on behalf of fellow Republican incumbents.

Tuesday night, Mr. McCain acknowledged the antiwar sentiment evident in the returns and said he shared voters' "frustration." But Mark McKinnon, a leading adviser to the Bush-Cheney campaigns, said it is unlikely Mr. McCain will drastically shift his call for continued involvement in Iraq.

"He's not taking a popular position on it, which is typical of McCain," Mr. McKinnon said.

Ms. Clinton, who has become a vocal critic of the White House's management of Iraq, could also face pressure to adjust her stance. "Someone in the Democratic Party is going to have to take the lead in changing the policy if they are going to be perceived as acceptable leader on the issue," said Mr. Demers, the party activist.

In Victory For Stocks, Dow Posts Another Record By KAREN RICHARDSON (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average, shaking off early postelection declines, rallied to a record close following the news of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation.

Stocks initially traded lower -- particularly health-care-related shares -- as investors weighed the impact and remaining uncertainty surrounding the results of the midterm elections. But the momentum reversed to the upside after the first headlines about the resignation of Mr. Rumsfeld, who has come in for criticism for his handling of the war in Iraq; after a pause, stocks rose again after President Bush's subsequent news conference discussing the election and pledging to work with the new Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0092366

The Dow, down nearly 55 points before the news developments, erased that loss and more, closing up 19.77 points, or 0.2%, to 12176.54 -- handily beating its previous record, set Oct. 26. It is up nearly 14% this year. Dow components American Express, Boeing and DuPont each rose more than 1%.

The S&P 500 edged up 2.88 points, or 0.2%, to 1385.72, up 11% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 9.06 points, or 0.4%, to 2384.94, up 8.1% this year.

"The fact that a new secretary of defense could help bring the war to some kind of resolution opens the door for change," said Larry Peruzzi, stock trader at Boston Company Asset Management. "Even more than the economy, the war and the housing sector are the biggest negatives for the Republicans."

News of the sweeping Democratic congressional victories had an effect in many corners of the market. SLM, a firm better known as Sallie Mae that facilitates loans between borrowers and student-loan providers, sank 4.8% to $47.21 as investors worried that a Congress controlled by Democrats might reduce student-loan interest rates and cut out middlemen like SLM.

Health-care and pharmaceutical stocks also took a hit over jitters that the Democrats would keep their vow to cut drug costs in federal health plans. Pfizer sank 1.6%, Eli Lilly fell 0.9%, and Johnson & Johnson fell 1.1%. Merck stock slid 3.4%, but was also weighed down by its disclosure of tax disputes involving billions of dollars.

Investors bid up some alternative-energy and biotechnology stocks they expected would benefit from Democratic support. VeraSun Energy, which produces and markets ethanol, rose 9%, while StemCells, a microcap firm that specializes in stem-cell research, gained 10%. Some Dow energy companies also rallied, such as power-generator AES, Duke Energy, FirstEnergy, PG&E and TXU.

The day's stock movements aren't likely to be sustained over the longer term, since the new legislation and regulations investors are anticipating to affect certain stocks and sectors could take far longer than expected.

"Generally, it's been a classic knee-jerk, postelection reaction," said Ken Fisher, chief executive of Fisher Investments, which manages about $30 billion. "We've moved out of a period of extreme political hostility into a short-term afterglow."

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, not including the U.S., rose 1.37 points, or 0.59%, to 230.80.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were up. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.86 billion shares, as 2,082 issues advanced and 1,201 declined.

Bond prices rose. The 10-year Treasury note gained 6/32, or $1.88 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.639%. The 30-year bond rose 13/32 to yield 4.731%.

The dollar strengthened. In late New York trading, the currency rose to 117.80 yen, from 117.70, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2760 from $1.2771.

Write to Karen Richardson at karen.richardson@awsj.com1

Gridlock Not Good For Stocks After All? (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, November 9, 2006

NEW YORK — The rallying cry on Wall Street after the Democrats' power grab is that political gridlock caused by divided government is good for financial markets.

Stock market action Wednesday supported that line of thinking. In the first day of trading after the Democrats regained control of at least one branch of Congress, the Dow Jones industrial average rose 20 points and finished with a record closing high of 12,176.54.

But some Wall Street economists and investment strategists contend that two years of potential legislative inertia might not be the best thing for financial markets in the long run. In a report titled “Wrong Time for Gridlock,” for example, Stephen Roach, chief economist at Morgan Stanley, says the U.S. can't afford not to tackle pressing economic concerns, the major one being the bulging budget deficit.

“It is just smug to say that no action is good news,” Roach says. “We have major issues on the agenda, and we can't afford to have Washington asleep at the switch.”

Conventional wisdom on Wall Street says it is unlikely that any major legislation would get passed in the next two years, given the Democrats' slim majority in Congress and the ability of President Bush to veto any bills he does not favor. As a result, the status quo would be maintained, reducing the threat to the investor community as well as specific stocks or industry sectors that could be adversely affected by new laws that take a bite out of profit.

For example, there is little chance that Democrats will be successful in boosting the investor-friendly tax rates on dividends and capital gains that are set to expire in 2010. It also means Democrats would have difficulty pushing through a bill that would allow the government to negotiate Medicaid drug prices with pharmaceutical companies or slapping a windfall profits tax on big oil companies.

DOJ_NMG_0092367

"This election doesn't mean much," says Greg Valliere, chief political strategist at Stanford Washington Research Group. "Congress is still basically tied, and Bush has a veto. The big change would come in the 2008 presidential election."

Two years of uncertainty and gridlock would "come with a price," says Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America. Key risks to markets — the Iraq war, the possibility that foreign investors will reduce their holdings in U.S. securities, a looming health care crisis and our dependence on foreign oil — all require the attention of Washington now, he says.

If these challenges are not addressed soon, Quinlan adds, it "will come back to haunt the U.S. financial markets at some point."

McCain Quits Post At College For The Deaf (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 (AP) — Senator John McCain has resigned from the board of trustees of Gallaudet University, the world's premier university for the deaf, after disagreeing with its decision to revoke the appointment of its incoming president, a university spokeswoman said.

The chairwoman of the Gallaudet University board, Brenda Jo Brueggemann, has also resigned, the spokeswoman, Mercy Coogan, said.

Mr. McCain, an Arizona Republican, wrote to outgoing President I. King Jordan on Monday, describing the board's decision as unfair, Ms. Coogan said.

The Washington Post reported Wednesday that Ms. Brueggemann, a professor at Ohio State University, resigned and that she said in an e-mail message that she had thought about quitting since Oct. 29, when the board voted to revoke the appointment of the president, Jane K. Fernandes, after a month of demonstrations and hunger strikes by students.

Ms. Brueggemann, who had supported Ms. Fernandes, wrote in a message posted Wednesday on the university's Web site that her personal life and work had suffered since May, when she became the board's chairwoman. She took the job after the interim board chairwoman, Celia May Baldwin, resigned after protests over Ms. Fernandes's appointment in May.

Students and faculty members had criticized Ms. Fernandes, saying she was autocratic and unable to tackle some of the university's long-term problems as provost.

Ms. Fernandes, 50, has said she became a lightning rod for those frustrated about changes in deaf culture. She had spoken about expanding Gallaudet, known for its expertise in and adherence to American Sign Language, to all kinds of deaf people — those with cochlear implants, those who speak and those who do not sign very well.

But some students were worried about preserving sign language and perhaps being left behind if other forms of communication became more prevalent on campus.

The board is scheduled to meet Saturday on campus to discuss the process of choosing an interim president.

'A Better Way' (WP)

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

IT IS TOO BAD that Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr.'s concession speech in his failed Democratic bid for the U.S. Senate came at an hour when most people had gone to bed. Not only was he gracious, but Mr. Ford delivered an important plea for a bettering of the American political process:

"What people want more than anything, and what I heard and I know candidates all around the country heard . . . [was] a hunger, and they sensed a great appetite on the part of the American people for something much better and far more dignified and greater than what we'd given them."

Mr. Ford knows firsthand -- to use his phrase -- how "demeaning and debasing" politics can be, having been the target of a scurrilous ad in which a suggestively dressed white woman is seen coming on to him. Mr. Ford is black. Unfortunately, that ad was not an aberration but rather an embodiment of the seedy standards that infected this political year.

Consider the Election Day disgrace of Maryland's top two elected officials sanctioning the use of a clearly false campaign flier and then compounding the insult to the targeted Prince George's County audience by using out-of-state homeless people to distribute the material. Or Sen. George Allen's misuse of fictional writings to impugn the character of his Democratic opponent in Virginia. There also has been the introduction of sleazy new practices such as robo-calls designed to annoy and deceive voters and a greater use of push polls aimed at spreading inaccurate information about candidates.

Politics is rough and tumble, and negative campaigning has always had a place in American campaigns. But, as The Post's Michael Grunwald recently reported, an ugly low was established this year, partly because candidates could pretend they had nothing to do with the more disgraceful practices financed through independent expenditures by national parties and other groups. The worst offenders this year were Republicans, but that probably was because they were the ones on the defensive.

DOJ_NMG_0092368

Once the votes are counted, memories fade -- until the next election cycle. Mr. Ford laid out a challenge to both the winners and the losers to figure out "a better way." That's not a bad start for a Democratic agenda.

Russia Rejects European Iran Sanctions (AP)

By Henry Meyer

AP, November 9, 2006

Russia has rejected European-proposed U.N. sanctions aimed at forcing Iran to halt its suspected nuclear weapons drive, but Moscow appears to be applying its own pressure by threatening to delay a key nuclear power project.

Analysts say the Kremlin is determined not to push Iran into a corner like North Korea — blaming tough U.S. policies for Pyongyang's recent nuclear test — but Tehran's refusal to compromise has led to growing impatience in Moscow despite the two countries' close commercial ties.

"President Putin is angry at (Iranian President Mahmoud) Ahmadinejad but he understands that it's probably too late to do anything now," said Georgy Mirsky, chief researcher at the Institute for World Economics and International Relations in Moscow.

A planned visit to Moscow by Iran's Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki was abruptly postponed on Wednesday, a move seen as a diplomatic snub reflecting Iranian annoyance at Russian hints of a delay to the construction of the country's first nuclear power station.

However, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said later Wednesday that he will visit Russia in a day or two, describing Russia's position on the proposed sanctions as "logical and principled." He did not say with whom he would hold talks in Moscow.

In a speech to supporters in northern Iran, meanwhile, supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei remained defiant, saying his country would continue to acquire nuclear technology.

"The Americans open their mouth and close their eyes and say whatever they want, such as 'the world opposes enrichment,'" Khamenei said, referring to Iran's enrichment of uranium, which the United Nations has said must cease.

"In a glorious way, the Iranian nation — with awareness, an informed generation and reason — has challenged Western fabrications and will go ahead strongly," Khamenei added in his address to thousands in Semnan, 155 miles east of Tehran.

Experts say Moscow could be using its $1 billion contract to build the plant in the southern city of Bushehr as a lever of pressure on Tehran.

"Russia is not ready to support fully-fledged sanctions against Iran but it is looking for ways to persuade the Iranians to be more transparent in their nuclear research activities," said Anton Khlopkov, deputy director of the Moscow-based PIR Center, which specializes in nonproliferation.

Russia, which along with China has veto power as a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council, has been the main obstacle to efforts by Western nations to punish Iran for its refusal to halt sensitive uranium enrichment activity.

Moscow has crossed out large sections of a U.S.-backed U.N. Security Council draft resolution proposing broad sanctions on Tehran's nuclear and missile programs, according to a document obtained by The Associated Press.

Russia's changes would weaken demands that Tehran stop working on a separate reactor that can produce plutonium and that Iran allow tougher U.N. inspections of its nuclear program. They also would delete any reference to Iran's Bushehr nuclear plant, said U.N. diplomats in Vienna, Austria, who demanded anonymity because the Russian amendments had not been officially announced.

The announcement that Mottaki's trip was postponed came after a senior Russian nuclear official said Wednesday that Russia would shortly review the timetable for completing construction of Bushehr, which already has been repeatedly delayed.

Sergei Shmatko, head of Russian state company Atomstroiexport, which is in charge of the project, said that work so far was on schedule.

He added, however, that an assessment of the targets for Bushehr to be conducted later this month "will determine the final timetable for its launch," according to the ITAR-Tass news agency.

In September, Russia agreed to ship fuel to Bushehr by March 2007 and launch the facility in September. Fuel from the plant potentially could be diverted and used to produce bombs. Iran claims its nuclear program is peaceful.

But on Tuesday an unidentified Russian nuclear industry official was quoted as saying by Russian news agencies that Russia could postpone the timetable if Iran fails to meet commitments that were not specified. According to ITAR-Tass, the official said one of the problems is that Iran has not adhered to a payment schedule.

Russia Proposes Weakened Iran Sanctions (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0092369

By George Jahn
AP, November 9, 2006

Russia has crossed out large sections of a U.N. Security Council draft proposing broad U.S.-backed sanctions on Tehran's nuclear and missile programs, according to a document obtained Wednesday by The Associated Press.

The paper outlines Moscow's proposed amendments to a Security Council draft resolution drawn up by Britain and France and broadly endorsed by the United States. Russia's changes weaken the draft resolution's demands that Tehran stop working on a reactor that can produce plutonium and that Iran allow tougher U.N. inspections of its nuclear program. They also delete any reference to Iran's Bushehr nuclear plant, which Russia is helping build.

In a draft presented earlier this month, the United States reluctantly agreed to European proposals to exempt Bushehr from sanctions, in attempts to placate Moscow and gain its support for sanctions meant to punish Tehran's refusal to freeze uranium enrichment.

But U.N. diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the Russian amendments had not been officially announced, said the Kremlin wanted no mention whatsoever of Bushehr. That stance was meant to reflect Russia's view that the plant should not be linked to international concerns that Tehran might be trying to develop nuclear arms.

Much of Moscow's 11-page document consists of passages in the original Western draft struck through by Russian negotiators, reflecting Moscow's insistence on reducing sanctions to the minimum needed to directly target enrichment, which can generate both nuclear energy or be used to make the fissile core of warheads.

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said he did not want to discuss specifics of the dispute but told reporters: "There are a lot of differences, no doubt about it."

"Obviously we've got to get some direction from capitals, given the disparity," he said, adding that the five permanent U.N. Security Council members — the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France — planned another meeting later in the week.

Other senior Security Council diplomats also acknowledged the divide.

"Clearly, I think in a number of difficult areas the differences cannot be bridged, so I believe there should be more reflections in the capitals," China's Ambassador Wang Guangya said Tuesday.

In contrast to the Russian amendments, the European draft resolution orders all countries to ban the supply of material and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs and to impose a travel ban and asset freeze on companies, individuals and organizations involved in those programs.

It would exempt from restrictions the initial nuclear power plant being built by the Russians at Bushehr but not the nuclear fuel needed for the reactor. It also would limit assistance to Iran by the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog, to food, agriculture, medical and humanitarian programs. And it would ban countries from teaching or training Iranians in disciplines that would contribute to Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

Sharpening the dispute with Russia, the United States has proposed amendments that would strengthen the measures proposed by Britain and France.

In September, Russia agreed to ship fuel to Bushehr by March 2007, adding to concerns of the U.S. and others over Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

Moscow's draft also was lenient on Arak, an Iranian heavy water research reactor scheduled for completion in 2009.

One of the byproducts of heavy-water reactors is plutonium, which can be used in building nuclear weapons. In the Western draft, the council "decides that Iran shall suspend work" on the Arak facility. The Russian version instead "calls upon Iran to reconsider" its construction.

Similarly, while the Western draft "decides ... that Iran shall without delay" implement its Additional Protocol with the IAEA, the Russian version only "urges" Iran to implement the agreement that would allow the International Atomic Energy Agency to more thoroughly probe Tehran's nuclear program.

____

Associated Press writers Edith M. Lederer at the United Nations, Henry Meyer in Moscow and Nasser Karimi in Tehran, Iran, contributed to this report.

Israeli Shelling Kills 18 Gazans; Anger Boils Up (NYT)

By Ian Fisher And Steven Erlanger
The New York Times, November 9, 2006

BEIT HANUN, Gaza Strip, Nov. 8 — Israeli tank shells killed 18 Palestinians, including 8 children and 6 women, at a cluster of houses here on Wednesday, one of the largest single losses of life in Gaza in years.

Some Hamas leaders called for a suicide-bombing retaliation inside Israel and, unusually, for the United States to be taught “hard lessons” as well.

DOJ_NMG_0092370

“Nothing happened,” mumbled Isra Athamnah, 5 years old, who was pocked with shrapnel and in shock. The news that her widowed mother, Sanaa, 35, was dead and that she was now an orphan did not sink in.

Others described how a tank shell had hit a home here in northern Gaza, sending members of the extended Athamnah family outside before dawn. The next volleys struck them as they crowded in a narrow alley between the houses. The dead ranged from less than a year old to 70 years old, witnesses said.

Israeli leaders expressed regret. They have been on the defensive over their performance in the war against Hezbollah in Lebanon and the more than 300 Palestinians killed in operations in Gaza since the summer.

Defense Minister Amir Peretz ordered a halt to artillery attacks in the densely populated Gaza Strip, which are intended to prevent Palestinians from launching rockets into nearby Israeli cities, and an immediate investigation. Initial findings suggested a misfire, the commander of the south, Gen. Yoav Galant, told Israel’s Channel 2 television.

After largely observing a unilateral truce that it declared a year and a half ago, Hamas called for renewed suicide bombings. Khaled Meshal, the leader of Hamas’s political bureau exiled in Syria, said Hamas would answer the deaths with “deeds, not words.”

Hamas’s military wing also said in a statement that the United States should be taught “hard lessons” for supporting Israel. The threat, though vague, was an unusual escalation for Hamas, an Islamic-based militant group that has pointedly portrayed its fight as being against Israel alone. It was immediately disavowed by Ghazi Hamad, the spokesman for the Hamas-led Palestinian government in Gaza.

The Israelis had just pulled out of Beit Hanun on Tuesday morning after a six-day operation in which they effectively occupied the town and fought battles with militants, many of them from Hamas. At least 52 Palestinians were killed, some 22 of them believed to be civilians, and one Israeli soldier was killed in the operation, which was aimed at stopping Palestinian rocket fire into Israel.

Nonetheless on Wednesday, according to the army, 13 rockets were fired into Israel.

The Israeli military said it had launched a preventive artillery barrage in response to about 10 rockets fired in the previous 24 hours.

This is not the first time Israeli shelling has gone awry, hitting houses in Beit Hanun and nearby Beit Lahiya. And it is not the first time that errant rounds have led to a halt or delay in efforts to find new paths of dialogue between Israel and the Palestinians, and among the Palestinian factions themselves.

The Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, both of whom gave blood for the victims and visited them in hospitals, have been engaged in two days of supposedly climactic talks on a government to replace the one run by Hamas, which is isolated internationally.

The intention is to have a government of “national unity,” made up of experts and technocrats approved by the various parties, in the hope that Western aid and Palestinian tax money will again begin to flow. The Palestinian Authority has been unable to pay full salaries for nine months.

The idea was also to have the new government release an Israeli soldier captured on June 25, which would prompt Israel to free hundreds of Palestinian prisoners and to arrange a long-delayed meeting between Mr. Abbas and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

But this latest shelling, on top of the Beit Hanun operation, which Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya had already called a “massacre,” caused Mr. Haniya to request a pause in the talks for three days of mourning.

In June, a similar cycle followed another apparently errant Israeli shell that killed Palestinian civilians, including seven members of a single family, the Ghaliyas, who were enjoying a day at the beach. The Israelis said they were shelling areas where rocket teams had fired into Israel, and denied that the shell that killed the Ghaliyas was theirs.

But no Palestinian believed the Israeli denial, there was never any conclusive alternative explanation and the military wing of Hamas announced that it was ending the cease-fire against Israel. The Hamas government belatedly went along, and Hamas started firing rockets again toward Israel, instead of simply supplying them to others.

More important, the Hamas military wing took part in the capture of the Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, later in June, setting off the political crisis that surrounded — and has outlasted — Israel’s summertime war against Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Only days before the June shelling, Mr. Abbas and Mr. Olmert met together informally in Petra, Jordan, and promised to have a formal meeting within two weeks, actually setting a date for June 28, to begin their relationship afresh. Mr. Olmert promised Mr. Abbas to release 600 prisoners then. But with the capture of Corporal Shalit, the Hamas government found itself unable to repudiate the actions of its own military wing, apparently directed from Syria by Mr. Meshal.

Hamas later said it would reinstate the truce with Israel, but it might now break it again, and more decisively, because its experiment in government appeared to be foundering.

DOJ_NMG_0092371

"I don't believe in the rockets, but their reactions cannot be justified," Mr. Abbas said of the Israelis. "We totally condemn the international silence and any acts that can be used as justification for the Israeli massacres."

Leaders at the United Nations and the European Union, and in Russia, Britain and Italy, did condemn the incident. "It is hard to see what this action was meant to achieve and how it can be justified," said the British foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett.

Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the White House National Security Council, called for restraint by all parties, adding: "We deeply regret the injuries and loss of life in Gaza today. We have seen the Israeli government's apology and hope their investigation will be completed quickly."

A similar statement was issued in President Bush's name.

Witnesses said the shelling began about 5:30 a.m. Ali Athamnah, 29, a doctor, said he heard the crash of a shell, then glass from a window spattered on his face. He looked down from his second-story balcony and saw one relative, Ahmad, wounded and scores of other family members running outside.

Then the other shells hit, and he did not see the crowd standing anymore. "They just left — they withdrew," he said, walking over puddles filled with blood, spattered human remains and sandals, many belonging to children.

"Children! Women! Parents!" said Abu Ahman, 42, a rescue worker who lives on the street and arrived right after the rockets hit. "I can't find the words that describe this action — legs of children, head of a small girl."

At the Kamal Adwan Hospital, Maali Athamnah, 27, the aunt of the newly orphaned Isra and two other siblings who survived, Islam, 14, and Muhammad, 3, who broke both his legs, broke into tears reading a list of the dead, nearly all of them relatives. Another 80 people were wounded.

Ms. Athamnah said she did not support the militants' firing rockets into Israel. But she said: "Just think who is firing them: those who lost family members to Israel. And think about these kids now. They will be the rocket firers in the future. No mother, no father. No house. They will be the next ones to fire the rockets."

On Wednesday night, Israeli rockets killed Ahmed Awad and another Hamas member in Gaza City. Mr. Awad was said to be a rocket maker and the son-in-law of the Hamas foreign minister, Mahmoud Zahar.

In the West Bank on Wednesday, Israeli soldiers killed four gunmen and a civilian during a raid near Jenin, Palestinian security officials said.

Israeli forces also killed a Hamas gunman and a 17-year-old civilian near the Jabaliya refugee camp in Gaza, hospital officials said. The Israeli Army said soldiers had shot three gunmen after being attacked with an antitank missile.

'Shells Kept Falling' On Gaza Apartment, Killing 17 In Family (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

BEIT HANOUN, Gaza Strip, Nov. 8 -- Islam al-Athamnah was asleep on a foam mattress next to her brothers and sisters, crowded together like puzzle pieces on the floor of their top-story apartment. Uncles and cousins slept in the levels beneath, her mother and father in an adjoining room.

"Then something hit us," Islam, 14, recalled from a hospital room with sky-blue walls. "The windows shattered, and then a second shell hit the house. It was all smoky. We were using our hands to find the kids."

Palestinian emergency workers and frightened neighbors pulled scores of Islam's wounded relatives from the ruins of their home in the frantic hours after the 5:30 a.m. blasts, which witnesses here said came from Israeli artillery fire.

Palestinian health officials said 20 civilians were killed, 17 of them from Islam's extended family. At least seven of the dead were children asleep at the time of the blasts, which left heavy jagged shrapnel on rooftops and in living rooms.

More than 60 people were wounded, including Islam's 5-year-old sister, Israh, and 3-year-old brother, Mohammed, who tossed in a hospital bed here with thickly bandaged legs, crying for his wounded mother. Islam's father, two grandparents, an uncle and many cousins were among the dead.

"I just grabbed who I could and ran," said Islam, her face freckled with dozens of pinprick shrapnel wounds. "I was lucky because more shells kept falling."

The blasts along Hamad Street, which witnesses said numbered between four and 10, ripped through several generations of a family of farmers, doctors and taxi drivers who live near fruit orchards on the northern edge of this town. A grandfather died along with his 23-year-old son and 1-year-old granddaughter. Three brothers died. So did two sisters.

The mourning tents that appeared throughout this agricultural town became the venues for public despair, nationalist fervor and strident anger toward the Jewish state and its ally, the United States, which provides Israel with roughly $2 billion annually in military aid. Palestinian leaders called for three days of mourning across the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, as well as international pressure to stop Israel's operations in this town of 28,000 people.

DOJ_NMG_0092372

"We expect the international community to intervene," said Ghazi Hamad, spokesman for the Hamas-led Palestinian government. "But the United States bears direct responsibility for this by giving Israel the green light. We don't expect anything from them."

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert expressed regret for the incident, and the Israeli military announced a suspension of artillery fire into Gaza, designed to suppress the frequent Palestinian rocket fire directed at Israeli cities, pending an investigation.

The inquiry will be led by Maj. Gen. Meir Kalifi, deputy chief of ground forces, who headed the June investigation into an explosion on a Gaza beach that killed six members of the Ghaliyah family. He concluded that Israel was not responsible for the blast, although a Human Rights Watch investigator said the explosion most likely came from a fired artillery shell.

In a statement, Israel's military said that "the responsibility for any civilian casualties lies with the terrorist organizations" firing rockets toward Israel. Six of the crude rockets landed in Israel on Wednesday despite the recent intensive military operation here intended to stop them.

In a separate incident in the West Bank town of Yamoun, near Jenin, Israeli soldiers in civilian clothes killed four fighters from the military wing of the Fatah movement and one civilian. As night fell here, an Israeli airstrike on a car in northern Gaza killed two gunmen from Hamas's military wing, the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigades, bringing the day's toll to 27 dead.

"Our response to these crimes and these massacres has to be unity," said Mahmoud Abbas, president of the Palestinian Authority and head of Fatah. "I condemn anyone who launches rockets. It is fruitless and gives an excuse, not a reason, for the Israeli massacres, which have no justification."

Abbas is in Gaza for talks with Hamas to form a national unity government, hoping to end economic sanctions that have been in place against the Palestinian Authority since the radical Islamic movement took power over its ministries in March. The United States, the European Union and Israel classify Hamas, which does not recognize the Jewish state's right to exist, as a terrorist organization.

Palestinian officials warned that the deaths in Beit Hanoun would increase tensions between Fatah and Hamas, especially the harder-line Hamas leaders in exile.

Khaled Meshal, head of Hamas's political wing in Damascus, Syria, called on "all the factions of the resistance, despite the difficulties on the ground, to respond."

"This is an Israeli act of escalation and provocation that will have a negative impact both internally and bilaterally," said Hanan Ashrawi, a Palestinian legislator from the Third Way movement. "The consequence of this unleashed violence against a civilian population will be yet, unfortunately, another circle of violence."

In a statement faxed to news agencies here, the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigades said that "America is providing the political and financial cover" for Israel's military operations. It called on supporters "around the world to teach the American enemy a hard lesson."

Abu Obaida, a spokesman for Hamas's military wing, said in a telephone interview later that "our only theater of operation is in Palestine and only against the Israeli occupation." He added, "We appeal to the American administration to apply one standard of humanity to Israelis and Palestinians."

In Washington, President Bush said in a statement: "We send our condolences to the families of all those affected. . . . We call on all parties to act with care and restraint so as to avoid any harm to innocent civilians."

Israel withdrew most of its forces here Tuesday after a six-day operation that left dozens of homes in ruins, sidewalks crumbled, lampposts toppled and backyard orchards torn up by bulldozers. Al-Nasser Mosque, site of a standoff between Israeli forces and Palestinian gunmen, lay in ruins, only its turquoise-tipped minaret still standing.

Israeli Group Demands Inquiry Into Attack (FT)

By Harvey Morris In Jerusalem

Financial Times, November 9, 2006

Israel's leading human rights organisation has demanded a criminal investigation into the army's shelling of northern Gaza on Wednesday that killed 18 Palestinian civilians, most of them women and children.

As international leaders expressed a mixture of concern and outrage at the latest additions to a mounting death toll in the Gaza Strip, the B'tselem organisation said it was gravely concerned that the action constituted a war crime.

Amir Peretz, Israeli defence minister, ordered a halt to shelling pending an internal military inquiry to determine whether tank fire had strayed from its intended target.

Whatever the outcome of the investigation, the incident prompted fresh questions about Israel's military tactics in Gaza where hundreds of people, including 96 children, have died this year while the number of Israeli civilian casualties of Palestinian attacks has dwindled to a handful. Israeli tanks had ostensibly been targeting areas used by militants to fire rockets into southern Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0092373

Instead, up to 10 shells hit a residential area of the town of Beit Hanoun, blasting two apartment buildings in the early morning. Sixteen members of a single family were among the dead.

Some of the casualties were hit by secondary shellfire as they left their beds to survey the scene of the initial explosions.

In a statement, the army said: “Initial information shows that the artillery fire was directed at a location distant from the one reportedly hit.”

Mr Peretz and Ehud Olmert, Israeli prime minister, issued a statement that referred to the “tragic results” of the action and offered humanitarian aid.

The shelling was denounced as a massacre by Palestinian officials. In a rare public display of unity, Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority’s Fatah president, and Ismail Haniyeh, its Hamas prime minister, donated blood during a joint visit to a hospital where some of more than 50 wounded were being treated.

Mr Haniyeh earlier called off a formal meeting with Mr Abbas at which they were to have had further talks on the formation of a national unity government. The PA declared three days of mourning for the victims.

Javier Solana, European Union foreign policy chief, said in a statement he deplored the Israeli military operation. “These military operations must be halted.”

Margaret Beckett, UK foreign minister, said she was “gravely disturbed” by the deaths and that Israel must respect its obligation to avoid harming civilians. “It is hard to see what this action was meant to achieve and how it can be justified.”

Alvaro de Soto, UN special envoy in the region, said he was “shocked and appalled”.

Foreign leaders had previously expressed concern at a week-long Israeli invasion of Beit Hanoun that ended on Tuesday in which more than 50 Palestinians were killed.

The army opted for a ground operation after intensive shellfire failed to stem the launching of rockets into southern Israel. The almost daily barrage of home-made missiles continued on Wednesday, with two striking the southern Israeli town of Sderot and injuring one person.

Although the relatively crude weapons have caused few injuries, the Israeli government has vowed to continue its efforts to stamp out the attacks. Officials say no state would allow its citizens to be targeted in such a way without responding.

Some Hamas officials warned on Wednesday that militants now would resume suicide bombings inside Israel. Khaled Maashal, head of the movement’s Damascus-based exiled leadership that controls its military wing, said the response to the Beit Hanoun killings would be “by deed not words”.

Hamas Leader Calls Off Israel Cease-fire (AP)

By Diaa Hadid

AP, November 9, 2006

Hamas' exiled leader on Wednesday called off a cease-fire with Israel and militants threatened to attack Americans after 18 members of a family, including eight children, were killed in an Israeli artillery barrage on a densely populated Gaza neighborhood.

It was the highest number of Palestinian civilians killed in a single strike since fighting erupted six years ago, and undermined Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas's attempts to form a more moderate government and renew a peace process with Israel.

Abbas condemned the "terrible, despicable crime," and the international community criticized the deaths. Israel, promising a swift inquiry, expressed regret for harming civilians.

The shelling occurred early Wednesday as residents were sleeping in the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun, the focus of a weeklong military offensive aimed at stopping rocket fire. Israeli troops had pulled out of the town just 24 hours earlier, and the rocket attacks resumed almost immediately.

The Israeli shells landed around a compound of four apartment buildings on a small side street. The explosions left holes in the buildings, owned by four brothers from the al-Athamna family, and sent panicked residents scurrying outside. Additional salvos landed, hitting the people and flooding a dusty alleyway in a pool of blood.

"Shells were fired directly onto the people who were rushing out of the house," said Akram al-Athamna, a relative of the victims. "There was blood everywhere."

Another family member, 14-year-old Asma al-Athamna, said she saw her mother, older sister and brother-in-law die as they fled their home. "I was behind them and I was wounded," the weeping girl said from her hospital bed. Her 2-year-old niece, Malak, lay in an adjacent bed, recovering from shrapnel wounds to her face.

The family is prominent in Beit Hanoun and includes several doctors and professionals. Family members said they had fled during the Israeli offensive, returning home after Tuesday's pullout.

DOJ_NMG_0092374

Bits of dismembered bodies were plastered to walls of the damaged buildings and lying on the ground. A woman's head scarf, children's boots and slippers, and a pair of jeans — all burnt — were strewn outside.

Weeping relatives gathered outside the homes. One man dipped his hand in victims' blood and smeared it over his face. "God avenge us, God avenge us," he wailed.

A young man, standing in the bloodied alleyway, said an infant girl had been blown to pieces. "I tried to look for her head, I tried to look for her head," he shrieked, then sank to the ground, weeping.

Health workers said some 60 people were wounded, including 26 children.

In Damascus, Syria, Khaled Mashaal, the exiled leader of Hamas, said the group would no longer honor a February 2005 truce and called for renewed attacks on Israel. He urged other militant groups to join the struggle.

"The armed struggle is free to resume, and the resistance is dictated by local circumstances," he told a news conference. "There must be a roaring reaction so that we avenge all those victims." Other major militant groups pledged to follow suit.

The declarations raised the prospect of a new wave of suicide bombings and large-scale fighting with Israel. Although violence has persisted since the truce declaration, including the kidnapping of an Israeli soldier by Hamas-linked militants in June, there has been a sharp drop in fighting. Hamas has not carried out a suicide bombing since August 2004, after killing scores of Israelis in such attacks over the previous four years.

Despite the rhetoric, Hamas would be taking a gamble by resuming large-scale violence. The group won legislative elections this year and has been struggling to win international legitimacy. Already boycotted by the U.S., Europe and Israel, Hamas would risk further international isolation.

Perhaps with this in mind, Hamas leaders in Gaza quickly distanced themselves from a call by the group's military wing for Muslims around the world to strike at "the American enemy." Hamas has historically confined attacks to Israeli targets.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert expressed regret at the loss of civilian life and offered humanitarian aid.

"The unintentional tragedy that happened today in Beit Hanoun is one that the Israel Defense Forces will investigate to make sure that such events do not recur," said Miri Eisin, Olmert's spokeswoman.

She said, however, that Israel would press on with its efforts to halt Palestinian rocket attacks. She also dismissed the latest Hamas threats, saying militants have continually tried to attack Israelis. Six rockets landed in Israel on Wednesday, wounding two people, the army said.

Initial findings showed that the army had fired artillery at a target some 500 yards away from the residential area.

"Our estimate is that it was something connected with the aiming devices, or the alignment, or the balance between them, or our radar's location of the shell hit," Maj. Gen. Yoav Galant, head of Israel's southern command, told Channel 2 TV. "Our investigation is concentrating on these points," he said.

In Gaza, Abbas said the killings jeopardized peace prospects. "We tell the Israelis, you are not seeking peace at all, but are destroying all chances for peace. You must therefore bear all the consequences of these crimes," he told Palestine TV.

However, Abbas also criticized the Palestinian rocket launchers, saying they invited tough Israeli reprisals. "We are against those that justify Israeli actions," he said. Hamas angrily accused Abbas of caving in to Israeli pressure.

Despite the attack, Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas met Abbas for talks on forming a coalition government, but no agreement was reached. Haniyeh had called for suspending the talks after the shelling.

In a rare gesture of unity, the rival leaders also visited victims in a Gaza hospital together and donated blood. Both men also declared three-day mourning periods throughout the West Bank and Gaza.

The civilian deaths drew swift condemnations around the world. France and Russia warned of an escalation of hostilities, and the British foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, said "it was hard to see what this action was meant to achieve and how it can be justified."

President Bush called on "all parties" to act with restraint. Noting that Israel has begun an investigation, he said, "We hope it will be completed quickly and that appropriate steps will be taken to avoid a repetition of this tragic incident."

The U.N. Security Council scheduled an open meeting Thursday at the Palestinians request. Palestinian U.N. observer Riyad Mansour said Palestinians want a resolution that condemns recent Israeli attacks and calls for an Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, a cease-fire, and deployment of U.N. observers.

Spontaneous demonstrations erupted across Gaza and the West Bank. Black smoke billowed into the skies of northern Gaza as protesters set tires ablaze. A mass funeral was expected Thursday.

Israeli police, fearing revenge attacks, stepped up their alert level, mobilizing forces across the country.

In separate fighting Wednesday, Israeli troops killed four Palestinian militants in northern Gaza. And in the West Bank, Israeli forces ambushed a group of Palestinian gunmen, killing four militants. A 30-year-old civilian also died in the shootout.

Hamas Ends Truce Following Israeli Bombing Campaign In Gaza (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0092375

By Dion Nissenbaum

McClatchy Newspapers, November 9, 2006

BEIT HANOUN, Gaza Strip - Omar Athamna and his family crawled into their beds Tuesday night in the quiet following an Israeli military campaign that killed more than 60 Palestinians in their small farming town.

Their sense of calm proved to be short-lived. Just before dawn on Wednesday, an Israeli artillery barrage slammed into the Athamnas' neighborhood, killing at least 17 members of the extended family, including seven children, as they tried to escape.

The attack decimated the Athamna clan, stunned the Gaza Strip and threatened to spark a renewed suicide bombing campaign in Israel.

"I am not a militant, but I will be a militant to fight them now," Omar Athamna said as he sat near the spot where three of his brothers, two cousins, aunt, uncle, grandmother and other relatives were killed.

In Syria, exiled Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal declared an end to the group's self-imposed 18-month-old cease-fire with Israel and said the group would respond with "deeds, not words."

As international condemnation mounted, Israel halted its artillery shelling of the Gaza Strip and vowed to launch a swift investigation.

"It is clear a serious mistake was made and it is being examined," Deputy Defense Minister Efraim Sneh told Israel Radio. "Artillery needs to be used in cases where it is helpful, but it needs to be used carefully, as it is not accurate."

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz expressed regret as the military worked to figure out what happened.

Yoav Galant, the head of Israel's southern command, told Israel's Channel 2 that the artillery was supposed to hit fields 500 yards from the homes and said the investigation would look into whether the radar or targeting systems had failed.

The shelling surprised the residents of Beit Hanoun, who'd just emerged that morning to survey damage caused by a six-day Israeli operation meant to quash Palestinian militants who fire rudimentary rockets into southern Israel. The operation ravaged parts of the town of 30,000 near the Israeli border.

Survivors of Wednesday's shelling described a morning of carnage and confusion:

The first shell slammed into the roof of the four-story Athamna home on the outskirts of Beit Hanoun around 5:30 a.m.

Frightened parents bundled up their children as a second shell slammed into one of the children's rooms. One mother tossed her infant daughter to relatives from a second-story window and rushed to grab her other children before being felled by another blast. The third shell slammed into a concrete stairwell as family members were trying to escape. But it was the fourth shell that caused the most damage. It exploded in the narrow street outside the home where the family members were gathering.

A sense of profound shock, grief and anger rippled through Beit Hanoun as word spread that at least 17 people had been killed in the attack.

In the hours after the shelling, witnesses said, one relative slumped by a large pool of bloody water in the street and wailed as he smeared it on his face.

The four-story home was ravaged. Dust covered teddy bears in one room while shards of concrete coated scattered mattresses in another.

The attack briefly united Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, who set aside their differences over the formation of a new unity government to visit survivors of the attack.

Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for Haniyeh, echoed Hamas leader Mashaal's appeal for renewed attacks on Israel.

"It is not fair that people in Tel Aviv are sleeping quietly," Hamad said after visiting the blast sites. "It is our right that they should taste the same pain that we feel here in Gaza."

Hillel Frisch, a senior research associate at the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies, said the attack could push frustrated Palestinians toward the hard-line groups Israel is trying to undermine.

"I would say this action, and others like it, are intensifying a process that has been going on for four years of strengthening Hamas at the expense of Fatah and turning the Palestinian movement into a religious nationalist or even religious-revolutionary movement - distancing the Palestinians from any peace process," he said.

Israel's shelling is part of a months-long campaign against Palestinian militants who've fired hundreds of rudimentary rockets into southern Israel. While the rocket attacks haven't killed any Israelis in the past 15 months, the persistent threat hangs over Israeli towns close to the Gaza border.

In response, Israel has fired tens of thousands of shells into the northern Gaza Strip fields and towns that the Palestinian militants have used as launching pads.

"We are launching these metal pipes which we call rockets, which do not hurt them at all," said Zakaria Kafarna as he stood in a hospital room where one of his cousins was being treated for shrapnel wounds. "It is not worth all this."

DOJ_NMG_0092376

In the past year, more than 53 Palestinians who weren't involved in fighting Israel have been killed by Israeli artillery and tank fire, according to statistics compiled by the Israeli human rights group B'Tselem.

Until Wednesday, the most contentious incident took place in June when eight Palestinians picnicking on a Gaza Strip beach were killed while Israel was shelling the waterfront. An Israeli military investigation concluded that the victims weren't killed by shells fired that day, but American human rights researchers strongly challenged the official findings.

Democratic Leader In Senate Calls Bush's India Deal A Priority (BLM)

By Judy Mathewson And Nicholas Johnston

Bloomberg, November 9, 2006

``India is the largest democracy in the world," the Nevada Democrat told reporters today in Washington. ``We want to work with them, and this is important we move along that line." At the White House, President George W. Bush said securing congressional approval for the accord is also high on his agenda.

``I'm trying to get the Indian deal done," Bush said.

The agreement is a major initiative of Bush's foreign policy, an effort to expand a strategic relationship with the fastest-growing major economy after China. While the measure enjoys bipartisan support, the agreement was mired in a procedural squabble in the Senate when lawmakers adjourned at the end of September.

Passage in the lame-duck session would be a win for nuclear-industry suppliers such as Fairfield, Connecticut-based General Electric Co. and Monroeville, Pennsylvania-based Westinghouse Electric Co., which are in line to supply India with equipment. The bill exempts India from U.S. laws that bar technology transfers to countries that haven't signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Reid said the India accord is one of five things he wants to accomplish in the lame-duck session before the new Congress begins in January. However, the agreement still faces additional hurdles before it can go into effect.

House Version

If it passes, the Senate measure would have to be reconciled with a version the House passed in July, or else the legislation will have to be introduced again next year.

``We just have to keep our fingers crossed," said Graham Wisner, who lobbied Congress to pass the bill on behalf of the U.S.-India Business Council in Washington. ``The thought of having to go through the whole process again is enough to make me want to jump off a cliff."

A U.S. State Department delegation is in New Delhi this week to address possible sticking points, including whether India must cede the right to conduct nuclear weapons tests, a person familiar with the negotiations said.

The U.S. has said cooperation would end if India conducts a nuclear test, while the Indian government has said it will only agree to a voluntary ban.

Another step that must be cleared is agreement between the SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> United Nations nuclear watchdog and India on a regimen for international inspections. And the Nuclear Suppliers Group, a 45-nation forum dedicated to limiting the spread of atomic weapons, must also sign off on the deal.

India and the U.S. agreed to the deal's broad outlines on March 2. It would require India, for the first time, to open some of its power plants to UN inspectors.

The agreement also marks a turnabout for the U.S., which has barred nuclear exports to India since that country tested an atomic bomb in 1974 without signing the nonproliferation treaty.

U.N. Urges U.S. To End Cuba Embargo (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, November 9, 2006

The U.N. General Assembly voted overwhelmingly Wednesday to urge the United States to end its 45-year-old trade embargo against Cuba after defeating an amendment calling on Fidel Castro's government to free political prisoners and respect human rights.

It was the 15th straight year that the 192-member world body approved a resolution calling for the U.S. economic and commercial embargo against Cuba to be repealed "as soon as possible."

Cuba's Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque told the assembly "the economic war unleashed by the U.S. against Cuba, the longest and most ruthless ever known, qualifies as an act of genocide and constitutes a flagrant violation of international law and the charter of the United Nations."

Perez Roque said the embargo has caused $86 billion in economic damage to Cuba since it began.

DOJ_NMG_0092377

U.S. deputy ambassador Ronald Godard later said that to claim the embargo adversely affects the Cuban people ignores "the truth" that the Cuban government has systematically denied "the human, economic, labor and political rights of its people over 47 years."

"We maintain this embargo to demonstrate our continuing call for economic and political freedom for all Cubans," Godard said.

The embargo, aimed at toppling Castro's socialist system, was imposed after the failed CIA-backed Bay of Pigs invasion in 1961. It has been steadily tightened under President Bush.

Delegates in the General Assembly chamber burst into applause when the vote flashed on the screen — 183 in favor to 4 opposed, with 1 abstention. Joining the United States in voting "no" were Israel and the South Pacific nations of the Marshall Islands and Palau. Micronesia, also in the South Pacific, abstained.

In Cuba, state-run television showed Foreign Ministry officials cheering when the vote was announced.

"This confirms once again by the U.N. itself that the embargo is totally illegal and wrong and needs to be suspended," said Hipolito Rodriguez, a customs worker in Havana.

The General Assembly voted on the resolution soon after defeating an amendment by Australia stating that the U.S. laws and measures "were motivated by valid concerns about the continued lack of democracy and political freedom in Cuba."

It also would have called on Cuba to release all political prisoners, cooperate with international human rights bodies, respect the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and comply with all human rights treaties to which it is a signatory.

Australia's U.N. Ambassador Robert Hill said his country proposed the amendment in hopes that if Cuba met its obligations, "we would not need to return to this issue every year," he said.

Perez Roque called Australia the "lackeys" of the United States for introducing the amendment, which he claimed was drafted in Washington.

U.S. Seeks To Form Ties With Nicaragua (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, November 9, 2006

The State Department said Wednesday that it looks to establish "positive relations" with the Nicaraguan government of President-elect Daniel Ortega, a former rival who won Sunday's presidential elections.

Spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos said cooperation with Ortega and his Sandinista colleagues will be "based on their action in support of Nicaragua's democratic future."

Ortega has said he wants to maintain relations with Washington while forging closer ties with Cuba and Venezuela. During the campaign, he also projected a far more moderate image compared with his days as a Marxist-Leninist firebrand.

The Reagan administration forcefully opposed Ortega when he was president during the 1980s, backing anti-communist rebels who took up arms against him. Both Washington and Managua seem intent on a more amicable relationship during Ortega's second time around.

"We respect the decision of the Nicaraguan people," Gallegos said, alluding to the elections.

On Tuesday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack suggested that Ortega may have a stake in maintaining good relations with the United States.

He noted that Nicaragua is part of a U.S.-Central American free trade agreement. In addition, he said the United States has a $175 million program aimed at rural development in a northeastern Nicaraguan region sprinkled with strong pro-Sandinista sentiment.

In Havana, Cuban President Fidel Castro welcomed Ortega's victory. He said the outcome "fills our people with joy, at the same time filling the terrorist and genocidal government of the United States with opprobrium."

In Caracas, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said he and Ortega would be "uniting as never before" to construct a socialist future.

In the runup to the election, administration officials issued warnings that Nicaraguan democracy could be imperiled if Ortega prevailed in the balloting. The comments seemed to contradict the professed neutrality of the State Department in the election.

U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said in October that Nicaraguans "must reject the politics of corrupt and discredited caudillos (strongmen) who robbed Nicaragua of its prosperity and who still pose a threat to the bright future that Nicaragua has before it today."

He said U.S. aid and trade programs "will be endangered" if "anti-democratic forces prevail."

DOJ_NMG_0092378

Paul Trivelli, the U.S. ambassador in Nicaragua, said Ortega "is a tiger that has not changed his stripes." He added that the Sandinistas and an allied party "hijacked" Nicaraguan democracy by manipulating the election ground rules in ways that favored them.

Chavez Leads Gloating Over Vote (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez yesterday led a global chorus of Bush administration critics gloating over the outcome of Tuesday's midterm elections, but some foreign leaders expressed concern over what the Democratic victory will mean on issues such as global trade and the Middle East.

Latin American populists, European leftists and Islamic fundamentalists were all quick to point to the U.S. vote as a repudiation of Mr. Bush's aggressive, go-it-alone approach on Iraq and the global war on terror.

The resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld also sparked praise from leaders of countries from the heart of what Mr. Rumsfeld once memorably dismissed as "Old Europe."

The Democratic sweep ranks as "the beginning of the end of a six-year nightmare for the world," 200 members of the Socialist bloc in the European Parliament declared in a joint statement yesterday.

Said Italian Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema, "A cycle has ended. The cycle of pre-emptive wars, of unilateralism, ends in great failure."

With Mr. Bush still in charge of U.S. foreign policy for another two years, the pugnacious Mr. Chavez was one of the few world leaders to comment publicly on the elections.

"It's a reprisal vote against the war in Iraq, against the corruption" inside the Bush administration, he told reporters in Caracas. "All this fills us with optimism."

Informed of Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation as he was speaking, Mr. Chavez said, "Heads have started to roll. The president should resign on moral grounds, and Rumsfeld should go to jail."

Iran's state-controlled television said in a commentary that U.S. voters were rejecting "Bush's wrong strategy in the Middle East," as well as "financial corruption in the United States."

Sudan, which has clashed with the United States over the humanitarian crisis in its Darfur region, is hoping for "relations of cooperation, not confrontation" with the chastened U.S. administration, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs al-Samani al-Wasiyla said.

The celebration was not universal, with some foreign commentators worrying that the new Democrat-led Congress will be more protectionist on trade and will disappoint those hoping for a major U.S. shift on issues such as Iraq, North Korea, global warming and the International Criminal Court.

Jose Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, the European Union's executive arm, urged the United States to make a "renewed commitment" to revive faltering World Trade Organization talks for a new global trade pact.

A spokesman for Mexican President Vicente Fox said the Democratic gains could soften the U.S. stand in talks on illegal immigration.

"We hope this new makeup of Congress can be a catalyst for the U.S. government working toward a migration reform with the characteristics proposed by Mexico," spokesman Ruben Aguilar said.

Mr. Bush's diminished clout also was a cause of concern for some allies.

Japanese press commentators worried that a weakened Mr. Bush will not be able to push through major trade deals or stick to the hard line he has taken against North Korea's nuclear-weapons programs. Analysts in India predicted Democrats may demand new concessions in the massive civilian nuclear pact Mr. Bush has championed, putting the deal in doubt.

Alexander Pikayev of the Moscow-based think tank Scholars for Global Security noted that U.S.-Russian relations historically fared better under Republicans than Democrats.

"As a result of the election, we expect the political struggle in the United States to toughen, and this may lead to sudden, spontaneous jumps of the American elephant in the international arena," he told a Moscow radio interviewer yesterday.

Foreign leaders closely aligned with Mr. Bush, including British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Australian Prime Minister John Howard, were undercut by the U.S. vote.

John McDonnell, a leftist member of Mr. Blair's ruling Labor Party and a critic of the Iraq war, said the U.S. results "mean that Blair is now totally isolated in the international community."

Venezuela Groups Get U.S. Aid Amid Meddling Charges (NYT)

By Simon Romero

DOJ_NMG_0092379

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, Nov. 8 — Since President Hugo Chávez returned to power after a brief coup in 2002, the United States has channeled millions of dollars to Venezuelan organizations, many of them critical of his government. This aid has become a key issue in the presidential election next month amid claims of American interference in the domestic political system.

"Washington thinks it can buy regime change in Venezuela," said Carlos Escarrá, a constitutional lawyer and a leading legislator in the National Assembly who has been pushing for tighter regulation over the American financing of Venezuelan groups. "This is an affront to our sovereignty as a nation that is not docile to Washington's interests."

He echoed recent comments from other high-ranking officials and from Mr. Chávez, who has a double-digit lead in most polls over his main opponent, Manuel Rosales, the governor of Zulia State. Mr. Chávez rarely refers in public to Mr. Rosales by name, instead framing his campaign as a choice between his government and the Bush administration.

American diplomats here have remained largely quiet in commenting on the election, which is scheduled for Dec. 3, in contrast to the active role American officials played in Nicaragua before the election of Daniel Ortega earlier this week. Government officials here exploit any example of American efforts to counter Mr. Chávez's influence as evidence of what they see as a looming confrontation with Washington.

For instance, Vice President José Vicente Rangel has organized an event this week to publicize the release of "Bush vs. Chávez: Washington's War Against Venezuela," a book by Eva Golinger, an American lawyer who has become famous in Venezuela for detailing the American financing of groups here.

The United States Agency for International Development has distributed about $25 million to various Venezuelan organizations over the last five years, according to officials involved in the projects. The funds have been channeled to the Venezuelan groups through private and public entities from the United States that have opened offices in Caracas.

These include Development Alternatives Inc., a Bethesda, Md., company that works closely with the State Department in dispersing funds around the world, and the International Republican Institute and the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs, two Washington groups that have carried out training for emerging political leaders in Venezuela.

Documents obtained from the United States government under the Freedom of Information Act point to numerous grants made by the United States in the past two years to groups whose activities are viewed as critical of Mr. Chávez's government. The international development agency withheld the names of many of the grant recipients, saying that the disclosure of their identities could put them at risk of political retaliation.

All of the grants were channeled through Development Alternatives, which worked on behalf of the Office of Transition Initiatives, a little-known branch of the international development agency that started operating in Venezuela after the April 2002 coup.

O.T.I., which was created in the 1990s to push for democratic change in the former Soviet Union, normally finances activities in strife-torn countries like Liberia, Nepal and Sri Lanka. Its only operations in Latin America are in Venezuela and Bolivia, two countries that have developed an alliance based in part on shared distrust of the United States.

Mr. Chávez has repeatedly lashed out at the United States government's activities, mixing his attacks with unsubstantiated claims that the Bush administration is financing covert intelligence operations aimed at strengthening his opponent's campaign. This criticism has played well among the president's political base, where anti-American sentiment has flourished since Mr. Chávez was briefly removed from power in a coup in 2002 with the Bush administration's tacit approval.

Officials from the agency for international development did not withhold all of the identities of its grant recipients in Venezuela, as if to point out that some of the aid went to groups receiving charity in the form of baseball equipment and roofing materials. One $15,728 grant for a nutrition program went to the municipal government of Baruta, an area of Caracas whose mayor, Henrique Capriles Radonski, is an outspoken critic of Mr. Chávez.

American officials here and in Washington say the aim of the assistance is to bring opponents and supporters of Mr. Chávez together to discuss ways to prevent the erosion of democratic freedoms.

"U.S. activities, as has been publicly discussed on numerous occasions, focus on strengthening civil society in Venezuela, which is a critical element for any healthy democracy," David Snider, an international development agency spokesman in Washington, said in a statement.

"These nonpartisan activities are no different than those activities that U.S.A.I.D. supports in many other countries throughout the world," he added.

But some grants were directed at organizations whose stated objectives seemed to look for potential weaknesses in Mr. Chávez's administration. One $33,304 grant in March 2005 was called "Land Redistribution Dos and Don'ts," and required its unidentified recipient to investigate agricultural policies in areas where the federal government had been carrying out land expropriations.

Other grants had what appeared to be an objective of building support for potential rivals to Mr. Chávez. A $47,459 grant, for instance, was made in July 2005 to an organization whose goal was to meet with organizations to build a "democratic leadership campaign."

The agency's grants in Venezuela have raised concern among some political analysts who see parallels in efforts by Washington to destabilize the socialist government of Salvador Allende in Chile in the early 1970s or attempts to influence the domestic political system of Nicaragua in the 1980s.

"I wouldn't feel comfortable with the Chinese government doing something like this in the U.S.," said Jeremy Bigwood, an international policy analyst at the Center for Economic Policy and Research in Washington. Mr. Bigwood filed a pending lawsuit against the agency for international development this year asking that it name its recipients. He said not doing so changed it from a "civilian to a clandestine service."

Meanwhile, a backlash to the American financing has been building. Prosecutors filed conspiracy charges against leaders of Súmate, a voter education group, after it received $31,000 from the National Endowment for Democracy, another entity backed by the United States government that distributes money to groups in Venezuela.

A proposed law is also making its way through the National Assembly that would regulate international financing of nongovernmental organizations. The bill, which has been criticized by anticorruption groups like Transparency International, has been held up until after the election.

Increased scrutiny by the government here of the American financing has been described as hypocritical by some analysts at a time when Venezuela has increased its own foreign aid in an attempt to influence the political direction of countries like Bolivia and Nicaragua.

"The thinking goes that if it's for the revolution, then by definition it is correct," said Aníbal Romero, a professor of political science at Simón Bolívar University. "But if the money comes from Washington, then it's definitely wrong."

Mexico's Calderon Heartened By Outcome Of U.S. Elections (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon said yesterday that Democratic gains in Congress could lead to "room for improvement" in U.S.-Mexican relations, a suggestion that headway may be made on immigration and other bilateral issues.

At a White House meeting with President Bush today, Calderon, who takes office on Dec. 1, is expected to express Mexico's disappointment with the decision by the outgoing Republican-controlled House and Senate to approve a 700-mile fence along the Mexican-American border, an effort to stem the flow of millions of migrant workers.

During a meeting yesterday with Washington Post reporters and editors, Calderon said the outcome of Tuesday's midterm elections allowed for "some room for improvement in terms of bilateral relations."

"I know President Bush is facing a difficult moment," he said. "But I think there is an opportunity. After the elections, I hope Americans and Congress will have a chance for rational debate."

Calderon, a Harvard-educated economist and a member of the conservative National Action Party, made job creation a central platform of his campaign. He returned to that theme yesterday, saying that new jobs and foreign investment in Mexico would be more effective than a fence as a tool against migration.

His predecessor, current President Vicente Fox, made the same arguments against the fence, to no avail.

"Now maybe you have people crossing the border looking for capital," Calderon said. "We need capital crossing the border looking for people."

Calderon also said that the North American Free Trade Agreement had been a boon for Mexico but that more needed to be done to make the economy more competitive. He said that only by reducing tariffs, eliminating other regulations and enforcing the rule of law could Mexico be seen as a destination for foreign investment.

Mexico also has recently been suffering from increased violence. Calder?n acknowledged the months-long protests that have shut down the city of Oaxaca and expressed hopes that order would be restored. His home state of Michoacan, as well as the neighboring state of Guerrero, have seen a wave of violence, including decapitations, shootings and bombings. Much of that violence has appeared to be drug-related.

Yesterday, the president-elect acknowledged that there had been "a deterioration in the environment in Mexico."

"Probably, the main challenge I will have to face is how to strengthen institutions and the rule of law and to stop the loss of respect in authority."

Calderon, 44, waged an intense campaign against Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, the populist former mayor of Mexico City. The results of the July 2 vote were contested, leading to weeks of appeals to electoral courts and protests in the capital's streets by Lopez Obrador supporters. Calderon was declared president-elect Sept. 5.

DOJ_NMG_0092381

Yesterday, Calderon suggested that divisions created by the controversy were fading. He also expressed hope that, as a former member of the National Congress, he would be well-positioned to reach out to the opposition.

Bush To Meet Mexican President-elect (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

President Bush will find out today if good fences do make good neighbors when he sits down with Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon for their first face-to-face conversation.

The two men say they will talk about free trade, economic growth and security -- but the hottest topic is likely to be immigration, and Mr. Bush's signature two weeks ago on a bill to erect 698 miles of fence on the international boundary between the two nations.

Mr. Calderon criticized the fence yesterday in a meeting with Hispanic groups, saying he sees "the U.S.-Mexico border not covered in walls and barbed wire, but as an area of opportunity and prosperity for Mexicans and Americans both."

Neither side would say whether the fence was specifically on today's agenda. Mexican officials said it was more important at this stage that the two men have a chance to meet and establish a relationship, and Mr. Calderon tried to play down expectations this week, calling it a chance "to establish a first contact."

A White House official said having the meeting even before Mr. Calderon's Dec. 1 inauguration "reflects the importance we attach to continued strong ties with our hemispheric partner and neighbor."

The Mexican president-elect made his first international visit last month to Canada to meet with Prime Minister Stephen Harper on the day Mr. Bush signed the fence act. The visit was a clear signal, said Larry Birns, director of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs, a Washington-based think tank.

"That was noted by everyone. That was noted as almost a sign of aggressive sovereignty on Calderon's part," Mr. Birns said.

At a press conference after that meeting, Mr. Calderon was harshly critical of the fence, and he isn't the only leader protesting. Over the weekend, leaders from Latin America, Spain and Portugal, meeting in an Ibero-American summit, said the fence "incites discrimination and xenophobia."

Mr. Bush previously has spoken with Mr. Calderon by phone, calling in the days after Mexico's election to congratulate him on securing the most votes, even though he had not yet been declared the winner.

At 44, Mr. Calderon will be among the youngest presidents in Mexico's history. He is from the same party as outgoing President Vicente Fox, who is leaving because of Mexico's one-term limit on the office.

Like Mr. Fox and, for that matter, Mr. Bush, Mr. Calderon studied at Harvard, earning a master's degree in public administration from the Kennedy School of Government.

Mr. Birns said today's meeting could be the beginning of a productive working relationship because the two men need each other. In addition to border issues, he said Mr. Bush also might take the opportunity to sound out Mr. Calderon, a former energy secretary, on energy policy.

"They can help each other, and the help is largely on the border, but I also think Bush may very well make a reference to energy because that in a sense is even more important to Bush right now," Mr. Birns said.

Asked recently about Mr. Calderon's statements on the fence, White House press secretary Tony Snow focused on the cooperation both nations have shown on the border in fighting drug trafficking. Mr. Snow also said Mr. Bush is considering a host of measures on the border.

"The president understands the sensitivities, but on the other hand, he also understands the importance of securing the border," Mr. Snow said.

Immigration Expected To Dominate Calderón-Bush Talks (CSM)

By Sara Miller Llana

The Christian Science Monitor, November 9, 2006

Posted November 09, 2006 - http://www.csmonitor.com/2006/1109/p25s01-woam.html Immigration expected to dominate Calder?n-Bush talks Mexico's conservative president-elect, Felipe Calder?n, makes his first White House visit Thursday.

By Sara Miller Llana | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

MEXICO CITY

The nearly 700 miles of fencing President Bush authorized for the US-Mexican border two weeks ago could overshadow other issues when Mexican president-elect Felipe Calderón makes his first visit to the White House on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0092382

Unlike recently elected leftist leaders in Latin America, Mr. Calderón is a pro-business, US-friendly candidate who narrowly won July's presidential election against a leftist leader.

Yet, the additional fencing Mr. Bush approved threatens to create a political barrier even before Calderón officially takes office on Dec. 1.

On a recent trip to Canada, Mexico's president-elect compared the fence to the "Berlin Wall," the former barrier between Communist East and democratic West Berlin.

"The most important thing for him is to end the monothematic tone [between the two nations]," says Luis Rubio, president of the Center of Research for Development, a think tank in Mexico City. He says the US-Mexican relationship, dominated by drug trafficking in the 1980s, now is being driven by differences over US immigration policy.

The US border fence, meant to enhance security and deter illegal immigration, is one step in a comprehensive immigration reform plan that Bush hopes can later include a guest-worker program and amnesty plan for some undocumented immigrants. Half of the estimated 11 million undocumented migrants living in the US are believed to be Mexican.

Monday, Calderón said the US-Mexican relationship is the "most delicate, most complex, and most important" in terms of Mexican foreign policy.

He did not say whether he would reiterate Mexico's objection to the law authorizing a major extension of the fence, which Mexican officials say will cause more deaths by making it even harder for would-be immigrants to cross the border. "The only thing [the wall] will do is create more death," says legislator José Edmundo Ramírez Martínez, an opposition Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) member and secretary of the immigration committee in Mexico's Congress.

Immigration was not among the main issues on the original agenda for Thursday's meeting. White House spokesman Tony Snow said last month that the discussion would focus on competitiveness, free trade, economic growth, and security in North America.

Calderón may have wanted to avoid immigration altogether given the failure of outgoing president and fellow National Action Party (PAN) party member Vicente Fox to get what he called the "whole enchilada": Mexico's leader had hoped to convince the Bush administration to push through the guest-worker plan and a path to citizenship for many undocumented Mexican workers.

"We didn't even get a nacho," says Mr. Ramírez Martínez.

Bush's move to authorize the fence underscored the Fox administration's failure to help Mexicans working illegally in the US and appears to have forced his successor to make it a priority. "If the US had not passed a law authorizing 700 miles of fencing, he could almost ignore immigration entirely. It was such a failure for Fox," says David Shirk, director of the Transborder Institute at the University of San Diego. "Now he can't ignore it."

Mr. Shirk says Calderón's No. 1 task should be to address the economic inequality in Mexico underscored by the country's July presidential race. Leftist candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador, who attracted the nation's poor, lost by half a percentage point and challenged the legitimacy of the election during a seven-week sit-in in Mexico City.

"The way [Calderón] rose to power requires his single-minded focus be on economic development if he is to legitimatize his presidency," says Shirk. He'll need to "enlist US support in a variety of ways to make it happen."

Calderón has floated a plan to put the country on the list of the world's fastest growing economies. "Mexico 2030" aims to help reduce extreme poverty by boosting annual per-capita income from $8,000 today to $30,000 over the next 25 years. Calderón hopes that improving conditions at home will reduce the number of Mexicans seeking opportunities in the US.

Calderón's top foreign adviser, Arturo Sarukhan, said Friday that the president-elect plans to meet in Washington with officials at the Inter-American Development Bank and the World Bank. Under discussion: programs that will create infrastructure and capitalize on the $19 billion Mexican immigrants in the US send home each year.

Ramírez Martínez, the lawmaker, says it is imperative that the president-elect discuss the wall with US officials. "We want him to go to the meeting with an agenda to talk about a migration policy - not just economics, commerce and free trade, but a new discussion about a migration policy."

Mexican Leader Assails Border Fence Plan (AP-Y)

By George Gedda

AP, November 9, 2006

Preparing for a meeting with President Bush, Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon made clear Wednesday his unhappiness with U.S. border security measures, saying the two countries need "bridges for progress and not walls that isolate and divide."

U.S. steps to stem the flow of migrants across the border were expected to dominate Bush's discussions with Calderon, who takes office Dec. 1.

DOJ_NMG_0092383

Mexico has been highly critical of the U.S. plan to build a 700-mile fence along the border. Bush signed the law authorizing the fence on Oct. 26.

Calderon noted that barbed wire is also part of the U.S. border control apparatus.

The border region "should not be a zone of barbed wire but a zone of opportunities," Calderon said, according to a translation of his remarks.

He spoke to a gathering of some 200 Hispanic leaders here. He meets with Bush on Thursday after a breakfast meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Also scheduled to attend the breakfast were Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

Calderon acknowledged Wednesday that illegal border-crossings into the United States are an unpleasant issue for both countries.

"Migration is not a desirable issue for anybody," he said. "It awakens enormous sensibilities in the United States and was at the center of the debate in the (Tuesday) elections.

And, he said, "it takes away the most daring part of our population and divides our families."

In a statement issued Wednesday from Mexico City, U.S. ambassador Antonio Garza said Bush and Calderon planned to discuss border problems caused by criminals and narco-traffickers.

Other possible topics, Garza said, include further reductions in limits to free trade and finding ways to ensure "how both people and goods can cross our border in a legal, orderly, and more efficient way."

Turkey Given Month To Rescue EU Bid (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And George Parker In Brussels And Vincent Boland In Ankara

Financial Times, November 9, 2006

Turkey was on Wednesday given a month to rescue its bid to join the European Union, as Brussels sought to allay public concerns that the EU is expanding too far and too fast. In response, Ankara said it was up to the 25-nation bloc to keep the negotiations alive.

“It is clear that Turkey is not fulfilling its obligations,” Philippe Douste-Blazy, France’s foreign minister, said yesterday. Unless Ankara changed its behaviour, “it seems to me necessary to review Turkey’s EU membership timetable”.

The issue is set to come to a head at an EU summit next month. But Olli Rehn, EU enlargement commissioner, held out hope that the looming “train wreck” over Turkey’s membership could yet be averted. “While there’s a will, there’s a way,” he said.

The European Commission had been considering whether to recommend the formal suspension of three or more of the 34 remaining negotiating “chapters” of Turkey’s membership talks because of Ankara’s failure to meet a key EU demand over Cyprus.

On Wednesday Mr Rehn announced that the Commission would not make a recommendation at this stage.

Officials said that Brussels would probably set out the likely penalties for Turkey in early to mid-December, ahead of the EU summit. But Mr Rehn’s staff fears that if the EU takes too tough a stance with Ankara, either the talks will prove impossible to revive or Turkey will choose to walk away.

“At this point, much of the responsibility for continuing the [EU] accession process lies with the EU rather than with Turkey,” said the Turkish government in an official statement. Ankara added that the issue of Cyprus should not be linked to its own membership bid.

But the Turkish statement appeared to acknowledge that its preparations for EU membership needed to be stepped up. “We will correct the problems stemming from implementation,” said Abdullah Gul, Turkish foreign minister.

Wednesday’s Commission report highlighted the issue that could bring the negotiations to a halt – the country’s refusal to open up its ports to vessels from Cyprus, which is an EU member but which does not have diplomatic ties with Ankara.

The report also criticised Turkey for letting the pace of reform slow and expressed its concern over prosecutions of writers and journalists for criticising “Turkishness” and the Turkish state. The report voiced the Commission’s concern that Turkey’s judiciary was not yet sufficiently independent, that its military was not fully under civilian control and that some cases of torture were still being reported.

Mr Rehn said he hoped the Turkish parliament would amend the article in the country’s penal code that the Commission believes restricts freedom of speech. He added that a Finnish attempt to broker a deal between Turkey, Cyprus and the self-styled Republic of Northern Cyprus was “the last opportunity to make serious progress for some years to come on this issue”.

Such a deal would remove the biggest threat to Turkey’s candidacy. However, many EU diplomats believe the likelihood of a Finnish breakthrough is slim. A ministerial meeting scheduled for last Sunday to reach a deal was cancelled.

DOJ_NMG_0092384

Under the Finnish proposal, the Northern Cypriot port of Famagusta would come under EU management and be opened to trade with the rest of the EU. At the same time, the UN would take charge of the neighbouring town of Varosha, to which the internationally recognised Greek Cypriot government lays claim.

Mr Rehn also addressed wider public fears about the pace of EU expansion with new guidelines for future enlargements, but insisted the EU should not slam the door on any country with ambitions to join the club.

His paper on the union's "capacity to integrate new members" said any future enlargement should only come after the union had modernised its creaking institutions, probably by salvaging parts of the moribund EU constitution.

Learning the lessons of the difficult negotiations with Bulgaria and Romania – which will join the EU on January 1 – Mr Rehn said that future talks would have to tackle crime and corruption at an earlier stage.

But both he and José Manuel Barroso, European Commission president, have resisted pressure from politicians in France, Germany and elsewhere to make the EU's "absorption capacity" a new condition for membership and have refused to define the eventual eastern borders of the club.

Turks' Bid To Join Europe Stalls On Cyprus And Rights, Official Warns (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky And James Kanter

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

ISTANBUL, Nov. 8 — The governing commission of the European Union on Wednesday issued its strongest warning yet to Turkey to open its ports to Cyprus and make more progress on human rights or face a possible suspension of talks over allowing the country to join the organization.

Speaking after the release of a report highly critical of Turkey's efforts to make changes requested by the European Union, Olli Rehn, the union's expansion commissioner, delivered what appeared to be an ultimatum to Turkey: soften the intransigence over Cyprus or risk the collapse of the European Union bid.

"Failure to implement obligations will affect the overall progress of negotiations," Mr. Rehn warned. "This is likely to be the last opportunity to make real, serious progress for some years to come on the issue of Cyprus."

Turkey has refused to meet an end-of-year deadline set by the European Union to open its ports and airports to the Greek-speaking part of Cyprus, which belongs to the organization. Turkey insists it will not compromise on Cyprus unless the European Union lifts a trade embargo against the northern Turkish side of Cyprus.

The report, which also highlighted shortcomings on issues like minority rights and freedom of speech, did not call for an immediate halt in the talks with Turkey. But European Union officials said the harsh tone of the report made it increasingly likely that a summit meeting of European Union leaders in mid-December would at least consider a partial suspension of the negotiations.

"The pace has slowed during the past year and significant further efforts are needed," the report said.

The Turkish prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, sought to play down the criticism. "For us, the E.U. process maintains its importance," he said. "Our aim is to achieve the maximum possible. Our struggle will continue."

A poll published here on Tuesday by the International Strategic Research Organization showed that two-thirds of Turks would rather suspend membership talks with the European Union than give ground over Cyprus. "If the E.U. fulfills its promise to end the isolation of Northern Cyprus, then we will open our ports," said Egemen Bagis, a senior adviser to Mr. Erdogan and a member of the governing Justice and Development Party. "If European leaders want reforms to continue in Turkey, if they want their safety to be assured in an unstable region, if they want to assure an alternative energy supply, then they should show us some encouragement," he said.

In the cafes, mosques and streets of Istanbul, the overwhelming feeling was indifference. "Here we go again, yet another report from the E.U. criticizing us," said Gurol Yilmaz, 24, a waiter at a cafe in the bustling Taksim neighborhood. "Most Turks don't really care. The E.U. will never accept a Muslim country."

Membership talks between Turkey, with 70 million people, and the European Union cannot continue apace if Turkey fails to meet its obligations toward the organization by the end of the year, the German chancellor, Angela Merkel, warned Wednesday. "Otherwise, the E.U. will have to draw the appropriate consequences," she said. "A simple 'Let's keep on going as before' will not be possible."

The report also rebuked Turkey for its failure to meet minimum standards on human rights and cited concerns over the rights of women, Kurds and religious minorities.

Disease Expert From China Is Nominated As WHO Director (WSJ)

By Betsy McKay

Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092385

The World Health Organization nominated Chinese infectious-diseases expert Margaret Chan to lead the United Nations health agency, underscoring China's rising prominence and mounting pressure on the Chinese government to improve its cooperation on global health crises such as avian flu.

The landslide victory by Dr. Chan, 59 years old, over four other finalists in voting by WHO's 34-country executive board essentially assures her of a 5½-year term as the next director-general of the agency, one of the most important leadership positions in public health. The nomination faces a vote today by the full WHO governing body; no one proposed by the executive board has ever been rejected for the top job.

China campaigned hard for Dr. Chan. The push, led by Vice Premier Wu Yi and President Hu Jintao, was unusual because the five permanent-member countries of the U.N.'s Security Council, which includes China, traditionally haven't backed candidates to lead WHO. Sha Zukang, China's ambassador to Switzerland, said Dr. Chan's selection is a landmark for China. "We know there are great responsibilities and high expectations," he said.

While it isn't clear exactly what swayed 24 of 34 countries to support Dr. Chan in four rapid rounds of voting in a closed-door meeting in Geneva, she is known for having a combination of scientific skill, on-the-ground experience and political dexterity that will be needed to navigate challenges such as halting the spread of pandemic flu.

China has been criticized for failing to disclose cases of avian flu and severe acute respiratory syndrome, and for not sharing virus samples that could speed research and vaccine development. The Chinese government has been more forthcoming recently, and its staunch support of Dr. Chan's candidacy suggests officials are willing to make further changes.

"This is a moment of personal honor and deep personal responsibility," Dr. Chan said in a brief speech yesterday. "I do not take this lightly." She insisted during her campaign that she wouldn't bend to Chinese political interests.

A top official at China's Ministry of Health said yesterday that government officials "try our best to cooperate with the international community."

When asked whether China would try to influence Dr. Chan, a former schoolteacher who got a medical degree from the University of Western Ontario in Canada, the official responded: "No one from China will say we will sacrifice ourselves to meet the expectations of other parties...If the WHO, when they are dealing with the relations with China...don't take into consideration the Chinese people, there will be a problem."

The U.S. is one of the countries believed to have voted for Dr. Chan, who emerged as the heavy favorite in five rounds of voting Monday that narrowed the field to five finalists.

Mike Leavitt, U.S. Secretary of Health and Human Services and leader of the U.S. delegation in Geneva, said he is "confident she will ensure WHO's role as the premier global health agency, guided by scientific excellence and well-prepared to meet the many challenges it faces."

As Hong Kong's top health official, Dr. Chan showed the mettle to make controversial decisions, including culling 1.5 million poultry feared to be spreading the H5N1 avian-flu virus to humans in 1997. The move exacted a brutal economic toll on farmers but helped stamp out the world's first outbreak of the virus. That strategy now is the standard approach to controlling avian flu.

DOJ_NMG_0092386

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, November 09, 2006 8:19 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Thursday, November 09, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061109.pdf; agnb061109.doc

In observance of the federal Veterans Day holiday, the Attorney General's News Briefing and Department of Justice News Clips will not be published on Friday, November 10.

This morning's Attorney General's News Briefing is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Holiday Publishing Notice 3
Three Alleged Hamas Militants On Trial For Jordan Terror Plot 3
Four Northwest Ecoterror Suspects Reach Plea Agreements ..3

Patriot Act:

Civil Liberties Groups Foresee Democratic Action Against Surveillance Programs 3

Homeland Response:

Human Rights Panel Considers Resolution Pressing FBI About Hamoodi Search 3
FBI Evacuates Ft. Hood Housing Over Material Found In Iraq Soldier's Luggage 4
NRC To Analyze Survivability Of New Reactor Designs 4

War News:

Rumsfeld Resigns, Bush Nominates Gates To Succeed Him At Pentagon 4
Khalilzad Expects No Major Shift In US Iraq Policy 8
Bombs Kill Eight Sadr City Youths On Soccer Field 9
Maliki Predicts Saddam Hanging This Year 9
Suicide Bombing Kills At Least 42 Pakistani Soldiers Near Afghan Border 9

Corporate Scandals:

Former US Foodservice Official Convicted Of Securities Fraud 10
UnitedHealth Executives Forfeit $390 Million In Stock Options 10
Fannie Mae To Spend $1 Billion On Accounting Review 10
SEC To Relax Audit Rules For Small Firms 11

Criminal Law:

Jefferson, Carter Begin Month-Long Runoff Campaign 11
FBI Searches Offices Of Kentucky Judge-Executive 12
Grand Jury Subpoenas Chicago City Worker Injury Claim Records 12
Malvo Sentenced To Six Life Terms For DC-Area Sniper Shootings 12
US Charges Montana PI With Defrauding Law Firms 13
Former Penn Professor Charged With Child Porn 13
Senior Gotti's Mob Allies Lambasted Victoria Gotti Reality Show 13
Former Employee Charged With Sabotaging Florida Theater Chain Ticket System 13

Civil Law:

Judge Rules Group Can Subpoena White House Documents In Plan B Lawsuit 13
Supreme Court Hears Challenge To Federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban 14

Civil Rights:

Few Polling Problems Seen, Review Could Presage Changes For 2008 15
Anti-Affirmative Action Initiative Passes By Wide Margin In Michigan 16
Seven States Pass Marriage Definition Initiatives 17
South Dakota Voters Reject Restrictive Abortion Ban 17
Los Angeles Firefighter Settles Racial Harassment Suit 17
Maryland Police Say Stun Guns Effective In Averting Trouble 17

Antitrust:

Dingell Wants FCC To Delay AT&T-BellSouth Vote 18
Liz Clairborne To Purchase Kate Spade For $124 Million 18
Spain's Iberdrola Considers Offer For Scottish Power 18

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Revokes Boston Police Officer's Bail 18
FBI, Chicago Police Arrest 17 Alleged Drug Gang Members 19
19 Suspected Gang Members Arrested In Ohio On Drug, Weapons Charges 19

Trial Begins For Arkansas Alderman Accused Of Selling Xanax, Crack 19
Marijuana Initiative Passes In Montana, Relaxes Enforcement Of Some Offenses 19
Three California Cities Lean Toward Relaxing Marijuana Laws 19
Colorado Marijuana Measure Defeated By Wide Margin 20
Judge In Montana Denies Claim Under Medical Marijuana Act 21
City Council In California Seeks To Ban Marijuana Dispensaries 21
Federal, State Agents Arrest Arkansas Militia Member On Weapons Charges 21

Immigration:

US Cracks Down On Fraudulent Immigrant Marriages 21
Arizona Voters Seen As Helping Boost Comprehensive Immigration Reform 22

Tax:

Rangel Says He Won't Roll Back Bush Tax Cuts 22

Congress-Administration:

Pelosi Vows Swift Action On Democratic Agenda 23
Murtha, Hoyer Line Up Support For Majority Leader Post 26
Angry Conservatives Blame GOP Leadership For Losses 27
Democratic House Majority Could Continue To Grow 28
Biden Says At Meetings, Bush Tells Cheney To "Shut Up" Or "Something To That Effect." 29
Bush To Meet With Big Three Executives 29
Bush To Examine Bill To Give DC House Voting Rights 29

Other News:

Bush Says Election Was A "Thumping." 30
Democratic Lobbyists Eager To Share Spoils Of Victory 33
AP Declares Webb Victor, Allen Reportedly To Concede 33
Midterm Elections Scramble 2008 Candidacies 35
Patrick To Become Nation's Second-Ever Black Governor 35
Minnesota Elects Nation's First Muslim Congressman 35
Stock Markets Make Gains 35
McCain Resigns From Board Of Gallaudet Over Ouster Of Incoming President 36
WPost Praises Ford's Call For More Civil Political Campaigns 36
Russia Rejects Proposed UN Sanctions On Iran 36
After Shelling Kills 18 In Gaza, Hamas Vows Retaliation Against US, Israel 36
Reid Calls Bush's India Nuke Deal A Priority 37
UN Urges US To End Cuba Embargo 37
US Seeks To Establish "Positive Relations" With Ortega 37
Chavez Leads "Global Chorus" Of Bush Critics In Democrats' Victory 38
Immigration Expected To Dominate Calderon, Bush Talks 38
EU Issues Warning To Turkey Over Bid 38
WHO Nominates Chinese Disease Expert As New Director 39

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 39

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 40

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0092389

TERRORISM NEWS:

Holiday Publishing Notice. In observance of the federal Veterans Day holiday, the Attorney General's News Briefing will not be published on Friday, November 10. News from the holiday will be included in your Monday, November 13 briefing.

Three Alleged Hamas Militants On Trial For Jordan Terror Plot. The AP (11/9) reports from Amman, Jordan, "Three Hamas militants went on trial Wednesday for conspiring to attack Israeli businessmen, Jordanian intelligence officers and various other locations in Jordan." The AP continues, "Ayman Naji Daraghmeh, 34, Ahmed Abu Rabee, 27, and Ahmed Abu Thiyab, appeared in court but did not submit pleas because they have not appointed lawyers. The trial adjourned to Nov. 15 to allow the defendants time to obtain counsel. … The defendants were also charged with illegal possession of weapons and ammunition." The AP adds, "In April, Jordanian authorities arrested 20 alleged Hamas militants on suspicion of monitoring Jordanian intelligence officers and foreigner tourists to plan for possible attacks. Authorities released all but the three, apparently for lack of evidence. … Al-Daraghmeh gave authorities the location of several weapons caches, the indictment sheet said. .. .The three, Jordanians of Palestinian origin, confessed in May on Jordanian state TV to conspiring to carry out terrorist attacks and to acquiring weapons and ammunition for Hamas. Al-Daraghmeh said he received he received orders from a high level Hamas leader living in Syria."

Four Northwest Ecoterror Suspects Reach Plea Agreements. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/9, Barnard) reports, "Four people awaiting trial on charges they were part of an ecoterrorism cell that caused $20 million in damages from firebombings around the Northwest are due in federal court on Thursday to change their pleas," although defense lawyers and prosecutors "refused to comment on terms of the plea agreements." The AP notes, "A total of 13 people were indicted out of Eugene as part of an investigation known as Operation Backfire. Six have pleaded guilty, agreeing to testify against the others, and three are fugitives. … The Oregon defendants were charged with arsons from 1996 to 2001 that were claimed by the Earth Liberation Front and the Animal Liberation Front in Oregon, Washington, California, Wyoming and Colorado."

PATRIOT ACT:

Civil Liberties Groups Foresee Democratic Action Against Surveillance Programs. Government Executive/National Journal's Technology Daily (11/8, Noyes) reported, "The new Democratic-led House could bode well for the civil-liberties crowd." ACLU Washington office director Caroline Fredrickson "said the shift in leadership may mean 'a very profound change' in how lawmakers address the electronic wiretapping initiative of the National Security Agency." However, Center for Democracy and Technology director Leslie Harris said that "there will probably not be 'dramatic rollbacks of national-security-related legislation,' like the controversial sections of the USA PATRIOT Act that were reinstated by the 109th Congress, Harris said. One provision involves a special subpoena power that lets the FBI scour library and Internet provider files without search warrants." Technology Daily added, "Lisa Graves, deputy director for the Center for National Security Studies, said missteps that have been taken by the Joint Terrorism Task Force, a partnership between the FBI and local law enforcement agencies aimed at tackling terrorism, also must be examined. In particular, she cited reports revealed through Freedom of Information Act requests that the task force has spied on Americans who oppose the Iraq war and other administration policies."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Human Rights Panel Considers Resolution Pressing FBI About Hamoodi Search. The Columbia (MO) Tribune (11/8, LeBlanc) reported, "The Columbia Human Rights Commission will consider asking the city council to approve a resolution in support of an Iraqi-American man whose southwest Columbia home was raided by the FBI. … The FBI has since repeatedly declined to give a reason for the search involving the 54-year-old grocery store owner," Shakir Hamoodi, "who also has been an outspoken critic of the Iraq war." At a Tuesday evening meeting, "supporters of Hamoodi urged commission members to accept a draft resolution that calls for the government to speed up its investigation and publicly release its findings. The measure also asks the FBI to apologize to Hamoodi and his family for searching the home." However, "commission members expressed some reservations about whether forwarding the resolution to the city council would be appropriate. In the end, the human rights panel agreed to consider the measure -- but only with the consent of Hamoodi, who was not present." The Tribune noted, "Jeff Lanza, a spokesman for the FBI office in Kansas City, declined to offer more information on the Hamoodi case."

DOJ_NMG_0092390

FBI Evacuates Ft. Hood Housing Over Material Found In Iraq Soldier's Luggage. KCEN-TV Temple, TX (11/8) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Part of a housing development on Fort Hood remained evacuated through Wednesday night. An F.B.I. spokesperson said a soldier returned from Iraq and noticed items missing from his luggage. Replacing those items was a jar filled with an unfamiliar substance." KCEN added, "Initial testing by the F.B.I. and Fort Hood showed it might have dangerous materials, but upon further testing, it was found not to be hazardous. Fort Hood is still investigating its origins."

NRC To Analyze Survivability Of New Reactor Designs. Under the headline, "Agency Considers A-Plants' Vulnerability," the New York Times (11/9, Wald, 1.16M) reports, "With construction of many new nuclear reactors under discussion, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission is grappling with the question of whether they should be designed to withstand a Sept. 11-style airplane attack. The commission has told its staff to study the vulnerabilities of the four new reactor designs, two of which it has already approved. But it has decided not to make the nuclear power industry meet security requirements any tougher than those for existing plants." The Times says NRC Commissioner Gregory "Jaczko said in an interview, 'We've left it in the hands of Transportation Security Administration, the Federal Aviation Administration and the reactor vendors, who are building these plants, to do what they think is right in this area, and to me that's clearly not the answer.'" But Commissioner "Edward McGaffigan Jr., said, 'We think we've done enough.'"

WAR NEWS:

Rumsfeld Resigns, Bush Nominates Gates To Succeed Him At Pentagon. Reports on the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld after nearly six years in that job, and President Bush's nomination of Texas A&M University President Robert M. Gates, CIA director from 1991-1993, to replace him, are interspersed with overview stories on Bush's Wednesday news conference and on the aftermath of this week's midterm elections. The resignation leads many of these reports, which generally show Rumsfeld in a negative light, casting his "ouster" as a response to perceived voter rejection of the Bush Administration's Iraq policies. Several also suggest that Gates' service under the first President Bush and his participation in James Baker's Iraq Study Group indicate Baker will have a key behind-the-scenes role in reshaping the Iraq agenda.

ABC World News (11/8, lead story, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) opened by saying "all indications are that voters were looking for change yesterday...and change, they will get." ABC (Raddatz) added, "The President had a very different tone today. But as for that surprise Rumsfeld resignation, a White House official said it had been in the works for weeks. If the President was looking for a way to change the headlines, today, he found it." Sen. John McCain was shown saying, "There were many of us that expressed a lack of confidence in Rumsfeld for a long time."

The CBS Evening News (11/8, lead story, 3:00, Couric, 7.66M) led by saying, "The Democrats are in, Donald Rumsfeld is out. It's a tidal wave of change." CBS (Axelrod) added, "Bush met the big loss with a big change, firing" Rumsfeld, the "highly divisive and polarizing figure and replacing him with a veteran of his father's Administration."

NBC Nightly News (11/8, lead story, 4:00, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "As if the election results...were not big enough, the President's response to them today overshadowed that news. Aides say the President decided to replace Rumsfeld now, hope to persuade Americans angry about the war that a change in course is coming. In the Oval Office this afternoon a grim-faced president took a step his critics say was overdue." In another report, NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 2, 2:00, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) said the "usually feisty if not combative Rumsfeld appeared subdued and reflective, calling it a privilege to serve with the young men and women of the military."

DOJ_NMG_0092391

On CNN's The Situation Room (11/8), Pentagon correspondent Jamie McIntyre said, "Nobody saw this coming, as far as I can tell. Most of the key Rumsfeld aides who came in this morning were in meetings with him and he didn't give a clue that this was up until about mid-morning, when he started to brief some of the senior people. So, a big shock, particularly because President Bush had just given him another endorsement."

A front-page Washington Post (11/9, Fletcher, Baker, 690K) headline reads "Bush Ousts Embattled Rumsfeld; Democrats Near Control Of Senate," a prime example of how the media is connecting the elections with the Secretary's exit. The Post leads by saying Bush said his party "took what he described as a 'thumping'" Tuesday, and he "ousted" Rumsfeld, saying "a 'fresh perspective' is needed to guide the military through the difficult war in Iraq." Under the front-page headline "A Meek Departure From The War Cabinet," a second Washington Post (11/9, Ricks, Abramowitz, 690K) story says that "though Bush affectionately patted Rumsfeld on the shoulder as he ushered him out of the Oval Office, there was little sugarcoating the reality" that Rumsfeld "was being offered as a sacrificial lamb amid the repudiation of Bush and his Iraq policy that the American electorate delivered on Tuesday."

A front-page New York Times (11/9, Stolberg, Rutenberg, 1.16M) headline also connects the elections and the resignation, putting Rumsfeld's departure on the same line as the close Senate race in Virginia. That story says that "just days after telling reporters that he would keep Mr. Rumsfeld on for the rest of his term, Mr. Bush said that the two had agreed 'after a series of thoughtful conversations' that it was time for Mr. Rumsfeld, a magnet for criticism about management of the war, to go." USA Today (11/9, Page, Kelley, 2.27M) says in its front-page story that "after the worst setback for Republicans on Capitol Hill since Watergate, the president sought to rescue the final two years of his tenure from being paralyzed by an increasingly violent and unpopular war."

The AP (11/8, Burns, Shrader) reports Bush announced Rumsfeld's resignation "within hours of the Democrats' triumph in congressional elections," and "reached back to his father's administration" for a successor. The Chicago Tribune (11/9, Hedges, Silva, 617K) also puts the election's role in its lead, saying Rumsfeld resigned "within hours of a stunning Republican setback" in elections that "became a referendum on President Bush's strategy for the war in Iraq and on Rumsfeld's stormy stewardship of the Pentagon."

The Baltimore Sun (11/9, Davis, 257K) says replacing Rumsfeld "was a stunning turn for a president who has staked his legacy -- and, to some degree, the fortunes of his party -- on a war plan that has lost the support of most Americans." The Financial Times (11/9, Luce, Daniel, Sevastopulo) says Rumsfeld "became a casualty of the Republican party's unexpectedly heavy defeat." On Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (11/8), Dick Morris said, "I was surprised. How about September? How about doing it in August or July? If he'd done that months before, he could have won this election. … I think that the country was waiting for some indication from Bush that he got it. And there was no indication."

The Washington Times (11/9, Scarborough, 88K) headlines its story "Rumsfeld Resigns Under Pressure," saying in its lead that "the icon of the U.S. war on Islamic terrorists…succumbed to mounting pressure to resign." Rumsfeld "referred to his many critics on Iraq by paraphrasing a hero, Winston Churchill: 'I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof.'"

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, King, Dreazen, Jaffe, 2.04M) says in the lead of its front-page story that Rumsfeld's resignation "opens the door for the biggest change of U.S. policy in Iraq since American troops got bogged down there three years ago." But as the Christian Science Monitor (11/9, Grier, 59K) writes, by "changing the leadership of the Department of Defense," Bush" has not necessarily changed his policies in Iraq." Still, he "may have changed the tone of Washington's debate about Iraq, at least for now." In an analysis, the Washington Post (11/9, A25, Kessler, Ricks, 690K) says Democratic control on Capitol Hill and Rumsfeld's exit have "set the stage for a dramatic shift in the Bush administration's policy toward the Iraq war."

The AP (11/8, Baldor) said the "square-jawed face of the war, the man behind the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that he predicted were just the beginnings of a long, hard slog," became the "latest casualty of those conflicts -- a victim of a war he steadfastly contended the American public simply did not understand."

On the CBS Evening News (11/8, story 4, 0:45, Couric, 7.66M), retired Maj. Gen. John Batiste, an early Rumsfeld critic, called him "arrogant, dismissive. He would have been a great peacetime secretary of defense, but in wartime he was the wrong person."

DOJ_NMG_0092392

"Un-Rumsfeld" Gates To Take Center Stage. ABC World News (11/8, story 2, 0:30, Karl, 8.78M) said, "Robert Gates is in many ways the 'un-Rumsfeld.' Where Rumsfeld is combative and controversial, Gates is soft-spoken and diplomatic. And there are substantive differences as well. Gates was not among those who pushed for the Iraq war. In fact, he's seen as a protégé of Brent Scowcroft, who, although he has been associated with the first President Bush, has been one of the harshest critics of this President's handling of the Iraq war. And most importantly, Gates is on that Baker-Hamilton Commission, who has been searching for a new direction in Iraq."

The CBS Evening News (11/8, story 2, 0:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) said, "This is somebody who's been very close to" President Bush's father "for many, many years. We keep hearing all of these stories about how his father is very concerned about what Iraq has come to. The President's father's advisors have been very, very worried about all of this. The fact that he is going to that circle and he's been very reluctant to do that in the past suggests to me that we're about to see a major re-evaluation of what we're doing in Iraq and where we go from here. This is extremely significant."

Roll Call (11/9, Stanton, Yehle) reports Senate Democrats "said they would not look to block hearings" on Gates, "although they stopped short of pledging to confirm Gates during the upcoming lame-duck session."

The Los Angeles Times (11/9, Miller, 850K) says that in turning the Gates, President Bush "has selected a low-key loyalist who is in many ways the opposite" of Rumsfeld. While Rumsfeld "often seemed bent on running roughshod over the Pentagon brass, Gates is described by longtime associates as collegial and a consensus-builder," and if Rumsfeld "had little regard for President George H.W. Bush and many of his pragmatic security advisers, including Brent Scowcroft, Gates was part of that inner circle. He remains close not only to Scowcroft but to other Rumsfeld rivals, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." Bloomberg (11/8, Zacharia) says Bush's selection of Gates "suggests a readiness to examine a new strategy in Iraq."

The New York Times (11/9, Shane, 1.16M) says on its front page that the Gates nomination marks a return "to an earlier era in Republican foreign policy, one marked more by caution and pragmatism than that of the neoconservatives who have shaped the Bush administration's war in Iraq and confrontations with Iran and North Korea." The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A6, Jaffe, 2.04M) says it "remains to be seen what kind of long-term vision" Gates will bring to the Pentagon if confirmed.

The Wall Street Journal goes on to say Gates "is known as a master operator of the national-security bureaucracy," though the Washington Times (11/9, Gertz, 88K) says Gates has "little experience in military and defense affairs." But USA Today (11/9, 2A, Willing, 2.27M) says "those who have observed Gates" say his job as Texas A&M president may actually "have provided the best test of the skills he'll need to succeed" at the Pentagon. One said, "He undertook big changes, and evidently did it with good nature and without too many bad feelings. He got accomplished what he felt needed to be accomplished without being picketed or having rocks thrown at him." The Dallas Morning News (11/9, Landers, 500K) says Gates will leave A&M "for one of the most thankless jobs in the country." The Washington Post (11/9, A24, Tyson, Pincus, 690K) calls Gates a "Breaker Of Barriers" in a headline, saying he "lacks the top-down, take-no-prisoners managerial style that won Rumsfeld enemies and instead is more likely to set up task forces and forge agreements behind the scenes."

On NPR's Talk Of The Nation (11/8, Conan), intelligence correspondent Mary Louise Kelly said of Gates, "This not the first time President Bush has tried to pull Gates into his administration." Gates "was actually the first choice for the new position of national intelligence director when that job was created last year, and Gates turned it down. At the time he made clear he thought the job was a pretty bad idea and would add a layer of bureaucracy. So it's interesting to see he's coming back to Washington to serve his president."

On NPR's Day To Day (11/8, Brand), retired admiral and Clinton Defense nominee Bobby Ray Inman said of Gates, "I'm comfortable he wouldn't be going into the job unless he had the President's assurances for supporting new policies." Inman noted that Gates has served as a member of James Baker's Iraq Study Group, "so he's obviously been very involved in putting together their ideas of how we should change direction."

Pelosi Pleased, But Says "President Makes The Policy." On the CBS Evening News (11/8, story 5, 0:35, Couric, 7.66M), likely incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said, "I think it's good news. It signals, maybe, a change in attitude on the part of the President. The President is the policymaker, the Secretary of Defense is the implementer, and whatever you think of the policy, everyone agrees that the implementation of that policy has been a failure." On PBS'

DOJ_NMG_0092393

NewsHour (11/8, Warner), Pelosi said, "Yesterday, the American people spoke very clearly that there's one place they want a new direction: It's in the conduct of the war in Iraq. … So thank heavens the President has heard the message and has acted upon it. … I think it signals that he might be ready for change, but let's remember: He is the commander-in-chief. Rumsfeld or any secretary is an employee, an implementer of the policy. But the President makes the policy."

Capitol Hill Democrats Say Departure Just First Step. Sen. Joseph Biden said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/8, Matthews), "It is important that to demonstrate that" the President is "willing to change policy, the secretary of defense has to get out of the way. So he's done one of the things that's a precondition for changing policy. It would be impossible to change policy with Rumsfeld in place. It would just -- he could never do it."

On Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (11/8), Sen. Charles Schumer said, "I thought he should have done it months and months ago, but it showed that they're beginning to listen to new ideas. I think Donald Rumsfeld was just about the only person around that thought things in Iraq were going smoothly."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (11/8, Matthews), said, "People are very upset with the war. 'Stay the course' doesn't do it. And if this is going to be another stay-the-course secretary of defense, I think he'll run into trouble. … I hope we'll have a secretary of defense who has a new strategy, who will work with the Congress and we can put all of the kind of controversy about Mr. Rumsfeld behind us."

Rep. Jack Murtha said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/8, Matthews), "Bob Gates is a good friend of mine. … But if the policy doesn't change, it's not going to make any difference at all. And we got all kinds of money problems in the military. So this is not a change that I see making any difference at this point."

Rep. Charles Rangel, appearing on MSNBC's Tucker (11/8, Carlson), said, "I think the President actually counted the votes and saw that the American people were frustrated, not only with the policy but the personality of Rumsfeld. … What happens after him? If we've got to stay the course, it's not much of a change. But I think that it's a move in the right direction." On Fox News' Your World (11/8, Cavuto), Rangel said, "Rumsfeld had no policy. You cannot say this is the right thing to do, until you see what the new person is going to do."

Iraqis, US Troops Express Uncertainty About Pentagon Switch. NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 3, 0:45, Engel, 9.87M) reported that the view from Iraq "in a word is uncertainty, from the Iraqi government and from the American troops serving here." The CBS Evening News (11/8, story 3, 0:45, Logan, 7.66M) added that among "commanders and soldiers…perhaps the most damning reaction that I've heard is that this comes three years too late and that it won't change the reality on the ground for the troops here because they are on a course of action now as a result of decisions made by Secretary Rumsfeld and the results of that are plain for everyone to see."

Longest-Serving Pentagon Chief Played Major Role. The CBS Evening News (11/8, story 10, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) closed with a retrospective on Rumsfeld's career, which noted that "by the time he leaves the Pentagon after his replacement is confirmed, Rumsfeld will be the longest-serving defense secretary ever. He served two presidents 25 years apart. Then 43 years old, now 75, he's both the youngest and oldest man to head the Pentagon."

The New York Times (11/9, A29, Gordon, 1.16M) and the Los Angeles Times (11/9, Barnes, 850K) both reflect on Rumsfeld's desire to transform the Pentagon, with the New York paper saying in a headline that "Rumsfeld, A Force For Change, Did Not Change With The Times Amid Iraq Tumult," and writing that "from the day he took control at the Pentagon," Rumsfeld "was determined to reassert civilian control of the defense establishment and create a leaner, more lethal American military," and "pursued his goals with a vengeance, emerging as the most powerful secretary of defense since Robert S. McNamara more than three decades earlier." In its similar story, the Los Angeles newspaper says Rumsfeld's "strategy led him to dominate national security policy more than any figure since Henry Kissinger."

In the Style section of the Washington Post (11/9, C1, 690K), Linton Weeks takes a tongue-in-cheek look at Rumsfeld's unique public style, writing, "Is he stepping down? You bet. Does he admit defeat? Not by a long shot. … Goodness gracious!" Rumsfeld "not only has been secretary of defense for six years, he's been secretary of offense. During his tenure, briefings by the head of the armed forces became tours de force. He would clap his hands, lick his lips, narrow his eyes into a squinty gaze and extemporize, patronize, chastise, sermonize and crack wise all at the same time."

DOJ_NMG_0092394

Hunter, Kissinger Laud Rumsfeld. On CNN (11/8), Rep. Duncan Hunter, described by anchor Don Lemon as "an ardent Rumsfeld supporter," said, "Don Rumsfeld has done a good job. He's managed a force of 2.5 million people, wars in two theaters, reformed the military, stood up our first incipient missile defense. So, he's had a broad array of challenges. He's handled those well. I talked to him before the resignation announcement. And I think he's really doing it, because he sees now, with the Democrat leadership in Congress, it's going to be hard to get past what I see as personal animosities toward him, and get the job done."

On CNN's The Situation Room (11/8, Blitzer), Henry Kissinger said, "Rumsfeld is a great patriot. And he must have decided he was drawing too much fire, it would be too difficult to carry out his tasks and that he wanted to provide a opportunity for a different perspective."

Australia Praises Rumsfeld, Vows To Stay In Iraq. AFP (11/9) reports Australia "hailed" Rumsfeld as a "'champion of freedom' and pledged that Canberra would keep its troops in Iraq."

More Commentary On Pentagon Leadership Change. Commentary on the Rumsfeld resignation follows a similar line as the coverage, saying Rumsfeld's departure was a near-certainty following the elections and saying the nomination of Gates hearkens back to the administration of President Bush's father. The New York Times (11/9, A32, 1.16M) editorializes, "There was absolutely nothing more left for Mr. Rumsfeld to do as secretary of defense except continue to defend failed policies and tinker with unworkable strategies. Most of the men and women who will be part of the new Congress came to that conclusion, whatever their party affiliation. … Rumsfeld's departure is merely the first step. It has to be followed by a major change in policy if American troops can be brought home without leaving a disaster behind."

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, 2.04M) editorializes, "When the history of this era is written, Mr. Rumsfeld is likely to fare much better than his many critics assert. The secretary has been a convenient political foil -- for Democrats, for generals who didn't like the way he exercised civilian control at the Pentagon, and especially for erstwhile war supporters who wanted to blame the Iraqi insurgency on some individual rather than on the inevitable complications and setbacks of any war." As for Gates, he "is a capable public servant with broad security experience. But much of that experience is with the CIA, which has misjudged the nature of the enemy throughout this conflict."

The Los Angeles Times (11/9, 850K) editorializes, "Better late than never." More than two years after Rumsfeld "offered to resign in the aftermath of the Abu Ghraib prison scandal, President Bush finally agreed to let Rumsfeld go, to make room for a 'fresh perspective.' It's an easy gesture at this point -- the political equivalent of bringing down the piñata once it's been battered beyond recognition."

The Boston Herald (11/9, 184K) editorializes, "Well, better late than never, as they say. … Rumsfeld should have been out the door two years ago, but President Bush has been loyal to a fault. Tuesday he and his party paid an enormous price for that with the voters. But they spoke and Bush -- finally -- listened. … Good riddance."

The Arizona Republic (11/9) editorializes, "Firmness in wartime is a virtue, certainly. As is consistency of leadership. And…Rumsfeld demonstrated both. A war against a merciless foe needed to be won, and for all his hardheaded faults, Rumsfeld clearly had the determination to see it through. … But the primary task of the American force in Iraq, under Rumsfeld, has been to establish and maintain the peace necessary for that nascent democracy to assert itself. And that has not come to pass."

In her New York Times (11/9, 1.16M) column, Maureen Dowd writes, "Poppy Bush and James Baker gave Sonny the presidency to play with and he broke it. So now they're taking it back. They are dragging W. away from those reckless older guys who have been such a bad influence and getting him some new minders who are a lot more practical. … Gates, his friends say, had been worried about the belligerent, arrogant, ideological style of Rummy & Cheney from the start."

In his Washington Post (11/9, A29, 690K) column, David Ignatius writes, "Senior military officers referred to it as 'the 7,000-mile screwdriver.' That was their way of describing Donald Rumsfeld's penchant for micromanaging aspects of the Iraq war that interested him. And it's one reason the military has to be happy that Rumsfeld is leaving -- even happier, maybe, than Democrats, who have claimed an early scalp for their election victory. … Changes in Iraq are coming, and Rumsfeld's departure is, to paraphrase the prayer book, one outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual process."

Khalilzad Expects No Major Shift In US Iraq Policy. USA Today (11/9, 14A, Stinson, 2.27M) writes that

DOJ_NMG_0092395

"from Tokyo to Baghdad, Istanbul to Nairobi, Toronto to the British capital, many people said they hoped the Democratic wins in Tuesday's U.S. elections would pressure President Bush to alter course in Iraq and abandon what some called an arrogant foreign policy." But in Iraq, the AP (11/8, Bodeen) reports, US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the "sharp political realignment in Congress would not provoke upheaval" in US policy. Khalilzad said, "The President is the architect of US foreign policy. He is the commander in chief of our armed forces. He understands what is at stake in Iraq. … He is committed to working with both Houses of the American Congress to get support needed for the mission in Iraq to succeed." The Washington Post (11/9, A23, Anderson, 690K) also covers Khalizad's remarks.

The New York Times (11/9, A18, Burns, Luo, 1.16M) reports Iraq's political leaders "scrambled Wednesday to interpret what a sharply altered American political landscape might mean for the future of this war-ravaged country." Some Iraqi politicians said they "hoped for major changes, while others seemed more concerned about reassuring Iraq's 27 million people that America would not abandon its commitments here and order American troops home."

Friedman Says US Choices In Iraq Between "Tolerable" And "Awful." In his New York Times (11/9, A33, 1.16M), column, Thomas L. Friedman writes, "The Iraq war has turned into a sucking chest wound for our country -- infecting its unity at home and its standing abroad. No one can predict what Iraq will look like 10 years from now. I wish it well. But in the near term, it is clear, nothing that we'll feel particularly proud of, nothing that we'll feel justifies the vast expenditure of lives and treasure, is going to come out of Iraq. Our only two options left today in Iraq are 'tolerable' and 'awful.' 'Good' is no longer on the menu. … It's time to make a final push for the tolerable, and if that fails, quit Iraq and insulate ourselves and our allies from the awful. This can't go on."

Bombs Kill Eight Sadr City Youths On Soccer Field. In an evocative report, the Los Angeles Times (11/9, Daragahi, 850K) says explosives "rained down on a dusty soccer field" in Sadr City Wednesday, "killing eight Iraqi youths and injuring dozens. Around the country, bombings and shootings left dozens of other Iraqis dead," and the official number of US troops killed climbed to "at least 2,839. … Mortar and rocket battles reminiscent of the urban civil warfare that engulfed Sarajevo, Beirut and Kabul in previous decades have erupted occasionally throughout Baghdad's patchwork of religiously mixed neighborhoods."

Maliki Predicts Saddam Hanging This Year. The New York Times (11/9, A18, Semple, 1.16M) reports Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki "predicted in a televised interview on Wednesday that former President Saddam Hussein would be hanged by the end of the year." But court officials said Maliki's prediction "was unrealistic, considering the timing of the appeals process and the sheer volume of evidence the appellate judges would have to review. It was far more likely, they said, that the hanging would not take place until January at the earliest, and probably later."

Saddam Co-Defendant Says Kurds Spied For Iran During War. The AP (11/8, Yacoub, Halaby) reports Saddam-era military intelligence chief Sabir al-Douri "accused Iraqi Kurds on Wednesday of spying for the Iranians at the time of the government crackdown on the Kurdish population." Al-Douri, a co-defendant in the ex-dictator's genocide trial, "made the accusation after listening to Kurdish witnesses testify about chemical attacks against their villages in northern Dahuk province in August 1988."

Suicide Bombing Kills At Least 42 Pakistani Soldiers Near Afghan Border. ABC World News (11/8, story 13, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) and NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) both briefly reported on a suicide bombing at a Pakistani army camp near the Afghanistan border, which killed at least 42 soldiers. The New York Times (11/9, A24, Gall, Masood, 1.16M) says it was the "deadliest terrorist attack against the Pakistani military on record." The Washington Post (11/9, A16, Constable, Khan, 690K) reports officials "immediately blamed the bombing on al-Qaeda and local Islamic extremists."

Pakistan-Based Taliban Fighters Describe Operations. The Christian Science Monitor (11/9, Koster, 59K) runs a "rare interview with a Western reporter" granted by Taliban fighters based in Pakistan's Balochistan Province. The four described "how they slip into Afghanistan, attack NATO and Afghan forces, and return to Pakistan to rest."

Poll Finds Afghanis Generally Optimistic. USA Today (11/9, 4A, Wiseman, 2.27M) reports that an Asia Foundation poll of 6,226 Afghan adults found that most "are optimistic about the future, satisfied with their young democracy and rank security low on their list of everyday concerns." The USAID-funded poll "suggests that Afghans are surprisingly confident about the direction of their country even as NATO forces battle a pro-Taliban insurgency in southern and eastern provinces."

DOJ_NMG_0092396

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former US Foodservice Official Convicted Of Securities Fraud. The Washington Post (11/9, D01, Johnson) reports, "A New York jury convicted former U.S. Foodservice Inc. marketing chief Mark P. Kaiser yesterday of conspiracy, securities fraud and false filing charges, all but bringing to a close a three-year, $800 million accounting fraud probe at the Columbia food distribution company." The Post continues, "Kaiser, 49, remains free on bond until his sentencing Feb. 8. He is the only former official at U.S. Foodservice, a unit of the Dutch grocery retailer Royal Ahold NV, who presented his case to a jury." The Post adds, "A few weeks before the trial began last month, former finance chief Michael J. Resnick pleaded guilty to conspiracy for his role in the scheme, which boosted earnings by inflating the amount of promotional rebates U.S. Foodservice received from suppliers. … Kaiser's deputy, Timothy J. Lee, also pleaded guilty and testified against his former boss in the course of the case, which spanned about four weeks. In closing arguments, Kaiser's lawyer, Richard J. Morvillo of the District, labored to paint Lee as a liar trying to curry favor with the government and win a lighter prison sentence."

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, C3) reports, "The government alleged Mr. Kaiser and others misrepresented to U.S. Foodservice's auditors and the public how much the company was receiving in supplier rebates, known as promotional allowances, by hundreds of millions of dollars in order to meet income targets." The Journal adds, "More than a dozen U.S. Foodservice vendors and three former executives, including former U.S. Foodservice Chief Financial Officer Michael Resnick, have pleaded guilty to criminal charges in the matter. … On Monday, the Amsterdam-based retailer said it will put the U.S. Foodservice unit and its Tops supermarkets in New York and Pennsylvania up for sale."

UnitedHealth Executives Forfeit $390 Million In Stock Options. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, B1, Stecklow, Fuhrmans) reports, "The two top executives of UnitedHealth Group Inc." -- outgoing Chief Executive William W. McGuire and his successor, Stephen J. Hemsley – "agreed to forfeit about $390 million in stock-option compensation, by far the biggest sum returned to a company under scrutiny for backdating options awards." Other "senior UnitedHealth executives will also return unspecified options gains." UnitedHealth "also disclosed that it would have to take 'significantly greater' charges related to its backdated stock options than it had previously estimated and that it expects the charges to affect the past 12 years of previously reported earnings."

Bloomberg (11/8, Rapaport) added UnitedHealth Group Inc. "said its restatement of earnings to correct accounting for stock-based compensation ;will be significantly greater' than the $286 million it estimated in May." UnitedHealth "said its financial statements from 1994 through September this year 'should no longer be relied upon' because they may not reflect costs of stock-based compensation." Meanwhile, "Departing...McGuire will lose about $200 million because of the restatements, said his lawyer, David Brodsky." Hemsley "will give up about $190 million," UnitedHealth said. Last month, "both agreed to let their option dates be reset to the highest share price in the grant year."

Business Week (11/9, Ryst) reports UnitedHealth Group "faces a whopper of a bill from backdated stock options. It's also hoping to renew favor with investors by repricing options for several executives and bringing new leaders into its executive suite." UnitedHealth "also ousted its chief financial officer, Patrick Erlandson, who has been in that position since 2001. Erlandson will remain with the company, and be succeeded by G. Mike Mikan, a senior vice-president of finance. In addition, UnitedHealth designated Forrest Burke as acting general counsel, from his former role as general counsel for UnitedHealthcare, Uniprise, and specialized-care services."

The Los Angeles Business (11/9) adds UnitedHealth Group Inc. board also "strengthened requirements for ensuring the independence of its directors, going further than the standards of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the New York Stock Exchange."

Fannie Mae To Spend $1 Billion On Accounting Review. The AP (11/9, Gordon) reports, "Fannie Mae said Wednesday it expects to spend more than $1 billion this year on the massive review of its accounting and preparing financial statements as the mortgage giant pushes to complete it by year's end." The AP continues, "The government-sponsored company, which finances one of every five home loans in the United States, is emerging from an accounting scandal that brought the ouster of top executives and a record $400 million civil fine in a settlement with federal regulators. Fannie Mae also said it would miss a regulatory deadline Wednesday for filing its financial report for the third quarter of 2006. The company hasn't filed an earnings statement since late 2004." The AP adds, "Federal regulators that year accused Fannie Mae of serious accounting problems and earnings manipulation to meet Wall Street targets, and the Securities and Exchange Commission ordered the company to restate earnings back to 2001. … The anticipated restatement has been estimated at $10.8 billion, though Fannie Mae says it expects the final amount could be lower. The company said in August it believes that the accounting review has uncovered the last of the errors."

DOJ_NMG_0092397

SEC To Relax Audit Rules For Small Firms. The New York Times (11/9, Norris) reports, "Regulators are seeking a way to lighten the burden of the Sarbanes-Oxley law on smaller companies by addressing the focus and cost of audits of internal controls, Christopher Cox, the chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, said yesterday." The Times continues, "Mr. Cox said in an interview that the goal was to focus the attention of auditors on only those controls that could be important to assuring the accuracy of financial records, a measure required by Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, and to hold down the cost of the audits. … 'There will be an audit for everybody, which is a major decision we took,' he said, adding that the nature of the audit could change. 'It is supposed to be risk-based, so that the auditor's time is focused on the areas of greatest risk.' … He said that was particularly important for smaller companies, some of which have complained that costs are excessive. The burden of such audits has also been blamed for a reluctance of foreign companies to list their securities on American markets." The Times notes, "Mr. Cox said his goal was to smooth the way for the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board to propose a new auditing standard in the area, and for the S.E.C. to approve it, by this spring. To do that, he said, he has held extensive consultations with Mark Olsen, the chairman of the oversight board."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Jefferson, Carter Begin Month-Long Runoff Campaign. The AP (11/9, Burdeau) reports, "U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, handicapped by an FBI bribery investigation, embarked Wednesday on a monthlong and grueling contest against a young but politically experienced challenger seeking to end his 16-year turn as this city's face in Congress. State Rep. Karen Carter played up the old-versus-new dynamic at a Wednesday news conference, keying on the hurricane-battered city's recovery." The AP notes Jefferson "won about 30 percent of the vote in the multiparty primary Tuesday, outpacing 12 challengers lured into the race because of his vulnerability stemming from the FBI bribery investigation into his African business dealings." Carter "got about 22 percent of the vote, finishing second to earn a spot in the Dec. 9 runoff. … 'We can assume that the voters who voted for other candidates will not vote for Jefferson' in the runoff, said Susan Howell, a political analyst at the University of New Orleans."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (11/9, Donze) reports, "Conventional political wisdom says that a congressman who lands in a runoff, particularly after 16 years in office, should seriously consider cleaning out his desk. For…Jefferson, the adage may be even more apropos, given that Hurricane Katrina scattered much of his traditional voter base last year just as FBI agents were ramping up their federal bribery probe into his business dealings in Africa." But campaigning for the runoff yesterday, Jefferson "wasn't talking like someone preparing to pack up." Still, "political observers say the situation he finds himself in is less than ideal."

Letten Says New Orleans Must Overcome Crime, Corruption. The AP (11/9, Bohrer) reports from New Orleans, "The city's survival depends on getting a handle on violent crime and corruption and creating opportunities for young people, a federal prosecutor said Wednesday. 'And that's a heck of a tall order, but that's something we need to do,' Jim Letten said." At the Bureau of Governmental Research breakfast, the US Attorney "joined Supreme Court Justice Catherine Kimball in addressing the rebuilding of New Orleans' criminal justice system after Hurricane Katrina." The AP adds that Kimball told the group, "The survival of this town depends on getting a handle on violent crime, corruption, so we can keep and attract industry -- diversifying our economy and, for God's sake, building a decent school system so that kids who grow up in public housing, poor neighborhoods and Section 8 housing can get the opportunities they need to actually get jobs and not go into the drug trade."

DOJ_NMG_0092398

FBI Searches Offices Of Kentucky Judge-Executive. The Lexington Herald-Leader (11/9, 113K) reports, "FBI agents searched the offices of Knox County Judge-Executive Raymond C. Smith on Wednesday. Bruce Murphy, Smith's deputy judge-executive, said four agents accompanied by a Kentucky State Police trooper served a search warrant at the office Wednesday morning. The warrant sought audiotapes and other records concerning fiscal court meetings in 2004 and 2005 and documents related to four companies" which had "won contracts to provide goods or services to the county, Murphy said. Smith had an ownership interest with his brother in at least one of the companies," but "Murphy said that when Smith took office, he essentially turned the company over to his brother. The warrant could indicate the FBI is investigating bids awarded by the county."

Kentucky Judge Indicted On Vote-Buying Charges. WTVQ-TV Lexington (11/8, Haeberle) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Bath County Judge Executive Walter B. Shrout has been indicted on charges he took part in a vote-buying scheme during this year's primary election. In a federal indictment unsealed Wednesday, Shrout…was charged with conspiracy, making a false statement to a federal agent and obstruction of justice. Shrout now becomes the 10th person indicted in relation to the vote-buying scheme that started weeks before the May primary." WTVQ added that the indictment "also states Shrout lied to an FBI investigator last month about being involved in the scheme and offering $100,000" to two conspirators "to 'keep quiet about his involvement.'"

Grand Jury Subpoenas Chicago City Worker Injury Claim Records. The Chicago Sun-Times (11/9, Spielman, Novak) reports, "A federal grand jury is demanding records from City Hall regarding injury claims of city workers, a move that comes two weeks after the Sun-Times reported Chicago patronage workers claim to be hurt at a rate that exceeds the nation's most dangerous jobs. Grand jurors have issued a subpoena to the City Council Finance Committee, headed by Ald. Edward M. Burke, seeking an array of records on injured city workers, many who have been off work for years and collecting disability checks." The Sun-Times notes, "The Sun-Times' 'Clout's Sick List' investigation…reported that one in five patronage workers listed on the once-secret clout list kept by Mayor Daley's former patronage director had filed workers' compensation claims. That injury rate far outpaces those for any occupation tracked by the U.S. Department of Labor, including underground coal miners and foundry workers. Most of those patronage workers had filed at least two claims."

Malvo Sentenced To Six Life Terms For DC-Area Sniper Shootings. The Washington Post (11/9, B01, Londo) reports, "Sniper Lee Boyd Malvo offered a tearful apology yesterday to relatives of the six people he and his accomplice killed in Montgomery County, minutes before he was sentenced to six consecutive terms of life in prison without the possibility of parole. … 'I'm truly sorry, grieved and ashamed of what I've done to the families and friends,' Malvo said as he listed the names of the Montgomery victims he and John Allen Muhammad shot from afar with a powerful rifle in October 2002. 'Each of you relive this every morning, every birthday, every anniversary, every time you look in your children's eyes.'" The Post continues, "A handful of relatives attended the afternoon hearing in Rockville, which marked the last chapter of the snipers' legal proceedings in Maryland. … Malvo said he was most haunted by the death of Ride On bus driver Conrad Johnson, 35, the sniper's last victim. According to Malvo's testimony, his death was the only fatal shooting in Maryland in which Malvo pulled the trigger. … 'I thought of his sons, who just for once would like to play basketball with their father,' Malvo said. 'Just one more time see his face.'" The Post notes, "Prosecutors and Malvo's attorneys said Malvo, 21, has experienced a transformation during his months in Maryland. They said his remorse is genuine, and they commended him for cooperating with prosecutors in Muhammad's May trial in Montgomery, in which Malvo took the stand to offer the first public, firsthand account of the shootings. … Malvo testified that he fell under the spell of Muhammad as a young and vulnerable teenager who had all but been abandoned by his parents in Jamaica. The elder sniper took him on a cross-country trip in 2002 that began in Washington state, terrorized the District and its suburbs for three weeks in October and ended in suburban Maryland, where they were arrested. Malvo told law enforcement officials in Maryland this year that the pair shot 27 people, 17 of whom died."

DOJ_NMG_0092399

US Charges Montana PI With Defrauding Law Firms. The New York Law Journal (11/9, Lin) reports, "Federal law enforcement officials in New York have announced the arrest on wire fraud charges of a Montana private investigator who allegedly defrauded two of Manhattan's top litigation firms by promising to sell them 'proof' of misconduct by opposing parties and counsel." The Journal continues, "The criminal complaint filed Wednesday by the Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney's Office charged that Michael Lair had approached New York lawyers working on two high-profile cases and received more than $80,000 to provide information he ultimately failed to produce." The Journal adds, "Lair, 46, is the president of Bozeman, Mont.-based consumerdefense.com Inc., a company that claims to investigate consumer complaints and conduct research in connection with fraud cases. … The complaint, sworn out by Special Agent B.J. Kang of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, did not identify any matters or lawyers by name, only describing one case as involving a large insurance company engaged in litigation with its former chairman and the other as involving a pharmaceutical company's suit against a hedge fund." The Journal notes, "Sources familiar with both matters confirmed that the insurance company case was the dispute between AIG Inc. and its former chairman, Maurice R. Greenberg, and that the hedge fund matter was Biovail Corp.'s securities fraud suit against SAC Capital Management. … The lawyers who dealt with Lair included Robert G. Morvillo of Morvillo, Abramowitz, Grand, Iason, Anello & Bohrer, which is one of a team of firms representing Greenberg, and Michael J. Bowe of Kasowitz, Benson, Torres & Friedman. Morvillo is one of the city's most well-known white-collar litigators and the Kasowitz firm, led by Marc E. Kasowitz, is also regarded as a top litigation shop."

Former Penn Professor Charged With Child Porn. The AP (11/9) reports, "A former University of Pennsylvania business professor who was previously convicted in a teen sex sting was indicted Wednesday on charges he produced and distributed child pornography." The AP continues, "Lawrence Scott Ward, 64, was arrested in August as he returned from Brazil through Washington Dulles International Airport. … Federal authorities who searched his laptop computer said it contained a video of young children engaged in sexual activity. They also said they found videos showing the defendant involved in sex acts with teenage boys." The AP adds, "The three-count indictment charges that Ward produced, imported, and possessed child pornography. His arraignment was set for Thursday in Virginia. … Ward was convicted in 1999 of soliciting sex from a Pennsylvania state trooper posing as a 15-year-old male prostitute, a prosecutor said at Ward's recent bail hearing."

Senior Gotti's Mob Allies Lambasted Victoria Gotti Reality Show. The New York Sun (11/9, Capeci) reports in its "Gang Land" column, "There was food and wine on the table and an FBI bug hidden underneath" at the 2004 dinner hosted by Genovese capo Ciro Perrone. "A trio of veteran wiseguys was trashing a reality TV show that struck close to their hearts, 'Growing Up Gotti,' the saga of John Gotti's racy, platinum blonde daughter, Victoria, and her three teenage sons." Perrone denounced the show, saying, "It's a soap opera, and the kids look like girls." The Sun adds, "'It's one of the most disgusting, insulting shows' on television, the aging capo's longtime right-hand-man, John Yannucci, said, according to a report about the discussion written by FBI agent John Penza. Colombo soldier Ralph Scopo, a close Howard Beach pal of the late Gambino boss, was 'so embarrassed' for his late friend's family that he said he couldn't talk about it, Mr. Penza wrote in an affidavit that was filed last year with the federal judge who approved the bugging.

Former Employee Charged With Sabotaging Florida Theater Chain Ticket System. The Miami Herald (11/9, Danner, 286K) reports, "Fort Lauderdale-based Muvico Theaters' former information-technology director faces a federal charge of sabotaging the movie-chain's ticketing-sales system last spring on the opening weekend of Mission Impossible III." Joseph Harlen Shook "was charged in a one-count grand jury indictment of hacking Muvico's computer system to disrupt ticket sales in May -- which the company says cost it about $100,000." Shook "was dismissed in February as part of some cutbacks, according to Muvico spokesman John Spano." The Herald notes, "The investigation was conducted by the FBI."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Rules Group Can Subpoena White House Documents In Plan B Lawsuit. The AP (11/9) reports Federal Magistrate Judge Victor Pohorelsky "has ruled that a reproductive rights group can seek White House e-mails and other documents as part of its lawsuit promoting broader access to the morning-after pill." The ruling "allows the Center for Reproductive Rights to subpoena more than three years of Plan B-related communications between the White House's domestic policy office and select Food and Drug Administration officials. The documents include e-mails, letters and records of conversations." The group "sued the FDA seeking to lift all age restrictions on nonprescription sales of the Plan B emergency contraceptive pills. It seeks the documents to determine whether the White House interfered with the FDA's handling of a request by manufacturer Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc. to allow over-the-counter sales."

DOJ_NMG_0092400

Supreme Court Hears Challenge To Federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, Bravin, 2.04M) reports a day after "voters in three states rejected ballot measures to restrict abortions, the Supreme Court took up the Bush administration's appeal to reinstate the first federal ban of a specific abortion procedure." Three federal appeals courts "struck down the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, finding it violated a five-to-four Supreme Court opinion in 2000 that invalidated a similar Nebraska law because it made no exception to preserve the woman's health." Solicitor General Paul Clement "told the justices that Congress had avoided the flaws of the Nebraska statute, by making official findings that the procedure was never medically necessary and defining the procedure itself more specifically." But the "biggest change may have been on the court, where antiabortion activists hope two Bush appointees will uphold restrictions on the procedure and, perhaps someday, an outright ban. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who voted with the majority in the 2000 Nebraska case, has since retired, and her successor, Justice Samuel Alito, brings a record of skepticism toward abortion-rights arguments."

ABC World News (11/8, story 11, 0:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Emotions ran high today, as the Supreme Court heard its first big abortion case since Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito joined the panel. Protesters on both sides of the so-called partial birth abortion issue marched outside. Inside, police dragged a man from the court after an outburst. The Supreme Court must decide whether to uphold a law banning the procedure. The Bush Administration called it infanticide. Abortion rights groups say the law would prohibit all abortions after the first trimester."

NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 7, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported it was "an emotional day at the US Supreme Court as it took up one of the most important abortion cases. The justices heard arguments and must decide on what will become of the Federal ban on late term abortions. The term opponents use is partial birth abortions. Inside the courtroom by the way, there was a rare outburst by a protester who opposes this procedure. It was the first such disruption inside the Supreme Court chambers in two decades."

USA Today (11/9, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports the Supreme Court "was packed and demonstrators gathered outside under drizzly skies Wednesday as the justices heard arguments in what probably will be two of the most significant abortion rights cases in decades." The "disputes over Congress' ban of a procedure it calls 'partial birth' abortion represent a key test of whether the court led by Chief Justice John Roberts will take a harder line against abortion rights now that Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a key supporter of such rights, has retired." But as the "two-hour court session played out, neither Roberts nor the conservative justice who replaced O'Connor, Samuel Alito, were the key players. Instead, everything seemed choreographed around Anthony Kennedy, the justice who is at the ideological center of the divided, nine-member court." Kennedy, who "has supported abortion rights but voted against striking down a state ban on 'partial birth' abortion six years ago, is widely viewed as the key vote in the cases."

The AP (11/9, Sherman) reports that in "an intense morning of arguments, lawyers for the Bush administration and supporters of abortion rights gave starkly contrasting views: A law passed by Congress labels it a gruesome and inhumane practice. Supporters argue that such abortions in the second trimester of pregnancy sometimes are the safest for women." Justice Kennedy, "the court's swing voter following O'Connor's departure, dissented so strongly in the Nebraska case that many court observers believe he is unlikely to switch sides."

The New York Times (11/9, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports Justice Kennedy's "questioning suggested that he had not made up his mind, despite his strongly worded dissenting opinion when the court struck down Nebraska's version of the federal law six years ago, and despite his obvious distaste for the procedure at issue. Instead, his questions suggested that he remained open to persuasion that the law placed doctors in legal jeopardy and imposed an unconstitutional burden on their patients' right to terminate their pregnancies."

DOJ_NMG_0092401

The Washington Post (11/9, A3, Lane, 690K) reports the two hours of oral arguments "on a federal 'partial birth' abortion ban at the Supreme Court yesterday showed that the justices are intensely focused on the procedure's medical details and health implications -- but produced few clues as to how they might rule." As "expected, the court's four most liberal members, Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer, sounded skeptical about the statute. Of the court's conservatives, only Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said much at all, asking questions that implied the law should be upheld." That left "plenty of time for Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, whom both sides in the case consider the likely swing vote, to listen to the lawyers and air his concerns -- though he did not tip his hand."

The Los Angeles Times (11/9, Savage, 850K) reports the case "could prove a turning point for the Supreme Court on abortion. With the arrival of President Bush's two conservative appointees, there appears to be a five-vote majority, including Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, to uphold stricter regulation of abortion." Six years ago, "when the court struck down a Nebraska ban on the practice, Kennedy wrote an impassioned dissent, describing D&X as 'abhorrent.' Abortion-rights advocates hope he will switch sides. But Wednesday, Kennedy suggested that the disputed procedure might be 'purely elective and not medically necessary.'"

Scripps Howard (11/9, Guillaume) reports, "A screaming man charged through the main doors of the Supreme Court's chambers during a hearing in a contentious abortion case Wednesday. … 'Abortion is a sin,' shouted the man, later identified by court officials as Rives Miller Grogan. Four court employees dragged him out of the courtroom." Scripps Howard continues, "Grogan's last known residence is in Los Angeles. He was taken to the U.S. Capitol Booking Center before being transported to D.C. Superior Court. … He was charged with creating a noise disturbance, resisting arrest and other related offenses, a Supreme Court spokesman said." Scripps Howard notes, "Some spectators left their seats and headed toward the door. None of the justices said anything about the disturbance. Such disturbances are rare in the well-guarded court chamber. Court regulars said the last one they remembered was in1983 when Hustler publisher Larry Flynt shouted obscenities during a hearing in his own case."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Few Polling Problems Seen, Review Could Presage Changes For 2008. USA Today (11/9, Wolf) reports, "As a dress rehearsal for the 2008 presidential election, Tuesday's experiences at the nation's 183,000 polling places succeeded by failing." USA continues, "Where voters encountered balky equipment, it pointed up the need to examine paper trails and other methods for verifying their votes. … Where voters weren't helped by struggling poll workers, it illuminated the need for increased recruitment and better training. … And where they were misinformed or misdirected by automated 'robocalls' and leaflets, it reignited calls for laws that would crack down on such practices." USA adds, "All of those problems and more surfaced Tuesday in what state and federal officials said was a practice run for the 2008 election. And while none of the problems caused nearly as much trouble as the "hanging chads" of 2000, they laid bare the election system's growing pains. … 'There continue to be deep concerns about the patterns of voting in our country,' Chellie Pingree, president of the civic group Common Cause, said. 'The level of problems that we heard about out there is still completely unacceptable.'" USA notes, "A hotline run by Common Cause received 16,000 calls. Another headed by the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law got 20,000. The Justice Department received only about 250 calls and e-mails, down from 1,200 in 2004. … 'There was nothing out of the ordinary,' Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said. 'They tended to be routine problems, and fairly isolated.'"

Monitors Report Few Problems At Louisiana Polls. The Baton Rouge (LA) Advocate (11/9, Burgess) reports, "Poll watchers from the Justice Department and the NAACP reported a smooth election day in St. Landry Parish, despite concerns of voting irregularities in a close contest between a black female interim sheriff and her white male opponent." The Advocate continues, "Former State Police Trooper Bobby Guidroz won election over interim Sheriff Laura Balthazar on Tuesday with 20,210 votes, or 51 percent, according to complete but unofficial returns." The Advocate adds, "U.S. Attorney Donald Washington said Wednesday that the roughly 24 Justice Department monitors who roamed parish precincts Tuesday reported no issues with voter access or intimidation. … He said some routine election problems arose, such as a few names mistakenly left off voter rolls, but the issues were quickly resolved by the Clerk of Court's Office. … 'It was quiet, and people who wanted to get out and vote got out and voted,' said St. Landry Parish First Assistant District Attorney Frank Trosclair, whose office manned phones Tuesday to field election-day complaints." The Advocate notes, "Poll watchers for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People Legal Defense and Education Fund also reported no problems. … Clifton Lemelle Sr., a retired educator from Eunice who helped organize the NAACP monitors, said he heard scattered complaints of people campaigning too close to the polls but no confirmed reports of intimidation or of voters being wrongly turned away from the polls."

DOJ_NMG_0092402

Touch-Screen Voting To Be Reviewed In St Louis. The St Louis Post-Dispatch (11/9, Deere) reports, "Now that the votes have been tallied, St. Louis County election officials and voter rights advocates will begin counting the number of problems voters had casting them. … High on the list of priorities: the county's touch-screen voting machines, which had their first major test on Tuesday." The Post-Dispatch continues, "John Diehl, chairman of the county's Election Board, said most problems with the machines were confined to 20 or fewer of the county's 450 polling sites. … Diehl, a Republican, admitted that lines were long in some places, but said it was mostly due to heavy voter turnout and a lengthy ballot. … But one voting rights advocate argued that problems were more widespread and were the result of poorly trained election judges and a lack of specialists to monitor the touch-screen machines. … 'There wasn't enough (specialists) to meet the need,' said Denise Lieberman, an attorney with the voter advocacy group Advancement Project and former legal director of the ACLU of Eastern Missouri. 'The election judges simply didn't have the skills.' … Diehl said the county had trained 200 poll workers to boot up and shut down the machines, as well as 25 specialists assigned to locations throughout the county and 28 pairs of roving specialists to respond to problems. … The midterm election marked sort of a role reversal for the county — where reports of voting problems have typically been uncommon — and the city of St. Louis, where elections have been marred by lawsuits and an inquiry from the U.S. Justice Department."

Massachusetts Secretary Of State To Oversee Boston Elections. The Boston Globe/AP (11/9) reports, "Secretary of State William Galvin said Wednesday he would take over the supervision of the city's election department after some precincts ran out of ballots during Tuesday's election, forcing voters to wait as police cruisers rushed to bring more. … 'I can't have "We'll try to do better next time." That's not acceptable,' Galvin said Wednesday. 'What they did yesterday was put the rights of voters at risk and that's unacceptable.'" The AP continues, "Galvin said the law required him to determine a pattern of misconduct -- which he believes there is -- then create a solution to the problems. … 'My view of the remedy is there has to be some supervision,' he said. 'I have no desire to micromanage the operations of the city of Boston. ... I'm interested in making sure that the basic function of the department is carried out.'" The AP adds, "Galvin said a similar move was made in Boston in the 1980s, when the Secretary of State's Office appointed a monitor to review, control and direct the department. … Jennifer Mehigan, a spokeswoman for Mayor Thomas Menino, said the city would cooperate with the state. Menino also is drawing from other sources to help fix election problems."

The Boston Herald (11/9, McPhee) reports, "Mayor Thomas M. Menino said city staffers face 'reassignment' as the state seeks legal oversight of Boston's Elections Department after a ballot shortage forced police to make rush deliveries to angry voters at the polls. … 'I am very, very angry. This should not have happened,' Menino told the Herald. 'Will people be reassigned? It's possible. We certainly need a management plan for the Elections Department.'" The Herald continues, "Secretary of State William Galvin told city officials he plans to utilize his legal right to manage the city Elections Department. … Meanwhile the mayor has said he will hire a consultant to "shake up" the department and file quarterly progress reports to Galvin." The Herald notes, "The state printed more than 300,000 ballots for Hub voters, but just half those were delivered to polling locations, leaving largely minority strongholds such as East Boston, Hyde Park, Mattapan, Roxbury and Dorchester without enough ballots, infuriating voters who were forced to wait for hours to cast their ballots. … Some precinct wardens began handing English-speaking voters ballots printed in other languages, or told voters to leave their phone numbers and they would be called when there were ballots available. Officials estimate that 2.2 million people voted in Tuesday's election."

Anti-Affirmative Action Initiative Passes By Wide Margin In Michigan. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A13, Sataline, Hechinger, 2.04M) reports that in 2003, "when the Supreme Court upheld affirmative action in college admissions, many observers felt that the issue had been settled for years to come. Think again." Michigan voters, "where the state university successfully fought in that Supreme Court case to preserve minority preference, repudiated it in a ballot initiative Tuesday. An initiative passed by Michigan voters will ban affirmative action in admissions to public colleges and in government hiring. Currently, the University of Michigan and other selective public institutions in the state consider race as one of many factors in admissions decisions. The ban takes effect 45 days after the vote." Polls had "indicated that the vote on the initiative would be close. But Michigan voters on Tuesday approved the measure, called Proposal 2, by a margin of 58% to 42%, with 100% of precincts reporting."

DOJ_NMG_0092403

Seven States Pass Marriage Definition Initiatives. ABC World News (11/8, story 6, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Voters in seven out of eight states defining marriage as union between a man and a woman. Same-sex partnerships will be allowed in many of the states but they cannot be called marriage."

South Dakota Voters Reject Restrictive Abortion Ban. ABC World News (11/8, story 7, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In South Dakota, voters rejected restricting abortions in cases of rape and incest. The creators said it would hope it would urge the Supreme Court to reverse its stance on allowing abortions."

Los Angeles Firefighter Settles Racial Harassment Suit. The Los Angeles Times (11/8, Banks) reports, "A black firefighter who was served dog food in his spaghetti by fellow firefighters will be paid more than $2.7 million to settle a lawsuit alleging racial harassment and discrimination within the Los Angeles Fire Department." The Times continues, "The award, approved 11-1 Wednesday by the Los Angeles City Council, is the latest in a recent string of settlements of lawsuits by firefighters claiming discrimination, harassment and retaliation against those who complain. … It is believed to be the largest payout for misconduct in the history of the department, which was long considered among the nation's finest, but has been dogged for years by complaints of hostility toward black and female firefighters." The Times adds, "The lawsuit, by firefighter Tennie Pierce, 51, alleges that firefighter Jorge Arevalo mixed canned dog food into Pierce's dinner at their station two years ago; that Capt. John Tohill purchased the dog food; and that Capt. Chris Burton knew about the trick but did nothing to warn Pierce. All three men were present when Pierce ate the dog food. … Pierce 'took a large bite, at which time he noticed the other firefighters were laughing and making noises,' the lawsuit says. He took a second bite, then demanded to know what was in his food, 'but no one would tell him. (Pierce) then left the kitchen with his co-workers laughing at him.' … A fire department investigation suggested the incident was intended to 'humble' Pierce -- who stands 6'5" -- after his team won a fire station volleyball game. A lawyer for one of the defendants initially called the incident 'a good-natured prank . . . (not) in any way motivated by race.' … But a University of California, Santa Cruz, professor who was hired by Pierce's attorney to review department records of discrimination complaints, said the prank was clearly intended to 'humiliate and dehumanize' Pierce."

Maryland Police Say Stun Guns Effective In Averting Trouble. The Baltimore Sun (11/9, Fenton) reports, "From a suicidal teenager to a suspected car thief who flees on foot, some people who have refused to cooperate with Harford County police have been getting a wake-up call -- the 50,000-volt variety." The Sun continues, "The Harford County Sheriff's Office is believed to be among the first police agencies in Maryland to issue Taser stun guns to its deputies, who have used the devices to stop people who flee or refuse to comply with orders, and for the mentally ill who become violent. … The agency has been issuing stun guns to patrol deputies since last year, and they have used them on at least 28 occasions since January. One incident involved a 50-year-old schizophrenic woman who had barricaded herself in a closet and was shocked with a stun gun because a deputy feared she could get to weapons in another room." The Sun adds, "The agency says the devices, which have been criticized for causing fatalities, have been most effective as a deterrent to violence and limit injuries to suspects and officers. A spokesman said assaults on officers were down. … The agency first purchased stun guns in 2002 and has been phasing them into the arsenal of weapons used by all patrol deputies. Harford is not alone -- more than 7,000 of the 18,000 police agencies in the United States use the weapons, according to a March report by Amnesty International, and 1,700 police departments have purchased them for every officer. … With increased use, however, has come greater scrutiny. Amnesty International said there had been at least 156 deaths across the country related to police stun guns in the past five years, and dozens of excessive-force lawsuits have been brought by people who say they were injured by officers." The Sun notes, "A research arm of the Justice Department is conducting a two-year study of cases in which a suspect died after being subdued with a stun gun. The National Institute of Justice said there have been more than 180 deaths in the past 10 years, with most occurring since 2000."

DOJ_NMG_0092404

ANTITRUST:

Dingell Wants FCC To Delay AT&T-BellSouth Vote. The AP (11/9) reports, "John Dingell, the incoming chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said Wednesday that he wants the Federal Communications Commission to delay its vote on the AT&T Inc. acquisition of BellSouth Corp." The AP continues, "Dingell, saying the combination raises a 'significant antitrust question,' sent a letter to the FCC asking that it hold off on the vote until after the new Congress convenes in January. The agency has delayed a vote on the merger three times." The AP adds, 'Dingell's request might be an opening shot in the House Democrats' new oversight of big business. California Rep. Nancy Pelosi, who is in line to become speaker, has promised to fight early on in the next Congress to lower the price of prescription drugs available through Medicare. Efforts to curb military spending are also likely, political and financial analysts said, after an election whose outcome was influenced in large part by voters' dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq. … But with the two parties stalemated in the Senate, where it usually takes 60 votes to pass major legislation, the pharmaceutical and defense industries might find themselves beset more by unwelcome rhetoric in Congress than any changes in law."

Liz Clairborne To Purchase Kate Spade For $124 Million. The AP (11/9) reports, "Liz Claiborne Inc., moving to expand its reach into luxury department stores, Wednesday said it agreed to acquire privately held Kate Spade LLC, a maker of high-end fashion accessories, for $124 million in cash." The AP continues, "The deal, expected to close late this year, includes an undisclosed amount of assumed debt. … New York-based Kate Spade, which makes the kate spade and Jack Spade brands, had net sales of about $84 million for the year ended July 30. Its product line includes handbags, small leather goods, accessories, luggage and baby products." The AP adds, "Kate Spade sells in U.S. department stores, including Neiman Marcus, Saks Fifth Avenue, Nordstrom, and Bloomingdale's, as well as 19 Kate Spade stores, four Kate Spade outlets and one Jack Spade store. … Kate Spade also has distributors in Asia and licensing agreements for shoes, eyewear, tabletop and paper products. … Despite having more than $5 billion in annual sales and more than 40 brands in its stable, Liz Claiborne, also based in New York, so far has been a limited player in handbags and accessories. Its brands include Ellen Tracy, Dana Buchman, Lucky Brand, and Juicy Couture."

Spain's Iberdrola Considers Offer For Scottish Power. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A3, Singer, Johnson) reports, "The latest effort by a European energy giant to strike a major deal -- Iberdrola SA's preliminary approach to Scottish Power PLC -- signals that utilities believe they need to be larger to survive in a future dominated by the search for newer and cleaner ways of producing energy. The Journal says, "Iberdrola of Spain made an approach to Scottish Power, which has a market value of £10.9 billion ($20.8 billion), as a prelude to a possible offer, according to people close to the situation." The Journal reports, "A potential deal would mark the latest in a series of deals and attempted acquisitions involving some of Europe's biggest electricity producers in Spain, France, Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Revokes Boston Police Officer's Bail. The Boston Globe (11/9, Murphy, 413K) reports Boston Police Officer Carlos Pizarro, "one of three officers facing federal cocaine and heroin charges in one of the biggest corruption cases in the department's history," yesterday "was ordered held without bail until the case is resolved. US District Judge William G. Young found that Pizarro violated his bail conditions by agreeing to let the government search his Dorchester home for contraband before he was released, then quickly calling his wife to 'change the situation in that house.'" The Globe adds, "Prosecutors allege that Pizarro, who knew jail calls are monitored, used code words to warn his wife to get rid of illegal drugs. … Pizarro's lawyers, however, disputed the government's contention that Pizarro was talking about illegal drugs. They say he was talking about sex-enhancing drugs…and other prescription drugs during the call."

DOJ_NMG_0092405

The Boston Herald (11/9, Sweet, 184K) reports, "The 20-minute call was placed on Sept. 22 from the Barnstable House of Correction just three hours after Pizarro -- who was busted by the FBI in July with fellow officers Roberto Pulido and Nelson Carrasquillo -- learned authorities would search his home prior to his Oct. 11 pre-trial release. … Pizarro directs Joyce to a 'rack of clothes,' 'little pink things' and the 'top drawer in my dresser,' according to a transcript of the conversation." The Herald notes, "Pizarro, Pulido and Carrasquillo are alleged to have hired themselves out as muscle for cocaine shipments and to have hosted orgies with hookers, among other betrayals of their badges."

FBI, Chicago Police Arrest 17 Alleged Drug Gang Members. The AP (11/9) reports, "Chicago police and the FBI arrested and charged 17 people in a West Side gang roundup Wednesday. Following an investigation by the Joint Task Force on Gangs, FBI special agents and Police narcotics investigators arrested 11 suspected members and associates of the Satan Disciples, according to an FBI release." Operation Burn Down, "which began in September 2004, included undercover operations to purchase drugs and court-authorized electronic surveillance of phones used by one or more of the defendants, the release said. The suspects were charged in criminal complaints filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Chicago with numerous felony counts of conspiracy and possession of a controlled substance with intent to distribute, the release said."

The Chicago Tribune (11/9, Coen, 617K) reports, "One of those charged is de facto head of the gang in Chicago, according to the FBI, and court documents named another as a local chief. … 'These are some of the worst offenders and biggest targets in the area,' said Mitchell Marrone, an assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in Chicago and the leader of the bureau's anti-gang efforts. 'They're dealing in quantities of drugs and also in violence.'" The Tribune notes, "The case came together after intelligence from beat officers was developed by the Chicago FBI's Joint Task Force on Gangs, FBI officials said. The investigation…involved undercover work and electronic surveillance, authorities said."

19 Suspected Gang Members Arrested In Ohio On Drug, Weapons Charges. The Columbus (OH) Dispatch (11/9) reports nineteen suspected gang members across Columbus "were arrested…as police conducted a methodical sweep as part of the mayor's anti-gang initiative. They were some of the 63 suspects that police, the DEA, the U.S. marshal's office and parole officers were searching for…said Columbus police Sgt. Chantay Boxill." Those arrested "were mainly wanted for drug or weapons charges."

Trial Begins For Arkansas Alderman Accused Of Selling Xanax, Crack. The Newport (AR) Independent (11/8) reports on the trial of Newport Alderman Pinky McFarlin, who "is charged with selling Xanax and crack cocaine on 20 different dates to an informant from May through November of 2004. Evidence expected to be introduced will include tape recordings of conversations held between the informant and the defendant in the defendant's home." Witnesses "expected to testify against McFarlin will include an expert witness for the DEA."

Marijuana Initiative Passes In Montana, Relaxes Enforcement Of Some Offenses. The Missoulian (11/8) reports a ballot measure recommending Missoula County law enforcement officials make adult marijuana offenses their lowest priority passed Tuesday night. The measure, dubbed Initiative 2, won the support of 22,502 Missoula voters, or 53 percent. Opponents of the initiative totaled 19,565, or 46 percent, and included some of Missoula County's top law enforcement officials. The initiative will make marijuana crimes the single lowest priority for Missoula County authorities, but won't include marijuana sales or drug use by minors as low-priority offenses."

The AP (11/9) reports Police Chief Rusty Wickman and Sheriff Mike McMeekin "have publicly voiced their concern about the initiative, saying they worry the measure's passage could lead to the loss of federal dollars from Missoula's drug enforcement programs." Proponents "say Initiative 2 strives to place increased emphasis on crimes that threaten people's lives and property and on other, more pressing drug issues." The Helena Montana Independent Record used the AP story.

Three California Cities Lean Toward Relaxing Marijuana Laws. The Los Angeles Times (11/9, Romney, Chawkins, Writers) reports voters on Tuesday "weighed in on a vast array of local issues, with three cities leaning toward relaxed marijuana enforcement. … In returns from Santa Monica, Santa Barbara and Santa Cruz, voters were siding with proposals requiring local police to make marijuana arrests their lowest priority. Financed largely by Ohio insurance magnate Peter Lewis, the measures were opposed by many police officers, who described the issues as unnecessary and a possible obstacle to investigating major crimes."

DOJ_NMG_0092406

In a later story, the Los Angeles Times (11/9) writes, "And a resounding 65% of voters approved Proposition Y, which would make the personal use of marijuana by adults on private property [Santa Monica's] lowest police enforcement priority. Santa Monicans for Sensible Marijuana Policy had said the measure would send a message to Sacramento and Washington that voters want more common-sense marijuana laws."

Colorado Marijuana Measure Defeated By Wide Margin. In the Grand Junction (CO) Sentinel (11/8), Le Roy Standish writes, "Colorado voters have pitched Amendment 44 aside like an assortment of stems and seeds found at the bottom of an empty bag of weed. Tuesday's election results showed that the amendment failed by a wide margin statewide. Across Colorado 688,987 or 60.7 percent voted against the amendment, compared to 445,280 votes or 39.3 percent, in favor. In Mesa County, voters turned the amendment down by an even greater margin. Results were 31,637 votes or 68.2 percent against Amendment 44 and 14,240 or 30.7 percent in favor. The amendment would have decriminalized possession of less than one ounce of marijuana by adults over the age of 21."

On its Web site, WINS Radio, New York (11/8) reports Colorado voters "joined Nevada in rejecting measures that would have legalized possession of up to an ounce of marijuana by anyone 21 and older. South Dakotans voted down a proposal that would have allowed marijuana use for some medical purposes."

Reporting Continues On Nevada Marijuana Measure. In an updated story, the AP (11/8) writes, "Nevadans on Tuesday rejected selling legalized marijuana at state-sanctioned pot shops. … Question 7, to legalize adult possession of up to one ounce of marijuana and require the state to set up procedures to tax and regulate its sale failed, 56 percent to 44 percent. … While other states and local governments have decriminalized possession of small amounts of marijuana, the Nevada measure sponsored by the Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana went further. It directed the state Department of Taxation to set up procedures to license and regulate pot growers, distributors and retailers." The AP adds, "Critics - including law enforcement, civic groups and the nation's drug czar [said] marijuana is a gateway drug that could lead to harsher substances and negate anti-drug efforts." This AP story was used by the Las Vegas Sun.

The Ely (NV)Times (11/8) has posted on its Web site the Las Vegas Review-Journal story included in yesterday's briefing which says, "With at least 1,620 of 1,913 precincts statewide reporting, Question 7, which would have allowed Nevada residents 21 years of age or older to possess an ounce of marijuana or less, was being rejected by 56 percent of voters."

The Reno (NV) Gazette Journal (11/8) reports, "With Lyon's polls closed and votes tallied late Tuesday night, questions Nos. 4 and 5, regarding creation of stricter smoking bans in various public places were both voted down on the County level alongside Question No. 7 regarding legalization and regulation of one ounce or less of marijuana."

South Dakotans Reject Proposed Marijuana Law. The AP (11/9) writes, "Whatever the reason -- too many issues, too long, too confusing -- South Dakota voters rejected eight of the 11 issues on Tuesday's general election ballot. … South Dakotans have rejected a proposed law that would have let some people smoke marijuana to provide relief from pain. … It was defeated 52 percent to 48 percent." This AP story was used by South Dakota's Yankton Daily.

Election Day No "Full Sweep" For Liberal Social Issues. In the Washington Times (11/9, Wetzstein), Cheryl Wetzstein writes, "Tuesday wasn't a full sweep for liberal social issues -- measures to legalize marijuana failed in three states. … Democrats lost measures to legalize marijuana in Nevada, South Dakota and Colorado."

In USA Today (11/9), Judy Keen writes, "There's more to the election results than just Democrats winning and Republicans losing. … Potheads: Voters in Colorado and Nevada rejected proposals to legalize adult possession of up to an ounce of marijuana. South Dakotans voted against medical use of marijuana."

Local TV Coverage. The fate of marijuana measures in Colorado, Nevada and South Dakota received wide local television coverage. Some examples: KDVR-TV, Denver (11/8, 6:00 a.m.) aired, "Another election, another defeat for the folks who want to legalize marijuana. Amendment 44 failed."

DOJ_NMG_0092407

KMGH-TV, Denver (11/8, 6:00 a.m.) aired, "Voters raised the minimum wage…and said no to marijuana with six out of ten voters rejecting that proposal to legalize possession of up to an ounce for anyone over the age of 21."

KUSA-TV, Denver (11/8, 6:00 a.m.) aired, "With 60% of the vote, Amendment 44 has failed."

KLAS-TV, Las Vegas (11/8, 4:00 p.m.) aired, "Nevada voters rejected Question 7, a proposal to legalize marijuana. Fifty-six percent of voters said they were against the initiative, which would have legalized taxed and regulated the purchase and sale of small amounts of marijuana for personal use. John Walters, the White House drug czar, issued a statement today saying the results of this election show that Americans simply do not want more drugs in their communities."

KTNV-TV, Las Vegas (11/8, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "Nevada voters said 'No way' to Question 7 to legalize marijuana for recreational use. Question 7 would have legalized adult possession of up to one ounce of marijuana; it would have required the state to set up procedures to tax and regulate its sale."

KVVU-TV, Las Vegas (11/8, 5:00 a.m.) aired, "Question 7 was one of the more controversial questions on the ballot. It asked voters if they wanted to legalize small amounts of marijuana for people over 21. Despite an effective campaign by supporters, the measure failed by more than 40-thousand votes. … FOX 5's Mike Doria joins us this morning with reaction to this issue. Governor-elect Jim Gibbons was one of the 40-thousand people who voted against the marijuana measure. … Supports of Question 7 say cops should focus on more serious crimes and more serious drugs."

KELO-TV, Sioux Falls, South Dakota (11/8, 9:00 a.m.) aired, "Voters rejected Initiated Measure 4, which would have legalized medical marijuana."

KSFY-TV, Sioux Falls, South Dakota (11/8, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "South Dakota voters rejected 8 of the eleven issues on yesterday's ballot. The failed measures include…legalizing marijuana."

Judge In Montana Denies Claim Under Medical Marijuana Act. The Whitefish (MT) Pilot (11/8) reports a Kalispell man who "claimed protection under the state's Medical Marijuana Act after he was caught smoking marijuana at a downtown Whitefish bar will have his day in court later this month. But he may have to seek another line of defense or appeal to a higher court, now that Whitefish City Court Judge Bradley Johnson has denied the man's motion to dismiss the charge based on the act. … In a two-page document submitted to city court, [Lucas] Venters claims to have a 'debilitating medical condition.' He said he has been 'in pain every day for the past 10 years due to my spinal, thoracic and neck injuries/conditions,' and that he has severe or persistent muscle spasms."

City Council In California Seeks To Ban Marijuana Dispensaries. Torrance, California's Daily Breeze (11/8) reports Lawndale City Council members this week "quickly shot down a proposal to regulate medical marijuana dispensaries in the city, opting instead to direct staff to look into banning the establishments altogether. … Dispensaries have recently met with a cold reception in the South Bay, with Torrance, Gardena, Hawthorne, Hermosa Beach, Lomita, Rancho Palos Verdes and Redondo Beach issuing temporary or permanent bans. Lawndale in June enacted a temporary ban on the establishments."

Federal, State Agents Arrest Arkansas Militia Member On Weapons Charges. The Northwest Arkansas Morning News (11/9, Mehaffey) reports Fayetteville militia member Hollis "Wayne" Fincher "was arrested Wednesday by teams of special agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and other federal and state agencies and local police in connection with illegal firearms." The News notes, "The arrest and search warrants were the result of an eight-month investigation relating to the unlawful manufacture, possession and transfer of machine guns," and "ATF, FBI, Washington County Sheriff's Department, Fayetteville Police Department, Springdale Police Department, Arkansas State Police, Arkansas State Bomb Squad and the Madison County Sheriff's Department all participated in the investigation."

IMMIGRATION:

US Cracks Down On Fraudulent Immigrant Marriages. USA Today (11/9, Koch) reports, "A Virginia man's guilty plea Wednesday to arranging sham marriages between U.S. citizens and Ghanaian immigrants reflects the government's increased focus on marriage fraud." USA continues, "Eric Amoah, 42, a pharmacy technician from Ghana, was one of 22 people charged in the Washington, D.C., area two months ago with participating in a marriage and immigration fraud scheme. His sentence is pending. … Similar busts have occurred in the past year in California, New York and Utah. An investigation is underway in Gwinnett County, Ga., where two men are charged with bigamy for marrying at least 13 African women. … 'We're definitely seeing more organizations' involved in marriage fraud, says James Spero, head of the Identity and Benefits Fraud Unit at U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). 'We're stepping up our efforts.'" USA adds, "Sham marriages for immigrants seeking citizenship have long been a problem. A marriage license can be the quickest way to gain the temporary legal status conferred by a green card, the title of a 1990 movie about two people who enter into such a marriage of convenience only to — surprise — fall in love. … Since 9/11, marriage fraud has taken on more serious implications. Half of 36 foreign-born suspected terrorists who were in the USA from the early 1990s to 2004 gained legal status by marrying Americans — 10 of them through sham marriages — according to the Center for Immigration Studies, which promotes tighter immigration controls."

DOJ_NMG_0092408

Arizona Voters Seen As Helping Boost Comprehensive Immigration Reform. The Los Angeles Times (11/9, 850K) says in an editorial, "Arizona held a referendum on immigration policy Tuesday. The winner was John McCain. McCain, the state's senior senator, wasn't actually on the ballot. Rather, candidates across the state campaigned for or against an idea that McCain and a few other Arizonans in Congress have championed: a comprehensive approach to immigration reform that provides more visas for guest workers, modifies the path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the country and improves border security. Critics of this approach, including Republican candidates for governor, attorney general and two of Arizona's eight House seats, argued instead for sealing the borders and enforcing current immigration laws. They all were defeated, despite the frustration and anger expressed by many Arizonans about the torrent of border jumpers." Now McCain and Rep. Jeff Flake "may get their way. With Democrats in control of the House next year, the prospects for a comprehensive overhaul have improved dramatically." The "voters of Arizona have pushed a comprehensive solution one step closer to reality."

TAX:

Rangel Says He Won't Roll Back Bush Tax Cuts. The Washington Post (11/9, D1, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "Democrats have pledged 'fiscal discipline,' starting with pay-as-you-go rules to prohibit the House from approving new spending or tax measures unless the costs are offset by tax increases or spending cuts." Democratic Rep. Earl Pomeroy, a member of the House Ways and Means Committee, said, "There's not going to be, frankly, room for some grand new adventure in federal spending." Still, "there's plenty on the Democratic wish list, starting with relief for the growing number of middle-class families hit by the alternative minimum tax, which jacks up their tax bills. Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), likely to be the next Ways and Means chairman, said yesterday that 'tackling this very complex problem would be a good test of bipartisanship.'" Rangel "said he would not roll back tax cuts that President Bush won from the Republican Congress. But budget experts predict that Democrats will revisit at least some of them, such as lower rates for the richest Americans, lower rates on capital gains and dividends, and partial repeal of the estate tax, to pay for other priorities."

USA Today (11/9, McCoy, 2.27M) interviewed Rangel, who said, ""I enjoy working together with Republicans. … I enjoy a finished legislative product that you can get on the floor in a civil way and say, 'We worked on this together.' I think that's what the Congress is all about." USA Today adds, "That cooperation was lost during the Republican Party's 12-year control of the House, says Rangel, describing a political wandering-in-the-desert, when it wasn't odd for Ways and Means Democrats to learn about the committee's plans only after final decisions had been made." Rangel "says his predecessor, retiring GOP Rep. William Thomas of California, never spoke to him about US trade legislation apart from bills the New Yorker championed."

USA Today (11/9, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) also reports, "Because Democrats don't have a veto-proof majority in the House, or the 60 votes needed to limit Senate debate, some observers predict gridlock." But "even if passing laws is difficult, Democrats still have plenty of power to shape the agenda." Democrats "can affect the economy by declining to schedule votes on pending trade deals or expiring Bush tax cuts. There are also must-pass measures to fund the government and the war in Iraq, where Bush has less flexibility. Those bills could be a vehicle for adding other Democratic priorities."

DOJ_NMG_0092409

Schumer Says Democrats May Raise "Some Taxes" On "Oil Companies And Things Like That." On Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (11/8), host Bill O'Reilly said to Sen. Charles Schumer, "I believe that Democrats are going to try to raise taxes. Am I wrong?" Schumer: "Well, you're mostly wrong. I mean, there will be some taxes. The loopholes for the oil companies that we'll attempt to close and things like that. But no, we're not going to raise taxes."

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A1, 2.04M) reports Rangel "cites 'ending tax shelters for companies that move American jobs overseas' as one of his main objectives." Rep. Nancy Pelosi, "the probable new speaker of the House, has already called for ending 'tax giveaways' to oil companies, negotiating with pharmaceutical companies for better drug prices for federal health programs and rolling back tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans."

Rangel Open To Private Accounts "In Addition To Maintaining Social Security." On Fox News' Your World (11/8), host Neil Cavuto asked Rep. Charles Rangel, "The President talked a great deal today about private accounts" for Social Security. Is that "a non-starter to Charlie Rangel?" Rangel: "If it's in addition to maintaining Social Security as we know it, no, it's not a non-starter."

New Congress Expected To Scrutinize Some Industries. The Washington Post (11/9, S1, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "Democrats wasted no time yesterday proclaiming a new era in Washington, pledging to put middle-class economic issues at the top of their agenda. They promised fresh scrutiny of drug prices, corporate profits, international trade and more." The "presumptive chairmen of key House committees laid out plans to challenge the president on many issues important to business interests. For instance, an exuberant Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) rattled off a to-do list for the powerful Energy and Commerce Committee, including regulating dietary supplements, promoting electric cars and examining drug-safety procedures at the Food and Drug Administration. 'We'll kill the closest snake first,' he said when asked about his priorities."

The Financial Times (11/9, Kirchgaessner, Bowe, White) reports the elections "set the stage for heightened congressional scrutiny of pharmaceutical companies, oil and gas groups and government contractors such as Halliburton." Shares in Merck, Schering-Plough and other big drugmakers "fell on Wednesday in response to the polls," even as "the overall stock market rose, reflecting an emerging consensus among lobbyists that Democrats would take a selective approach in pushing for regulatory changes." The Wall Street Journal (11/9, C1, Johnson, Mathews, 2.04M) runs a similar report under the headline "Big Pharma Catches A Chill, Fearing Democrats' Prescriptions On Pricing."

New Congress To Revisit Some Bush Administration Federal Workforce Initiatives. The Washington Post's (11/9, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The new Congress will take a more skeptical view of the Bush administration's approach to managing the federal government, in particular efforts to contract out federal jobs and link employee pay raises more closely to job performance. Those were the post-election predictions offered by a number of public policy experts, union leaders and Democrats yesterday." The Post adds, "Federal union leaders saw the election results as an opportunity to roll back some of the administration's workforce initiatives," and "some employee groups said yesterday that they expect to see Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) serve as a bridge" on federal "employee issues." Outsourcing "efforts 'have demoralized people throughout the federal workforce,' Van Hollen said. 'The amount of time, energy and anxiety spent going through this process has far outweighed any benefit.'"

Democrats To Exact Office Space Revenge On GOP. The Washington Post (11/9, C1, Copeland, 690K) reports, "Perhaps we shouldn't call this revenge. Perhaps this is just what a party in power does. Dogs chase squirrels, and the majority party in the U.S. House gets to throw its weight around a little." Former Rep. Bob Wise said, "The first thing you've got to learn is that from now on, you don't get upstairs." Wise recalled "how some of the meeting rooms for Democrats were downgraded when the Republicans took over after '94. Members' personal offices are doled out on a seniority basis, but control over many other rooms falls to the majority."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Pelosi Vows Swift Action On Democratic Agenda. The Washington Post (11/9, A1, Weisman, Babington, 690K) reports Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi "promised swift action early next year on a Democratic package that includes an increase of $2.10 an hour in the minimum wage, full implementation of the recommendations of the bipartisan Sept. 11, 2001, commission, and making some college tuition payments tax-deductible." The AP (11/9, Espo) also notes Pelosi "pledged…to press for a new course in Iraq and move promptly to raise the minimum wage. 'We will not disappoint' the American people,'" she said. At a news conference in the Capitol, Pelosi also "pledged that Democrats will make the next Congress 'the most honest, ethical and open' one in history."

DOJ_NMG_0092410

McClatchy (11/9) reports Pelosi "signaled Wednesday that she intends to steer a centrist course and work across party lines with President Bush to shape policy on Iraq, energy, Social Security and immigration." Pelosi "acknowledged that her party's return to the House majority after a dozen years in exile occurred largely because at least nine fairly conservative 'Blue Dog' Democrats won Republican seats. The liberal-tilting House Democratic caucus must accommodate them -- and the centrist voters they represent -- she conceded." Along similar lines, the New York Times (11/9, Hulse, 1.16M) reports on "the new mosaic of the Democratic Party in the House of Representatives -- incoming lawmakers who will make a diverse group of political officeholders even more eclectic. While much of the focus in the campaign was on the more moderate tendencies of Democratic contenders, the scope of Tuesday's Democratic surge makes for a more complex picture and a broader mix of ideologies. … The diverse viewpoints and backgrounds they are bringing to Washington could pose problems for…Pelosi."

On ABC World News (11/8, story 5, 1:50, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said a Democratic Congress "means an increase in the minimum wage. We saw six states pass initiatives for increase in the minimum wage. It is at the top of the Democrats' agenda. If they control both houses of the Congress, I think they'll be able to pass that. On the President's agenda I think it means he has a better chance of passing the immigration reform that died in the last Congress. Democrats like it more than Republicans do. … On the other hand, the President and his team are going to get investigated more by the Democrats and I think this is most important, if the Senate switches control, the Democrats will be able to block President Bush's judge nominations, including another one on the Supreme Court, if it came up." The Washington Post (11/9, 690K), in an editorial titled "The 'Thumping' of the GOP," lists the top Democratic issues and adds, "If Democrats aren't responsible enough to stop using those issues as political footballs and start considering the future fiscal health of the country, they won't deserve to remain in the majority."

Pelosi, who is receiving largely positive media coverage one day after the midterm elections, made several public appearances and granted interviews to all three network newscasts, PBS and CNN. Pelosi, says USA Today (11/9, Stone, 2.27M), "wasted no time making clear who's in charge now. 'Democrats are ready to lead,' the San Francisco congresswoman declared at a news conference Wednesday, hours after her party reclaimed control of the House of Representatives to end 12 years of Republican rule. And prepared to lead the Democrats is an Armani-clad daughter of an old-fashioned Baltimore politician about to become the first female speaker of the House -- two heartbeats from the presidency." And the Christian Science Monitor (11/9, Chaddock, 59K) reports that "what helped Pelosi become the first female speaker…is old-school pragmatism: a practical sense of how to build power and no qualms about using it."

ABC World News (11/8, story 10, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) described her as "a liberal Democrat from San Francisco, a grandmother many times over, awaiting another grandchild any day now. She comes from a political family but waited to enter politics herself until her kids were grown. As Speaker, she'll be third in line for the presidency." ABC (Moran) added Pelosi "is the woman of the moment in this city right now." In an interview with Pelosi, ABC asked her about the "bad blood built up" between her and President Bush. Is Bush, asked ABC, "still incompetent, shallow and dangerous and all the other things you have called him?" Pelosi: "Incompetence in the implementation of a war, it is dangerous. But again, the election is over. Right now, I'm the Speaker of the House of Representatives. I'm not the leader of the Democrats. I will be the Speaker of the whole House of Representatives." Moran: "There is one thing about Nancy Pelosi's rise that transcends politics, she'll be the most powerful woman in US history when she becomes speaker. Are you going to use the mother of five voice?" Pelosi said, "The mother of five voice comes in handy. My colleagues hear it coming, they know." ABC added, "And that voice works. Nancy Pelosi managed to instill discipline in Democratic ranks. She'll need to keep that up, as the country looks to her and Democrats as they take power in Congress."

The CBS Evening News (11/8, story 8, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) noted Pelosi and the President "have said some pretty nasty things about each other." Pelosi told CBS, "I never called the President a liar. That I never did. I said it's time for the President to tell the truth to the American people. I think that much of the truth has been withheld from the American people." Asked about the fact that she's expected to become the first woman to be Speaker, Pelosi said, "I've broken the marble ceiling. This Congress is steeped in tradition and history. It's very hard for a woman to suck steed the level I have that and I think it send a message to all women that if this can happen, anything can happen." Pelosi repeated that message, almost word by word, on CNN's The Situation Room (11/8, Blitzer), "Congress is…an institution steeped in history and tradition. For a woman to break through what I call the 'marble ceiling' here is something quite remarkable. It sends a message that women can do anything. … I feel a very special responsibility. I feel a responsibility to have the most honest and open Congress, to have a Congress that has civility as its hallmark, bipartisanship in our debate and our deliberations, and fiscal soundness as a woman would want to have, not heaping mountains of debt on future generations. And as the first woman speaker, I would want to conduct myself, perform my duties, in a way that would be sure that it wouldn't be too long before we'd have another woman speaker of the House."

DOJ_NMG_0092411

The AP (11/9, Zuckerbrod) reports Pelosi recounted that Bush's call was "so very, very early in the morning," and that "an ebullient Pelosi recalled…that Bush referred to her as 'Madam speaker-elect, and I referred to him as president.'"

NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 6, 3:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported Pelosi will be "the first woman in that job. As Nancy Pelosi reminded us as we sat down with her today, the first Italian American as well." In her interview with NBC, Pelosi discussed her morning phone call from President Bush, "The call was very friendly. He extended a hand of friendship. I told him what I said earlier in the evening that I looked forward to working with him in partnership, not partisanship." On PBS' NewsHour (11/8, Warner), Pelosi said of Bush, "He's the President of the United States. I respect the office, and I respect him. I don't respect his judgment on Katrina, on Iraq, and on a number of other issues."

The New York Times (11/9, Mills, 1.16M), in a piece titled "Nancy Pelosi Is Ready to Be Voice of the Majority," says that when she "faced the cameras Wednesday morning, after the Democrats had taken a majority in the House and put her on the brink of becoming the first female speaker, she spoke so softly at first that some reporters insisted they could not hear her. Then suddenly, she was commanding: 'But I could use my mother-of-five voice!'" It is "a line Ms. Pelosi uses often, and a voice she may have to rely on frequently as she tries to ensure that the new Democratic majority lasts more than two years."

Rep. Charles Rangel, appearing on MSNBC's Tucker (11/8, Carlson), said, "It's remarkable that I'm the first African-American to head the Ways and Means Committee. She's the first woman to become speaker. But it shows, in this great Republic, that there's progress. And it inspires other people to get involved in public life, hopefully."

On Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (11/8), Sen. Charles Schumer said of Pelosi, "She may vote her district, but she is going to run the Democratic Party in a way that's pragmatic."

Rep. Peter King said on Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (11/8), "I like Nancy Pelosi as a person. But her base is going to be very liberal wing of the Democratic Party. They in many ways just hate George Bush. It's almost irrational. And that's their base."

Pelosi Says Investigations Needed About Iraq, Halliburton, Katrina. On PBS' NewsHour (11/8, Warner), Pelosi said, "Investigations are needed in terms of -- I think the American people want to know about Katrina, about contracting and Halliburton in Iraq. They want to know how we have the energy policy that we do so that we go forward to protect the American people in case of natural disaster, to protect us in times of" war. She added, "That would be three places where I think hearings would be very necessary for us to go forward for better policy."

Pelosi said on CNN's The Situation Room (11/8, Blitzer), "Subpoena power is a last resort. We would hope that there would be cooperation from the executive branch in terms of investigating the pre-war intelligence. I don't know -- those decisions will be made by our caucus with the wisdom of the committees of jurisdiction."

The Washington Post (11/9, A1, Weisman, Babington, 690K) reports Pelosi also "said she will not heed the calls of some activists on the left to explore impeaching the president. But with subpoena power and committee chairmanships, Democrats will ensure that Bush's anti-terrorism and war policies receive tough scrutiny in the last two years of his presidency."

Pelosi Suggests "Troublemakers" Would Leave Iraq If US Pulled Out. ABC World News (11/8, story 10, 2:50, Moran, 8.78M) asked Pelosi about her position on the Iraq war, she said, "Our presence in Iraq has been provocative to our enemies. It is viewed as an occupation. And is resisted not only by Iraqis but others in the region. And those troublemakers, few in number, but nonetheless, a menace, would probably leave Iraq after we left Iraq. They're there because we're there.

DOJ_NMG_0092412

New Congressional Democratic Majority Will Affect Judicial Nominations. The Legal Times (11/9, Goldman) reports, "Democrats, as widely expected, wrested control of the House of Representatives from the Republicans, after 12 years of Republican rule, in elections across the country Tuesday, setting the stage for a series of intensive investigations of the Bush administration by several different House committees. … But it appears Democrats also carried the Senate -- radically changing the politics of federal judge-picking as well -- and that victory was something of a surprise, even to them. As of Wednesday afternoon, Democrat James Webb had claimed victory in the Virginia Senate race over incumbent Sen. George Allen, but a recount that could take several weeks appeared likely. If Webb is indeed the winner, Democrats will have a 51-49 edge. … 'There just wasn't a firm sense this would happen,' says a senior Democratic staffer. 'It could have been as few as two pickups,' the staffer adds, referring to previously Republican seats won by Democrats. 'But six was at the high end.'" The Times continues, "The Democratic Senate victory, assuming it holds, could also have profound implications for the next Supreme Court pick, if 86-year-old Justice John Paul Stevens dies or resigns, or another justice resigns or falls ill, during the last two years of the Bush administration. .. 'The biggest thing [about the Democratic takeover] is judges,' notes David Hoppe, former chief of staff to Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss. 'Everything else has a way of working itself out,' adds Hoppe, now a lobbyist at Quinn Gillespie & Associates." The Times notes, "By midday Wednesday, Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats had already plunged into discussions over the agenda they planned to carry out in their expected majority status. … If they are indeed the majority, then when the 110th Congress begins in January, the Senate Judiciary Committee will be led by Vermont's Patrick Leahy, a 32-year veteran who had previously chaired the committee for 18 months, from mid-2001 until just after the 2002 elections, after the departure of Vermont's James Jeffords from the Republican Party."

Murtha, Hoyer Line Up Support For Majority Leader Post. Roll Call (11/9, Yachnin, Bresnahan) reports that as Rep. Nancy Pelosi "pledged Wednesday to rule the House fairly in the 110th Congress as the first-ever female Speaker, a handful of senior Democrats moved aggressively to secure other leadership posts in their nascent majority." One of the "architects of that victory — Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) — remained mum about his plans despite speculation that he could run for Majority Whip." Current Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) "was not similarly hesitant, formally announcing his bid for the Majority Leader's office early Wednesday morning and confidently predicting that he will secure the post when Democrats vote in leadership election on Nov. 16." But Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) — "who stunned fellow lawmakers when he announced in June that he would campaign for the Majority Leader post against Hoyer — re-affirmed his own interest in the office Wednesday." In addition to "the Majority Leader competition, Democrats could see a contest for control of the third-ranking post of Majority Whip. Although House Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (D-S.C.) remained the only active candidate for the post Wednesday evening it is possible that Emanuel, who has said he will not serve a second term as DCCC chairman, will make a bid for the office."

Hoyer discussed his bid on MSNBC's Hardball (11/8), saying, "I think I'm going to win the race. … I think my colleagues will be supporting me for the work that we've done in the past with Nancy Pelosi, who will be our next speaker, creating the kind of unity and consensus within our party that has led us to be the most unified we've been in a half a century. So I'm very confident." Host Chris Matthews later said, "I think Murtha could be a difficult challenger, but you seem to have the numbers now."

New Line-Up Of Committee Chairmen Noted. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A4, Mullins, 2.04M) reports, "Some in line to become chairmen have suggested that, even if they can't pass legislation that Mr. Bush would sign into law, they would use the power of the gavel to conduct oversight hearings and investigations into the administration and some of its corporate allies." In the Senate, "Pat Leahy of Vermont would take over the Judiciary Committee; Hawaii's Dan Inouye would take the reins of the Commerce Committee; Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts would inherit the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee; and Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico would run the Energy and Natural Resources panel." Rep. Barney Frank, "expected to take over the Financial Services Committee, will focus attention on affordable housing and predatory lending. But Mr. Frank also hopes to enact new regulations on government-sponsored enterprises, such as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, that were endorsed by the current chairman, Mike Oxley (R., Ohio)." Rep. Henry Waxman, "who will run the Government Reform Committee plans to probe oil-company prices, government contracting in Iraq and massive growth in homeland-security expenditures." The Journal adds, "Others assuming committee chairmanships in the House include Michigan's John Conyers at the Judiciary Committee; California's George Miller at the Education and Workforce Committee; and Wisconsin's David Obey at the Appropriations Committee."

DOJ_NMG_0092413

The Financial Times (11/9, Yeager) reports Democrats yesterday "tried to deflect attention from the liberal records of those set to ascend to top jobs in Congress, vowing to work with Republicans. 'We extend a hand of co-operation to the president, our colleagues across the aisle,' said Rahm Emanuel, the Chicago Democrat who led the party's campaign committee. 'We'll work with you when we agree, we will challenge you when we don't. But our goal will always be the best interests of our country.'"

USA Today (11/9, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "One of the few openly gay House members, the Harvard-educated Frank is a liberal on social issues. He advocates tougher regulation in areas than current Chairman Michael Oxley, R-Ohio, but insists he's not anti-business. Frank's goal is to ensure that economic benefits are better distributed. … Among Frank's priorities: expanding affordable housing, enhancing consumer privacy rights and going after predatory mortgage lending."

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A4, Fialka, 2.04M) reports that Dingell, "who has long had a reputation as a partisan investigative bulldog, is in the unusual position of cautioning younger Democrats to resist the impulse to seek revenge on their Republican colleagues. 'Revenge makes you feel good,' says Mr. Dingell, the Michigan Democrat who, at 80 years old, is the most seasoned member of the committee chairmen taking control in the House. 'It ain't the right way to go, but it's going to cause me some problems.'" Dingell "says he plans to run his panel 'from the center' and work out a formula for comity that allows Republicans to participate in the panel's decisions and investigations." But "he and other Democrats who want to reach out to Republicans to avoid gridlock may encounter some resistance from younger Democrats, half of whom have never served in a House controlled by Democrats."

Angry Conservatives Blame GOP Leadership For Losses. McClatchy (11/9, Thomma) reports, "Republicans turned on one another Wednesday after losing control of power in Congress -- blaming an out-of-touch, self-promoting party leadership for abandoning ethics and conservative principles and turning off the country." Conservative strategist Richard A. Viguerie "was especially caustic. 'Every single member of the Republican leadership in the House should be replaced. They have failed the conservatives who put them in office, and they have failed the people of this country,' Viguerie said. … 'I feel liberated,' said conservative radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh, one of the party's biggest cheerleaders. 'I no longer am going to have to carry water for people who I don't think deserve having their water carried.'" In "one of the most stinging indictments, David Keene, the longtime president of the American Conservative Union -- the nation's oldest grass-roots conservative lobby, founded in 1964 -- ripped Republicans for spending more taxpayer money than Democrats had and for weak ethics." Keene "joined Rep. Eric Cantor, R-Va., in urging House Republicans to postpone their leadership elections until January. Cantor is a member of the existing House Republican leadership as chief deputy whip." The Washington Post (11/9, D1, Kurtz, 690K) runs a similar story under the headline "Conservative Talkers, Feeling Just a Little Blue."

USA Today (11/9, Bazar, 2.27M), in a story headlined "GOP Starts To Play The 'Blame Game' Over Its Big Losses," notes Limbaugh's comment, as well as former majority leader Tom DeLay's contention that "Republicans had failed to fight for their core beliefs on such issues as tax reform and immigration." Dick Armey, "former House majority leader and an architect of the Republicans' 1994 takeover of Congress, told National Public Radio's Diane Rehm that the GOP had become the big government party. 'They actually grew the government,' he said." Dick Armey also writes in the Wall Street Journal this morning (11/9, A14), "It was a rout. … One big issue in exit polls suggests widespread voter backlash against the 'culture of corruption.' There is something to this, I think. Over time, too many Republicans in the governing majority forgot or abandoned their national vision, letting parochial interests dominate the decision-making process."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/9, Chaddock, 59K) reports "GOP self-critics say that the bad environment -- scandals, war, the economy, or the president -- doesn't account for this historic GOP defeat. The need, they say, is to get back to the principles that won them their majority in 1994. Call it a bridge to the insurgent past."

DOJ_NMG_0092414

A couple of opinion pieces by conservatives offered a more benign reading of the election, and what it means for Republicans. Jonah Goldberg, who is editor at large of National Review Online, writes in USA Today (11/9, 2.27M) reports, "Don't let the spin fool you: These elections were neither a repudiation of conservative values nor an endorsement of the Democratic Party." The GOP "got thrown out of office because it got fat and lazy and because Democrats -- with the help of a transmission-belt media -- convinced a lot of voters that they could simply change the channel on the war by voting for 'change.'"

George Will, in Washington Post (11/9, 690K), also offered an optimistic assessment of the future of conservatism, listing "three reasons for conservatives to temper their despondency. First, they were punished not for pursuing but for forgetting conservatism. Second, they admire market rationality, and the political market has worked. Third, on various important fronts, conservatism continued its advance Tuesday. … The country remains receptive to conservatism. That doctrine -- were it to become constraining on, rather than merely avowed by, congressional Republicans -- can be their bridge back from the wilderness."

Hastert Won't Seek Minority Leader Post. The CBS Evening News (11/8, story 9, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With the Democrats soon to be the majority in the House, who will lead the Republican minority? The top Republican, Speaker Dennis Hastert, under fire in the Foley page scandal, said today he doesn't want the job." The AP (11/9, Espo) says Hastert's decision "cleared the way for a likely succession battle among lawmakers who face the sudden loss of power after a dozen years in the majority. Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, currently the majority leader, is expected to run for leader, and Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana announced during the day he also will seek the post. Joe Barton of Texas has signaled he may join the field."

USA Today (11/9, Kiely, 2.27M) reports, "Nine races remained too close to call," but "Rep. Deborah Pryce, an Ohio Republican, was in one of them. Pryce, the only female member of the House GOP leadership team, told colleagues in a letter that she would also give up her leadership post even if she wins re-election."

With Santorum Defeated, Alexander Confident Of Winning Senate Minority Whip Post. The AP (11/9, French) reports Sen. Lamar Alexander "said today he's confident his Republican colleagues will select him to be GOP whip, the party's No. 2 leadership position in the Senate." Alexander said he's "close to a majority and 'working on a consensus' to win the post now that his closest rival, Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, lost his re-election bid." Alexander "for months has been meeting with Senate Republicans in hopes they will select him to be the GOP whip. The current whip, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, is expected to succeed Sen. Bill Frist as GOP leader."

Democratic House Majority Could Continue To Grow. Roll Call (11/9, Whittington) reports Democrats "claimed a comfortable House majority in Tuesday's midterm elections and appear poised to also capture control of the Senate pending a final vote tally in Virginia, as voters across the country voiced widespread frustration with President Bush and the Republican Party's leadership." In the House, Democrats "picked up a minimum of 28 seats, with the potential for at least one more gain pending final vote confirmation or recounts. In the Senate, Democratic challengers defeated Sens. Rick Santorum (Pa.), Mike DeWine (Ohio), Jim Talent (Mo.) and Lincoln Chafee (R.I.)." Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) "narrowly trailed state Senate President Jon Tester (D) into the wee hours Wednesday morning and the race was called for Tester by mid-day, although Burns has yet to concede." But even "as the official Senate outcome and several House races remained up in the air and recount teams were being deployed Wednesday morning, strategists in both parties already were shifting their focus to the 2008 landscape and assessing how sustainable the new Democratic majorities might be." National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) "conceded that the seats held by GOP Reps. Anne Northup (Ky.) and Jim Leach (Iowa) — two of the biggest upsets Tuesday — would be all but impossible to return to the GOP fold. Leach had held his seat for 15 terms." Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) "carried both districts in the 2004 presidential contest, and he also won the districts held by defeated Reps. Clay Shaw (Fla.), Curt Weldon (Pa.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.) and Charles Bass (N.H.)." But Reynolds "also sounded confident that his party would be able to recapture some of the GOP-friendly territory lost in 2006. He held out the seats of Reps. John Sweeney (N.Y.) and Jim Ryun (Kan.), both of whom were defeated on Tuesday, as prime pickup opportunities in 2008." Democrats, however, "likened their strong performance in the Democratic-friendly

DOJ_NMG_0092415

Northeast to the political realignment that occurred in the GOP tidal wave of 1994, when Democrats lost a disproportionate number of seats in the South — most of which they have not since reclaimed."

Ronald Brownstein writes in the Los Angeles Times (11/9, 850K), "The rolling realignment of US politics accelerated Tuesday, as Democrats strengthened their hold over the Northeast and opened new beachheads in the Midwest and Mountain West that could prove critical to their hopes of winning the White House two years from now. These and other political changes, illuminated by the 2006 election like a late-night flash of lightning, could signal a new stage in the competition between the two major parties." For Democrats, "the watchword Tuesday was growth: the party expanded its reach with key groups of swing voters as it made notable advancements on previously GOP-leaning terrain." The results "sent Republicans a message of retrenchment: the Democratic surge reversed President Bush's gains in the 2004 vote among women and Hispanic voters and saw the GOP virtually obliterated across the Northeast and mid-Atlantic."

Close Races May Mean Recounts In Half Dozen Districts. Roll Call (11/9, Murray, Drucker) reports, "Election Day may stretch well in to mid-November or beyond, as a bumper crop of midterm nail-biters mean that state elections officials may re-tally the vote in perhaps a half dozen or more House races." As of Wednesday afternoon, Carl Forti, "spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said the GOP was keeping a watchful eye on races involving incumbents Reps. Rob Simmons (Conn.), Robin Hayes (N.C.), Barbara Cubin (Wyo,), Heather Wilson (N.M.) and J.D. Hayworth (Ariz.) — and GOP House campaign leadership hinted that the list may not be fixed." Roll Call adds that by "late Wednesday, Democrat Joe Courtney's narrow lead over Simmons appeared to trip a Connecticut state law requiring recounts. With 100 percent of precincts reporting, the total vote in Connecticut's 2nd district had Courtney besting the three-term incumbent by less than 200 votes." In addition "to those races flagged by the GOP, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spokesman Bill Burton said Democrats were keeping tabs on Franklin County Commissioner Mary Jo Kilroy's (D) attempt to oust the House GOP's fourth-ranking Member, Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio). Burton also said Democrats were concerned about alleged voting irregularities in Florida's 13th district, where automobile dealer Vern Buchanan (R) narrowly defeated banker Christine Jennings (D) in the race to replace Rep. Katherine Harris (R)."

Biden Says At Meetings, Bush Tells Cheney To "Shut Up" Or "Something To That Effect." Sen. Joseph Biden said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/8, Matthews), "One thing about this President, in my meetings with he and [Vice President] Cheney, there's no question who the boss is. He, the President, is the boss. … He'll just say, 'Shut up, Dick,' or something to that effect. … Here's what this President does: He delegates full authority and walks away. … He decided that Cheney was the guy, that he was the smartest guy to do this, and now I think he's decided Cheney ain't working. And so what he's saying is 'Dick, I'm changing. I'm the boss. Here's what we're doing.'"

Rep. Jack Murtha said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/8, Matthews), "I've felt for a long time that the Vice President doesn't have the influence that he had before."

Bush To Meet With Big Three Executives. The AP (11/9) reports President Bush's "long-promised meeting with the heads of Detroit's Big Three automakers will be held Tuesday at the White House." The auto executives "tentatively were scheduled to meet with Bush in May, but in September, the meeting was pushed back until after the election." The delay "prompted criticism from Michigan's Gov. Jennifer Granholm and other Democrats who said the administration had neglected the problems of the Big Three automakers and its workers."

Bush To Examine Bill To Give DC House Voting Rights. The Washington Post (11/9, B1, Woodlee, 690K) reports President Bush said "he will review a bill to give District residents full voting rights in the House, marking the first time he has spoken about a measure that local lawmakers are trying to win approval for over the next few weeks." The bill, "introduced six months ago, also would add a congressional seat for Utah. Proponents of D.C. voting rights have waged a major push to get the bill passed this year." Bush said, "It's the first I've heard of it. I didn't know that's going to come up from the lame duck." The Post adds, "Bush's comments come a week after prominent D.C. politicians and business leaders met to determine how they can get the bill passed this year."

DOJ_NMG_0092416

OTHER NEWS:

Bush Says Election Was A "Thumping." In a press conference yesterday, President Bush said that although the midterm elections were close on a race-by-race basis, overall they represented a "thumping." Bush's "thumping" quote was broadcast in all three network newscasts, and appears on the front-page headlines of several major newspapers. Bush also took his share of responsibility for the GOP loss, and reached out to Democrats. USA Today (11/9, Jackson, 2.27M) reports Bush "began rebooting his agenda on Wednesday, ticking off a revised list of priorities that include education, an immigration overhaul and maybe even an increase in the minimum wage." Bush "pledged to 'work through our differences' with incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi and other Democratic leaders. He said that includes the conduct of the Iraq war. … To jump-start the final two years of his presidency, Bush said he would draw on his experience as governor of Texas, where he developed a reputation for working well with Democrats who controlled the Legislature on such issues as raising education standards and toughening penalties for juvenile crimes." Bush "said there may be some 'common ground' on a Democratic proposal to increase the minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 as long as there is 'compensation' for small business owners. … Bush also expressed hope for a more 'comprehensive' immigration bill that includes expanded employment opportunities for temporary 'guest workers.'" USA Today adds, "Among other agenda items Bush cited: an extension of his signature No Child Left Behind education law, promoting alternatives to oil and dealing with unfunded liabilities in entitlement programs, including Social Security"

The Christian Science Monitor (11/9, Feldmann, Grier, 59K) reports, "The tectonic plates of Washington power have shifted, presenting both…Bush and the new Democratic majority in Congress with an opportunity to work together and leave behind the politics of confrontation. … The reality, analysts say, is that the next two years are likely to offer a blend of confrontation and common ground. The Democrats…don't want their hard-fought majority to vanish in the next election. The incentive for Bush, entering the final two years of his presidency, is to leave his party in a position to compete effectively in 2008." He "can take a page from his earlier days as governor of Texas, when he gained a reputation for working well with Democrats."

Media reports describe the President with terms such as "contrite" and "humble," and several newspaper stories and opinion pieces focus their election analyses on Bush's low popularity ratings. The Los Angeles Times (11/9, McManus, 850K), for example, says Bush's "effort to secure his legacy was encumbered by two inflexible factors: the loss of a once-supportive congressional majority and the weight of an unpopular war. … What lies ahead, Bush's remarks suggested, might be a presidency open to compromise on domestic legislation but committed to its basic strategy in Iraq and the war on terrorism -- one-half Austin, Texas, one-half Sept. 11." Robert Novak, in a syndicated column appearing in the Washington Post (11/9, 690K), writes "only gerrymandered House districts prevented a landslide that would have given the Democrats a House majority of historic proportions, approaching 50 seats." The reaction from losing "candidates was anger at…Bush and his political team. That includes a rising GOP undercurrent against Iraq policy. The unpleasant truth is that Republicans lost almost everywhere the president campaigned during the past week." Also in the Washington Post (11/9, 690K), David Broder notes "a few days before the election, Bernadette Budde, political director of BIPAC, the Republican-friendly Business Industry Political Action Committee, was quoted here as warning of the imminence of what she correctly predicted would be 'an earthquake.' The only people who seemed oblivious to the warning signs were…Bush and his political adviser, Karl Rove." The Republican Party "paid a heavy price for Bush and Rove's obduracy -- and for the miserable performance of the GOP congressional leadership."

Stuart Rothenberg, in Roll Call (11/9), says Bush, "of course, is the biggest loser" in this election "in a number of ways. He loses at least one chamber, and he is the reason Republicans took a bath on Tuesday. He may console himself by believing that he has the right policy in Iraq and history will judge him kindly." But "his performance in office has destroyed a number of noteworthy political careers, and he would be wise to never forget that."

David Brooks, in the New York Times (11/9, 1.16M), writes that "on Tuesday the muscular middle took control of America. Say goodbye to the era of Rovian base mobilization. Say goodbye to the era of conservative dominance that began in 1980."

DOJ_NMG_0092417

Dana Milbank, in his "Washington Sketch" column for the Washington Post (11/9, A2, 690K), says "Rove will have to surrender his 'genius' credentials after the GOP lost the House and apparently the Senate. But the recriminations weren't stopping at Rove's door. The president…went on to blame everybody else. He blamed corruption. … He blamed Mark Foley, whose name remained on the Florida ballot. … He blamed ballot rules. … He blamed bad luck: 'If you look at race by race, it was close.' … And, not least, he blamed the uncomprehending voters: 'I thought when it was all said and done, the American people would understand the importance of taxes and the importance of security. But the people have spoken, and now it's time for us to move on.'" Milbank adds, "The president's performance fit neatly into yesterday's version of the post-election ritual in Washington: The winning side gloated, and the losing side pointed fingers every which way."

On NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 5, 9.87M), Tim Russert said of the election results, "Some are saying it is typical of what happens in the midterm election. Bill Clinton gained five House seats in his second midterm, Ronald regular an lost a handful. This was much bigger than that. Where the White House is correct is war is hard on President's war parties. In the civil war, world war one, world war ii, Korea and Vietnam, the average loss to a party in an election year at war was 37 House seats and seven Senate seats. That's what we saw last night. People anxious about the war."

The Washington Post (11/9, A1, Balz, 690K) describes Bush as "politically humbled." The Post adds Bush and Rove's political model ""has often elevated policies and tactics designed to energize conservative activists over an appeal to what many GOP strategists saw as a shrinking middle of the electorate. But on Tuesday, the center struck back, voting decisively for Democratic candidates in House races." The President "responded with a renewed call for bipartisan cooperation."

ABC World News (11/8, lead story, 2:50, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported "the President seemed almost contrite about the impact this war had on the voters." Bush: "I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made there. It's very important that the people understand the consequences of failure." Bush "summed up what happened with one phrase." Bush was shown saying, "It was a thumping." NBC Nightly News (11/8, lead story, 4:00, Gregory, 9.87M) said, "The President appeared humble, admitting he heard the voter's message on Iraq." The CBS Evening News (11/8, lead story, 3:00, Axelrod, 7.66M) said "Bush didn't duck the drubbing in yesterday's election." He "was conflicted. Losing…had him extending his hand to Democrats." Bush was shown saying, "I understand when campaigns end and I know when governing begins and I'm going to work with the people of both parties." But "in the next breath, he was dug in as ever about the war in Iraq." Bush: "If the goal is success, we can work together. If the goal is get out now regardless, that's going to be hard to work together."

The Los Angeles Times (11/9, Hook, 850K) headlines its story "Bush Bows To Election Day 'Thumping' From Democrats," and says "the ritual of post-election fence-mending began early Wednesday morning, when Bush began dialing congressional leaders, including Democratic chieftains he only rarely consulted while they were in the minority." NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 4, 0:50, Williams, 9.87M) also noted the President said yesterday he plans to meet with the Democratic leadership. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A1, 2.04M) says that when Bush and Pelosi "meet for lunch at the White House today, Mr. Bush and his party will come to the table significantly weakened, and Mrs. Pelosi's Democrats considerably strengthened." The Washington Post (11/9, 690K) run an editorial titled "The 'Thumping' of the GOP," in which it urged Bush and the Democrats to move on to the business of governing. If Democrats don't "stop using…issues as political footballs…they won't deserve to remain in the majority."

The Washington Times (11/9, Curl, 88K) says a "contrite" Bush said "he shares 'a large part' of the responsibility for the 'thumping' suffered by Republicans on Election Day." The AP (11/9, Riechmann, Raum) quotes Bush saying, "I thought we were going to do fine yesterday, shows what I know."

The Washington Times (11/9, Dinan, 88K), in a story titled "Bush Eyes Democrats For Help On Amnesty," says "Republican opponents" of Bush's immigration reform plan "predicted a bloody intraparty fight but said they cannot stop such a bill from passing."

The Chicago Tribune (11/9, Zuckman, 617K) says "the historic midterm election provided a sharp rebuke to Bush and his policies."

White House Handling Of Violence Upsurge In Iraq Seen As Key To Election Results. The New York Times (11/9, Nagourney, Rutenberg, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports the two weeks after President Bush's weeklong commemoration of September 11 were critical to the midterm election results: "The political world had turned, propelled by new bursts of violence in Iraq, new questions about incompetence in the waging of the war in Iraq, and an intelligence report suggesting that the American invasion had actually worsened the terrorist threat." As Republicans and Democrats "reviewed the outcome of a midterm election yesterday that upended political power in Washington, they pointed to this span of time as the most critical period of the campaign. Aides on both sides said that, as much as anything this year, the parties' contrasting reactions to the renewed violence in Iraq accounted for the breadth of a Democratic victory that cost Republicans close to 30 seats in the House and, it appears, control of the Senate." From October on, "in stump speeches and television advertisements, the Democrats moved the war front and center. Republican candidates began to avoid the issue. Yet to the increasing distress of Republican Party strategists, the White House appeared to play into Democratic hands, as Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney continued to offer arguments for victory."

DOJ_NMG_0092418

Frum Offers Advice To Bush. David Frum, a former Bush speechwriter, writes in the Wall Street Journal (11/9, A14, 2.04M) that "the administration seems to have exhausted its energy. Frustrated by Iraq, wounded by Katrina, thwarted in its two most recent major domestic initiatives (Social Security and immigration), the administration looks baffled, uncertain and often strangely passive." But Bush "can yet regain the initiative." Bush "should prepare to bombard Congress and the media with new ideas and proposals that rally his own party, divide his opponents and drive a wedge between left-wing Democrats and the voting public. So long as he is acting, he forces Congress to react. … At home, the administration should seek less to pass legislation -- although legislative success is always welcome -- than to clarify the differences between the parties for 2008. For instance: The president talked vaguely in 2005 of a grand new tax reform, but never gave enough detail to interest anybody in his ideas. What he had in mind, of course, was a shift away from taxing work, savings and investment toward taxing consumption. Good idea, but awfully abstract. The next Congress offers an opportunity to make it clear what this reform means."

More Commentary On Election Results. Bill Safire, writing in the New York Times (11/9, 1.16M) under the headline "After The Thumping," says that "despite the pervasive weariness with the war and the high tide of irritation at Bush's steadfastness; despite the general disgust at the policy paralysis and ethical laxity in the wake of muscle-bound one-party control — the result was only the average loss of House and Senate seats of the party in power midway in the second term of a president." Safire adds, "A political shakeup every dozen years is a necessary cathartic for the two-party system. What's more, the rightward cast of many Democrats in the freshman class is hardly bad news for conservativism. And the heartening victory of Joe Lieberman over the angry far left in liberal Connecticut augurs a renewal of a brief period of bipartisanship at the water's edge. … So cheer up, my fellow right-wingers, especially those of you who have grown too accustomed to winning every election night. Sometimes we have to suffer a loud, corrective slap before readying the political counterpunch."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/9, 2.04M) laments that the GOP gave "so much ammunition" to Democrats: "By our count, at least eight GOP House seats fell largely due to scandal; campaign-finance ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff probably cost Conrad Burns his Senate seat in Montana. These columns have spent several years warning Republicans that their overspending, corrupt 'earmarks' and policy drift would undermine their claim as the party of reform. On Tuesday they did."

In an editorial, the New York Times (11/9, 1.16M) calls the election "a satisfying expression of the basic democratic principle of accountability. A government that performs badly is supposed to be punished by the electorate. And this government has performed badly on so many counts." The Times adds that "while they are trying to build a new majority, the Democrats need to remember what happens when a party in power loses its way."

Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (11/9, Kondracke), "The 2006 election results were a rebuke not just to President Bush and Congressional Republicans but to radio talk-show hosts and other right-wing polarizers."

DeWayne Wickham writes in USA Today (11/9, 2.27M), "In the days leading up to the midterm elections, the president sounded a dire warning. The nation would face 'innumerable obstacles to steady progress' if Democrats wrested control of Congress from Republicans, he said in a speech to supporters. But when the votes were counted the American electorate didn't heed his words, and the president quickly tried to position himself as a healer, not a divider. … If none of this sounds familiar to you, that's understandable. The president I'm talking about is Dwight D. Eisenhower, not

DOJ_NMG_0092419

George W. Bush. And the midterm elections were in 1954, not the ones held two days ago." Wickham adds, "Many lessons can be learned from the drubbing that Republicans took at the polls this week. But none is more compelling than this: Americans don't want the fate of this nation to rest solely in the hands of George W. Bush and the Republican Party he leads."

E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (11/9, 690K), "American voters, in their wisdom, ended an era on Tuesday. They rejected a poorly conceived war policy in Iraq that has weakened the United States. They rejected a harshly ideological approach to politics that cast opponents as enemies of the country's survival. They rejected a president so determined to win an election that he was willing to slander his opponents by saying: 'The Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses.'" The voters "decided there was no decency in that."

Democratic Lobbyists Eager To Share Spoils Of Victory. Roll Call (11/9, Newmyer) reports Democratic lobbyists, "flush with the excitement of a victorious Election Day, already are looking to share in the spoils." The Democratic "rout of Republican rule in Congress also spelled a definitive end of years of GOP dominance of K Street. Jubilant Democratic lobbyists spent the day after the elections basking in their glow, but also beginning to ponder a new order that restores them to relevance." Veteran Democratic lobbyist Chuck Brain said, "It's started. Within a couple days, it will be full-fledged, with companies asking, 'What are we doing?' and 'Can we still represent our interests?'" Roll Call adds companies will "have some adjusting to do, lobbyists from both parties agreed. Many have spent the better part of a decade responding to a Republican pressure campaign to hire more Republican lobbyists and to direct more of their campaign contributions back to the GOP." But the "movers behind that effort were pushed off the stage during this Congress, when former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) was forced to resign and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) fell short in his re-election bid." Several Democratic lobbyists "agreed that the program, dubbed the K Street Project, created an inertia that now will benefit their ranks, as corporate offices seek to ramp up contacts with the new party in control. But even so, many Democratic K Streeters were careful to say their party — which made lobbying and ethics a major campaign issue this year — will not seek to impose its own similar effort to help that process along."

The Washington Post (11/9, A27, Sarasohn, 690K) reports as "former House member Gerry Sikorski (D-Minn.), now head of the government practice at Holland & Knight, put it, some of his fellow Democratic lobbyists have a nice 'jump to their step' today after the Democratic takeover of the House. But then, he said, everyone must get down to the fact that 'it's a bipartisan process largely.'" The Post adds, "No one seems to be echoing the bipartisan-lobbying mantra more than the business community, which, while not monolithically Republican, tended to support more Republicans than Democrats, not leaving it with such great credentials with the new Democratic leadership in the House." Indeed, "today, Harold McGraw III, chairman of the Business Roundtable and chief executive of McGraw-Hill Cos., is talking to the Wharton School of Business on "The Real World Is Neither Red Nor Blue" and laying out the group's agenda for Congress." BRT is "also taking out newspaper ads today on the theme, one of which is a photo of former presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton with the line: 'If they can put aside their differences after an election, so can you.'"

AP Declares Webb Victor, Allen Reportedly To Concede. The AP (11/9, Sidoti, Lewis) reports Democrats "wrested control of the Senate from Republicans Wednesday with an upset victory in Virginia, giving the party complete domination of Capitol Hill for the first time since 1994." Jim Webb's "squeaker win over incumbent Sen. George Allen gave Democrats their 51st seat in the Senate, an astonishing turnabout at the hands of voters unhappy with Republican scandal and unabated violence in Iraq. Allen was the sixth Republican incumbent senator defeated in Tuesday's elections." The new AP count "showed Webb with 1,172,538 votes and Allen with 1,165,302, a difference of 7,236. Virginia has had two statewide vote recounts in modern history, but both resulted in vote changes of no more than a few hundred votes."

The Washington Times/UPI (11/9) reports Sen. Allen "reportedly plans to concede, as news organizations late Thursday projected Democrat Jim Webb has won their Senate contest." Sources "within the Allen campaign told CNN Wednesday that Allen might concede Thursday because a Wednesday canvas of votes suggested there was little chance that a recount would change the outcome."

DOJ_NMG_0092420

The Washington Post (11/9, A28, 690K) says in an editorial, "Barring some significant error or surprise, Mr. Webb will be the state's next junior senator."

ABC World News (11/8, story 4, 2:30, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "No one has called for a recount. That cannot happen until the election has been certified about 2 1/2 weeks from now. Starting today, a canvas, with lawyers from both sides watching every precinct retabulating their ballots. That should be completed in the next three to four days." Ed Gillespie, George Allen campaign advisor: "Votes may shift. You may be asking Mr. Webb if he'll be seeking a recount." Tapper: "But election experts have doubts."

The CBS Evening News (11/8, story 6, 0:15, Pitts, 7.66M) reported, "Poll watchers and lawyers from both campaigns stood by as election officials throughout the state reviewed vote totals, a process that will take at least two weeks. Under Virginia law, a candidate who finishes 1 percentage point or less behind can request a recount. A decision the Allen campaign will make after votes are certified November 27." Ed Gillespie, George Allen's campaign manager: "When you're operating in a margin of 0.3%, there's reason for hope those shifts could go our way." Pitts: "But Virginia political science professor Robert Holsworth says a bitter legal fight could damage Allen over the long term." Robert Holsworth, Virginia Commonwealth University: "I think what George Allen is going to have choose is whether he wants to have a political future in Virginia in another election or whether he's going to roll all the dice on this election."

The Washington Times (11/9, Hurt, 88K) reports Democratic electoral gains "grew yesterday to 29 House seats, with 10 other races still in doubt. On the Senate side, they claimed victory yesterday in the last three states needed to take their gains to six seats. Missouri Sen. Jim Talent conceded defeat to Democrat Claire McCaskill this morning." Montana Republican Sen. Conrad Burns "did not throw in the towel despite trailing Jon Tester in the final unofficial tally. Virginia Sen. George Allen was close enough to Democrat James H. Webb Jr. that he could demand a recount. But several news organizations, including the Associated Press, called the two races for the Democrats."

The Washington Post (11/9, Shear, Rein, 690K) reports Webb "claimed the title of senator-elect Wednesday and began organizing his congressional staff, while Republican incumbent George Allen declined to concede but was described as 'realistic' about the outcome if he seeks a recount challenging Webb's thin lead." Allen "dispatched teams of lawyers and operatives across Virginia in search of the votes he would need to win. Early in the day, Allen did not appear ready to relinquish his claim to an office he once saw as a springboard to the White House." But Webb "continued to lead by approximately 7,300 votes with virtually all of Virginia's 2.3 million ballots counted Wednesday evening, and Republicans said there appeared to be little hope that glitches or math errors might uncover new GOP votes." GOP strategist Ed Gillespie "said Allen was 'realistic,' and an e-mail sent late Wednesday said the senator would make a statement 'at the conclusion' of the statewide canvass of votes."

USA Today (11/8, Hall, Parker, 2.27M) reports Webb "laid claim to a Virginia Senate seat Wednesday, but" Allen "refused to yield as elections workers across the state double-checked returns in a razor-close election." The Associated Press "declared Webb the winner late Wednesday after canvassing elections officials statewide. That result would leave Democrats with control of the Senate — and therefore the entire Congress. If Allen prevailed in a vote challenge, the houses would be split between the parties." In a "page from President Bush's political playbook from the contested 2000 election, Webb took steps to try to seize victory before it had been officially declared. Early in the day Wednesday he named three members of his transition team, and his campaign headquarters staff started referring to him as 'Senator-elect.'"

The New York Times (11/8, Broder, Urbina, 1.16M) reports Allen's advisers "said Wednesday night that he would do nothing until a canvass of ballots was completed. But Democrats — ecstatic at the prospect that they might have swept both houses of Congress — were not waiting." Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer said, "It is virtually 100 percent that Webb is going to win the race. I think you can say without any hesitancy or doubt that Democrats are going to be the majority party in the Senate."

Independent Green Candidate Offered To Endorse Candidate Who Backed Railway Plan. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A1, Kronholz, Schatz, 2.04M) reports Independent Green Party of Virginia candidate Gail Paker two weeks ago "offered to swing her support in the Virginia Senate race to either the Democratic or Republican candidate. In return, she wanted them to back her pet issue: high-speed rail across the traffic-clogged state." But "neither man was much interested in her offer, she says. Now it looks like her 'Gail for Rail' campaign could have been a factor in deciding which party controls the U.S. Senate." Parker "collected about 26,000 votes -- which could have given either Republican Sen. George Allen or Democratic challenger Jim Webb a decisive victory."

DOJ_NMG_0092421

Midterm Elections Scramble 2008 Candidacies. USA Today (11/9, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports the elections "transformed not only Congress but the playing field for the 2008 presidential race. Some contenders self-destructed, one went home and a meteor streaked onto the radar in the form of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama. There were two things, however, that didn't change: the contenders leading the polls on both sides." Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., "won a resounding re-election victory after raising nearly $40 million — more than any other Senate candidate this year. She isn't yet talking about her future, which is widely presumed to include a presidential bid but could involve a leadership role in a possibly Democratic Senate." The Republican front-runner, Arizona Sen. John McCain, "campaigned and raised money for candidates nationwide while also building a network for his White House bid. Though supportive of President Bush on Iraq, his disagreements with Bush about immigration policy, prisoner abuse and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's performance kept his maverick image alive." While former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani "also does well in polls and barnstormed the country, 'right now it's hard to see another Republican who has similar stature' to McCain," according to University of Iowa professor Peverill Squire. A "lesser known Democratic hopeful, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, is forming a presidential campaign committee today, the Des Moines Register reported, making him first into the race on either side." But Republican Sen. George Allen, who had "laid foundations for a national campaign now faces political oblivion." Another politician "who pushed the self-destruct button: Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry."

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A1, Cummings, 2.04M) reports McCain "proved more popular on the stump with his party's candidates than President Bush did -- newly-elected Republican Gov. Charlie Crist skipped a last-minute rally in Florida with the president to tour that state with the Arizona lawmaker." But his "advocacy for continuing the Iraq campaign -- and perhaps sending in more troops -- sharply conflicts with the antiwar message sent by voters this week." Sen. Clinton "was also a popular fundraiser on the campaign stump, and she transferred millions of dollars from her bulging campaign account to candidates and party committees to help the Democratic team." Pat Toomey of the Club for Growth views McCain as "insufficiently reliable," and said his "wing of the party is still reviewing the record of Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who also impressed party activists with his midterm campaigning. They remain skeptical that a law adopted on Mr. Romney's watch penalizing businesses that don't provide health-care coverage will meet their standards." To "fill those holes, social conservatives began taking another look at Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, both of whom would have to drastically ratchet up their presidential-campaign machinery to become competitive. On the fiscal side, activists may try to recruit South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford, who was re-elected on Tuesday and hails from a state in the party's early primary lineup." The "election fallout also could encourage a long-shot candidate such as former House Speaker Newt Gingrich to jump into the race. On the flip side, the diminished influence of the religious right on the midterms could buoy the camp of moderate former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, another sought-after personality this cycle." The Democrats "also are without a high-profile antiwar candidate who could harness the activist and voter support for that position evident in the campaigns. North Carolina's John Edwards could be best positioned to do that."

Patrick To Become Nation's Second-Ever Black Governor. ABC World News (11/8, story 8, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Massachusetts Democrat, Deval Patrick, became the second black person ever to be elected governor of any state. He is now the new governor of Massachusetts."

Minnesota Elects Nation's First Muslim Congressman. ABC World News (11/8, story 9, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "And the first Muslim Congressman will arrive on Capitol Hill for Minnesota. Keith Ellison, will represent a district who is predominantly Christian."

Stock Markets Make Gains. NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 11, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Dow was up just under 20 points [to close at 12,176.54]. NASDAQ gained nine points [to close at 2,384.94] on today's trading.

DOJ_NMG_0092422

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, C1, Richardson, 2.04M) reports the Dow "rallied to a record close following the news of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation. Stocks initially traded lower -- particularly health-care-related shares -- as investors weighed the impact and remaining uncertainty surrounding the results of the midterm elections. But the momentum reversed to the upside after the first headlines about the resignation of Mr. Rumsfeld, who has come in for criticism for his handling of the war in Iraq; after a pause, stocks rose again after President Bush's subsequent news conference discussing the election and pledging to work with the new Congress." The S&P 500 "edged up 2.88 points, or 0.2%, to 1385.72, up 11% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 9.06 points, or 0.4%, to 2384.94, up 8.1% this year."

USA Today (11/9, Shell, 2.27M) reports the "rallying cry on Wall Street after the Democrats' power grab is that political gridlock caused by divided government is good for financial markets." Stock market action Wednesday "supported that line of thinking. In the first day of trading after the Democrats regained control of at least one branch of Congress, the Dow Jones industrial average rose 20 points and finished with a record closing high of 12,176.54." But "some Wall Street economists and investment strategists contend that two years of potential legislative inertia might not be the best thing for financial markets in the long run. In a report titled 'Wrong Time for Gridlock,' for example, Stephen Roach, chief economist at Morgan Stanley, says the U.S. can't afford not to tackle pressing economic concerns, the major one being the bulging budget deficit."

McCain Resigns From Board Of Gallaudet Over Ouster Of Incoming President. The New York Times/AP (11/9) reports Sen. John McCain has resigned from the board of trustees of Gallaudet University, the world's premier university for the deaf, after disagreeing with its decision to revoke the appointment of its incoming president, a university spokeswoman said." The chairwoman "of the Gallaudet University board, Brenda Jo Brueggemann, has also resigned, the spokeswoman, Mercy Coogan, said." Mr. McCain "wrote to outgoing President I. King Jordan on Monday, describing the board's decision as unfair, Ms. Coogan said."

WPost Praises Ford's Call For More Civil Political Campaigns. The Washington Post (11/9, A28, 690K) reports that it is "too bad that Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr.'s concession speech in his failed Democratic bid for the U.S. Senate came at an hour when most people had gone to bed. Not only was he gracious, but Mr. Ford delivered an important plea for a bettering of the American political process: 'What people want more than anything, and what I heard and I know candidates all around the country heard . . . [was] a hunger, and they sensed a great appetite on the part of the American people for something much better and far more dignified and greater than what we'd given them.'" Ford "knows firsthand -- to use his phrase -- how 'demeaning and debasing' politics can be, having been the target of a scurrilous ad in which a suggestively dressed white woman is seen coming on to him. Mr. Ford is black. Unfortunately, that ad was not an aberration but rather an embodiment of the seedy standards that infected this political year."

Russia Rejects Proposed UN Sanctions On Iran. The AP (11/9, Meyer) reports Russia has "rejected European-proposed UN sanctions aimed at forcing Iran to halt its suspected nuclear weapons drive, but Moscow appears to be applying its own pressure by threatening to delay a key nuclear power project. Analysts say the Kremlin is determined not to push Iran into a corner like North Korea -- blaming tough US policies for Pyongyang's recent nuclear test -- but Tehran's refusal to compromise has led to growing impatience in Moscow despite the two countries' close commercial ties."

Separately, the AP (11/9, Jahn) reports Russia has "crossed out large sections of a UN Security Council draft proposing broad US-backed sanctions on Tehran's nuclear and missile programs," citing a document the news agency obtained Wednesday. The AP says Moscow has "delete[d] any reference to Iran's Bushehr nuclear plant, which Russia is helping build." UN diplomats "said the Kremlin wanted no mention whatsoever of Bushehr. That stance was meant to reflect Russia's view that the plant should not be linked to international concerns that Tehran might be trying to develop nuclear arms."

After Shelling Kills 18 In Gaza, Hamas Vows Retaliation Against US, Israel. NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 10, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, In the Middle East the leader of Hamas says the truce with Israel is over after 18 members of one family, including eight children were killed in an Israeli artillery attack in a crowded neighborhood on the Gaza strip during a military campaign aimed to stop rocket attacks. Israel's prime minister apologized for the deaths of innocent civilians." ABC World News (11/8, story 12, 0:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that the Israeli army said it "had missed its intended target by 500 yards. Tonight, the militant group Hamas ended its two-year truce with Israel, called for attacks against the US, and demanded revenge for this suffering."

DOJ_NMG_0092423

In a front page article, the New York Times (11/9, A1, Fisher, Erlanger, 1.16M) calls the attacks "one of the largest single losses of life in Gaza in years" and notes that "some Hamas leaders called for a suicide-bombing retaliation inside Israel and, unusually, for the United States to be taught 'hard lessons' as well." Israeli leaders "expressed regret" for the incident and Defense Minister Amir Peretz "ordered a halt to artillery attacks" in Gaza. However, "After largely observing a unilateral truce that it declared a year and a half ago, Hamas called for renewed suicide bombings." The group's military wing also said in a statement that the US should be taught "hard lessons" for supporting Israel. The Times says the threat, "though vague, was an unusual escalation for Hamas…that has pointedly portrayed its fight as being against Israel alone." Meanwhile, "leaders at the United Nations and the European Union, and in Russia, Britain and Italy, did condemn the incident" and NSC spokesman Gordon Johndroe "called for restraint by all parties," adding: "We deeply regret the injuries and loss of life in Gaza today. We have seen the Israeli government's apology and hope their investigation will be completed quickly." A "similar statement was "issued in President Bush's name," the Times notes.

The Washington Post (11/9, A3, Wilson, 690K) notes that the inquiry into the attack "will be led by Maj. Gen. Meir Kalifi, deputy chief of ground forces, who headed the June investigation into an explosion on a Gaza beach that killed six" Palestinians. Kalifi "concluded that Israel was not responsible for the blast, although a Human Rights Watch investigator said the explosion most likely came from a fired artillery shell." And in a statement, Israel's military said that "the responsibility for any civilian casualties lies with the terrorist organizations" firing rockets toward Israel.

The Financial Times (11/9, Morris) adds, "Israel's leading human rights organization," B'tselem, has "demanded a criminal investigation" into the shelling, saying it "was gravely concerned that the action constituted a war crime." The Times notes that "whatever the outcome of the investigation, the incident prompted fresh questions about Israel's military tactics in Gaza where hundreds of people, including 96 children, have died this year while the number of Israeli civilian casualties of Palestinian attacks has dwindled to a handful. Israeli tanks had ostensibly been targeting areas used by militants to fire rockets into southern Israel."

The AP (11/9, Hadid) notes that the UNSC "scheduled an open meeting Thursday at the Palestinians request. Palestinian UN observer Riyad Mansour said Palestinians want a resolution that condemns recent Israeli attacks and calls for an Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, a cease-fire, and deployment of UN observers." Meanwhile, McClatchy (11/9, Nissenbaum) says the attack "briefly united Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, who set aside their differences over the formation of a new unity government to visit survivors of the attack."

Reid Calls Bush's India Nuke Deal A Priority. Bloomberg (11/9, Mathewson, Johnston) reports Senator Harry Reid said completion of President George W. Bush's nuclear agreement with India is "a priority during an anticipated post-election legislative session." Speaking to reporters in Washington, Reid said, "India is the largest democracy in the world. We want to work with them, and this is important we move along that line." At the White House, President Bush said securing congressional approval for the accord is "also high on his agenda." Bloomberg says the deal is "a major initiative of Bush's foreign policy" and "passage in the lame-duck session would be a win for nuclear-industry suppliers."

UN Urges US To End Cuba Embargo. The AP (11/9, Lederer) reports the UN General Assembly voted "overwhelmingly Wednesday to urge the United States to end its 45-year-old trade embargo against Cuba after defeating an amendment calling on Fidel Castro's government to free political prisoners and respect human rights." The AP notes that it was "the 15th straight year" the body approved a resolution calling for an end to the embargo "as soon as possible." After the vote, US deputy ambassador Ronald Godard "said that to claim the embargo adversely affects the Cuban people ignores 'the truth' that the Cuban government has systematically denied 'the human, economic, labor and political rights of its people over 47 years.'"

US Seeks To Establish "Positive Relations" With Ortega. The AP (11/9, Gedda) reports the State Department "said Wednesday that it looks to establish 'positive relations' with the Nicaraguan government of President-elect Daniel Ortega." Spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos said cooperation with Ortega will be "based on their action in support of Nicaragua's democratic future." On Tuesday, State Dept. spokesman Sean McCormack "suggested that Ortega may have a stake in maintaining good relations with the United States. He noted that Nicaragua is part of a US-Central American free trade agreement. In addition, he said the United States has a $175 million program aimed at rural development in a northeastern Nicaraguan region sprinkled with strong pro-Sandinista sentiment."

DOJ_NMG_0092424

Chavez Leads "Global Chorus" Of Bush Critics In Democrats' Victory. The Washington Times (11/9, Sands, 88K) reports Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez yesterday "led a global chorus of Bush administration critics gloating over the outcome of Tuesday's midterm elections, but some foreign leaders expressed concern over what the Democratic victory will mean on issues such as global trade and the Middle East." The Time says "Latin American populists, European leftists and Islamic fundamentalists were all quick to point to the US vote as a repudiation of Mr. Bush's aggressive, go-it-alone approach on Iraq and the global war on terror." The resignation of Secretary Rumsfeld also "sparked praise from leaders of countries from the heart of what Mr. Rumsfeld once memorably dismissed as 'Old Europe.'"

Venezuela Groups Get US Aid Amid Meddling Charges. The New York Times (11/9, Romero, 1.16M) reports, "Since President Hugo Chávez returned to power after a brief coup in 2002, the United States has channeled millions of dollars to Venezuelan organizations, many of them critical of his government. This aid has become a key issue in the presidential election next month amid claims of American interference in the domestic political system." Although American diplomats in the country "have remained largely quiet in commenting on the election," the Times says the United States Agency for International Development "has distributed about $25 million to various Venezuelan organizations over the last five years, according to officials involved in the projects."

Immigration Expected To Dominate Calderon, Bush Talks. The Washington Post (11/9, A18, Boustany, 690K) reports that at a White House meeting with President Bush today, Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon is "expected to express Mexico's disappointment with the decision by the outgoing Republican-controlled House and Senate to approve a 700-mile fence along the Mexican-American border." However, during a meeting yesterday with Washington Post reporters and editors, Calderon said yesterday that Democratic gains in Congress could lead to "room for improvement" in US-Mexican relations, "a suggestion that headway may be made on immigration and other bilateral issues." Calderon also said that the North American Free Trade Agreement "had been a boon for Mexico but that more needed to be done to make the economy more competitive."

The Washington Times (11/9, Dinan, 88K) says the "hottest topic" of today's meeting is "likely to be immigration, and Mr. Bush's signature two weeks ago" authorizing the border fence. Calderon criticized the fence yesterday in a meeting with Hispanic groups, saying he sees "the US-Mexico border not covered in walls and barbed wire, but as an area of opportunity and prosperity for Mexicans and Americans both." Meanwhile, a White House official said having the meeting before Calderon's Dec. 1 inauguration "reflects the importance we attach to continued strong ties with our hemispheric partner and neighbor."

Similarly, the Christian Science Monitor (11/9, Llana, 59K) says the subject of the fence "could overshadow other issues" at today's meeting, noting that immigration "was not among the main issues on the original agenda for Thursday's meeting." However, Bush's move to authorize the fence "underscored the Fox administration's failure to help Mexicans working illegally in the US and appears to have forced his successor to make it a priority," the Monitor writes.

The AP (11/9, Gedda) notes that during his address Wednesday Calderon "made clear...his unhappiness" with the fence, saying the two countries need "bridges for progress and not walls that isolate and divide."

EU Issues Warning To Turkey Over Bid. The Financial Times (11/9, Dombey, Parker, Boland) reports the EU Wednesday gave Turkey "a month to rescue its bid…as Brussels sought to allay public concerns that the EU is expanding too far and too fast. In response, Ankara said it was up to the 25-nation bloc to keep the negotiations alive." However, the issue is "set to come to a head at an EU summit next month. But Olli Rehn, EU enlargement commissioner, held out hope that the looming 'train wreck' over Turkey's membership could yet be averted." Officials said that Brussels "would probably set out the likely penalties for Turkey in early to mid-December, ahead of the EU summit. But Mr. Rehn's staff fears that if the EU takes too tough a stance with Ankara, either the talks will prove impossible to revive or Turkey will choose to walk away."

DOJ_NMG_0092425

The New York Times (11/9, A5, Bilefsky, Kanter, 1.16M) calls the EU statement "its strongest warning yet to Turkey to open its ports to Cyprus and make more progress on human rights or face a possible suspension of talks." But a poll published Tuesday by the International Strategic Research Organization "showed that two-thirds of Turks would rather suspend membership talks with the European Union than give ground over Cyprus."

WHO Nominates Chinese Disease Expert As New Director. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, B7, McKay, 2.04M) reports the World Health Organization Wednesday nominated Chinese infectious-diseases expert Margaret Chan to lead the United Nations health agency, "underscoring China's rising prominence and mounting pressure on the Chinese government to improve its cooperation on global health crises such as avian flu." The "landslide victory" over four other finalists "assures her of a 5½-year term as the next director-general of the agency. The Journal notes that China "campaigned hard" for Dr. Chan in a push led by Vice Premier Wu Yi and President Hu Jintao. The move was "unusual because the five permanent-member countries of the UN's Security Council "traditionally haven't backed candidates to lead WHO," it notes.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Democrats Close In On Senate."
"With Bonds Approved, The Line For Billions Forms."
"Senate On Verge Of New Agenda."
"A New Bush? Yes And No."
"L.A. Tycoons Join Bidding For Tribune."
"Election Shows State's True Colors: Pastel."

USA Today:
"Nomination Offers 'Fresh Perspective' On Iraq."

New York Times:
"Rumsfeld Resigns; Bush Vows 'To Find Common Ground'; Focus Is On Virginia."
"With Control Of The Senate In The Balance, All Eyes Turn to Virginia."
"Democrats Turned War Into An Ally."
"New Democrats Pose Challenge."
"Robert Gates, A Cautious Player From A Past Bush Team."
"Nancy Pelosi Is Ready To Be Voice Of The Majority."
"Israeli Shelling Kills 18 Gazans; Anger Boils Up."

Washington Post:
"Bush Ousts Embattled Rumsfeld; Democrats Near Control of Senate."
"A Meek Departure From the War Cabinet."
"House Majority Offers An Ambitious Agenda."
"For Bush's New Direction, Cooperation Is The Challenge."
"Governor And U.S. Senate Losses Just The Tip Of State GOP Collapse."
"Webb's Small Lead Holds Up In Virginia

Washington Times:
"Democrats Claim Senate Control."
"Bush Accepts Role In Losses."
"Bush Eyes Democrats For Help."
"Rumsfeld Resigns Under Pressure."
"Iraqi's See No Shift In U.S. Support."
"Ehrlich Steele Concede Defeat."
"Snubby Blacks In PG Sink Steele."

Detroit Free Press:
"Faces Of Chance."
"Who Is Nancy Pelosi?"
"Legal Assault Begins On Affirmative Action Ban."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Political Aftershock."

Houston Chronicle:
"A&M gates To replace Rumsfeld."
"A Unifying Tone After Shift In Congress."
"Chance To lead War Top love Of School."
"He Calls Move 'A Good Things For Everybody'."
"A Long Day's Journey To Victory."
"Warning For GOP In Harris County."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Rumsfeld Is Leaving New Defense Secretary; Election 2006 Results; Virginia Senate Race; Senate Analysis; Same Sex Marriage; Abortion Not Banned; New Black Governor;

DOJ_NMG_0092426

First Muslim Congressman; New Speaker; Abortion Case; Violence-Gaza Strip; Pakistan Violence; Election Mistake.
CBS: Rumsfeld Is Leaving; New Defense Secretary Analysis; New Defense Secretary-Military Response; Rumsfeld Analysis; New Defense Secretary-Pelosi's Reaction; Virginia Senate Race; Election Results; Pelosi Interview; Hastert-Minority Leader Position; Rumsfeld's Legacy.
NBC: Rumsfeld Is Leaving; Rumsfeld's Legacy; New Defense Secretary-Military Reaction; Election Results; Election Results Analysis; Pelosi Interview; Abortion Case; Flood Waters; Pakistan Violence; Gaza Strip Violence; Stock Market; Democratic Sweep.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: AP-Webb Victory in VA; Bush-Meeting With House Democrats; Howard Dean-No Plans For Immediate Iraq Departure; Rumsfeld Resignation; Robert Gates-Bush's Choice To Replace Rumsfeld; San Francisco 49ers Moving To Suburbs; Stock Market Reaction To Elections; Federline-Spears Divorce; TX-State Representative's Assault Claim.
CBS: AP-Webb Victory in VA; Robert Gates-Bush's Choice To Replace Rumsfeld; US Troops in Iraq-Reaction To Rumsfeld's Resignation; Sen. Warner-Hoping To Confirm Gates By End Of Year; Tom Vilsack To Enter 2008 Presidential Race; Atkin's Diet Study; MA-Gay Marriage; Stock Markets
NPR: AP-Webb Victory in VA; Rumsfeld Resignation; Pelosi, Bush Meeting; CA-Sex Offender Proposition 83 Blocked By Judge; Tokyo Stock Market; Wall Street; Microsoft's Windows Vista Announcement; NATO Confrontation With Afghan Insurgents.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in the presentation of the 2006 National Medals of Arts and the National Humanities Medals, Oval Office; meets with the Cabinet; meets with President-elect Felipe Calderon of Mexico.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for the introduction of bills.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 2 p.m. Meets for pro forma session.

Other: MEXICAN PRESIDENT-ELECT FELIPE CALDERON _ Highlights: 1:15 p.m. Meets with President Bush. White House.

WAR-ELECTIONS _ 10 a.m. - 10 p.m. Anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan leads a protest against the war in Iraq and possibly against election results. Location: Lafayette Park.

HEALTH CARE _ Two-day meeting of the Consumer-Centric Healthcare Congress. Highlights: 9:30 a.m. Adam Bosworth, VP, Google. Location: L'Enfant Plaza Hotel, 480 L'Enfant Plaza, SW.

US-EU _ The 2nd U.S.-EU Economic Ministerial will be held. Highlights: 1:45 p.m. Energy Secretary Bodman meets with the ministers to discuss energy security issues. Closed press. Location: Blair House.

ELECTIONS-HEALTH CARE _ The Employers Council on Flexible Compensation and member companies hold a two-day conference in which leaders from the benefits field will provide their immediate reaction to the 2006 elections and their impact on health care issues for employers and employees and strategies for 2007. Highlights: 2:30 p.m. Session on ``What do Elections Mean for Health Care Issues?" with John Castellani, President, Business Roundtable; Helen Darling, President, National Business Group on Health; Dr. Jeremy Mayer, George Mason University. Carnegie Institute of Washington, 16th and P Sts. NW.

VETERANS CONFERENCE _ The American Veterans Center's holds its Ninth Annual Conference. The event includes three full days of speakers devoted to each era from World War II through today; wreath laying ceremonies at the World War II, Korea and Vietnam War memorials; and evening receptions. Highlights: Location: Hyatt Regency-Crystal City, 2799 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington, Va.

ELECTION ANALYSIS _ 8 a.m. - 4:30 p.m. Congressional Quarterly and the Public Affairs Council hold a day-long briefing to provide analysis of the midterm elections. Location: Ronald Reagan Building, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

POLITICS-ARAB WORLD _ 9:30 a.m. - 1 p.m. The U.S. Institute of Peace hosts an event, ``Political Oppositions in the Arab World: A New Path?" Participants include: Daniel Brumberg, Overview Special Adviser, Muslim World Initiative; Dina Shehata, Egypt Department of Government, Georgetown University; Maryam Montague, Morocco Democracy and Governance Specialist, Management Systems International; and Janine Clark, Jordan Associate

DOJ_NMG_0092427

Professor, University of Guelph. Location: U.S. Institute of Peace, 2nd Floor Conference Room, 1200 17th St. NW.

ELECTION-MIDEAST _ 9 a.m. The Middle East Institute holds a panel discussion on the Tuesday elections, with Joshua Muravchik of AEI, Mara Rudman of the Center for American Progress and p 1/8ollster James Zogby. Location: MEI, 1761 N St. NW.

VETERANS COMMISSION _ 9 a.m. Commission on the Future for America's Veterans holds its first meeting to discuss baseline issues report. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

VETERANS BENEFITS _ 9:30 a.m. AMVETS holds a news conference to release recommendations on reforming and modernizing the veterans' benefit system. Location: National Press Club.

DISABILITY REPORT _ 10 a.m. The National Council on Disability holds a media availability to release its annual ``National Disability Policy: A Progress Report." Location: Suite 850, 1331 F St. NW.

POST-ELECTION FORUM _ 10 a.m. - 12 p.m. NDN, the political action arm of the New Democrat movement, holds a post election forum with Pete Brodnitz, pollster and advisor to Senate candidates Jim Webb and Harold Ford; Tom Matzzie, Washington director for Moveon.org; Tom Schaller, professor, Univ. of Maryland, author, ``Whistling Past Dixie"; Maria Cardona, senior advisor, NDN's Hispanic Strategy Center; and others. Location: Phoenix Park Hotel, 525 New Jersey Ave., N.W.

MILLENNIUM CHALLENGE _ 10:30 a.m. Millennium Challenge Corp. Deputy Chief Executive officer Rodney Bent holds a meeting to discuss actions from Wednesday's board meting, followed by a panel to update the selection of eligible countries for FY07. Location: Millennium Challenge Corp. offices, 875 15th St. NW.

FAMILIES-IRAQ _ 11 a.m. The Military Families Speak Out organization holds a news conference to call for an end to the ``back door draft" and for all troops to be brought home. Location: News conference at the LBJ Memorial Grove parking lot near the pentagon, off the GW Parkway. March will then be to the Pentagon to deliver petitions to Secretary Rumsfeld.

ELECTION REAX _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute holds a forum on the results of the 2006 election, with John Samples of the institute, Michael McDonald of Brookings Institution, others. Location: 1000 Masschusetts Ave. NW.

ELECTION-BLACK VOTE _ 12 p.m. The National Coalition on Black Civic Participation Unity '06 Coalition holds a briefing on the impact of the black vote on the election. Highlights: 12 p.m. Panel discussion on what happened. 1:30 p.m. Panel discussion on the future. Location: National Press Club.

NEW CONGRESS-ETHICS _ 12 p.m. News conference by Campaign Legal Center, Common Cause, Democracy 21, League of Women Voters, Public Citizen and US PIRG to call for immediate lobbying and ethics reforms in the new Congress. Location: National Press Club.

AEI-MIDTERMS _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute's Election Watch series hosts an assessment of the 2006 midterm elections by AEIs political team. Participants are AEI's Karlyn H. Bowman; John C. Fortier; Norman J. Ornstein; and James K. Glassman. Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, Twelfth Floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

HEALTH CARE _ 12:15 p.m. The Alliance for Health Reform and the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation hold a briefing on the role of long-term care in the broader health insurance picture. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

POST-ELECTION ANALYSIS _ 12:15 p.m. Catholic University's Department of Politics hosts a post-election discussion. Location: Catholic Univeristy, Life Cycle Institute Auditorium, 620 Michigan Ave. NE.

MIDEAST _ 12:30 p.m. The New America Foundation holds a discussion with Yossi Beilin, member of the Israeli Knesset, on the Mideast peace prospects. Location: 7th floor, 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

ELECTION-POLL _ 1 p.m. Campaign for America's Future co-director Robert Borosage and Democratic pollster Stan Greenberg release a new post-election poll. Location: National Press Club.

ELECTION-RELIGION _ 1 p.m. The American Humanist Association holds a new conference to launch the Appignani Humanist Legal Center with the announcement of its first case, a lawsuit addressing a church-state separation violation that will be the product of a mid-term ballot initiative. Location: National Press Club.

MORIAL-ELECTIONS _ 2:30 p.m. Marc H. Morial, president and CEO National Urban League, holds a post election press briefing. Location: National Press Club, National Press Building, Holeman Lounge.

CHINA-MIDEAST-IRAN _ 3:30 p.m. Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty hold a briefing with John Calabrese of American University on Chinese-Mideast relations and Iran. Location: 4th floor conference room, 1201 Connecticut Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0092428

EDUCATION _ 3:30 p.m. Deputy Secretary of Education Raymond Simon and Senior Policy Advisor in the Office of Elementary and Secondary Education Catherine Freeman hold a telephone conference to brief reporters on the updated status of the growth model pilot program. Notes: Call in number: 888-913-9969. Passcode: GROWTH.

US-INDONESIA _ 4 p.m.Ambassador of Indonesia to the U.S. Sudjadnan Parnohadiningrat addresses a National Press Club afternoon newsmaker. Topic: ``The U.S.-Indonesia Relationship: Bulding a Partnership Between Two Large Democracies." Location: National Press Club, Lisagor Room.

RUBIN _ 7 p.m. Former Labor Secretary Robert Rubin speaks to the Economic Club of Washington's dinner meeting on the U.S. economy. Location: Ritz-Carlton Hotel, 1150 22nd St. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0092429

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Holiday Publishing Notice ... 3
Three Alleged Hamas Militants On Trial For Jordan Terror Plot ... 3
Four Northwest Ecoterror Suspects Reach Plea Agreements ... 3

Patriot Act:
Civil Liberties Groups Foresee Democratic Action Against Surveillance Programs ... 3

Homeland Response:
Human Rights Panel Considers Resolution Pressing FBI About Hamoodi Search ... 3
FBI Evacuates Ft. Hood Housing Over Material Found In Iraq Soldier's Luggage ... 4
NRC To Analyze Survivability Of New Reactor Designs ... 4

War News:
Rumsfeld Resigns, Bush Nominates Gates To Succeed Him At Pentagon ... 4
Khalilzad Expects No Major Shift In US Iraq Policy ... 8
Bombs Kill Eight Sadr City Youths On Soccer Field ... 8
Maliki Predicts Saddam Hanging This Year ... 8
Suicide Bombing Kills At Least 42 Pakistani Soldiers Near Afghan Border ... 8

Corporate Scandals:
Former US Foodservice Official Convicted Of Securities Fraud ... 9
UnitedHealth Executives Forfeit $390 Million In Stock Options ... 9
Fannie Mae To Spend $1 Billion On Accounting Review ... 9
SEC To Relax Audit Rules For Small Firms ... 10

Criminal Law:
Jefferson, Carter Begin Month-Long Runoff Campaign ... 10
FBI Searches Offices Of Kentucky Judge-Executive ... 10
Grand Jury Subpoenas Chicago City Worker Injury Claim Records ... 11
Malvo Sentenced To Six Life Terms For DC-Area Sniper Shootings ... 11
US Charges Montana PI With Defrauding Law Firms ... 11
Former Penn Professor Charged With Child Porn ... 12
Senior Gotti's Mob Allies Lambasted Victoria Gotti Reality Show 12
Former Employee Charged With Sabotaging Florida Theater Chain Ticket System ... 12

Civil Law:
Judge Rules Group Can Subpoena White House Documents In Plan B Lawsuit ... 12
Supreme Court Hears Challenge To Federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban ... 12

Civil Rights:
Few Polling Problems Seen, Review Could Presage Changes For 2008 ... 14
Anti-Affirmative Action Initiative Passes By Wide Margin In Michigan ... 15
Seven States Pass Marriage Definition Initiatives ... 15
South Dakota Voters Reject Restrictive Abortion Ban ... 15
Los Angeles Firefighter Settles Racial Harassment Suit ... 15
Maryland Police Say Stun Guns Effective In Averting Trouble ... 15

Antitrust:
Dingell Wants FCC To Delay AT&T-BellSouth Vote ... 16
Liz Clairborne To Purchase Kate Spade For $124 Million ... 16
Spain's Iberdrola Considers Offer For Scottish Power ... 16

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Judge Revokes Boston Police Officer's Bail ... 16
FBI, Chicago Police Arrest 17 Alleged Drug Gang Members ... 17
19 Suspected Gang Members Arrested In Ohio On Drug, Weapons Charges ... 17
Trial Begins For Arkansas Alderman Accused Of Selling Xanax, Crack ... 17
Marijuana Initiative Passes In Montana, Relaxes Enforcement Of Some Offenses ... 17
Three California Cities Lean Toward Relaxing Marijuana Laws ... 17
Colorado Marijuana Measure Defeated By Wide Margin ... 18
Judge In Montana Denies Claim Under Medical Marijuana Act ... 19
City Council In California Seeks To Ban Marijuana Dispensaries 19
Federal, State Agents Arrest Arkansas Militia Member On Weapons Charges ... 19

Immigration:
US Cracks Down On Fraudulent Immigrant Marriages ... 19
Arizona Voters Seen As Helping Boost Comprehensive Immigration Reform ... 19

Tax:
Rangel Says He Won't Roll Back Bush Tax Cuts ... 20

Congress-Administration:

Pelosi Vows Swift Action On Democratic Agenda 21
Murtha, Hoyer Line Up Support For Majority Leader Post 23
Angry Conservatives Blame GOP Leadership For Losses 24
Democratic House Majority Could Continue To Grow 25
Biden Says At Meetings, Bush Tells Cheney To "Shut Up" Or "Something To That Effect." 26
Bush To Meet With Big Three Executives 26
Bush To Examine Bill To Give DC House Voting Rights 26

Other News:

Bush Says Election Was A "Thumping." 26
Democratic Lobbyists Eager To Share Spoils Of Victory 29
AP Declares Webb Victor, Allen Reportedly To Concede 29
Midterm Elections Scramble 2008 Candidacies 31
Patrick To Become Nation's Second-Ever Black Governor 31
Minnesota Elects Nation's First Muslim Congressman 31
Stock Markets Make Gains 31
McCain Resigns From Board Of Gallaudet Over Ouster Of Incoming President 32
WPost Praises Ford's Call For More Civil Political Campaigns ... 32
Russia Rejects Proposed UN Sanctions On Iran 32
After Shelling Kills 18 In Gaza, Hamas Vows Retaliation Against US, Israel 32
Reid Calls Bush's India Nuke Deal A Priority 33
UN Urges US To End Cuba Embargo 33
US Seeks To Establish "Positive Relations" With Ortega 33
Chavez Leads "Global Chorus" Of Bush Critics In Democrats' Victory 33
Immigration Expected To Dominate Calderon, Bush Talks 34
EU Issues Warning To Turkey Over Bid 34
WHO Nominates Chinese Disease Expert As New Director 34

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 34

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 35

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0092431

TERRORISM NEWS:

Holiday Publishing Notice. In observance of the federal Veterans Day holiday, the Attorney General's News Briefing will not be published on Friday, November 10. News from the holiday will be included in your Monday, November 13 briefing.

Three Alleged Hamas Militants On Trial For Jordan Terror Plot. The AP (11/9) reports from Amman, Jordan, "Three Hamas militants went on trial Wednesday for conspiring to attack Israeli businessmen, Jordanian intelligence officers and various other locations in Jordan." The AP continues, "Ayman Naji Daraghmeh, 34, Ahmed Abu Rabee, 27, and Ahmed Abu Thiyab, appeared in court but did not submit pleas because they have not appointed lawyers. The trial adjourned to Nov. 15 to allow the defendants time to obtain counsel. … The defendants were also charged with illegal possession of weapons and ammunition." The AP adds, "In April, Jordanian authorities arrested 20 alleged Hamas militants on suspicion of monitoring Jordanian intelligence officers and foreigner tourists to plan for possible attacks. Authorities released all but the three, apparently for lack of evidence. … Al-Daraghmeh gave authorities the location of several weapons caches, the indictment sheet said. .. .The three, Jordanians of Palestinian origin, confessed in May on Jordanian state TV to conspiring to carry out terrorist attacks and to acquiring weapons and ammunition for Hamas. Al-Daraghmeh said he received he received orders from a high level Hamas leader living in Syria."

Four Northwest Ecoterror Suspects Reach Plea Agreements. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/9, Barnard) reports, "Four people awaiting trial on charges they were part of an ecoterrorism cell that caused $20 million in damages from firebombings around the Northwest are due in federal court on Thursday to change their pleas," although defense lawyers and prosecutors "refused to comment on terms of the plea agreements." The AP notes, "A total of 13 people were indicted out of Eugene as part of an investigation known as Operation Backfire. Six have pleaded guilty, agreeing to testify against the others, and three are fugitives. … The Oregon defendants were charged with arsons from 1996 to 2001 that were claimed by the Earth Liberation Front and the Animal Liberation Front in Oregon, Washington, California, Wyoming and Colorado."

PATRIOT ACT:

Civil Liberties Groups Foresee Democratic Action Against Surveillance Programs. Government Executive/National Journal's Technology Daily (11/8, Noyes) reported, "The new Democratic-led House could bode well for the civil-liberties crowd." ACLU Washington office director Caroline Fredrickson "said the shift in leadership may mean 'a very profound change' in how lawmakers address the electronic wiretapping initiative of the National Security Agency." However, Center for Democracy and Technology director Leslie Harris said that "there will probably not be 'dramatic rollbacks of national-security-related legislation,' like the controversial sections of the USA PATRIOT Act that were reinstated by the 109th Congress, Harris said. One provision involves a special subpoena power that lets the FBI scour library and Internet provider files without search warrants." Technology Daily added, "Lisa Graves, deputy director for the Center for National Security Studies, said missteps that have been taken by the Joint Terrorism Task Force, a partnership between the FBI and local law enforcement agencies aimed at tackling terrorism, also must be examined. In particular, she cited reports revealed through Freedom of Information Act requests that the task force has spied on Americans who oppose the Iraq war and other administration policies."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Human Rights Panel Considers Resolution Pressing FBI About Hamoodi Search. The Columbia (MO) Tribune (11/8, LeBlanc) reported, "The Columbia Human Rights Commission will consider asking the city council to approve a resolution in support of an Iraqi-American man whose southwest Columbia home was raided by the FBI. … The FBI has since repeatedly declined to give a reason for the search involving the 54-year-old grocery store owner," Shakir Hamoodi, "who also has been an outspoken critic of the Iraq war." At a Tuesday evening meeting, "supporters of Hamoodi urged commission members to accept a draft resolution that calls for the government to speed up its investigation and publicly release its findings. The measure also asks the FBI to apologize to Hamoodi and his family for searching the home." However, "commission members expressed some reservations about whether forwarding the resolution to the city council would be appropriate. In the end, the human rights panel agreed to consider the measure -- but only with the consent of Hamoodi, who was not present." The Tribune noted, "Jeff Lanza, a spokesman for the FBI office in Kansas City, declined to offer more information on the Hamoodi case."

DOJ_NMG_0092432

FBI Evacuates Ft. Hood Housing Over Material Found In Iraq Soldier's Luggage. KCEN-TV Temple, TX (11/8) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Part of a housing development on Fort Hood remained evacuated through Wednesday night. An F.B.I. spokesperson said a soldier returned from Iraq and noticed items missing from his luggage. Replacing those items was a jar filled with an unfamiliar substance." KCEN added, "Initial testing by the F.B.I. and Fort Hood showed it might have dangerous materials, but upon further testing, it was found not to be hazardous. Fort Hood is still investigating its origins."

NRC To Analyze Survivability Of New Reactor Designs. Under the headline, "Agency Considers A-Plants' Vulnerability," the New York Times (11/9, Wald, 1.16M) reports, "With construction of many new nuclear reactors under discussion, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission is grappling with the question of whether they should be designed to withstand a Sept. 11-style airplane attack. The commission has told its staff to study the vulnerabilities of the four new reactor designs, two of which it has already approved. But it has decided not to make the nuclear power industry meet security requirements any tougher than those for existing plants." The Times says NRC Commissioner Gregory "Jaczko said in an interview, 'We've left it in the hands of Transportation Security Administration, the Federal Aviation Administration and the reactor vendors, who are building these plants, to do what they think is right in this area, and to me that's clearly not the answer.'" But Commissioner "Edward McGaffigan Jr., said, 'We think we've done enough.'"

WAR NEWS:

Rumsfeld Resigns, Bush Nominates Gates To Succeed Him At Pentagon. Reports on the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld after nearly six years in that job, and President Bush's nomination of Texas A&M University President Robert M. Gates, CIA director from 1991-1993, to replace him, are interspersed with overview stories on Bush's Wednesday news conference and on the aftermath of this week's midterm elections. The resignation leads many of these reports, which generally show Rumsfeld in a negative light, casting his "ouster" as a response to perceived voter rejection of the Bush Administration's Iraq policies. Several also suggest that Gates' service under the first President Bush and his participation in James Baker's Iraq Study Group indicate Baker will have a key behind-the-scenes role in reshaping the Iraq agenda.

ABC World News (11/8, lead story, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) opened by saying "all indications are that voters were looking for change yesterday…and change, they will get." ABC (Raddatz) added, "The President had a very different tone today. But as for that surprise Rumsfeld resignation, a White House official said it had been in the works for weeks. If the President was looking for a way to change the headlines, today, he found it." Sen. John McCain was shown saying, "There were many of us that expressed a lack of confidence in Rumsfeld for a long time."

The CBS Evening News (11/8, lead story, 3:00, Couric, 7.66M) led by saying, "The Democrats are in, Donald Rumsfeld is out. It's a tidal wave of change." CBS (Axelrod) added, "Bush met the big loss with a big change, firing" Rumsfeld, the "highly divisive and polarizing figure and replacing him with a veteran of his father's Administration."

NBC Nightly News (11/8, lead story, 4:00, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "As if the election results…were not big enough, the President's response to them today overshadowed that news. Aides say the President decided to replace Rumsfeld now, hope to persuade Americans angry about the war that a change in course is coming. In the Oval Office this afternoon a grim-faced president took a step his critics say was overdue." In another report, NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 2, 2:00, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) said the "usually feisty if not combative Rumsfeld appeared subdued and reflective, calling it a privilege to serve with the young men and women of the military."

On CNN's The Situation Room (11/8), Pentagon correspondent Jamie McIntyre said, "Nobody saw this coming, as far as I can tell. Most of the key Rumsfeld aides who came in this morning were in meetings with him and he didn't give a clue that this was up until about mid-morning, when he started to brief some of the senior people. So, a big shock, particularly because President Bush had just given him another endorsement."

A front-page Washington Post (11/9, Fletcher, Baker, 690K) headline reads "Bush Ousts Embattled Rumsfeld; Democrats Near Control Of Senate," a prime example of how the media is connecting the elections with the Secretary's exit. The Post leads by saying Bush said his party "took what he described as a 'thumping'" Tuesday, and he "ousted" Rumsfeld, saying "a 'fresh perspective' is needed to guide the military through the difficult war in Iraq." Under the front-page headline "A Meek Departure From The War Cabinet," a second Washington Post (11/9, Ricks, Abramowitz, 690K) story says that "though Bush affectionately patted Rumsfeld on the shoulder as he ushered him out of the Oval Office, there was little sugarcoating the reality" that Rumsfeld "was being offered as a sacrificial lamb amid the repudiation of Bush and his Iraq policy that the American electorate delivered on Tuesday."

DOJ_NMG_0092433

A front-page New York Times (11/9, Stolberg, Rutenberg, 1.16M) headline also connects the elections and the resignation, putting Rumsfeld's departure on the same line as the close Senate race in Virginia. That story says that "just days after telling reporters that he would keep Mr. Rumsfeld on for the rest of his term, Mr. Bush said that the two had agreed 'after a series of thoughtful conversations' that it was time for Mr. Rumsfeld, a magnet for criticism about management of the war, to go." USA Today (11/9, Page, Kelley, 2.27M) says in its front-page story that "after the worst setback for Republicans on Capitol Hill since Watergate, the president sought to rescue the final two years of his tenure from being paralyzed by an increasingly violent and unpopular war."

The AP (11/8, Burns, Shrader) reports Bush announced Rumsfeld's resignation "within hours of the Democrats' triumph in congressional elections," and "reached back to his father's administration" for a successor. The Chicago Tribune (11/9, Hedges, Silva, 617K) also puts the election's role in its lead, saying Rumsfeld resigned "within hours of a stunning Republican setback" in elections that "became a referendum on President Bush's strategy for the war in Iraq and on Rumsfeld's stormy stewardship of the Pentagon."

The Baltimore Sun (11/9, Davis, 257K) says replacing Rumsfeld "was a stunning turn for a president who has staked his legacy -- and, to some degree, the fortunes of his party -- on a war plan that has lost the support of most Americans." The Financial Times (11/9, Luce, Daniel, Sevastopulo) says Rumsfeld "became a casualty of the Republican party's unexpectedly heavy defeat." On Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (11/8), Dick Morris said, "I was surprised. How about September? How about doing it in August or July? If he'd done that months before, he could have won this election. … I think that the country was waiting for some indication from Bush that he got it. And there was no indication."

The Washington Times (11/9, Scarborough, 88K) headlines its story "Rumsfeld Resigns Under Pressure," saying in its lead that "the icon of the U.S. war on Islamic terrorists…succumbed to mounting pressure to resign." Rumsfeld "referred to his many critics on Iraq by paraphrasing a hero, Winston Churchill: 'I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof.'"

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, King, Dreazen, Jaffe, 2.04M) says in the lead of its front-page story that Rumsfeld's resignation "opens the door for the biggest change of U.S. policy in Iraq since American troops got bogged down there three years ago." But as the Christian Science Monitor (11/9, Grier, 59K) writes, by "changing the leadership of the Department of Defense," Bush" has not necessarily changed his policies in Iraq." Still, he "may have changed the tone of Washington's debate about Iraq, at least for now." In an analysis, the Washington Post (11/9, A25, Kessler, Ricks, 690K) says Democratic control on Capitol Hill and Rumsfeld's exit have "set the stage for a dramatic shift in the Bush administration's policy toward the Iraq war."

The AP (11/8, Baldor) said the "square-jawed face of the war, the man behind the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that he predicted were just the beginnings of a long, hard slog," became the "latest casualty of those conflicts -- a victim of a war he steadfastly contended the American public simply did not understand."

On the CBS Evening News (11/8, story 4, 0:45, Couric, 7.66M), retired Maj. Gen. John Batiste, an early Rumsfeld critic, called him "arrogant, dismissive. He would have been a great peacetime secretary of defense, but in wartime he was the wrong person."

"Un-Rumsfeld" Gates To Take Center Stage. ABC World News (11/8, story 2, 0:30, Karl, 8.78M) said, "Robert Gates is in many ways the 'un-Rumsfeld.' Where Rumsfeld is combative and controversial, Gates is soft-spoken and diplomatic. And there are substantive differences as well. Gates was not among those who pushed for the Iraq war. In fact, he's seen as a protégé of Brent Scowcroft, who, although he has been associated with the first President Bush, has been one of the harshest critics of this President's handling of the Iraq war. And most importantly, Gates is on that Baker-Hamilton Commission, who has been searching for a new direction in Iraq."

The CBS Evening News (11/8, story 2, 0:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) said, "This is somebody who's been very close to" President Bush's father "for many, many years. We keep hearing all of these stories about how his father is very concerned about what Iraq has come to. The President's father's advisors have been very, very worried about all of this. The fact that he is going to that circle and he's been very reluctant to do that in the past suggests to me that we're about to see a major re-evaluation of what we're doing in Iraq and where we go from here. This is extremely significant."

Roll Call (11/9, Stanton, Yehle) reports Senate Democrats "said they would not look to block hearings" on Gates, "although they stopped short of pledging to confirm Gates during the upcoming lame-duck session."

The Los Angeles Times (11/9, Miller, 850K) says that in turning the Gates, President Bush "has selected a low-key loyalist who is in many ways the opposite" of Rumsfeld. While Rumsfeld "often seemed bent on running roughshod over the Pentagon brass, Gates is described by longtime associates as collegial and a consensus-builder," and if Rumsfeld "had little regard for President George H.W. Bush and many of his pragmatic security advisers, including Brent Scowcroft, Gates was part of that inner circle. He remains close not only to Scowcroft but to other Rumsfeld rivals, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." Bloomberg (11/8, Zacharia) says Bush's selection of Gates "suggests a readiness to examine a new strategy in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0092434

The New York Times (11/9, Shane, 1.16M) says on its front page that the Gates nomination marks a return "to an earlier era in Republican foreign policy, one marked more by caution and pragmatism than that of the neoconservatives who have shaped the Bush administration's war in Iraq and confrontations with Iran and North Korea." The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A6, Jaffe, 2.04M) says it "remains to be seen what kind of long-term vision" Gates will bring to the Pentagon if confirmed.

The Wall Street Journal goes on to say Gates "is known as a master operator of the national-security bureaucracy," though the Washington Times (11/9, Gertz, 88K) says Gates has "little experience in military and defense affairs." But USA Today (11/9, 2A, Willing, 2.27M) says "those who have observed Gates" say his job as Texas A&M president may actually "have provided the best test of the skills he'll need to succeed" at the Pentagon. One said, "He undertook big changes, and evidently did it with good nature and without too many bad feelings. He got accomplished what he felt needed to be accomplished without being picketed or having rocks thrown at him." The Dallas Morning News (11/9, Landers, 500K) says Gates will leave A&M "for one of the most thankless jobs in the country." The Washington Post (11/9, A24, Tyson, Pincus, 690K) calls Gates a "Breaker Of Barriers" in a headline, saying he "lacks the top-down, take-no-prisoners managerial style that won Rumsfeld enemies and instead is more likely to set up task forces and forge agreements behind the scenes."

On NPR's Talk Of The Nation (11/8, Conan), intelligence correspondent Mary Louise Kelly said of Gates, "This not the first time President Bush has tried to pull Gates into his administration." Gates "was actually the first choice for the new position of national intelligence director when that job was created last year, and Gates turned it down. At the time he made clear he thought the job was a pretty bad idea and would add a layer of bureaucracy. So it's interesting to see he's coming back to Washington to serve his president."

On NPR's Day To Day (11/8, Brand), retired admiral and Clinton Defense nominee Bobby Ray Inman said of Gates, "I'm comfortable he wouldn't be going into the job unless he had the President's assurances for supporting new policies." Inman noted that Gates has served as a member of James Baker's Iraq Study Group, "so he's obviously been very involved in putting together their ideas of how we should change direction."

Pelosi Pleased, But Says "President Makes The Policy." On the CBS Evening News (11/8, story 5, 0:35, Couric, 7.66M), likely incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said, "I think it's good news. It signals, maybe, a change in attitude on the part of the President. The President is the policymaker, the Secretary of Defense is the implementer, and whatever you think of the policy, everyone agrees that the implementation of that policy has been a failure." On PBS' NewsHour (11/8, Warner), Pelosi said, "Yesterday, the American people spoke very clearly that there's one place they want a new direction: It's in the conduct of the war in Iraq. … So thank heavens the President has heard the message and has acted upon it. … I think it signals that he might be ready for change, but let's remember: He is the commander-in-chief. Rumsfeld or any secretary is an employee, an implementer of the policy. But the President makes the policy."

Capitol Hill Democrats Say Departure Just First Step. Sen. Joseph Biden said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/8, Matthews), "It is important that to demonstrate that" the President is "willing to change policy, the secretary of defense has to get out of the way. So he's done one of the things that's a precondition for changing policy. It would be impossible to change policy with Rumsfeld in place. It would just -- he could never do it."

On Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (11/8), Sen. Charles Schumer said, "I thought he should have done it months and months ago, but it showed that they're beginning to listen to new ideas. I think Donald Rumsfeld was just about the only person around that thought things in Iraq were going smoothly."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (11/8, Matthews), said, "People are very upset with the war. 'Stay the course' doesn't do it. And if this is going to be another stay-the-course secretary of defense, I think he'll run into trouble. … I hope we'll have a secretary of defense who has a new strategy, who will work with the Congress and we can put all of the kind of controversy about Mr. Rumsfeld behind us."

Rep. Jack Murtha said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/8, Matthews), "Bob Gates is a good friend of mine. … But if the policy doesn't change, it's not going to make any difference at all. And we got all kinds of money problems in the military. So this is not a change that I see making any difference at this point."

Rep. Charles Rangel, appearing on MSNBC's Tucker (11/8, Carlson), said, "I think the President actually counted the votes and saw that the American people were frustrated, not only with the policy but the personality of Rumsfeld. … What happens after him? If we've got to stay the course, it's not much of a change. But I think that it's a move in the right direction." On Fox News' Your World (11/8, Cavuto), Rangel said, "Rumsfeld had no policy. You cannot say this is the right thing to do, until you see what the new person is going to do."

Iraqis, US Troops Express Uncertainty About Pentagon Switch. NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 3, 0:45, Engel, 9.87M) reported that the view from Iraq "in a word is uncertainty, from the Iraqi government and from the American troops serving here." The CBS Evening News (11/8, story 3, 0:45, Logan, 7.66M) added that among "commanders and soldiers…perhaps the most damning reaction that I've heard is that this comes three years too late and that it won't change the reality on the ground for the troops here because they are on a course of action now as a result of decisions made by Secretary Rumsfeld and the results of that are plain for everyone to see."

DOJ_NMG_0092435

Longest-Serving Pentagon Chief Played Major Role. The CBS Evening News (11/8, story 10, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) closed with a retrospective on Rumsfeld's career, which noted that "by the time he leaves the Pentagon after his replacement is confirmed, Rumsfeld will be the longest-serving defense secretary ever. He served two presidents 25 years apart. Then 43 years old, now 75, he's both the youngest and oldest man to head the Pentagon."

The New York Times (11/9, A29, Gordon, 1.16M) and the Los Angeles Times (11/9, Barnes, 850K) both reflect on Rumsfeld's desire to transform the Pentagon, with the New York paper saying in a headline that "Rumsfeld, A Force For Change, Did Not Change With The Times Amid Iraq Tumult," and writing that "from the day he took control at the Pentagon," Rumsfeld "was determined to reassert civilian control of the defense establishment and create a leaner, more lethal American military," and "pursued his goals with a vengeance, emerging as the most powerful secretary of defense since Robert S. McNamara more than three decades earlier." In its similar story, the Los Angeles newspaper says Rumsfeld's "strategy led him to dominate national security policy more than any figure since Henry Kissinger."

In the Style section of the Washington Post (11/9, C1, 690K), Linton Weeks takes a tongue-in-cheek look at Rumsfeld's unique public style, writing, "Is he stepping down? You bet. Does he admit defeat? Not by a long shot. … Goodness gracious!" Rumsfeld "not only has been secretary of defense for six years, he's been secretary of offense. During his tenure, briefings by the head of the armed forces became tours de force. He would clap his hands, lick his lips, narrow his eyes into a squinty gaze and extemporize, patronize, chastise, sermonize and crack wise all at the same time."

Hunter, Kissinger Laud Rumsfeld. On CNN (11/8), Rep. Duncan Hunter, described by anchor Don Lemon as "an ardent Rumsfeld supporter," said, "Don Rumsfeld has done a good job. He's managed a force of 2.5 million people, wars in two theaters, reformed the military, stood up our first incipient missile defense. So, he's had a broad array of challenges. He's handled those well. I talked to him before the resignation announcement. And I think he's really doing it, because he sees now, with the Democrat leadership in Congress, it's going to be hard to get past what I see as personal animosities toward him, and get the job done."

On CNN's The Situation Room (11/8, Blitzer), Henry Kissinger said, "Rumsfeld is a great patriot. And he must have decided he was drawing too much fire, it would be too difficult to carry out his tasks and that he wanted to provide a opportunity for a different perspective."

Australia Praises Rumsfeld, Vows To Stay In Iraq. AFP (11/9) reports Australia "hailed" Rumsfeld as a "'champion of freedom' and pledged that Canberra would keep its troops in Iraq."

More Commentary On Pentagon Leadership Change. Commentary on the Rumsfeld resignation follows a similar line as the coverage, saying Rumsfeld's departure was a near-certainty following the elections and saying the nomination of Gates hearkens back to the administration of President Bush's father. The New York Times (11/9, A32, 1.16M) editorializes, "There was absolutely nothing more left for Mr. Rumsfeld to do as secretary of defense except continue to defend failed policies and tinker with unworkable strategies. Most of the men and women who will be part of the new Congress came to that conclusion, whatever their party affiliation. … Rumsfeld's departure is merely the first step. It has to be followed by a major change in policy if American troops can be brought home without leaving a disaster behind."

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, 2.04M) editorializes, "When the history of this era is written, Mr. Rumsfeld is likely to fare much better than his many critics assert. The secretary has been a convenient political foil -- for Democrats, for generals who didn't like the way he exercised civilian control at the Pentagon, and especially for erstwhile war supporters who wanted to blame the Iraqi insurgency on some individual rather than on the inevitable complications and setbacks of any war." As for Gates, he "is a capable public servant with broad security experience. But much of that experience is with the CIA, which has misjudged the nature of the enemy throughout this conflict."

The Los Angeles Times (11/9, 850K) editorializes, "Better late than never." More than two years after Rumsfeld "offered to resign in the aftermath of the Abu Ghraib prison scandal, President Bush finally agreed to let Rumsfeld go, to make room for a 'fresh perspective.' It's an easy gesture at this point -- the political equivalent of bringing down the piñata once it's been battered beyond recognition."

The Boston Herald (11/9, 184K) editorializes, "Well, better late than never, as they say. … Rumsfeld should have been out the door two years ago, but President Bush has been loyal to a fault. Tuesday he and his party paid an enormous price for that with the voters. But they spoke and Bush -- finally -- listened. … Good riddance."

The Arizona Republic (11/9) editorializes, "Firmness in wartime is a virtue, certainly. As is consistency of leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0092436

And…Rumsfeld demonstrated both. A war against a merciless foe needed to be won, and for all his hardheaded faults, Rumsfeld clearly had the determination to see it through. … But the primary task of the American force in Iraq, under Rumsfeld, has been to establish and maintain the peace necessary for that nascent democracy to assert itself. And that has not come to pass."

In her New York Times (11/9, 1.16M) column, Maureen Dowd writes, "Poppy Bush and James Baker gave Sonny the presidency to play with and he broke it. So now they're taking it back. They are dragging W. away from those reckless older guys who have been such a bad influence and getting him some new minders who are a lot more practical. … Gates, his friends say, had been worried about the belligerent, arrogant, ideological style of Rummy & Cheney from the start."

In his Washington Post (11/9, A29, 690K) column, David Ignatius writes, "Senior military officers referred to it as 'the 7,000-mile screwdriver.' That was their way of describing Donald Rumsfeld's penchant for micromanaging aspects of the Iraq war that interested him. And it's one reason the military has to be happy that Rumsfeld is leaving -- even happier, maybe, than Democrats, who have claimed an early scalp for their election victory. … Changes in Iraq are coming, and Rumsfeld's departure is, to paraphrase the prayer book, one outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual process."

Khalilzad Expects No Major Shift In US Iraq Policy. USA Today (11/9, 14A, Stinson, 2.27M) writes that "from Tokyo to Baghdad, Istanbul to Nairobi, Toronto to the British capital, many people said they hoped the Democratic wins in Tuesday's U.S. elections would pressure President Bush to alter course in Iraq and abandon what some called an arrogant foreign policy." But in Iraq, the AP (11/8, Bodeen) reports, US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the "sharp political realignment in Congress would not provoke upheaval" in US policy. Khalilzad said, "The President is the architect of US foreign policy. He is the commander in chief of our armed forces. He understands what is at stake in Iraq. … He is committed to working with both Houses of the American Congress to get support needed for the mission in Iraq to succeed." The Washington Post (11/9, A23, Anderson, 690K) also covers Khalizad's remarks.

The New York Times (11/9, A18, Burns, Luo, 1.16M) reports Iraq's political leaders "scrambled Wednesday to interpret what a sharply altered American political landscape might mean for the future of this war-ravaged country." Some Iraqi politicians said they "hoped for major changes, while others seemed more concerned about reassuring Iraq's 27 million people that America would not abandon its commitments here and order American troops home."

Friedman Says US Choices In Iraq Between "Tolerable" And "Awful." In his New York Times (11/9, A33, 1.16M), column, Thomas L. Friedman writes, "The Iraq war has turned into a sucking chest wound for our country -- infecting its unity at home and its standing abroad. No one can predict what Iraq will look like 10 years from now. I wish it well. But in the near term, it is clear, nothing that we'll feel particularly proud of, nothing that we'll feel justifies the vast expenditure of lives and treasure, is going to come out of Iraq. Our only two options left today in Iraq are 'tolerable' and 'awful.' 'Good' is no longer on the menu. … It's time to make a final push for the tolerable, and if that fails, quit Iraq and insulate ourselves and our allies from the awful. This can't go on."

Bombs Kill Eight Sadr City Youths On Soccer Field. In an evocative report, the Los Angeles Times (11/9, Daragahi, 850K) says explosives "rained down on a dusty soccer field" in Sadr City Wednesday, "killing eight Iraqi youths and injuring dozens. Around the country, bombings and shootings left dozens of other Iraqis dead," and the official number of US troops killed climbed to "at least 2,839. … Mortar and rocket battles reminiscent of the urban civil warfare that engulfed Sarajevo, Beirut and Kabul in previous decades have erupted occasionally throughout Baghdad's patchwork of religiously mixed neighborhoods."

Maliki Predicts Saddam Hanging This Year. The New York Times (11/9, A18, Semple, 1.16M) reports Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki "predicted in a televised interview on Wednesday that former President Saddam Hussein would be hanged by the end of the year." But court officials said Maliki's prediction "was unrealistic, considering the timing of the appeals process and the sheer volume of evidence the appellate judges would have to review. It was far more likely, they said, that the hanging would not take place until January at the earliest, and probably later."

Saddam Co-Defendant Says Kurds Spied For Iran During War. The AP (11/8, Yacoub, Halaby) reports Saddam-era military intelligence chief Sabir al-Douri "accused Iraqi Kurds on Wednesday of spying for the Iranians at the time of the government crackdown on the Kurdish population." Al-Douri, a co-defendant in the ex-dictator's genocide trial, "made the accusation after listening to Kurdish witnesses testify about chemical attacks against their villages in northern Dahuk province in August 1988."

Suicide Bombing Kills At Least 42 Pakistani Soldiers Near Afghan Border. ABC World News (11/8, story 13, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) and NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) both briefly reported on a suicide bombing at a Pakistani army camp near the Afghanistan border, which killed at least 42 soldiers. The

DOJ_NMG_0092437

New York Times (11/9, A24, Gall, Masood, 1.16M) says it was the "deadliest terrorist attack against the Pakistani military on record." The Washington Post (11/9, A16, Constable, Khan, 690K) reports officials "immediately blamed the bombing on al-Qaeda and local Islamic extremists."

Pakistan-Based Taliban Fighters Describe Operations. The Christian Science Monitor (11/9, Koster, 59K) runs a "rare interview with a Western reporter" granted by Taliban fighters based in Pakistan's Balochistan Province. The four described "how they slip into Afghanistan, attack NATO and Afghan forces, and return to Pakistan to rest."

Poll Finds Afghanis Generally Optimistic. USA Today (11/9, 4A, Wiseman, 2.27M) reports that an Asia Foundation poll of 6,226 Afghan adults found that most "are optimistic about the future, satisfied with their young democracy and rank security low on their list of everyday concerns." The USAID-funded poll "suggests that Afghans are surprisingly confident about the direction of their country even as NATO forces battle a pro-Taliban insurgency in southern and eastern provinces."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former US Foodservice Official Convicted Of Securities Fraud. The Washington Post (11/9, D01, Johnson) reports, "A New York jury convicted former U.S. Foodservice Inc. marketing chief Mark P. Kaiser yesterday of conspiracy, securities fraud and false filing charges, all but bringing to a close a three-year, $800 million accounting fraud probe at the Columbia food distribution company." The Post continues, "Kaiser, 49, remains free on bond until his sentencing Feb. 8. He is the only former official at U.S. Foodservice, a unit of the Dutch grocery retailer Royal Ahold NV, who presented his case to a jury." The Post adds, "A few weeks before the trial began last month, former finance chief Michael J. Resnick pleaded guilty to conspiracy for his role in the scheme, which boosted earnings by inflating the amount of promotional rebates U.S. Foodservice received from suppliers. … Kaiser's deputy, Timothy J. Lee, also pleaded guilty and testified against his former boss in the course of the case, which spanned about four weeks. In closing arguments, Kaiser's lawyer, Richard J. Morvillo of the District, labored to paint Lee as a liar trying to curry favor with the government and win a lighter prison sentence."

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, C3) reports, "The government alleged Mr. Kaiser and others misrepresented to U.S. Foodservice's auditors and the public how much the company was receiving in supplier rebates, known as promotional allowances, by hundreds of millions of dollars in order to meet income targets." The Journal adds, "More than a dozen U.S. Foodservice vendors and three former executives, including former U.S. Foodservice Chief Financial Officer Michael Resnick, have pleaded guilty to criminal charges in the matter. … On Monday, the Amsterdam-based retailer said it will put the U.S. Foodservice unit and its Tops supermarkets in New York and Pennsylvania up for sale."

UnitedHealth Executives Forfeit $390 Million In Stock Options. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, B1, Stecklow, Fuhrmans) reports, "The two top executives of UnitedHealth Group Inc." -- outgoing Chief Executive William W. McGuire and his successor, Stephen J. Hemsley – "agreed to forfeit about $390 million in stock-option compensation, by far the biggest sum returned to a company under scrutiny for backdating options awards." Other "senior UnitedHealth executives will also return unspecified options gains." UnitedHealth "also disclosed that it would have to take 'significantly greater' charges related to its backdated stock options than it had previously estimated and that it expects the charges to affect the past 12 years of previously reported earnings."

Bloomberg (11/8, Rapaport) added UnitedHealth Group Inc. "said its restatement of earnings to correct accounting for stock-based compensation ;will be significantly greater' than the $286 million it estimated in May." UnitedHealth "said its financial statements from 1994 through September this year 'should no longer be relied upon' because they may not reflect costs of stock-based compensation." Meanwhile, "Departing...McGuire will lose about $200 million because of the restatements, said his lawyer, David Brodsky." Hemsley "will give up about $190 million," UnitedHealth said. Last month, "both agreed to let their option dates be reset to the highest share price in the grant year."

Business Week (11/9, Ryst) reports UnitedHealth Group "faces a whopper of a bill from backdated stock options. It's also hoping to renew favor with investors by repricing options for several executives and bringing new leaders into its executive suite." UnitedHealth "also ousted its chief financial officer, Patrick Erlandson, who has been in that position since 2001. Erlandson will remain with the company, and be succeeded by G. Mike Mikan, a senior vice-president of finance. In addition, UnitedHealth designated Forrest Burke as acting general counsel, from his former role as general counsel for UnitedHealthcare, Uniprise, and specialized-care services."

The Los Angeles Business (11/9) adds UnitedHealth Group Inc. board also "strengthened requirements for ensuring the independence of its directors, going further than the standards of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the New York Stock Exchange."

Fannie Mae To Spend $1 Billion On Accounting Review. The AP (11/9, Gordon) reports, "Fannie Mae said Wednesday it expects to spend more than $1 billion this year on the massive review of its accounting and preparing financial statements as the mortgage giant pushes to complete it by year's end." The AP continues, "The government-sponsored company, which finances one of every five home loans in the United States, is emerging from an accounting scandal that brought the ouster of top executives and a record $400 million civil fine in a settlement with federal regulators. Fannie Mae also said it would miss a regulatory deadline Wednesday for filing its financial report for the third quarter of 2006. The company hasn't filed an earnings statement since late 2004." The AP adds, "Federal regulators that year accused Fannie Mae of serious accounting problems and earnings manipulation to meet Wall Street targets, and the Securities and Exchange Commission ordered the company to restate earnings back to 2001. … The anticipated restatement has been estimated at $10.8 billion, though Fannie Mae says it expects the final amount could be lower. The company said in August it believes that the accounting review has uncovered the last of the errors."

DOJ_NMG_0092438

SEC To Relax Audit Rules For Small Firms. The New York Times (11/9, Norris) reports, "Regulators are seeking a way to lighten the burden of the Sarbanes-Oxley law on smaller companies by addressing the focus and cost of audits of internal controls, Christopher Cox, the chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, said yesterday." The Times continues, "Mr. Cox said in an interview that the goal was to focus the attention of auditors on only those controls that could be important to assuring the accuracy of financial records, a measure required by Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, and to hold down the cost of the audits. … 'There will be an audit for everybody, which is a major decision we took,' he said, adding that the nature of the audit could change. 'It is supposed to be risk-based, so that the auditor's time is focused on the areas of greatest risk.' … He said that was particularly important for smaller companies, some of which have complained that costs are excessive. The burden of such audits has also been blamed for a reluctance of foreign companies to list their securities on American markets." The Times notes, "Mr. Cox said his goal was to smooth the way for the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board to propose a new auditing standard in the area, and for the S.E.C. to approve it, by this spring. To do that, he said, he has held extensive consultations with Mark Olsen, the chairman of the oversight board."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Jefferson, Carter Begin Month-Long Runoff Campaign. The AP (11/9, Burdeau) reports, "U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, handicapped by an FBI bribery investigation, embarked Wednesday on a monthlong and grueling contest against a young but politically experienced challenger seeking to end his 16-year turn as this city's face in Congress. State Rep. Karen Carter played up the old-versus-new dynamic at a Wednesday news conference, keying on the hurricane-battered city's recovery." The AP notes Jefferson "won about 30 percent of the vote in the multiparty primary Tuesday, outpacing 12 challengers lured into the race because of his vulnerability stemming from the FBI bribery investigation into his African business dealings." Carter "got about 22 percent of the vote, finishing second to earn a spot in the Dec. 9 runoff. … 'We can assume that the voters who voted for other candidates will not vote for Jefferson' in the runoff, said Susan Howell, a political analyst at the University of New Orleans."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (11/9, Donze) reports, "Conventional political wisdom says that a congressman who lands in a runoff, particularly after 16 years in office, should seriously consider cleaning out his desk. For…Jefferson, the adage may be even more apropos, given that Hurricane Katrina scattered much of his traditional voter base last year just as FBI agents were ramping up their federal bribery probe into his business dealings in Africa." But campaigning for the runoff yesterday, Jefferson "wasn't talking like someone preparing to pack up." Still, "political observers say the situation he finds himself in is less than ideal."

Letten Says New Orleans Must Overcome Crime, Corruption. The AP (11/9, Bohrer) reports from New Orleans, "The city's survival depends on getting a handle on violent crime and corruption and creating opportunities for young people, a federal prosecutor said Wednesday. 'And that's a heck of a tall order, but that's something we need to do,' Jim Letten said." At the Bureau of Governmental Research breakfast, the US Attorney "joined Supreme Court Justice Catherine Kimball in addressing the rebuilding of New Orleans' criminal justice system after Hurricane Katrina." The AP adds that Kimball told the group, "The survival of this town depends on getting a handle on violent crime, corruption, so we can keep and attract industry -- diversifying our economy and, for God's sake, building a decent school system so that kids who grow up in public housing, poor neighborhoods and Section 8 housing can get the opportunities they need to actually get jobs and not go into the drug trade."

FBI Searches Offices Of Kentucky Judge-Executive. The Lexington Herald-Leader (11/9, 113K) reports, "FBI agents searched the offices of Knox County Judge-Executive Raymond C. Smith on Wednesday. Bruce Murphy, Smith's deputy judge-executive, said four agents accompanied by a Kentucky State Police trooper served a search warrant at the office Wednesday morning. The warrant sought audiotapes and other records concerning fiscal court meetings in 2004 and 2005 and documents related to four companies" which had "won contracts to provide goods or services to the county, Murphy said. Smith had an ownership interest with his brother in at least one of the companies," but "Murphy said that when Smith took office, he essentially turned the company over to his brother. The warrant could indicate the FBI is investigating bids awarded by the county."

DOJ_NMG_0092439

Kentucky Judge Indicted On Vote-Buying Charges. WTVQ-TV Lexington (11/8, Haeberle) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Bath County Judge Executive Walter B. Shrout has been indicted on charges he took part in a vote-buying scheme during this year's primary election. In a federal indictment unsealed Wednesday, Shrout…was charged with conspiracy, making a false statement to a federal agent and obstruction of justice. Shrout now becomes the 10th person indicted in relation to the vote-buying scheme that started weeks before the May primary." WTVQ added that the indictment "also states Shrout lied to an FBI investigator last month about being involved in the scheme and offering $100,000" to two conspirators "to 'keep quiet about his involvement.'"

Grand Jury Subpoenas Chicago City Worker Injury Claim Records. The Chicago Sun-Times (11/9, Spielman, Novak) reports, "A federal grand jury is demanding records from City Hall regarding injury claims of city workers, a move that comes two weeks after the Sun-Times reported Chicago patronage workers claim to be hurt at a rate that exceeds the nation's most dangerous jobs. Grand jurors have issued a subpoena to the City Council Finance Committee, headed by Ald. Edward M. Burke, seeking an array of records on injured city workers, many who have been off work for years and collecting disability checks." The Sun-Times notes, "The Sun-Times' 'Clout's Sick List' investigation…reported that one in five patronage workers listed on the once-secret clout list kept by Mayor Daley's former patronage director had filed workers' compensation claims. That injury rate far outpaces those for any occupation tracked by the U.S. Department of Labor, including underground coal miners and foundry workers. Most of those patronage workers had filed at least two claims."

Malvo Sentenced To Six Life Terms For DC-Area Sniper Shootings. The Washington Post (11/9, B01, Londo) reports, "Sniper Lee Boyd Malvo offered a tearful apology yesterday to relatives of the six people he and his accomplice killed in Montgomery County, minutes before he was sentenced to six consecutive terms of life in prison without the possibility of parole. … 'I'm truly sorry, grieved and ashamed of what I've done to the families and friends,' Malvo said as he listed the names of the Montgomery victims he and John Allen Muhammad shot from afar with a powerful rifle in October 2002. 'Each of you relive this every morning, every birthday, every anniversary, every time you look in your children's eyes.'" The Post continues, "A handful of relatives attended the afternoon hearing in Rockville, which marked the last chapter of the snipers' legal proceedings in Maryland. … Malvo said he was most haunted by the death of Ride On bus driver Conrad Johnson, 35, the sniper's last victim. According to Malvo's testimony, his death was the only fatal shooting in Maryland in which Malvo pulled the trigger. … 'I thought of his sons, who just for once would like to play basketball with their father,' Malvo said. 'Just one more time see his face.'" The Post notes, "Prosecutors and Malvo's attorneys said Malvo, 21, has experienced a transformation during his months in Maryland. They said his remorse is genuine, and they commended him for cooperating with prosecutors in Muhammad's May trial in Montgomery, in which Malvo took the stand to offer the first public, firsthand account of the shootings. … Malvo testified that he fell under the spell of Muhammad as a young and vulnerable teenager who had all but been abandoned by his parents in Jamaica. The elder sniper took him on a cross-country trip in 2002 that began in Washington state, terrorized the District and its suburbs for three weeks in October and ended in suburban Maryland, where they were arrested. Malvo told law enforcement officials in Maryland this year that the pair shot 27 people, 17 of whom died."

US Charges Montana PI With Defrauding Law Firms. The New York Law Journal (11/9, Lin) reports, "Federal law enforcement officials in New York have announced the arrest on wire fraud charges of a Montana private investigator who allegedly defrauded two of Manhattan's top litigation firms by promising to sell them 'proof' of misconduct by opposing parties and counsel." The Journal continues, "The criminal complaint filed Wednesday by the Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney's Office charged that Michael Lair had approached New York lawyers working on two high-profile cases and received more than $80,000 to provide information he ultimately failed to produce." The Journal adds, "Lair, 46, is the president of Bozeman, Mont.-based consumerdefense.com Inc., a company that claims to investigate consumer complaints and conduct research in connection with fraud cases. … The complaint, sworn out by Special Agent B.J. Kang of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, did not identify any matters or lawyers by name, only describing one case as involving a large insurance company engaged in litigation with its former chairman and the other as involving a pharmaceutical company's suit against a hedge fund." The Journal notes, "Sources familiar with both matters confirmed that the insurance company case was the dispute between AIG Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0092440

and its former chairman, Maurice R. Greenberg, and that the hedge fund matter was Biovail Corp.'s securities fraud suit against SAC Capital Management. … The lawyers who dealt with Lair included Robert G. Morvillo of Morvillo, Abramowitz, Grand, Iason, Anello & Bohrer, which is one of a team of firms representing Greenberg, and Michael J. Bowe of Kasowitz, Benson, Torres & Friedman. Morvillo is one of the city's most well-known white-collar litigators and the Kasowitz firm, led by Marc E. Kasowitz, is also regarded as a top litigation shop."

Former Penn Professor Charged With Child Porn. The AP (11/9) reports, "A former University of Pennsylvania business professor who was previously convicted in a teen sex sting was indicted Wednesday on charges he produced and distributed child pornography." The AP continues, "Lawrence Scott Ward, 64, was arrested in August as he returned from Brazil through Washington Dulles International Airport. … Federal authorities who searched his laptop computer said it contained a video of young children engaged in sexual activity. They also said they found videos showing the defendant involved in sex acts with teenage boys." The AP adds, "The three-count indictment charges that Ward produced, imported, and possessed child pornography. His arraignment was set for Thursday in Virginia. … Ward was convicted in 1999 of soliciting sex from a Pennsylvania state trooper posing as a 15-year-old male prostitute, a prosecutor said at Ward's recent bail hearing."

Senior Gotti's Mob Allies Lambasted Victoria Gotti Reality Show. The New York Sun (11/9, Capeci) reports in its "Gang Land" column, "There was food and wine on the table and an FBI bug hidden underneath" at the 2004 dinner hosted by Genovese capo Ciro Perrone. "A trio of veteran wiseguys was trashing a reality TV show that struck close to their hearts, 'Growing Up Gotti,' the saga of John Gotti's racy, platinum blonde daughter, Victoria, and her three teenage sons." Perrone denounced the show, saying, "It's a soap opera, and the kids look like girls." The Sun adds, "'It's one of the most disgusting, insulting shows' on television, the aging capo's longtime right-hand-man, John Yannucci, said, according to a report about the discussion written by FBI agent John Penza. Colombo soldier Ralph Scopo, a close Howard Beach pal of the late Gambino boss, was 'so embarrassed' for his late friend's family that he said he couldn't talk about it, Mr. Penza wrote in an affidavit that was filed last year with the federal judge who approved the bugging.

Former Employee Charged With Sabotaging Florida Theater Chain Ticket System. The Miami Herald (11/9, Danner, 286K) reports, "Fort Lauderdale-based Muvico Theaters' former information-technology director faces a federal charge of sabotaging the movie-chain's ticketing-sales system last spring on the opening weekend of Mission Impossible III." Joseph Harlen Shook "was charged in a one-count grand jury indictment of hacking Muvico's computer system to disrupt ticket sales in May -- which the company says cost it about $100,000." Shook "was dismissed in February as part of some cutbacks, according to Muvico spokesman John Spano." The Herald notes, "The investigation was conducted by the FBI."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Rules Group Can Subpoena White House Documents In Plan B Lawsuit. The AP (11/9) reports Federal Magistrate Judge Victor Pohorelsky "has ruled that a reproductive rights group can seek White House e-mails and other documents as part of its lawsuit promoting broader access to the morning-after pill." The ruling "allows the Center for Reproductive Rights to subpoena more than three years of Plan B-related communications between the White House's domestic policy office and select Food and Drug Administration officials. The documents include e-mails, letters and records of conversations." The group "sued the FDA seeking to lift all age restrictions on nonprescription sales of the Plan B emergency contraceptive pills. It seeks the documents to determine whether the White House interfered with the FDA's handling of a request by manufacturer Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc. to allow over-the-counter sales."

Supreme Court Hears Challenge To Federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, Bravin, 2.04M) reports a day after "voters in three states rejected ballot measures to restrict abortions, the Supreme Court took up the Bush administration's appeal to reinstate the first federal ban of a specific abortion procedure." Three federal appeals courts "struck down the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, finding it violated a five-to-four Supreme Court opinion in 2000 that invalidated a similar Nebraska law because it made no exception to preserve the woman's health." Solicitor General Paul Clement "told the justices that Congress had avoided the flaws of the Nebraska statute, by making official findings that the procedure was never medically necessary and defining the procedure itself more specifically." But the "biggest change may have been on the court, where antiabortion activists hope two Bush appointees will uphold restrictions on the procedure and, perhaps someday, an outright ban. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who voted with the majority in the 2000 Nebraska case, has since retired, and her successor, Justice Samuel Alito, brings a record of skepticism toward abortion-rights arguments."

DOJ_NMG_0092441

ABC World News (11/8, story 11, 0:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Emotions ran high today, as the Supreme Court heard its first big abortion case since Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito joined the panel. Protesters on both sides of the so-called partial birth abortion issue marched outside. Inside, police dragged a man from the court after an outburst. The Supreme Court must decide whether to uphold a law banning the procedure. The Bush Administration called it infanticide. Abortion rights groups say the law would prohibit all abortions after the first trimester."

NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 7, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported it was "an emotional day at the US Supreme Court as it took up one of the most important abortion cases. The justices heard arguments and must decide on what will become of the Federal ban on late term abortions. The term opponents use is partial birth abortions. Inside the courtroom by the way, there was a rare outburst by a protester who opposes this procedure. It was the first such disruption inside the Supreme Court chambers in two decades."

USA Today (11/9, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports the Supreme Court "was packed and demonstrators gathered outside under drizzly skies Wednesday as the justices heard arguments in what probably will be two of the most significant abortion rights cases in decades." The "disputes over Congress' ban of a procedure it calls 'partial birth' abortion represent a key test of whether the court led by Chief Justice John Roberts will take a harder line against abortion rights now that Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a key supporter of such rights, has retired." But as the "two-hour court session played out, neither Roberts nor the conservative justice who replaced O'Connor, Samuel Alito, were the key players. Instead, everything seemed choreographed around Anthony Kennedy, the justice who is at the ideological center of the divided, nine-member court." Kennedy, who "has supported abortion rights but voted against striking down a state ban on 'partial birth' abortion six years ago, is widely viewed as the key vote in the cases."

The AP (11/9, Sherman) reports that in "an intense morning of arguments, lawyers for the Bush administration and supporters of abortion rights gave starkly contrasting views: A law passed by Congress labels it a gruesome and inhumane practice. Supporters argue that such abortions in the second trimester of pregnancy sometimes are the safest for women." Justice Kennedy, "the court's swing voter following O'Connor's departure, dissented so strongly in the Nebraska case that many court observers believe he is unlikely to switch sides."

The New York Times (11/9, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports Justice Kennedy's "questioning suggested that he had not made up his mind, despite his strongly worded dissenting opinion when the court struck down Nebraska's version of the federal law six years ago, and despite his obvious distaste for the procedure at issue. Instead, his questions suggested that he remained open to persuasion that the law placed doctors in legal jeopardy and imposed an unconstitutional burden on their patients' right to terminate their pregnancies."

The Washington Post (11/9, A3, Lane, 690K) reports the two hours of oral arguments "on a federal 'partial birth' abortion ban at the Supreme Court yesterday showed that the justices are intensely focused on the procedure's medical details and health implications -- but produced few clues as to how they might rule." As "expected, the court's four most liberal members, Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer, sounded skeptical about the statute. Of the court's conservatives, only Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said much at all, asking questions that implied the law should be upheld." That left "plenty of time for Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, whom both sides in the case consider the likely swing vote, to listen to the lawyers and air his concerns -- though he did not tip his hand."

The Los Angeles Times (11/9, Savage, 850K) reports the case "could prove a turning point for the Supreme Court on abortion. With the arrival of President Bush's two conservative appointees, there appears to be a five-vote majority, including Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, to uphold stricter regulation of abortion." Six years ago, "when the court struck down a Nebraska ban on the practice, Kennedy wrote an impassioned dissent, describing D&X as 'abhorrent.' Abortion-rights advocates hope he will switch sides. But Wednesday, Kennedy suggested that the disputed procedure might be 'purely elective and not medically necessary.'"

Scripps Howard (11/9, Guillaume) reports, "A screaming man charged through the main doors of the Supreme Court's chambers during a hearing in a contentious abortion case Wednesday. … 'Abortion is a sin,' shouted the man, later identified by court officials as Rives Miller Grogan. Four court employees dragged him out of the courtroom." Scripps Howard continues, "Grogan's last known residence is in Los Angeles. He was taken to the U.S. Capitol Booking Center before being transported to D.C. Superior Court. … He was charged with creating a noise disturbance, resisting arrest and other related offenses, a Supreme Court spokesman said." Scripps Howard notes, "Some spectators left their seats and headed toward the door. None of the justices said anything about the disturbance. Such disturbances are rare in the well-guarded court chamber. Court regulars said the last one they remembered was in1983 when Hustler publisher Larry Flynt shouted obscenities during a hearing in his own case."

DOJ_NMG_0092442

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Few Polling Problems Seen, Review Could Presage Changes For 2008. USA Today (11/9, Wolf) reports, "As a dress rehearsal for the 2008 presidential election, Tuesday's experiences at the nation's 183,000 polling places succeeded by failing." USA continues, "Where voters encountered balky equipment, it pointed up the need to examine paper trails and other methods for verifying their votes. … Where voters weren't helped by struggling poll workers, it illuminated the need for increased recruitment and better training. … And where they were misinformed or misdirected by automated 'robocalls' and leaflets, it reignited calls for laws that would crack down on such practices." USA adds, "All of those problems and more surfaced Tuesday in what state and federal officials said was a practice run for the 2008 election. And while none of the problems caused nearly as much trouble as the "hanging chads" of 2000, they laid bare the election system's growing pains. … 'There continue to be deep concerns about the patterns of voting in our country,' Chellie Pingree, president of the civic group Common Cause, said. 'The level of problems that we heard about out there is still completely unacceptable.'" USA notes, "A hotline run by Common Cause received 16,000 calls. Another headed by the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law got 20,000. The Justice Department received only about 250 calls and e-mails, down from 1,200 in 2004. … 'There was nothing out of the ordinary,' Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said. 'They tended to be routine problems, and fairly isolated.'"

Monitors Report Few Problems At Louisiana Polls. The Baton Rouge (LA) Advocate (11/9, Burgess) reports, "Poll watchers from the Justice Department and the NAACP reported a smooth election day in St. Landry Parish, despite concerns of voting irregularities in a close contest between a black female interim sheriff and her white male opponent." The Advocate continues, "Former State Police Trooper Bobby Guidroz won election over interim Sheriff Laura Balthazar on Tuesday with 20,210 votes, or 51 percent, according to complete but unofficial returns." The Advocate adds, "U.S. Attorney Donald Washington said Wednesday that the roughly 24 Justice Department monitors who roamed parish precincts Tuesday reported no issues with voter access or intimidation. … He said some routine election problems arose, such as a few names mistakenly left off voter rolls, but the issues were quickly resolved by the Clerk of Court's Office. … 'It was quiet, and people who wanted to get out and vote got out and voted,' said St. Landry Parish First Assistant District Attorney Frank Trosclair, whose office manned phones Tuesday to field election-day complaints." The Advocate notes, "Poll watchers for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People Legal Defense and Education Fund also reported no problems. … Clifton Lemelle Sr., a retired educator from Eunice who helped organize the NAACP monitors, said he heard scattered complaints of people campaigning too close to the polls but no confirmed reports of intimidation or of voters being wrongly turned away from the polls."

Touch-Screen Voting To Be Reviewed In St Louis. The St Louis Post-Dispatch (11/9, Deere) reports, "Now that the votes have been tallied, St. Louis County election officials and voter rights advocates will begin counting the number of problems voters had casting them. … High on the list of priorities: the county's touch-screen voting machines, which had their first major test on Tuesday." The Post-Dispatch continues, "John Diehl, chairman of the county's Election Board, said most problems with the machines were confined to 20 or fewer of the county's 450 polling sites. … Diehl, a Republican, admitted that lines were long in some places, but said it was mostly due to heavy voter turnout and a lengthy ballot. … But one voting rights advocate argued that problems were more widespread and were the result of poorly trained election judges and a lack of specialists to monitor the touch-screen machines. … 'There wasn't enough (specialists) to meet the need,' said Denise Lieberman, an attorney with the voter advocacy group Advancement Project and former legal director of the ACLU of Eastern Missouri. 'The election judges simply didn't have the skills.' … Diehl said the county had trained 200 poll workers to boot up and shut down the machines, as well as 25 specialists assigned to locations throughout the county and 28 pairs of roving specialists to respond to problems. … The midterm election marked sort of a role reversal for the county — where reports of voting problems have typically been uncommon — and the city of St. Louis, where elections have been marred by lawsuits and an inquiry from the U.S. Justice Department."

Massachusetts Secretary Of State To Oversee Boston Elections. The Boston Globe/AP (11/9) reports, "Secretary of State William Galvin said Wednesday he would take over the supervision of the city's election department after some precincts ran out of ballots during Tuesday's election, forcing voters to wait as police cruisers rushed to bring more. … 'I can't have "We'll try to do better next time." That's not acceptable,' Galvin said Wednesday. 'What they did yesterday was put the rights of voters at risk and that's unacceptable.'" The AP continues, "Galvin said the law required him to determine a pattern of misconduct -- which he believes there is -- then create a solution to the problems. … 'My view of the remedy is there has to be some supervision,' he said. 'I have no desire to micromanage the operations of the city of Boston. ... I'm interested in making sure that the basic function of the department is carried out.'" The AP adds, "Galvin said a similar move was made in Boston in the 1980s, when the Secretary of State's Office appointed a monitor to review, control and direct the department. … Jennifer Mehigan, a spokeswoman for Mayor Thomas Menino, said the city would cooperate with the state. Menino also is drawing from other sources to help fix election problems."

DOJ_NMG_0092443

The Boston Herald (11/9, McPhee) reports, "Mayor Thomas M. Menino said city staffers face 'reassignment' as the state seeks legal oversight of Boston's Elections Department after a ballot shortage forced police to make rush deliveries to angry voters at the polls. … 'I am very, very angry. This should not have happened,' Menino told the Herald. 'Will people be reassigned? It's possible. We certainly need a management plan for the Elections Department.'" The Herald continues, "Secretary of State William Galvin told city officials he plans to utilize his legal right to manage the city Elections Department. … Meanwhile the mayor has said he will hire a consultant to "shake up" the department and file quarterly progress reports to Galvin." The Herald notes, "The state printed more than 300,000 ballots for Hub voters, but just half those were delivered to polling locations, leaving largely minority strongholds such as East Boston, Hyde Park, Mattapan, Roxbury and Dorchester without enough ballots, infuriating voters who were forced to wait for hours to cast their ballots. … Some precinct wardens began handing English-speaking voters ballots printed in other languages, or told voters to leave their phone numbers and they would be called when there were ballots available. Officials estimate that 2.2 million people voted in Tuesday's election."

Anti-Affirmative Action Initiative Passes By Wide Margin In Michigan. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A13, Sataline, Hechinger, 2.04M) reports that in 2003, "when the Supreme Court upheld affirmative action in college admissions, many observers felt that the issue had been settled for years to come. Think again." Michigan voters, "where the state university successfully fought in that Supreme Court case to preserve minority preference, repudiated it in a ballot initiative Tuesday. An initiative passed by Michigan voters will ban affirmative action in admissions to public colleges and in government hiring. Currently, the University of Michigan and other selective public institutions in the state consider race as one of many factors in admissions decisions. The ban takes effect 45 days after the vote." Polls had "indicated that the vote on the initiative would be close. But Michigan voters on Tuesday approved the measure, called Proposal 2, by a margin of 58% to 42%, with 100% of precincts reporting."

Seven States Pass Marriage Definition Initiatives. ABC World News (11/8, story 6, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Voters in seven out of eight states defining marriage as union between a man and a woman. Same-sex partnerships will be allowed in many of the states but they cannot be called marriage."

South Dakota Voters Reject Restrictive Abortion Ban. ABC World News (11/8, story 7, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In South Dakota, voters rejected restricting abortions in cases of rape and incest. The creators said it would hope it would urge the Supreme Court to reverse its stance on allowing abortions."

Los Angeles Firefighter Settles Racial Harassment Suit. The Los Angeles Times (11/8, Banks) reports, "A black firefighter who was served dog food in his spaghetti by fellow firefighters will be paid more than $2.7 million to settle a lawsuit alleging racial harassment and discrimination within the Los Angeles Fire Department." The Times continues, "The award, approved 11-1 Wednesday by the Los Angeles City Council, is the latest in a recent string of settlements of lawsuits by firefighters claiming discrimination, harassment and retaliation against those who complain. … It is believed to be the largest payout for misconduct in the history of the department, which was long considered among the nation's finest, but has been dogged for years by complaints of hostility toward black and female firefighters." The Times adds, "The lawsuit, by firefighter Tennie Pierce, 51, alleges that firefighter Jorge Arevalo mixed canned dog food into Pierce's dinner at their station two years ago; that Capt. John Tohill purchased the dog food; and that Capt. Chris Burton knew about the trick but did nothing to warn Pierce. All three men were present when Pierce ate the dog food. … Pierce 'took a large bite, at which time he noticed the other firefighters were laughing and making noises,' the lawsuit says. He took a second bite, then demanded to know what was in his food, 'but no one would tell him. (Pierce) then left the kitchen with his co-workers laughing at him.' … A fire department investigation suggested the incident was intended to 'humble' Pierce -- who stands 6'5" -- after his team won a fire station volleyball game. A lawyer for one of the defendants initially called the incident 'a good-natured prank . . . (not) in any way motivated by race.' … But a University of California, Santa Cruz, professor who was hired by Pierce's attorney to review department records of discrimination complaints, said the prank was clearly intended to 'humiliate and dehumanize' Pierce."

Maryland Police Say Stun Guns Effective In Averting Trouble. The Baltimore Sun (11/9, Fenton) reports, "From a suicidal teenager to a suspected car thief who flees on foot, some people who have refused to cooperate with Harford County police have been getting a wake-up call -- the 50,000-volt variety." The Sun continues, "The Harford County Sheriff's Office is believed to be among the first police agencies in Maryland to issue Taser stun guns to its deputies, who have used the devices to stop people who flee or refuse to comply with orders, and for the mentally ill who become violent. … The agency has been issuing stun guns to patrol deputies since last year, and they have used them on at least 28 occasions since January. One incident involved a 50-year-old schizophrenic woman who had barricaded herself in a closet and was shocked with a stun gun because a deputy feared she could get to weapons in another room." The Sun adds, "The agency says the devices, which have been criticized for causing fatalities, have been most effective as a deterrent to violence and limit injuries to suspects and officers. A spokesman said assaults on officers were down. … The agency first purchased stun guns in 2002 and has been phasing them into the arsenal of weapons used by all patrol deputies. Harford is not alone -- more than 7,000 of the 18,000 police agencies in the United States use the weapons, according to a March report by Amnesty International, and 1,700 police departments have purchased them for every officer. … With increased use, however, has come greater scrutiny. Amnesty International said there had been at least 156 deaths across the country related to police stun guns in the past five years, and dozens of excessive-force lawsuits have been brought by people who say they were injured by officers." The Sun notes, "A research arm of the Justice Department is conducting a two-year study of cases in which a suspect died after being subdued with a stun gun. The National Institute of Justice said there have been more than 180 deaths in the past 10 years, with most occurring since 2000."

DOJ_NMG_0092444

ANTITRUST:

Dingell Wants FCC To Delay AT&T-BellSouth Vote. The AP (11/9) reports, "John Dingell, the incoming chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said Wednesday that he wants the Federal Communications Commission to delay its vote on the AT&T Inc. acquisition of BellSouth Corp." The AP continues, "Dingell, saying the combination raises a 'significant antitrust question,' sent a letter to the FCC asking that it hold off on the vote until after the new Congress convenes in January. The agency has delayed a vote on the merger three times." The AP adds, 'Dingell's request might be an opening shot in the House Democrats' new oversight of big business. California Rep. Nancy Pelosi, who is in line to become speaker, has promised to fight early on in the next Congress to lower the price of prescription drugs available through Medicare. Efforts to curb military spending are also likely, political and financial analysts said, after an election whose outcome was influenced in large part by voters' dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq. … But with the two parties stalemated in the Senate, where it usually takes 60 votes to pass major legislation, the pharmaceutical and defense industries might find themselves beset more by unwelcome rhetoric in Congress than any changes in law."

Liz Clairborne To Purchase Kate Spade For $124 Million. The AP (11/9) reports, "Liz Claiborne Inc., moving to expand its reach into luxury department stores, Wednesday said it agreed to acquire privately held Kate Spade LLC, a maker of high-end fashion accessories, for $124 million in cash." The AP continues, "The deal, expected to close late this year, includes an undisclosed amount of assumed debt. … New York-based Kate Spade, which makes the kate spade and Jack Spade brands, had net sales of about $84 million for the year ended July 30. Its product line includes handbags, small leather goods, accessories, luggage and baby products." The AP adds, "Kate Spade sells in U.S. department stores, including Neiman Marcus, Saks Fifth Avenue, Nordstrom, and Bloomingdale's, as well as 19 Kate Spade stores, four Kate Spade outlets and one Jack Spade store. … Kate Spade also has distributors in Asia and licensing agreements for shoes, eyewear, tabletop and paper products. … Despite having more than $5 billion in annual sales and more than 40 brands in its stable, Liz Claiborne, also based in New York, so far has been a limited player in handbags and accessories. Its brands include Ellen Tracy, Dana Buchman, Lucky Brand, and Juicy Couture."

Spain's Iberdrola Considers Offer For Scottish Power. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A3, Singer, Johnson) reports, "The latest effort by a European energy giant to strike a major deal -- Iberdrola SA's preliminary approach to Scottish Power PLC -- signals that utilities believe they need to be larger to survive in a future dominated by the search for newer and cleaner ways of producing energy. The Journal says, "Iberdrola of Spain made an approach to Scottish Power, which has a market value of £10.9 billion ($20.8 billion), as a prelude to a possible offer, according to people close to the situation." The Journal reports, "A potential deal would mark the latest in a series of deals and attempted acquisitions involving some of Europe's biggest electricity producers in Spain, France, Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Revokes Boston Police Officer's Bail. The Boston Globe (11/9, Murphy, 413K) reports Boston Police Officer Carlos Pizarro, "one of three officers facing federal cocaine and heroin charges in one of the biggest corruption cases in the department's history," yesterday "was ordered held without bail until the case is resolved. US

DOJ_NMG_0092445

District Judge William G. Young found that Pizarro violated his bail conditions by agreeing to let the government search his Dorchester home for contraband before he was released, then quickly calling his wife to 'change the situation in that house.'" The Globe adds, "Prosecutors allege that Pizarro, who knew jail calls are monitored, used code words to warn his wife to get rid of illegal drugs. … Pizarro's lawyers, however, disputed the government's contention that Pizarro was talking about illegal drugs. They say he was talking about sex-enhancing drugs…and other prescription drugs during the call."

The Boston Herald (11/9, Sweet, 184K) reports, "The 20-minute call was placed on Sept. 22 from the Barnstable House of Correction just three hours after Pizarro -- who was busted by the FBI in July with fellow officers Roberto Pulido and Nelson Carrasquillo -- learned authorities would search his home prior to his Oct. 11 pre-trial release. … Pizarro directs Joyce to a 'rack of clothes,' 'little pink things' and the 'top drawer in my dresser,' according to a transcript of the conversation." The Herald notes, "Pizarro, Pulido and Carrasquillo are alleged to have hired themselves out as muscle for cocaine shipments and to have hosted orgies with hookers, among other betrayals of their badges."

FBI, Chicago Police Arrest 17 Alleged Drug Gang Members. The AP (11/9) reports, "Chicago police and the FBI arrested and charged 17 people in a West Side gang roundup Wednesday. Following an investigation by the Joint Task Force on Gangs, FBI special agents and Police narcotics investigators arrested 11 suspected members and associates of the Satan Disciples, according to an FBI release." Operation Burn Down, "which began in September 2004, included undercover operations to purchase drugs and court-authorized electronic surveillance of phones used by one or more of the defendants, the release said. The suspects were charged in criminal complaints filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Chicago with numerous felony counts of conspiracy and possession of a controlled substance with intent to distribute, the release said."

The Chicago Tribune (11/9, Coen, 617K) reports, "One of those charged is de facto head of the gang in Chicago, according to the FBI, and court documents named another as a local chief. … 'These are some of the worst offenders and biggest targets in the area,' said Mitchell Marrone, an assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in Chicago and the leader of the bureau's anti-gang efforts. 'They're dealing in quantities of drugs and also in violence.'" The Tribune notes, "The case came together after intelligence from beat officers was developed by the Chicago FBI's Joint Task Force on Gangs, FBI officials said. The investigation…involved undercover work and electronic surveillance, authorities said."

19 Suspected Gang Members Arrested In Ohio On Drug, Weapons Charges. The Columbus (OH) Dispatch (11/9) reports nineteen suspected gang members across Columbus "were arrested…as police conducted a methodical sweep as part of the mayor's anti-gang initiative. They were some of the 63 suspects that police, the DEA, the U.S. marshal's office and parole officers were searching for…said Columbus police Sgt. Chantay Boxill." Those arrested "were mainly wanted for drug or weapons charges."

Trial Begins For Arkansas Alderman Accused Of Selling Xanax, Crack. The Newport (AR) Independent (11/8) reports on the trial of Newport Alderman Pinky McFarlin, who "is charged with selling Xanax and crack cocaine on 20 different dates to an informant from May through November of 2004. Evidence expected to be introduced will include tape recordings of conversations held between the informant and the defendant in the defendant's home." Witnesses "expected to testify against McFarlin will include an expert witness for the DEA."

Marijuana Initiative Passes In Montana, Relaxes Enforcement Of Some Offenses. The Missoulian (11/8) reports a ballot measure recommending Missoula County law enforcement officials make adult marijuana offenses their lowest priority passed Tuesday night. The measure, dubbed Initiative 2, won the support of 22,502 Missoula voters, or 53 percent. Opponents of the initiative totaled 19,565, or 46 percent, and included some of Missoula County's top law enforcement officials. The initiative will make marijuana crimes the single lowest priority for Missoula County authorities, but won't include marijuana sales or drug use by minors as low-priority offenses."

The AP (11/9) reports Police Chief Rusty Wickman and Sheriff Mike McMeekin "have publicly voiced their concern about the initiative, saying they worry the measure's passage could lead to the loss of federal dollars from Missoula's drug enforcement programs." Proponents "say Initiative 2 strives to place increased emphasis on crimes that threaten people's lives and property and on other, more pressing drug issues." The Helena Montana Independent Record used the AP story.

Three California Cities Lean Toward Relaxing Marijuana Laws. The Los Angeles Times (11/9, Romney, Chawkins, Writers) reports voters on Tuesday "weighed in on a vast array of local issues, with three cities leaning toward relaxed marijuana enforcement. … In returns from Santa Monica, Santa Barbara and Santa Cruz, voters were siding with proposals requiring local police to make marijuana arrests their lowest priority. Financed largely by Ohio insurance magnate Peter Lewis, the measures were opposed by many police officers, who described the issues as unnecessary and a possible obstacle to investigating major crimes."

DOJ_NMG_0092446

In a later story, the Los Angeles Times (11/9) writes, "And a resounding 65% of voters approved Proposition Y, which would make the personal use of marijuana by adults on private property [Santa Monica's] lowest police enforcement priority. Santa Monicans for Sensible Marijuana Policy had said the measure would send a message to Sacramento and Washington that voters want more common-sense marijuana laws."

Colorado Marijuana Measure Defeated By Wide Margin. In the Grand Junction (CO) Sentinel (11/8), Le Roy Standish writes, "Colorado voters have pitched Amendment 44 aside like an assortment of stems and seeds found at the bottom of an empty bag of weed. Tuesday's election results showed that the amendment failed by a wide margin statewide. Across Colorado 688,987 or 60.7 percent voted against the amendment, compared to 445,280 votes or 39.3 percent, in favor. In Mesa County, voters turned the amendment down by an even greater margin. Results were 31,637 votes or 68.2 percent against Amendment 44 and 14,240 or 30.7 percent in favor. The amendment would have decriminalized possession of less than one ounce of marijuana by adults over the age of 21."

On its Web site, WINS Radio, New York (11/8) reports Colorado voters "joined Nevada in rejecting measures that would have legalized possession of up to an ounce of marijuana by anyone 21 and older. South Dakotans voted down a proposal that would have allowed marijuana use for some medical purposes."

Reporting Continues On Nevada Marijuana Measure. In an updated story, the AP (11/8) writes, "Nevadans on Tuesday rejected selling legalized marijuana at state-sanctioned pot shops. … Question 7, to legalize adult possession of up to one ounce of marijuana and require the state to set up procedures to tax and regulate its sale failed, 56 percent to 44 percent. … While other states and local governments have decriminalized possession of small amounts of marijuana, the Nevada measure sponsored by the Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana went further. It directed the state Department of Taxation to set up procedures to license and regulate pot growers, distributors and retailers." The AP adds, "Critics - including law enforcement, civic groups and the nation's drug czar [said] marijuana is a gateway drug that could lead to harsher substances and negate anti-drug efforts." This AP story was used by the Las Vegas Sun.

The Ely (NV)Times (11/8) has posted on its Web site the Las Vegas Review-Journal story included in yesterday's briefing which says, "With at least 1,620 of 1,913 precincts statewide reporting, Question 7, which would have allowed Nevada residents 21 years of age or older to possess an ounce of marijuana or less, was being rejected by 56 percent of voters."

The Reno (NV) Gazette Journal (11/8) reports, "With Lyon's polls closed and votes tallied late Tuesday night, questions Nos. 4 and 5, regarding creation of stricter smoking bans in various public places were both voted down on the County level alongside Question No. 7 regarding legalization and regulation of one ounce or less of marijuana."

South Dakotans Reject Proposed Marijuana Law. The AP (11/9) writes, "Whatever the reason -- too many issues, too long, too confusing -- South Dakota voters rejected eight of the 11 issues on Tuesday's general election ballot. … South Dakotans have rejected a proposed law that would have let some people smoke marijuana to provide relief from pain. … It was defeated 52 percent to 48 percent." This AP story was used by South Dakota's Yankton Daily.

Election Day No "Full Sweep" For Liberal Social Issues. In the Washington Times (11/9, Wetzstein), Cheryl Wetzstein writes, "Tuesday wasn't a full sweep for liberal social issues -- measures to legalize marijuana failed in three states. … Democrats lost measures to legalize marijuana in Nevada, South Dakota and Colorado."

In USA Today (11/9), Judy Keen writes, "There's more to the election results than just Democrats winning and Republicans losing. … Potheads: Voters in Colorado and Nevada rejected proposals to legalize adult possession of up to an ounce of marijuana. South Dakotans voted against medical use of marijuana."

Local TV Coverage. The fate of marijuana measures in Colorado, Nevada and South Dakota received wide local television coverage. Some examples: KDVR-TV, Denver (11/8, 6:00 a.m.) aired, "Another election, another defeat for the folks who want to legalize marijuana. Amendment 44 failed."

KMGH-TV, Denver (11/8, 6:00 a.m.) aired, "Voters raised the minimum wage…and said no to marijuana with six out of ten voters rejecting that proposal to legalize possession of up to an ounce for anyone over the age of 21."

KUSA-TV, Denver (11/8, 6:00 a.m.) aired, "With 60% of the vote, Amendment 44 has failed."

KLAS-TV, Las Vegas (11/8, 4:00 p.m.) aired, "Nevada voters rejected Question 7, a proposal to legalize marijuana. Fifty-six percent of voters said they were against the initiative, which would have legalized taxed and regulated the purchase and sale of small amounts of marijuana for personal use. John Walters, the White House drug czar, issued a statement today saying the results of this election show that Americans simply do not want more drugs in their communities."

KTNV-TV, Las Vegas (11/8, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "Nevada voters said 'No way' to Question 7 to legalize marijuana for recreational use. Question 7 would have legalized adult possession of up to one ounce of marijuana; it would have required the state to set up procedures to tax and regulate its sale."

DOJ_NMG_0092447

KVVU-TV, Las Vegas (11/8, 5:00 a.m.) aired, "Question 7 was one of the more controversial questions on the ballot. It asked voters if they wanted to legalize small amounts of marijuana for people over 21. Despite an effective campaign by supporters, the measure failed by more than 40-thousand votes. … FOX 5's Mike Doria joins us this morning with reaction to this issue. Governor-elect Jim Gibbons was one of the 40-thousand people who voted against the marijuana measure. … Supports of Question 7 say cops should focus on more serious crimes and more serious drugs."

KELO-TV, Sioux Falls, South Dakota (11/8, 9:00 a.m.) aired, "Voters rejected Initiated Measure 4, which would have legalized medical marijuana."

KSFY-TV, Sioux Falls, South Dakota (11/8, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "South Dakota voters rejected 8 of the eleven issues on yesterday's ballot. The failed measures include…legalizing marijuana."

Judge In Montana Denies Claim Under Medical Marijuana Act. The Whitefish (MT) Pilot (11/8) reports a Kalispell man who "claimed protection under the state's Medical Marijuana Act after he was caught smoking marijuana at a downtown Whitefish bar will have his day in court later this month. But he may have to seek another line of defense or appeal to a higher court, now that Whitefish City Court Judge Bradley Johnson has denied the man's motion to dismiss the charge based on the act. … In a two-page document submitted to city court, [Lucas] Venters claims to have a 'debilitating medical condition.' He said he has been 'in pain every day for the past 10 years due to my spinal, thoracic and neck injuries/conditions,' and that he has severe or persistent muscle spasms."

City Council In California Seeks To Ban Marijuana Dispensaries. Torrance, California's Daily Breeze (11/8) reports Lawndale City Council members this week "quickly shot down a proposal to regulate medical marijuana dispensaries in the city, opting instead to direct staff to look into banning the establishments altogether. … Dispensaries have recently met with a cold reception in the South Bay, with Torrance, Gardena, Hawthorne, Hermosa Beach, Lomita, Rancho Palos Verdes and Redondo Beach issuing temporary or permanent bans. Lawndale in June enacted a temporary ban on the establishments."

Federal, State Agents Arrest Arkansas Militia Member On Weapons Charges. The Northwest Arkansas Morning News (11/9, Mehaffey) reports Fayetteville militia member Hollis "Wayne" Fincher "was arrested Wednesday by teams of special agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and other federal and state agencies and local police in connection with illegal firearms." The News notes, "The arrest and search warrants were the result of an eight-month investigation relating to the unlawful manufacture, possession and transfer of machine guns," and "ATF, FBI, Washington County Sheriff's Department, Fayetteville Police Department, Springdale Police Department, Arkansas State Police, Arkansas State Bomb Squad and the Madison County Sheriff's Department all participated in the investigation."

IMMIGRATION:

US Cracks Down On Fraudulent Immigrant Marriages. USA Today (11/9, Koch) reports, "A Virginia man's guilty plea Wednesday to arranging sham marriages between U.S. citizens and Ghanaian immigrants reflects the government's increased focus on marriage fraud." USA continues, "Eric Amoah, 42, a pharmacy technician from Ghana, was one of 22 people charged in the Washington, D.C., area two months ago with participating in a marriage and immigration fraud scheme. His sentence is pending. … Similar busts have occurred in the past year in California, New York and Utah. An investigation is underway in Gwinnett County, Ga., where two men are charged with bigamy for marrying at least 13 African women. … 'We're definitely seeing more organizations' involved in marriage fraud, says James Spero, head of the Identity and Benefits Fraud Unit at U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). 'We're stepping up our efforts.'" USA adds, "Sham marriages for immigrants seeking citizenship have long been a problem. A marriage license can be the quickest way to gain the temporary legal status conferred by a green card, the title of a 1990 movie about two people who enter into such a marriage of convenience only to — surprise — fall in love. … Since 9/11, marriage fraud has taken on more serious implications. Half of 36 foreign-born suspected terrorists who were in the USA from the early 1990s to 2004 gained legal status by marrying Americans — 10 of them through sham marriages — according to the Center for Immigration Studies, which promotes tighter immigration controls."

Arizona Voters Seen As Helping Boost Comprehensive Immigration Reform. The Los Angeles Times (11/9, 850K) says in an editorial, "Arizona held a referendum on immigration policy Tuesday. The winner was John McCain. McCain, the state's senior senator, wasn't actually on the ballot. Rather, candidates across the state campaigned for or against an idea that McCain and a few other Arizonans in Congress have championed: a comprehensive approach to immigration reform that provides more visas for guest workers, modifies the path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the country and improves border security. Critics of this approach, including Republican candidates for governor, attorney general and two of Arizona's eight House seats, argued instead for sealing the borders and enforcing current immigration laws. They all were defeated, despite the frustration and anger expressed by many Arizonans about the torrent of border jumpers." Now McCain and Rep. Jeff Flake "may get their way. With Democrats in control of the House next year, the prospects for a comprehensive overhaul have improved dramatically." The "voters of Arizona have pushed a comprehensive solution one step closer to reality."

DOJ_NMG_0092448

TAX:

Rangel Says He Won't Roll Back Bush Tax Cuts. The Washington Post (11/9, D1, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "Democrats have pledged 'fiscal discipline,' starting with pay-as-you-go rules to prohibit the House from approving new spending or tax measures unless the costs are offset by tax increases or spending cuts." Democratic Rep. Earl Pomeroy, a member of the House Ways and Means Committee, said, "There's not going to be, frankly, room for some grand new adventure in federal spending." Still, "there's plenty on the Democratic wish list, starting with relief for the growing number of middle-class families hit by the alternative minimum tax, which jacks up their tax bills. Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), likely to be the next Ways and Means chairman, said yesterday that 'tackling this very complex problem would be a good test of bipartisanship.'" Rangel "said he would not roll back tax cuts that President Bush won from the Republican Congress. But budget experts predict that Democrats will revisit at least some of them, such as lower rates for the richest Americans, lower rates on capital gains and dividends, and partial repeal of the estate tax, to pay for other priorities."

USA Today (11/9, McCoy, 2.27M) interviewed Rangel, who said, ""I enjoy working together with Republicans. … I enjoy a finished legislative product that you can get on the floor in a civil way and say, 'We worked on this together.' I think that's what the Congress is all about." USA Today adds, "That cooperation was lost during the Republican Party's 12-year control of the House, says Rangel, describing a political wandering-in-the-desert, when it wasn't odd for Ways and Means Democrats to learn about the committee's plans only after final decisions had been made." Rangel "says his predecessor, retiring GOP Rep. William Thomas of California, never spoke to him about US trade legislation apart from bills the New Yorker championed."

USA Today (11/9, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) also reports, "Because Democrats don't have a veto-proof majority in the House, or the 60 votes needed to limit Senate debate, some observers predict gridlock." But "even if passing laws is difficult, Democrats still have plenty of power to shape the agenda." Democrats "can affect the economy by declining to schedule votes on pending trade deals or expiring Bush tax cuts. There are also must-pass measures to fund the government and the war in Iraq, where Bush has less flexibility. Those bills could be a vehicle for adding other Democratic priorities."

Schumer Says Democrats May Raise "Some Taxes" On "Oil Companies And Things Like That." On Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (11/8), host Bill O'Reilly said to Sen. Charles Schumer, "I believe that Democrats are going to try to raise taxes. Am I wrong?" Schumer: "Well, you're mostly wrong. I mean, there will be some taxes. The loopholes for the oil companies that we'll attempt to close and things like that. But no, we're not going to raise taxes."

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A1, 2.04M) reports Rangel "cites 'ending tax shelters for companies that move American jobs overseas' as one of his main objectives." Rep. Nancy Pelosi, "the probable new speaker of the House, has already called for ending 'tax giveaways' to oil companies, negotiating with pharmaceutical companies for better drug prices for federal health programs and rolling back tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans."

Rangel Open To Private Accounts "In Addition To Maintaining Social Security." On Fox News' Your World (11/8), host Neil Cavuto asked Rep. Charles Rangel, "The President talked a great deal today about private accounts" for Social Security. Is that "a non-starter to Charlie Rangel?" Rangel: "If it's in addition to maintaining Social Security as we know it, no, it's not a non-starter."

New Congress Expected To Scrutinize Some Industries. The Washington Post (11/9, S1, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "Democrats wasted no time yesterday proclaiming a new era in Washington, pledging to put middle-class economic issues at the top of their agenda. They promised fresh scrutiny of drug prices, corporate profits, international trade and more." The "presumptive chairmen of key House committees laid out plans to challenge the president on many issues important to business interests. For instance, an exuberant Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) rattled off a to-do list for the powerful Energy and Commerce Committee, including regulating dietary supplements, promoting electric cars and examining drug-safety procedures at the Food and Drug Administration. 'We'll kill the closest snake first,' he said when asked about his priorities."

The Financial Times (11/9, Kirchgaessner, Bowe, White) reports the elections "set the stage for heightened congressional scrutiny of pharmaceutical companies, oil and gas groups and government contractors such as Halliburton." Shares in Merck, Schering-Plough and other big drugmakers "fell on Wednesday in response to the polls," even as "the overall stock market rose, reflecting an emerging consensus among lobbyists that Democrats would take a selective approach in pushing for regulatory changes." The Wall Street Journal (11/9, C1, Johnson, Mathews, 2.04M) runs a similar report under the headline "Big Pharma Catches A Chill, Fearing Democrats' Prescriptions On Pricing."

DOJ_NMG_0092449

New Congress To Revisit Some Bush Administration Federal Workforce Initiatives. The Washington Post's (11/9, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The new Congress will take a more skeptical view of the Bush administration's approach to managing the federal government, in particular efforts to contract out federal jobs and link employee pay raises more closely to job performance. Those were the post-election predictions offered by a number of public policy experts, union leaders and Democrats yesterday." The Post adds, "Federal union leaders saw the election results as an opportunity to roll back some of the administration's workforce initiatives," and "some employee groups said yesterday that they expect to see Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) serve as a bridge" on federal "employee issues." Outsourcing "efforts 'have demoralized people throughout the federal workforce,' Van Hollen said. 'The amount of time, energy and anxiety spent going through this process has far outweighed any benefit.'"

Democrats To Exact Office Space Revenge On GOP. The Washington Post (11/9, C1, Copeland, 690K) reports, "Perhaps we shouldn't call this revenge. Perhaps this is just what a party in power does. Dogs chase squirrels, and the majority party in the U.S. House gets to throw its weight around a little." Former Rep. Bob Wise said, "The first thing you've got to learn is that from now on, you don't get upstairs." Wise recalled "how some of the meeting rooms for Democrats were downgraded when the Republicans took over after '94. Members' personal offices are doled out on a seniority basis, but control over many other rooms falls to the majority."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Pelosi Vows Swift Action On Democratic Agenda. The Washington Post (11/9, A1, Weisman, Babington, 690K) reports Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi "promised swift action early next year on a Democratic package that includes an increase of $2.10 an hour in the minimum wage, full implementation of the recommendations of the bipartisan Sept. 11, 2001, commission, and making some college tuition payments tax-deductible." The AP (11/9, Espo) also notes Pelosi "pledged…to press for a new course in Iraq and move promptly to raise the minimum wage. 'We will not disappoint' the American people,'" she said. At a news conference in the Capitol, Pelosi also "pledged that Democrats will make the next Congress 'the most honest, ethical and open' one in history."

McClatchy (11/9) reports Pelosi "signaled Wednesday that she intends to steer a centrist course and work across party lines with President Bush to shape policy on Iraq, energy, Social Security and immigration." Pelosi "acknowledged that her party's return to the House majority after a dozen years in exile occurred largely because at least nine fairly conservative 'Blue Dog' Democrats won Republican seats. The liberal-tilting House Democratic caucus must accommodate them -- and the centrist voters they represent -- she conceded." Along similar lines, the New York Times (11/9, Hulse, 1.16M) reports on "the new mosaic of the Democratic Party in the House of Representatives -- incoming lawmakers who will make a diverse group of political officeholders even more eclectic. While much of the focus in the campaign was on the more moderate tendencies of Democratic contenders, the scope of Tuesday's Democratic surge makes for a more complex picture and a broader mix of ideologies. … The diverse viewpoints and backgrounds they are bringing to Washington could pose problems for…Pelosi."

On ABC World News (11/8, story 5, 1:50, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said a Democratic Congress "means an increase in the minimum wage. We saw six states pass initiatives for increase in the minimum wage. It is at the top of the Democrats' agenda. If they control both houses of the Congress, I think they'll be able to pass that. On the President's agenda I think it means he has a better chance of passing the immigration reform that died in the last Congress. Democrats like it more than Republicans do. … On the other hand, the President and his team are going to get investigated more by the Democrats and I think this is most important, if the Senate switches control, the Democrats will be able to block President Bush's judge nominations, including another one on the Supreme Court, if it came up." The Washington Post (11/9, 690K), in an editorial titled "The 'Thumping' of the GOP," lists the top Democratic issues and adds, "If Democrats aren't responsible enough to stop using those issues as political footballs and start considering the future fiscal health of the country, they won't deserve to remain in the majority."

Pelosi, who is receiving largely positive media coverage one day after the midterm elections, made several public appearances and granted interviews to all three network newscasts, PBS and CNN. Pelosi, says USA Today (11/9, Stone, 2.27M), "wasted no time making clear who's in charge now. 'Democrats are ready to lead,' the San Francisco congresswoman declared at a news conference Wednesday, hours after her party reclaimed control of the House of Representatives to end 12 years of Republican rule. And prepared to lead the Democrats is an Armani-clad daughter of an old-fashioned Baltimore politician about to become the first female speaker of the House -- two heartbeats from the presidency." And the Christian Science Monitor (11/9, Chaddock, 59K) reports that "what helped Pelosi become the first female speaker…is old-school pragmatism: a practical sense of how to build power and no qualms about using it."

DOJ_NMG_0092450

ABC World News (11/8, story 10, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) described her as "a liberal Democrat from San Francisco, a grandmother many times over, awaiting another grandchild any day now. She comes from a political family but waited to enter politics herself until her kids were grown. As Speaker, she'll be third in line for the presidency." ABC (Moran) added Pelosi "is the woman of the moment in this city right now." In an interview with Pelosi, ABC asked her about the "bad blood built up" between her and President Bush. Is Bush, asked ABC, "still incompetent, shallow and dangerous and all the other things you have called him?" Pelosi: "Incompetence in the implementation of a war, it is dangerous. But again, the election is over. Right now, I'm the Speaker of the House of Representatives. I'm not the leader of the Democrats. I will be the Speaker of the whole House of Representatives." Moran: "There is one thing about Nancy Pelosi's rise that transcends politics, she'll be the most powerful woman in US history when she becomes speaker. Are you going to use the mother of five voice?" Pelosi said, "The mother of five voice comes in handy. My colleagues hear it coming, they know." ABC added, "And that voice works. Nancy Pelosi managed to instill discipline in Democratic ranks. She'll need to keep that up, as the country looks to her and Democrats as they take power in Congress."

The CBS Evening News (11/8, story 8, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) noted Pelosi and the President "have said some pretty nasty things about each other." Pelosi told CBS, "I never called the President a liar. That I never did. I said it's time for the President to tell the truth to the American people. I think that much of the truth has been withheld from the American people." Asked about the fact that she's expected to become the first woman to be Speaker, Pelosi said, "I've broken the marble ceiling. This Congress is steeped in tradition and history. It's very hard for a woman to suck steed the level I have that and I think it send a message to all women that if this can happen, anything can happen." Pelosi repeated that message, almost word by word, on CNN's The Situation Room (11/8, Blitzer), "Congress is…an institution steeped in history and tradition. For a woman to break through what I call the 'marble ceiling' here is something quite remarkable. It sends a message that women can do anything. … I feel a very special responsibility. I feel a responsibility to have the most honest and open Congress, to have a Congress that has civility as its hallmark, bipartisanship in our debate and our deliberations, and fiscal soundness as a woman would want to have, not heaping mountains of debt on future generations. And as the first woman speaker, I would want to conduct myself, perform my duties, in a way that would be sure that it wouldn't be too long before we'd have another woman speaker of the House."

The AP (11/9, Zuckerbrod) reports Pelosi recounted that Bush's call was "so very, very early in the morning," and that "an ebullient Pelosi recalled…that Bush referred to her as 'Madam speaker-elect, and I referred to him as president.'"

NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 6, 3:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported Pelosi will be "the first woman in that job. As Nancy Pelosi reminded us as we sat down with her today, the first Italian American as well." In her interview with NBC, Pelosi discussed her morning phone call from President Bush, "The call was very friendly. He extended a hand of friendship. I told him what I said earlier in the evening that I looked forward to working with him in partnership, not partisanship." On PBS' NewsHour (11/8, Warner), Pelosi said of Bush, "He's the President of the United States. I respect the office, and I respect him. I don't respect his judgment on Katrina, on Iraq, and on a number of other issues."

The New York Times (11/9, Mills, 1.16M), in a piece titled "Nancy Pelosi Is Ready to Be Voice of the Majority," says that when she "faced the cameras Wednesday morning, after the Democrats had taken a majority in the House and put her on the brink of becoming the first female speaker, she spoke so softly at first that some reporters insisted they could not hear her. Then suddenly, she was commanding: 'But I could use my mother-of-five voice!'" It is "a line Ms. Pelosi uses often, and a voice she may have to rely on frequently as she tries to ensure that the new Democratic majority lasts more than two years."

Rep. Charles Rangel, appearing on MSNBC's Tucker (11/8, Carlson), said, "It's remarkable that I'm the first African-American to head the Ways and Means Committee. She's the first woman to become speaker. But it shows, in this great Republic, that there's progress. And it inspires other people to get involved in public life, hopefully."

On Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (11/8), Sen. Charles Schumer said of Pelosi, "She may vote her district, but she is going to run the Democratic Party in a way that's pragmatic."

Rep. Peter King said on Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (11/8), "I like Nancy Pelosi as a person. But her base is going to be very liberal wing of the Democratic Party. They in many ways just hate George Bush. It's almost irrational. And that's their base."

Pelosi Says Investigations Needed About Iraq, Halliburton, Katrina. On PBS' NewsHour (11/8, Warner), Pelosi said, "Investigations are needed in terms of -- I think the American people want to know about Katrina, about contracting and Halliburton in Iraq. They want to know how we have the energy policy that we do so that we go forward to protect the American people in case of natural disaster, to protect us in times of" war. She added, "That would be three places where I think hearings would be very necessary for us to go forward for better policy."

DOJ_NMG_0092451

Pelosi said on CNN's The Situation Room (11/8, Blitzer), "Subpoena power is a last resort. We would hope that there would be cooperation from the executive branch in terms of investigating the pre-war intelligence. I don't know -- those decisions will be made by our caucus with the wisdom of the committees of jurisdiction."

The Washington Post (11/9, A1, Weisman, Babington, 690K) reports Pelosi also "said she will not heed the calls of some activists on the left to explore impeaching the president. But with subpoena power and committee chairmanships, Democrats will ensure that Bush's anti-terrorism and war policies receive tough scrutiny in the last two years of his presidency."

Pelosi Suggests "Troublemakers" Would Leave Iraq If US Pulled Out. ABC World News (11/8, story 10, 2:50, Moran, 8.78M) asked Pelosi about her position on the Iraq war, she said, "Our presence in Iraq has been provocative to our enemies. It is viewed as an occupation. And is resisted not only by Iraqis but others in the region. And those troublemakers, few in number, but nonetheless, a menace, would probably leave Iraq after we left Iraq. They're there because we're there.

New Congressional Democratic Majority Will Affect Judicial Nominations. The Legal Times (11/9, Goldman) reports, "Democrats, as widely expected, wrested control of the House of Representatives from the Republicans, after 12 years of Republican rule, in elections across the country Tuesday, setting the stage for a series of intensive investigations of the Bush administration by several different House committees. … But it appears Democrats also carried the Senate -- radically changing the politics of federal judge-picking as well -- and that victory was something of a surprise, even to them. As of Wednesday afternoon, Democrat James Webb had claimed victory in the Virginia Senate race over incumbent Sen. George Allen, but a recount that could take several weeks appeared likely. If Webb is indeed the winner, Democrats will have a 51-49 edge. … 'There just wasn't a firm sense this would happen,' says a senior Democratic staffer. 'It could have been as few as two pickups,' the staffer adds, referring to previously Republican seats won by Democrats. 'But six was at the high end.'" The Times continues, "The Democratic Senate victory, assuming it holds, could also have profound implications for the next Supreme Court pick, if 86-year-old Justice John Paul Stevens dies or resigns, or another justice resigns or falls ill, during the last two years of the Bush administration. .. 'The biggest thing [about the Democratic takeover] is judges,' notes David Hoppe, former chief of staff to Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss. 'Everything else has a way of working itself out,' adds Hoppe, now a lobbyist at Quinn Gillespie & Associates." The Times notes, "By midday Wednesday, Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats had already plunged into discussions over the agenda they planned to carry out in their expected majority status. … If they are indeed the majority, then when the 110th Congress begins in January, the Senate Judiciary Committee will be led by Vermont's Patrick Leahy, a 32-year veteran who had previously chaired the committee for 18 months, from mid-2001 until just after the 2002 elections, after the departure of Vermont's James Jeffords from the Republican Party."

Murtha, Hoyer Line Up Support For Majority Leader Post. Roll Call (11/9, Yachnin, Bresnahan) reports that as Rep. Nancy Pelosi "pledged Wednesday to rule the House fairly in the 110th Congress as the first-ever female Speaker, a handful of senior Democrats moved aggressively to secure other leadership posts in their nascent majority." One of the "architects of that victory — Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) — remained mum about his plans despite speculation that he could run for Majority Whip." Current Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) "was not similarly hesitant, formally announcing his bid for the Majority Leader's office early Wednesday morning and confidently predicting that he will secure the post when Democrats vote in leadership election on Nov. 16." But Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) — "who stunned fellow lawmakers when he announced in June that he would campaign for the Majority Leader post against Hoyer — re-affirmed his own interest in the office Wednesday." In addition to "the Majority Leader competition, Democrats could see a contest for control of the third-ranking post of Majority Whip. Although House Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (D-S.C.) remained the only active candidate for the post Wednesday evening it is possible that Emanuel, who has said he will not serve a second term as DCCC chairman, will make a bid for the office."

Hoyer discussed his bid on MSNBC's Hardball (11/8), saying, "I think I'm going to win the race. … I think my colleagues will be supporting me for the work that we've done in the past with Nancy Pelosi, who will be our next speaker, creating the kind of unity and consensus within our party that has led us to be the most unified we've been in a half a century. So I'm very confident." Host Chris Matthews later said, "I think Murtha could be a difficult challenger, but you seem to have the numbers now."

New Line-Up Of Committee Chairmen Noted. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A4, Mullins, 2.04M) reports, "Some in line to become chairmen have suggested that, even if they can't pass legislation that Mr. Bush would sign into law, they would use the power of the gavel to conduct oversight hearings and investigations into the administration and some of its corporate allies." In the Senate, "Pat Leahy of Vermont would take over the Judiciary Committee; Hawaii's Dan

DOJ_NMG_0092452

Inouye would take the reins of the Commerce Committee; Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts would inherit the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee; and Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico would run the Energy and Natural Resources panel." Rep. Barney Frank, "expected to take over the Financial Services Committee, will focus attention on affordable housing and predatory lending. But Mr. Frank also hopes to enact new regulations on government-sponsored enterprises, such as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, that were endorsed by the current chairman, Mike Oxley (R., Ohio)." Rep. Henry Waxman, "who will run the Government Reform Committee plans to probe oil-company prices, government contracting in Iraq and massive growth in homeland-security expenditures." The Journal adds, "Others assuming committee chairmanships in the House include Michigan's John Conyers at the Judiciary Committee; California's George Miller at the Education and Workforce Committee; and Wisconsin's David Obey at the Appropriations Committee."

The Financial Times (11/9, Yeager) reports Democrats yesterday "tried to deflect attention from the liberal records of those set to ascend to top jobs in Congress, vowing to work with Republicans. 'We extend a hand of co-operation to the president, our colleagues across the aisle,' said Rahm Emanuel, the Chicago Democrat who led the party's campaign committee. 'We'll work with you when we agree, we will challenge you when we don't. But our goal will always be the best interests of our country.'"

USA Today (11/9, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "One of the few openly gay House members, the Harvard-educated Frank is a liberal on social issues. He advocates tougher regulation in areas than current Chairman Michael Oxley, R-Ohio, but insists he's not anti-business. Frank's goal is to ensure that economic benefits are better distributed. … Among Frank's priorities: expanding affordable housing, enhancing consumer privacy rights and going after predatory mortgage lending."

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A4, Fialka, 2.04M) reports that Dingell, "who has long had a reputation as a partisan investigative bulldog, is in the unusual position of cautioning younger Democrats to resist the impulse to seek revenge on their Republican colleagues. 'Revenge makes you feel good,' says Mr. Dingell, the Michigan Democrat who, at 80 years old, is the most seasoned member of the committee chairmen taking control in the House. 'It ain't the right way to go, but it's going to cause me some problems.'" Dingell "says he plans to run his panel 'from the center' and work out a formula for comity that allows Republicans to participate in the panel's decisions and investigations." But "he and other Democrats who want to reach out to Republicans to avoid gridlock may encounter some resistance from younger Democrats, half of whom have never served in a House controlled by Democrats."

Angry Conservatives Blame GOP Leadership For Losses. McClatchy (11/9, Thomma) reports, "Republicans turned on one another Wednesday after losing control of power in Congress -- blaming an out-of-touch, self-promoting party leadership for abandoning ethics and conservative principles and turning off the country." Conservative strategist Richard A. Viguerie "was especially caustic. 'Every single member of the Republican leadership in the House should be replaced. They have failed the conservatives who put them in office, and they have failed the people of this country,' Viguerie said. … 'I feel liberated,' said conservative radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh, one of the party's biggest cheerleaders. 'I no longer am going to have to carry water for people who I don't think deserve having their water carried.'" In "one of the most stinging indictments, David Keene, the longtime president of the American Conservative Union -- the nation's oldest grass-roots conservative lobby, founded in 1964 -- ripped Republicans for spending more taxpayer money than Democrats had and for weak ethics." Keene "joined Rep. Eric Cantor, R-Va., in urging House Republicans to postpone their leadership elections until January. Cantor is a member of the existing House Republican leadership as chief deputy whip." The Washington Post (11/9, D1, Kurtz, 690K) runs a similar story under the headline "Conservative Talkers, Feeling Just a Little Blue."

USA Today (11/9, Bazar, 2.27M), in a story headlined "GOP Starts To Play The 'Blame Game' Over Its Big Losses," notes Limbaugh's comment, as well as former majority leader Tom DeLay's contention that "Republicans had failed to fight for their core beliefs on such issues as tax reform and immigration." Dick Armey, "former House majority leader and an architect of the Republicans' 1994 takeover of Congress, told National Public Radio's Diane Rehm that the GOP had become the big government party. 'They actually grew the government,' he said." Dick Armey also writes in the Wall Street Journal this morning (11/9, A14), "It was a rout. … One big issue in exit polls suggests widespread voter backlash against the 'culture of corruption.' There is something to this, I think. Over time, too many Republicans in the governing majority forgot or abandoned their national vision, letting parochial interests dominate the decision-making process."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/9, Chaddock, 59K) reports "GOP self-critics say that the bad environment -- scandals, war, the economy, or the president -- doesn't account for this historic GOP defeat. The need, they say, is to get back to the principles that won them their majority in 1994. Call it a bridge to the insurgent past."

A couple of opinion pieces by conservatives offered a more benign reading of the election, and what it means for Republicans. Jonah Goldberg, who is editor at large of

DOJ_NMG_0092453

National Review Online, writes in USA Today (11/9, 2.27M) reports, "Don't let the spin fool you: These elections were neither a repudiation of conservative values nor an endorsement of the Democratic Party." The GOP "got thrown out of office because it got fat and lazy and because Democrats -- with the help of a transmission-belt media -- convinced a lot of voters that they could simply change the channel on the war by voting for 'change.'"

George Will, in Washington Post (11/9, 690K), also offered an optimistic assessment of the future of conservatism, listing "three reasons for conservatives to temper their despondency. First, they were punished not for pursuing but for forgetting conservatism. Second, they admire market rationality, and the political market has worked. Third, on various important fronts, conservatism continued its advance Tuesday. … The country remains receptive to conservatism. That doctrine -- were it to become constraining on, rather than merely avowed by, congressional Republicans -- can be their bridge back from the wilderness."

Hastert Won't Seek Minority Leader Post. The CBS Evening News (11/8, story 9, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With the Democrats soon to be the majority in the House, who will lead the Republican minority? The top Republican, Speaker Dennis Hastert, under fire in the Foley page scandal, said today he doesn't want the job." The AP (11/9, Espo) says Hastert's decision "cleared the way for a likely succession battle among lawmakers who face the sudden loss of power after a dozen years in the majority. Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, currently the majority leader, is expected to run for leader, and Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana announced during the day he also will seek the post. Joe Barton of Texas has signaled he may join the field."

USA Today (11/9, Kiely, 2.27M) reports, "Nine races remained too close to call," but "Rep. Deborah Pryce, an Ohio Republican, was in one of them. Pryce, the only female member of the House GOP leadership team, told colleagues in a letter that she would also give up her leadership post even if she wins re-election."

With Santorum Defeated, Alexander Confident Of Winning Senate Minority Whip Post. The AP (11/9, French) reports Sen. Lamar Alexander "said today he's confident his Republican colleagues will select him to be GOP whip, the party's No. 2 leadership position in the Senate." Alexander said he's "close to a majority and 'working on a consensus' to win the post now that his closest rival, Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, lost his re-election bid." Alexander "for months has been meeting with Senate Republicans in hopes they will select him to be the GOP whip. The current whip, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, is expected to succeed Sen. Bill Frist as GOP leader."

Democratic House Majority Could Continue To Grow. Roll Call (11/9, Whittington) reports Democrats "claimed a comfortable House majority in Tuesday's midterm elections and appear poised to also capture control of the Senate pending a final vote tally in Virginia, as voters across the country voiced widespread frustration with President Bush and the Republican Party's leadership." In the House, Democrats "picked up a minimum of 28 seats, with the potential for at least one more gain pending final vote confirmation or recounts. In the Senate, Democratic challengers defeated Sens. Rick Santorum (Pa.), Mike DeWine (Ohio), Jim Talent (Mo.) and Lincoln Chafee (R.I.)." Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) "narrowly trailed state Senate President Jon Tester (D) into the wee hours Wednesday morning and the race was called for Tester by mid-day, although Burns has yet to concede." But even "as the official Senate outcome and several House races remained up in the air and recount teams were being deployed Wednesday morning, strategists in both parties already were shifting their focus to the 2008 landscape and assessing how sustainable the new Democratic majorities might be." National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) "conceded that the seats held by GOP Reps. Anne Northup (Ky.) and Jim Leach (Iowa) — two of the biggest upsets Tuesday — would be all but impossible to return to the GOP fold. Leach had held his seat for 15 terms." Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) "carried both districts in the 2004 presidential contest, and he also won the districts held by defeated Reps. Clay Shaw (Fla.), Curt Weldon (Pa.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.) and Charles Bass (N.H.)." But Reynolds "also sounded confident that his party would be able to recapture some of the GOP-friendly territory lost in 2006. He held out the seats of Reps. John Sweeney (N.Y.) and Jim Ryun (Kan.), both of whom were defeated on Tuesday, as prime pickup opportunities in 2008." Democrats, however, "likened their strong performance in the Democratic-friendly Northeast to the political realignment that occurred in the GOP tidal wave of 1994, when Democrats lost a disproportionate number of seats in the South — most of which they have not since reclaimed."

Ronald Brownstein writes in the Los Angeles Times (11/9, 850K), "The rolling realignment of US politics accelerated Tuesday, as Democrats strengthened their hold over the Northeast and opened new beachheads in the Midwest and Mountain West that could prove critical to their hopes of winning the White House two years from now. These and other political changes, illuminated by the 2006 election like a late-night flash of lightning, could signal a new stage in the competition between the two major parties." For Democrats, "the watchword Tuesday was growth: the party expanded its reach with key groups of swing voters as it made notable advancements on previously GOP-leaning terrain." The results "sent Republicans a message of retrenchment: the Democratic surge reversed President Bush's gains in the 2004 vote among women and Hispanic voters and saw the GOP virtually obliterated across the Northeast and mid-Atlantic."

DOJ_NMG_0092454

Close Races May Mean Recounts In Half Dozen Districts. Roll Call (11/9, Murray, Drucker) reports, "Election Day may stretch well in to mid-November or beyond, as a bumper crop of midterm nail-biters mean that state elections officials may re-tally the vote in perhaps a half dozen or more House races." As of Wednesday afternoon, Carl Forti, "spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said the GOP was keeping a watchful eye on races involving incumbents Reps. Rob Simmons (Conn.), Robin Hayes (N.C.), Barbara Cubin (Wyo,), Heather Wilson (N.M.) and J.D. Hayworth (Ariz.) — and GOP House campaign leadership hinted that the list may not be fixed." Roll Call adds that by "late Wednesday, Democrat Joe Courtney's narrow lead over Simmons appeared to trip a Connecticut state law requiring recounts. With 100 percent of precincts reporting, the total vote in Connecticut's 2nd district had Courtney besting the three-term incumbent by less than 200 votes." In addition "to those races flagged by the GOP, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spokesman Bill Burton said Democrats were keeping tabs on Franklin County Commissioner Mary Jo Kilroy's (D) attempt to oust the House GOP's fourth-ranking Member, Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio). Burton also said Democrats were concerned about alleged voting irregularities in Florida's 13th district, where automobile dealer Vern Buchanan (R) narrowly defeated banker Christine Jennings (D) in the race to replace Rep. Katherine Harris (R)."

Biden Says At Meetings, Bush Tells Cheney To "Shut Up" Or "Something To That Effect." Sen. Joseph Biden said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/8, Matthews), "One thing about this President, in my meetings with he and [Vice President] Cheney, there's no question who the boss is. He, the President, is the boss. … He'll just say, 'Shut up, Dick,' or something to that effect. … Here's what this President does: He delegates full authority and walks away. … He decided that Cheney was the guy, that he was the smartest guy to do this, and now I think he's decided Cheney ain't working. And so what he's saying is 'Dick, I'm changing. I'm the boss. Here's what we're doing.'"

Rep. Jack Murtha said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/8, Matthews), "I've felt for a long time that the Vice President doesn't have the influence that he had before."

Bush To Meet With Big Three Executives. The AP (11/9) reports President Bush's "long-promised meeting with the heads of Detroit's Big Three automakers will be held Tuesday at the White House." The auto executives "tentatively were scheduled to meet with Bush in May, but in September, the meeting was pushed back until after the election." The delay "prompted criticism from Michigan's Gov. Jennifer Granholm and other Democrats who said the administration had neglected the problems of the Big Three automakers and its workers."

Bush To Examine Bill To Give DC House Voting Rights. The Washington Post (11/9, B1, Woodlee, 690K) reports President Bush said "he will review a bill to give District residents full voting rights in the House, marking the first time he has spoken about a measure that local lawmakers are trying to win approval for over the next few weeks." The bill, "introduced six months ago, also would add a congressional seat for Utah. Proponents of D.C. voting rights have waged a major push to get the bill passed this year." Bush said, "It's the first I've heard of it. I didn't know that's going to come up from the lame duck." The Post adds, "Bush's comments come a week after prominent D.C. politicians and business leaders met to determine how they can get the bill passed this year."

OTHER NEWS:

Bush Says Election Was A "Thumping." In a press conference yesterday, President Bush said that although the midterm elections were close on a race-by-race basis, overall they represented a "thumping." Bush's "thumping" quote was broadcast in all three network newscasts, and appears on the front-page headlines of several major newspapers. Bush also took his share of responsibility for the GOP loss, and reached out to Democrats. USA Today (11/9, Jackson, 2.27M) reports Bush "began rebooting his agenda on Wednesday, ticking off a revised list of priorities that include education, an immigration overhaul and maybe even an increase in the minimum wage." Bush "pledged to 'work through our differences' with incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi and other Democratic leaders. He said that includes the conduct of the Iraq war. … To jump-start the final two years of his presidency, Bush said he would draw on his experience as governor of Texas, where he developed a reputation for working well with Democrats who controlled the Legislature on such issues as raising education standards and toughening penalties for juvenile crimes." Bush "said there may be some 'common ground' on a Democratic proposal to increase the minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 as long as there is 'compensation' for small business owners. … Bush also expressed hope for a more 'comprehensive' immigration bill that includes expanded employment opportunities for temporary 'guest workers.'" USA Today adds, "Among other agenda items Bush cited: an extension of his signature No Child Left Behind education law, promoting alternatives to oil and dealing with unfunded liabilities in entitlement programs, including Social Security"

DOJ_NMG_0092455

The Christian Science Monitor (11/9, Feldmann, Grier, 59K) reports, "The tectonic plates of Washington power have shifted, presenting both…Bush and the new Democratic majority in Congress with an opportunity to work together and leave behind the politics of confrontation. … The reality, analysts say, is that the next two years are likely to offer a blend of confrontation and common ground. The Democrats…don't want their hard-fought majority to vanish in the next election. The incentive for Bush, entering the final two years of his presidency, is to leave his party in a position to compete effectively in 2008." He "can take a page from his earlier days as governor of Texas, when he gained a reputation for working well with Democrats."

Media reports describe the President with terms such as "contrite" and "humble," and several newspaper stories and opinion pieces focus their election analyses on Bush's low popularity ratings. The Los Angeles Times (11/9, McManus, 850K), for example, says Bush's "effort to secure his legacy was encumbered by two inflexible factors: the loss of a once-supportive congressional majority and the weight of an unpopular war. … What lies ahead, Bush's remarks suggested, might be a presidency open to compromise on domestic legislation but committed to its basic strategy in Iraq and the war on terrorism -- one-half Austin, Texas, one-half Sept. 11." Robert Novak, in a syndicated column appearing in the Washington Post (11/9, 690K), writes "only gerrymandered House districts prevented a landslide that would have given the Democrats a House majority of historic proportions, approaching 50 seats." The reaction from losing "candidates was anger at…Bush and his political team. That includes a rising GOP undercurrent against Iraq policy. The unpleasant truth is that Republicans lost almost everywhere the president campaigned during the past week." Also in the Washington Post (11/9, 690K), David Broder notes "a few days before the election, Bernadette Budde, political director of BIPAC, the Republican-friendly Business Industry Political Action Committee, was quoted here as warning of the imminence of what she correctly predicted would be 'an earthquake.' The only people who seemed oblivious to the warning signs were…Bush and his political adviser, Karl Rove." The Republican Party "paid a heavy price for Bush and Rove's obduracy -- and for the miserable performance of the GOP congressional leadership."

Stuart Rothenberg, in Roll Call (11/9), says Bush, "of course, is the biggest loser" in this election "in a number of ways. He loses at least one chamber, and he is the reason Republicans took a bath on Tuesday. He may console himself by believing that he has the right policy in Iraq and history will judge him kindly." But "his performance in office has destroyed a number of noteworthy political careers, and he would be wise to never forget that."

David Brooks, in the New York Times (11/9, 1.16M), writes that "on Tuesday the muscular middle took control of America. Say goodbye to the era of Rovian base mobilization. Say goodbye to the era of conservative dominance that began in 1980."

Dana Milbank, in his "Washington Sketch" column for the Washington Post (11/9, A2, 690K), says "Rove will have to surrender his 'genius' credentials after the GOP lost the House and apparently the Senate. But the recriminations weren't stopping at Rove's door. The president…went on to blame everybody else. He blamed corruption. … He blamed Mark Foley, whose name remained on the Florida ballot. … He blamed ballot rules. … He blamed bad luck: 'If you look at race by race, it was close.' … And, not least, he blamed the uncomprehending voters: 'I thought when it was all said and done, the American people would understand the importance of taxes and the importance of security. But the people have spoken, and now it's time for us to move on.'" Milbank adds, "The president's performance fit neatly into yesterday's version of the post-election ritual in Washington: The winning side gloated, and the losing side pointed fingers every which way."

On NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 5, 9.87M), Tim Russert said of the election results, "Some are saying it is typical of what happens in the midterm election. Bill Clinton gained five House seats in his second midterm, Ronald regular an lost a handful. This was much bigger than that. Where the White House is correct is war is hard on President's war parties. In the civil war, world war one, world war ii, Korea and Vietnam, the average loss to a party in an election year at war was 37 House seats and seven Senate seats. That's what we saw last night. People anxious about the war."

The Washington Post (11/9, A1, Balz, 690K) describes Bush as "politically humbled." The Post adds Bush and Rove's political model ""has often elevated policies and tactics designed to energize conservative activists over an appeal to what many GOP strategists saw as a shrinking middle of the electorate. But on Tuesday, the center struck back, voting decisively for Democratic candidates in House races." The President "responded with a renewed call for bipartisan cooperation."

ABC World News (11/8, lead story, 2:50, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported "the President seemed almost contrite about the impact this war had on the voters." Bush: "I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made there. It's very important that the people understand the consequences of failure." Bush "summed up what happened with one phrase." Bush was shown saying, "It was a thumping." NBC Nightly News (11/8, lead story, 4:00, Gregory, 9.87M) said, "The President appeared humble, admitting he heard the voter's message on Iraq." The CBS Evening News (11/8, lead story, 3:00, Axelrod, 7.66M) said "Bush didn't duck the drubbing in yesterday's election." He "was conflicted. Losing…had him extending his hand to Democrats." Bush was shown saying, "I understand when campaigns end and I know when governing begins and I'm going to work with the people of both parties." But "in the next breath, he was dug in as ever about the war in Iraq." Bush: "If the goal is success, we can work together. If the goal is get out now regardless, that's going to be hard to work together."

DOJ_NMG_0092456

The Los Angeles Times (11/9, Hook, 850K) headlines its story "Bush Bows To Election Day 'Thumping' From Democrats," and says "the ritual of post-election fence-mending began early Wednesday morning, when Bush began dialing congressional leaders, including Democratic chieftains he only rarely consulted while they were in the minority." NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 4, 0:50, Williams, 9.87M) also noted the President said yesterday he plans to meet with the Democratic leadership. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A1, 2.04M) says that when Bush and Pelosi "meet for lunch at the White House today, Mr. Bush and his party will come to the table significantly weakened, and Mrs. Pelosi's Democrats considerably strengthened." The Washington Post (11/9, 690K) run an editorial titled "The 'Thumping' of the GOP," in which it urged Bush and the Democrats to move on to the business of governing. If Democrats don't "stop using…issues as political footballs…they won't deserve to remain in the majority."

The Washington Times (11/9, Curl, 88K) says a "contrite" Bush said "he shares 'a large part' of the responsibility for the 'thumping' suffered by Republicans on Election Day." The AP (11/9, Riechmann, Raum) quotes Bush saying, "I thought we were going to do fine yesterday, shows what I know."

The Washington Times (11/9, Dinan, 88K), in a story titled "Bush Eyes Democrats For Help On Amnesty," says "Republican opponents" of Bush's immigration reform plan "predicted a bloody intraparty fight but said they cannot stop such a bill from passing."

The Chicago Tribune (11/9, Zuckman, 617K) says "the historic midterm election provided a sharp rebuke to Bush and his policies."

White House Handling Of Violence Upsurge In Iraq Seen As Key To Election Results. The New York Times (11/9, Nagourney, Rutenberg, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports the two weeks after President Bush's weeklong commemoration of September 11 were critical to the midterm election results: "The political world had turned, propelled by new bursts of violence in Iraq, new questions about incompetence in the waging of the war in Iraq, and an intelligence report suggesting that the American invasion had actually worsened the terrorist threat." As Republicans and Democrats "reviewed the outcome of a midterm election yesterday that upended political power in Washington, they pointed to this span of time as the most critical period of the campaign. Aides on both sides said that, as much as anything this year, the parties' contrasting reactions to the renewed violence in Iraq accounted for the breadth of a Democratic victory that cost Republicans close to 30 seats in the House and, it appears, control of the Senate." From October on, "in stump speeches and television advertisements, the Democrats moved the war front and center. Republican candidates began to avoid the issue. Yet to the increasing distress of Republican Party strategists, the White House appeared to play into Democratic hands, as Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney continued to offer arguments for victory."

Frum Offers Advice To Bush. David Frum, a former Bush speechwriter, writes in the Wall Street Journal (11/9, A14, 2.04M) that "the administration seems to have exhausted its energy. Frustrated by Iraq, wounded by Katrina, thwarted in its two most recent major domestic initiatives (Social Security and immigration), the administration looks baffled, uncertain and often strangely passive." But Bush "can yet regain the initiative." Bush "should prepare to bombard Congress and the media with new ideas and proposals that rally his own party, divide his opponents and drive a wedge between left-wing Democrats and the voting public. So long as he is acting, he forces Congress to react. … At home, the administration should seek less to pass legislation -- although legislative success is always welcome -- than to clarify the differences between the parties for 2008. For instance: The president talked vaguely in 2005 of a grand new tax reform, but never gave enough detail to interest anybody in his ideas. What he had in mind, of course, was a shift away from taxing work, savings and investment toward taxing consumption. Good idea, but awfully abstract. The next Congress offers an opportunity to make it clear what this reform means."

More Commentary On Election Results. Bill Safire, writing in the New York Times (11/9, 1.16M) under the headline "After The Thumping," says that "despite the pervasive weariness with the war and the high tide of irritation at Bush's steadfastness; despite the general disgust at the policy paralysis and ethical laxity in the wake of muscle-bound one-party control — the result was only the average loss of House and Senate seats of the party in power midway in the second term of a president." Safire adds, "A political shakeup every dozen years is a necessary cathartic for the two-party system. What's more, the rightward cast of many Democrats in the freshman class is hardly bad news for conservativism. And the heartening victory of Joe Lieberman over the angry far left in liberal Connecticut augurs a renewal of a brief period of bipartisanship at the water's edge. … So cheer up, my fellow right-wingers, especially those of you who have grown too accustomed to winning every election night. Sometimes we have to suffer a loud, corrective slap before readying the political counterpunch."

DOJ_NMG_0092457

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/9, 2.04M) laments that the GOP gave "so much ammunition" to Democrats: "By our count, at least eight GOP House seats fell largely due to scandal; campaign-finance ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff probably cost Conrad Burns his Senate seat in Montana. These columns have spent several years warning Republicans that their overspending, corrupt 'earmarks' and policy drift would undermine their claim as the party of reform. On Tuesday they did."

In an editorial, the New York Times (11/9, 1.16M) calls the election "a satisfying expression of the basic democratic principle of accountability. A government that performs badly is supposed to be punished by the electorate. And this government has performed badly on so many counts." The Times adds that "while they are trying to build a new majority, the Democrats need to remember what happens when a party in power loses its way."

Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (11/9, Kondracke), "The 2006 election results were a rebuke not just to President Bush and Congressional Republicans but to radio talk-show hosts and other right-wing polarizers."

DeWayne Wickham writes in USA Today (11/9, 2.27M), "In the days leading up to the midterm elections, the president sounded a dire warning. The nation would face 'innumerable obstacles to steady progress' if Democrats wrested control of Congress from Republicans, he said in a speech to supporters. But when the votes were counted the American electorate didn't heed his words, and the president quickly tried to position himself as a healer, not a divider. … If none of this sounds familiar to you, that's understandable. The president I'm talking about is Dwight D. Eisenhower, not George W. Bush. And the midterm elections were in 1954, not the ones held two days ago." Wickham adds, "Many lessons can be learned from the drubbing that Republicans took at the polls this week. But none is more compelling than this: Americans don't want the fate of this nation to rest solely in the hands of George W. Bush and the Republican Party he leads."

E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (11/9, 690K), "American voters, in their wisdom, ended an era on Tuesday. They rejected a poorly conceived war policy in Iraq that has weakened the United States. They rejected a harshly ideological approach to politics that cast opponents as enemies of the country's survival. They rejected a president so determined to win an election that he was willing to slander his opponents by saying: 'The Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses.'" The voters "decided there was no decency in that."

Democratic Lobbyists Eager To Share Spoils Of Victory. Roll Call (11/9, Newmyer) reports Democratic lobbyists, "flush with the excitement of a victorious Election Day, already are looking to share in the spoils." The Democratic "rout of Republican rule in Congress also spelled a definitive end of years of GOP dominance of K Street. Jubilant Democratic lobbyists spent the day after the elections basking in their glow, but also beginning to ponder a new order that restores them to relevance." Veteran Democratic lobbyist Chuck Brain said, "It's started. Within a couple days, it will be full-fledged, with companies asking, 'What are we doing?' and 'Can we still represent our interests?'" Roll Call adds companies will "have some adjusting to do, lobbyists from both parties agreed. Many have spent the better part of a decade responding to a Republican pressure campaign to hire more Republican lobbyists and to direct more of their campaign contributions back to the GOP." But the "movers behind that effort were pushed off the stage during this Congress, when former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) was forced to resign and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) fell short in his re-election bid." Several Democratic lobbyists "agreed that the program, dubbed the K Street Project, created an inertia that now will benefit their ranks, as corporate offices seek to ramp up contacts with the new party in control. But even so, many Democratic K Streeters were careful to say their party — which made lobbying and ethics a major campaign issue this year — will not seek to impose its own similar effort to help that process along."

The Washington Post (11/9, A27, Sarasohn, 690K) reports as "former House member Gerry Sikorski (D-Minn.), now head of the government practice at Holland & Knight, put it, some of his fellow Democratic lobbyists have a nice 'jump to their step' today after the Democratic takeover of the House. But then, he said, everyone must get down to the fact that 'it's a bipartisan process largely.'" The Post adds, "No one seems to be echoing the bipartisan-lobbying mantra more than the business community, which, while not monolithically Republican, tended to support more Republicans than Democrats, not leaving it with such great credentials with the new Democratic leadership in the House." Indeed, "today, Harold McGraw III, chairman of the Business Roundtable and chief executive of McGraw-Hill Cos., is talking to the Wharton School of Business on "The Real World Is Neither Red Nor Blue" and laying out the group's agenda for Congress." BRT is "also taking out newspaper ads today on the theme, one of which is a photo of former presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton with the line: 'If they can put aside their differences after an election, so can you.'"

AP Declares Webb Victor, Allen Reportedly To Concede. The AP (11/9, Sidoti, Lewis) reports Democrats "wrested control of the Senate from Republicans Wednesday with an upset victory in Virginia, giving the party complete domination of Capitol Hill for the first time since 1994." Jim Webb's "squeaker win over incumbent Sen. George Allen gave Democrats their 51st seat in the Senate, an astonishing turnabout at the hands of voters unhappy with Republican scandal and unabated violence in Iraq. Allen was the sixth Republican incumbent senator defeated in Tuesday's elections." The new AP count "showed Webb with 1,172,538 votes and Allen with 1,165,302, a difference of 7,236. Virginia has had two statewide vote recounts in modern history, but both resulted in vote changes of no more than a few hundred votes."

DOJ_NMG_0092458

The Washington Times/UPI (11/9) reports Sen. Allen "reportedly plans to concede, as news organizations late Thursday projected Democrat Jim Webb has won their Senate contest." Sources "within the Allen campaign told CNN Wednesday that Allen might concede Thursday because a Wednesday canvas of votes suggested there was little chance that a recount would change the outcome."

The Washington Post (11/9, A28, 690K) says in an editorial, "Barring some significant error or surprise, Mr. Webb will be the state's next junior senator."

ABC World News (11/8, story 4, 2:30, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "No one has called for a recount. That cannot happen until the election has been certified about 2 1/2 weeks from now. Starting today, a canvas, with lawyers from both sides watching every precinct retabulating their ballots. That should be completed in the next three to four days." Ed Gillespie, George Allen campaign advisor: "Votes may shift. You may be asking Mr. Webb if he'll be seeking a recount." Tapper: "But election experts have doubts."

The CBS Evening News (11/8, story 6, 0:15, Pitts, 7.66M) reported, "Poll watchers and lawyers from both campaigns stood by as election officials throughout the state reviewed vote totals, a process that will take at least two weeks. Under Virginia law, a candidate who finishes 1 percentage point or less behind can request a recount. A decision the Allen campaign will make after votes are certified November 27." Ed Gillespie, George Allen's campaign manager: "When you're operating in a margin of 0.3%, there's reason for hope those shifts could go our way." Pitts: "But Virginia political science professor Robert Holsworth says a bitter legal fight could damage Allen over the long term." Robert Holsworth, Virginia Commonwealth University: "I think what George Allen is going to have choose is whether he wants to have a political future in Virginia in another election or whether he's going to roll all the dice on this election."

The Washington Times (11/9, Hurt, 88K) reports Democratic electoral gains "grew yesterday to 29 House seats, with 10 other races still in doubt. On the Senate side, they claimed victory yesterday in the last three states needed to take their gains to six seats. Missouri Sen. Jim Talent conceded defeat to Democrat Claire McCaskill this morning." Montana Republican Sen. Conrad Burns "did not throw in the towel despite trailing Jon Tester in the final unofficial tally. Virginia Sen. George Allen was close enough to Democrat James H. Webb Jr. that he could demand a recount. But several news organizations, including the Associated Press, called the two races for the Democrats."

The Washington Post (11/9, Shear, Rein, 690K) reports Webb "claimed the title of senator-elect Wednesday and began organizing his congressional staff, while Republican incumbent George Allen declined to concede but was described as 'realistic' about the outcome if he seeks a recount challenging Webb's thin lead." Allen "dispatched teams of lawyers and operatives across Virginia in search of the votes he would need to win. Early in the day, Allen did not appear ready to relinquish his claim to an office he once saw as a springboard to the White House." But Webb "continued to lead by approximately 7,300 votes with virtually all of Virginia's 2.3 million ballots counted Wednesday evening, and Republicans said there appeared to be little hope that glitches or math errors might uncover new GOP votes." GOP strategist Ed Gillespie "said Allen was 'realistic,' and an e-mail sent late Wednesday said the senator would make a statement 'at the conclusion' of the statewide canvass of votes."

USA Today (11/8, Hall, Parker, 2.27M) reports Webb "laid claim to a Virginia Senate seat Wednesday, but" Allen "refused to yield as elections workers across the state double-checked returns in a razor-close election." The Associated Press "declared Webb the winner late Wednesday after canvassing elections officials statewide. That result would leave Democrats with control of the Senate — and therefore the entire Congress. If Allen prevailed in a vote challenge, the houses would be split between the parties." In a "page from President Bush's political playbook from the contested 2000 election, Webb took steps to try to seize victory before it had been officially declared. Early in the day Wednesday he named three members of his transition team, and his campaign headquarters staff started referring to him as 'Senator-elect.'"

The New York Times (11/8, Broder, Urbina, 1.16M) reports Allen's advisers "said Wednesday night that he would do nothing until a canvass of ballots was completed. But Democrats — ecstatic at the prospect that they might have swept both houses of Congress — were not waiting." Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer said, "It is virtually 100 percent that Webb is going to win the race. I think you can say without any hesitancy or doubt that Democrats are going to be the majority party in the Senate."

Independent Green Candidate Offered To Endorse Candidate Who Backed Railway Plan. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A1, Kronholz, Schatz, 2.04M) reports Independent Green Party of Virginia candidate Gail Paker

DOJ_NMG_0092459

two weeks ago "offered to swing her support in the Virginia Senate race to either the Democratic or Republican candidate. In return, she wanted them to back her pet issue: high-speed rail across the traffic-clogged state." But "neither man was much interested in her offer, she says. Now it looks like her 'Gail for Rail' campaign could have been a factor in deciding which party controls the U.S. Senate." Parker "collected about 26,000 votes -- which could have given either Republican Sen. George Allen or Democratic challenger Jim Webb a decisive victory."

Midterm Elections Scramble 2008 Candidacies. USA Today (11/9, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports the elections "transformed not only Congress but the playing field for the 2008 presidential race. Some contenders self-destructed, one went home and a meteor streaked onto the radar in the form of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama. There were two things, however, that didn't change: the contenders leading the polls on both sides." Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., "won a resounding re-election victory after raising nearly $40 million — more than any other Senate candidate this year. She isn't yet talking about her future, which is widely presumed to include a presidential bid but could involve a leadership role in a possibly Democratic Senate." The Republican front-runner, Arizona Sen. John McCain, "campaigned and raised money for candidates nationwide while also building a network for his White House bid. Though supportive of President Bush on Iraq, his disagreements with Bush about immigration policy, prisoner abuse and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's performance kept his maverick image alive." While former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani "also does well in polls and barnstormed the country, 'right now it's hard to see another Republican who has similar stature' to McCain," according to University of Iowa professor Peverill Squire. A "lesser known Democratic hopeful, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, is forming a presidential campaign committee today, the Des Moines Register reported, making him first into the race on either side." But Republican Sen. George Allen, who had "laid foundations for a national campaign now faces political oblivion." Another politician "who pushed the self-destruct button: Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry."

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, A1, Cummings, 2.04M) reports McCain "proved more popular on the stump with his party's candidates than President Bush did -- newly-elected Republican Gov. Charlie Crist skipped a last-minute rally in Florida with the president to tour that state with the Arizona lawmaker." But his "advocacy for continuing the Iraq campaign -- and perhaps sending in more troops -- sharply conflicts with the antiwar message sent by voters this week." Sen. Clinton "was also a popular fundraiser on the campaign stump, and she transferred millions of dollars from her bulging campaign account to candidates and party committees to help the Democratic team." Pat Toomey of the Club for Growth views McCain as "insufficiently reliable," and said his "wing of the party is still reviewing the record of Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who also impressed party activists with his midterm campaigning. They remain skeptical that a law adopted on Mr. Romney's watch penalizing businesses that don't provide health-care coverage will meet their standards." To "fill those holes, social conservatives began taking another look at Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, both of whom would have to drastically ratchet up their presidential-campaign machinery to become competitive. On the fiscal side, activists may try to recruit South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford, who was re-elected on Tuesday and hails from a state in the party's early primary lineup." The "election fallout also could encourage a long-shot candidate such as former House Speaker Newt Gingrich to jump into the race. On the flip side, the diminished influence of the religious right on the midterms could buoy the camp of moderate former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, another sought-after personality this cycle." The Democrats "also are without a high-profile antiwar candidate who could harness the activist and voter support for that position evident in the campaigns. North Carolina's John Edwards could be best positioned to do that."

Patrick To Become Nation's Second-Ever Black Governor. ABC World News (11/8, story 8, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Massachusetts Democrat, Deval Patrick, became the second black person ever to be elected governor of any state. He is now the new governor of Massachusetts."

Minnesota Elects Nation's First Muslim Congressman. ABC World News (11/8, story 9, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "And the first Muslim Congressman will arrive on Capitol Hill for Minnesota. Keith Ellison, will represent a district who is predominantly Christian."

Stock Markets Make Gains. NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 11, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Dow was up just under 20 points [to close at 12,176.54]. NASDAQ gained nine points [to close at 2,384.94] on today's trading.

The Wall Street Journal (11/9, C1, Richardson, 2.04M) reports the Dow "rallied to a record close following the news of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation. Stocks initially traded lower -- particularly health-care-related shares -- as investors weighed the impact and remaining uncertainty surrounding the results of the midterm elections. But the momentum reversed to the upside after the first headlines about the resignation of Mr. Rumsfeld, who has come in for criticism for his handling of the war in Iraq; after a pause, stocks rose again after President Bush's subsequent news conference discussing the election and pledging to work with the new Congress." The S&P 500 "edged up 2.88 points, or

DOJ_NMG_0092460

0.2%, to 1385.72, up 11% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 9.06 points, or 0.4%, to 2384.94, up 8.1% this year."

USA Today (11/9, Shell, 2.27M) reports the "rallying cry on Wall Street after the Democrats' power grab is that political gridlock caused by divided government is good for financial markets." Stock market action Wednesday "supported that line of thinking. In the first day of trading after the Democrats regained control of at least one branch of Congress, the Dow Jones industrial average rose 20 points and finished with a record closing high of 12,176.54." But "some Wall Street economists and investment strategists contend that two years of potential legislative inertia might not be the best thing for financial markets in the long run. In a report titled 'Wrong Time for Gridlock,' for example, Stephen Roach, chief economist at Morgan Stanley, says the U.S. can't afford not to tackle pressing economic concerns, the major one being the bulging budget deficit."

McCain Resigns From Board Of Gallaudet Over Ouster Of Incoming President. The New York Times/AP (11/9) reports Sen. John McCain has resigned from the board of trustees of Gallaudet University, the world's premier university for the deaf, after disagreeing with its decision to revoke the appointment of its incoming president, a university spokeswoman said." The chairwoman "of the Gallaudet University board, Brenda Jo Brueggemann, has also resigned, the spokeswoman, Mercy Coogan, said." Mr. McCain "wrote to outgoing President I. King Jordan on Monday, describing the board's decision as unfair, Ms. Coogan said."

WPost Praises Ford's Call For More Civil Political Campaigns. The Washington Post (11/9, A28, 690K) reports that it is "too bad that Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr.'s concession speech in his failed Democratic bid for the U.S. Senate came at an hour when most people had gone to bed. Not only was he gracious, but Mr. Ford delivered an important plea for a bettering of the American political process: 'What people want more than anything, and what I heard and I know candidates all around the country heard . . . [was] a hunger, and they sensed a great appetite on the part of the American people for something much better and far more dignified and greater than what we'd given them.'" Ford "knows firsthand -- to use his phrase -- how 'demeaning and debasing' politics can be, having been the target of a scurrilous ad in which a suggestively dressed white woman is seen coming on to him. Mr. Ford is black. Unfortunately, that ad was not an aberration but rather an embodiment of the seedy standards that infected this political year."

Russia Rejects Proposed UN Sanctions On Iran. The AP (11/9, Meyer) reports Russia has "rejected European-proposed UN sanctions aimed at forcing Iran to halt its suspected nuclear weapons drive, but Moscow appears to be applying its own pressure by threatening to delay a key nuclear power project. Analysts say the Kremlin is determined not to push Iran into a corner like North Korea -- blaming tough US policies for Pyongyang's recent nuclear test -- but Tehran's refusal to compromise has led to growing impatience in Moscow despite the two countries' close commercial ties."

Separately, the AP (11/9, Jahn) reports Russia has "crossed out large sections of a UN Security Council draft proposing broad US-backed sanctions on Tehran's nuclear and missile programs," citing a document the news agency obtained Wednesday. The AP says Moscow has "delete[d] any reference to Iran's Bushehr nuclear plant, which Russia is helping build." UN diplomats "said the Kremlin wanted no mention whatsoever of Bushehr. That stance was meant to reflect Russia's view that the plant should not be linked to international concerns that Tehran might be trying to develop nuclear arms."

After Shelling Kills 18 In Gaza, Hamas Vows Retaliation Against US, Israel. NBC Nightly News (11/8, story 10, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, In the Middle East the leader of Hamas says the truce with Israel is over after 18 members of one family, including eight children were killed in an Israeli artillery attack in a crowded neighborhood on the Gaza strip during a military campaign aimed to stop rocket attacks. Israel's prime minister apologized for the deaths of innocent civilians." ABC World News (11/8, story 12, 0:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that the Israeli army said it "had missed its intended target by 500 yards. Tonight, the militant group Hamas ended its two-year truce with Israel, called for attacks against the US, and demanded revenge for this suffering."

In a front page article, the New York Times (11/9, A1, Fisher, Erlanger, 1.16M) calls the attacks "one of the largest single losses of life in Gaza in years" and notes that "some Hamas leaders called for a suicide-bombing retaliation inside Israel and, unusually, for the United States to be taught 'hard lessons' as well." Israeli leaders "expressed regret" for the incident and Defense Minister Amir Peretz "ordered a halt to artillery attacks" in Gaza. However, "After largely observing a unilateral truce that it declared a year and a half ago, Hamas called for renewed suicide bombings." The group's military wing also said in a statement that the US should be taught "hard lessons" for supporting Israel. The Times says the threat, "though vague, was an unusual escalation for Hamas…that has pointedly portrayed its fight as being against Israel alone." Meanwhile, "leaders at the United Nations and the European Union, and in Russia, Britain and Italy, did condemn the incident" and NSC spokesman Gordon Johndroe "called for restraint by all parties," adding: "We deeply regret the injuries and loss of life in Gaza today. We have seen the Israeli government's apology and hope their investigation will be completed quickly." A "similar statement was "issued in President Bush's name," the Times notes.

DOJ_NMG_0092461

The Washington Post (11/9, A3, Wilson, 690K) notes that the inquiry into the attack "will be led by Maj. Gen. Meir Kalifi, deputy chief of ground forces, who headed the June investigation into an explosion on a Gaza beach that killed six" Palestinians. Kalifi "concluded that Israel was not responsible for the blast, although a Human Rights Watch investigator said the explosion most likely came from a fired artillery shell." And in a statement, Israel's military said that "the responsibility for any civilian casualties lies with the terrorist organizations" firing rockets toward Israel.

The Financial Times (11/9, Morris) adds, "Israel's leading human rights organization," B'tselem, has "demanded a criminal investigation" into the shelling, saying it "was gravely concerned that the action constituted a war crime." The Times notes that "whatever the outcome of the investigation, the incident prompted fresh questions about Israel's military tactics in Gaza where hundreds of people, including 96 children, have died this year while the number of Israeli civilian casualties of Palestinian attacks has dwindled to a handful. Israeli tanks had ostensibly been targeting areas used by militants to fire rockets into southern Israel."

The AP (11/9, Hadid) notes that the UNSC "scheduled an open meeting Thursday at the Palestinians request. Palestinian UN observer Riyad Mansour said Palestinians want a resolution that condemns recent Israeli attacks and calls for an Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, a cease-fire, and deployment of UN observers." Meanwhile, McClatchy (11/9, Nissenbaum) says the attack "briefly united Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, who set aside their differences over the formation of a new unity government to visit survivors of the attack."

Reid Calls Bush's India Nuke Deal A Priority. Bloomberg (11/9, Mathewson, Johnston) reports Senator Harry Reid said completion of President George W. Bush's nuclear agreement with India is "a priority during an anticipated post-election legislative session." Speaking to reporters in Washington, Reid said, "India is the largest democracy in the world. We want to work with them, and this is important we move along that line." At the White House, President Bush said securing congressional approval for the accord is "also high on his agenda." Bloomberg says the deal is "a major initiative of Bush's foreign policy" and "passage in the lame-duck session would be a win for nuclear-industry suppliers."

UN Urges US To End Cuba Embargo. The AP (11/9, Lederer) reports the UN General Assembly voted "overwhelmingly Wednesday to urge the United States to end its 45-year-old trade embargo against Cuba after defeating an amendment calling on Fidel Castro's government to free political prisoners and respect human rights." The AP notes that it was "the 15th straight year" the body approved a resolution calling for an end to the embargo "as soon as possible." After the vote, US deputy ambassador Ronald Godard "said that to claim the embargo adversely affects the Cuban people ignores 'the truth' that the Cuban government has systematically denied 'the human, economic, labor and political rights of its people over 47 years.'"

US Seeks To Establish "Positive Relations" With Ortega. The AP (11/9, Gedda) reports the State Department "said Wednesday that it looks to establish 'positive relations' with the Nicaraguan government of President-elect Daniel Ortega." Spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos said cooperation with Ortega will be "based on their action in support of Nicaragua's democratic future." On Tuesday, State Dept. spokesman Sean McCormack "suggested that Ortega may have a stake in maintaining good relations with the United States. He noted that Nicaragua is part of a US-Central American free trade agreement. In addition, he said the United States has a $175 million program aimed at rural development in a northeastern Nicaraguan region sprinkled with strong pro-Sandinista sentiment."

Chavez Leads "Global Chorus" Of Bush Critics In Democrats' Victory. The Washington Times (11/9, Sands, 88K) reports Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez yesterday "led a global chorus of Bush administration critics gloating over the outcome of Tuesday's midterm elections, but some foreign leaders expressed concern over what the Democratic victory will mean on issues such as global trade and the Middle East." The Time says "Latin American populists, European leftists and Islamic fundamentalists were all quick to point to the US vote as a repudiation of Mr. Bush's aggressive, go-it-alone approach on Iraq and the global war on terror." The resignation of Secretary Rumsfeld also "sparked praise from leaders of countries from the heart of what Mr. Rumsfeld once memorably dismissed as 'Old Europe.'"

Venezuela Groups Get US Aid Amid Meddling Charges. The New York Times (11/9, Romero, 1.16M) reports, "Since President Hugo Chávez returned to power after a brief coup in 2002, the United States has channeled millions of dollars to Venezuelan organizations, many of them critical of his government. This aid has become a key issue in the presidential election next month amid claims of American interference in the domestic political system." Although American diplomats in the country "have remained largely quiet in commenting on the election," the Times says the United States Agency for International Development "has distributed about $25 million to various Venezuelan organizations over the last five years, according to officials involved in the projects."

DOJ_NMG_0092462

Immigration Expected To Dominate Calderon, Bush Talks. The Washington Post (11/9, A18, Boustany, 690K) reports that at a White House meeting with President Bush today, Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon is "expected to express Mexico's disappointment with the decision by the outgoing Republican-controlled House and Senate to approve a 700-mile fence along the Mexican-American border." However, during a meeting yesterday with Washington Post reporters and editors, Calderon said yesterday that Democratic gains in Congress could lead to "room for improvement" in US-Mexican relations, "a suggestion that headway may be made on immigration and other bilateral issues." Calderon also said that the North American Free Trade Agreement "had been a boon for Mexico but that more needed to be done to make the economy more competitive."

The Washington Times (11/9, Dinan, 88K) says the "hottest topic" of today's meeting is "likely to be immigration, and Mr. Bush's signature two weeks ago" authorizing the border fence. Calderon criticized the fence yesterday in a meeting with Hispanic groups, saying he sees "the US-Mexico border not covered in walls and barbed wire, but as an area of opportunity and prosperity for Mexicans and Americans both." Meanwhile, a White House official said having the meeting before Calderon's Dec. 1 inauguration "reflects the importance we attach to continued strong ties with our hemispheric partner and neighbor."

Similarly, the Christian Science Monitor (11/9, Llana, 59K) says the subject of the fence "could overshadow other issues" at today's meeting, noting that immigration "was not among the main issues on the original agenda for Thursday's meeting." However, Bush's move to authorize the fence "underscored the Fox administration's failure to help Mexicans working illegally in the US and appears to have forced his successor to make it a priority," the Monitor writes.

The AP (11/9, Gedda) notes that during his address Wednesday Calderon "made clear...his unhappiness" with the fence, saying the two countries need "bridges for progress and not walls that isolate and divide."

EU Issues Warning To Turkey Over Bid. The Financial Times (11/9, Dombey, Parker, Boland) reports the EU Wednesday gave Turkey "a month to rescue its bid…as Brussels sought to allay public concerns that the EU is expanding too far and too fast. In response, Ankara said it was up to the 25-nation bloc to keep the negotiations alive." However, the issue is "set to come to a head at an EU summit next month. But Olli Rehn, EU enlargement commissioner, held out hope that the looming 'train wreck' over Turkey's membership could yet be averted." Officials said that Brussels "would probably set out the likely penalties for Turkey in early to mid-December, ahead of the EU summit. But Mr. Rehn's staff fears that if the EU takes too tough a stance with Ankara, either the talks will prove impossible to revive or Turkey will choose to walk away."

The New York Times (11/9, A5, Bilefsky, Kanter, 1.16M) calls the EU statement "its strongest warning yet to Turkey to open its ports to Cyprus and make more progress on human rights or face a possible suspension of talks." But a poll published Tuesday by the International Strategic Research Organization "showed that two-thirds of Turks would rather suspend membership talks with the European Union than give ground over Cyprus."

WHO Nominates Chinese Disease Expert As New Director. The Wall Street Journal (11/9, B7, McKay, 2.04M) reports the World Health Organization Wednesday nominated Chinese infectious-diseases expert Margaret Chan to lead the United Nations health agency, "underscoring China's rising prominence and mounting pressure on the Chinese government to improve its cooperation on global health crises such as avian flu." The "landslide victory" over four other finalists "assures her of a 5½-year term as the next director-general of the agency. The Journal notes that China "campaigned hard" for Dr. Chan in a push led by Vice Premier Wu Yi and President Hu Jintao. The move was "unusual because the five permanent-member countries of the UN's Security Council "traditionally haven't backed candidates to lead WHO," it notes.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Democrats Close In On Senate."
"With Bonds Approved, The Line For Billions Forms."
"Senate On Verge Of New Agenda."
"A New Bush? Yes And No."
"L.A. Tycoons Join Bidding For Tribune."
"Election Shows State's True Colors: Pastel."

USA Today:
"Nomination Offers 'Fresh Perspective' On Iraq."

New York Times:
"Rumsfeld Resigns; Bush Vows 'To Find Common Ground'; Focus Is On Virginia."

DOJ_NMG_0092463

"With Control Of The Senate In The Balance, All Eyes Turn to Virginia."
"Democrats Turned War Into An Ally."
"New Democrats Pose Challenge."
"Robert Gates, A Cautious Player From A Past Bush Team."
"Nancy Pelosi Is Ready To Be Voice Of The Majority."
"Israeli Shelling Kills 18 Gazans; Anger Boils Up."

Washington Post:
"Bush Ousts Embattled Rumsfeld; Democrats Near Control of Senate."
"A Meek Departure From the War Cabinet."
"House Majority Offers An Ambitious Agenda."
"For Bush's New Direction, Cooperation Is The Challenge."
"Governor And U.S. Senate Losses Just The Tip Of State GOP Collapse."
"Webb's Small Lead Holds Up In Virginia

Washington Times:
"Democrats Claim Senate Control."
"Bush Accepts Role In Losses."
"Bush Eyes Democrats For Help."
"Rumsfeld Resigns Under Pressure."
"Iraqi's See No Shift In U.S. Support."
"Ehrlich Steele Concede Defeat."
"Snubby Blacks In PG Sink Steele."

Detroit Free Press:
"Faces Of Chance."
"Who Is Nancy Pelosi?"
"Legal Assault Begins On Affirmative Action Ban."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Political Aftershock."

Houston Chronicle:
"A&M gates To replace Rumsfeld."
"A Unifying Tone After Shift In Congress."
"Chance To lead War Top love Of School."
"He Calls Move 'A Good Things For Everybody'."
"A Long Day's Journey To Victory."
"Warning For GOP In Harris County."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Rumsfeld Is Leaving New Defense Secretary; Election 2006 Results; Virginia Senate Race; Senate Analysis; Same Sex Marriage; Abortion Not Banned; New Black Governor; First Muslim Congressman; New Speaker; Abortion Case; Violence-Gaza Strip; Pakistan Violence; Election Mistake.
CBS: Rumsfeld Is Leaving; New Defense Secretary Analysis; New Defense Secretary-Military Response; Rumsfeld Analysis; New Defense Secretary-Pelosi's Reaction; Virginia Senate Race; Election Results; Pelosi Interview; Hastert-Minority Leader Position; Rumsfeld's Legacy.
NBC: Rumsfeld Is Leaving; Rumsfeld's Legacy; New Defense Secretary-Military Reaction; Election Results; Election Results Analysis; Pelosi Interview; Abortion Case; Flood Waters; Pakistan Violence; Gaza Strip Violence; Stock Market; Democratic Sweep.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: AP-Webb Victory in VA; Bush-Meeting With House Democrats; Howard Dean-No Plans For Immediate Iraq Departure; Rumsfeld Resignation; Robert Gates-Bush's Choice To Replace Rumsfeld; San Francisco 49ers Moving To Suburbs; Stock Market Reaction To Elections; Federline-Spears Divorce; TX-State Representative's Assault Claim.
CBS: AP-Webb Victory in VA; Robert Gates-Bush's Choice To Replace Rumsfeld; US Troops in Iraq-Reaction To Rumsfeld's Resignation; Sen. Warner-Hoping To Confirm Gates By End Of Year; Tom Vilsack To Enter 2008 Presidential Race; Atkin's Diet Study; MA-Gay Marriage; Stock Markets
NPR: AP-Webb Victory in VA; Rumsfeld Resignation; Pelosi, Bush Meeting; CA-Sex Offender Proposition 83 Blocked By Judge; Tokyo Stock Market; Wall Street; Microsoft's Windows Vista Announcement; NATO Confrontation With Afghan Insurgents.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in the presentation of the 2006 National Medals of Arts and the National Humanities Medals, Oval Office; meets with the Cabinet; meets with President-elect Felipe Calderon of Mexico.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for the introduction of bills.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 2 p.m. Meets for pro forma session.

Other: MEXICAN PRESIDENT-ELECT FELIPE CALDERON _ Highlights: 1:15 p.m. Meets with President Bush. White House.

WAR-ELECTIONS _ 10 a.m. - 10 p.m. Anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan leads a protest against the war in Iraq and possibly against election results. Location: Lafayette Park.

HEALTH CARE _ Two-day meeting of the Consumer-Centric Healthcare Congress. Highlights: 9:30 a.m. Adam Bosworth, VP, Google. Location: L'Enfant Plaza Hotel, 480 L'Enfant Plaza, SW.

US-EU _ The 2nd U.S.-EU Economic Ministerial will be held. Highlights: 1:45 p.m. Energy Secretary Bodman meets with the ministers to discuss energy security issues. Closed press. Location: Blair House.

DOJ_NMG_0092464

ELECTIONS-HEALTH CARE _ The Employers Council on Flexible Compensation and member companies hold a two-day conference in which leaders from the benefits field will provide their immediate reaction to the 2006 elections and their impact on health care issues for employers and employees and strategies for 2007. Highlights: 2:30 p.m. Session on ``What do Elections Mean for Health Care Issues?'' with John Castellani, President, Business Roundtable; Helen Darling, President, National Business Group on Health; Dr. Jeremy Mayer, George Mason University. Carnegie Institute of Washington, 16th and P Sts. NW.

VETERANS CONFERENCE _ The American Veterans Center's holds its Ninth Annual Conference. The event includes three full days of speakers devoted to each era from World War II through today; wreath laying ceremonies at the World War II, Korea and Vietnam War memorials; and evening receptions. Highlights: Location: Hyatt Regency-Crystal City, 2799 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington, Va.

ELECTION ANALYSIS _ 8 a.m. - 4:30 p.m. Congressional Quarterly and the Public Affairs Council hold a day-long briefing to provide analysis of the midterm elections. Location: Ronald Reagan Building, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

POLITICS-ARAB WORLD _ 9:30 a.m. - 1 p.m. The U.S. Institute of Peace hosts an event, ``Political Oppositions in the Arab World: A New Path?'' Participants include: Daniel Brumberg, Overview Special Adviser, Muslim World Initiative; Dina Shehata, Egypt Department of Government, Georgetown University; Maryam Montague, Morocco Democracy and Governance Specialist, Management Systems International; and Janine Clark, Jordan Associate Professor, University of Guelph. Location: U.S. Institute of Peace, 2nd Floor Conference Room, 1200 17th St. NW.

ELECTION-MIDEAST _ 9 a.m. The Middle East Institute holds a panel discussion on the Tuesday elections, with Joshua Muravchik of AEI, Mara Rudman of the Center for American Progress and p 1/8ollster James Zogby. Location: MEI, 1761 N St. NW.

VETERANS COMMISSION _ 9 a.m. Commission on the Future for America's Veterans holds its first meeting to discuss baseline issues report. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

VETERANS BENEFITS _ 9:30 a.m. AMVETS holds a news conference to release recommendations on reforming and modernizing the veterans' benefit system. Location: National Press Club.

DISABILITY REPORT _ 10 a.m. The National Council on Disability holds a media availability to release its annual ``National Disability Policy: A Progress Report.'' Location: Suite 850, 1331 F St. NW.

POST-ELECTION FORUM _ 10 a.m. - 12 p.m. NDN, the political action arm of the New Democrat movement, holds a post election forum with Pete Brodnitz, pollster and advisor to Senate candidates Jim Webb and Harold Ford; Tom Matzzie, Washington director for Moveon.org; Tom Schaller, professor, Univ. of Maryland, author, ``Whistling Past Dixie''; Maria Cardona, senior advisor, NDN's Hispanic Strategy Center; and others. Location: Phoenix Park Hotel, 525 New Jersey Ave., N.W.

MILLENNIUM CHALLENGE _ 10:30 a.m. Millennium Challenge Corp. Deputy Chief Executive officer Rodney Bent holds a meeting to discuss actions from Wednesday's board meting, followed by a panel to update the selection of eligible countries for FY07. Location: Millennium Challenge Corp. offices, 875 15th St. NW.

FAMILIES-IRAQ _ 11 a.m. The Military Families Speak Out organization holds a news conference to call for an end to the ``back door draft'' and for all troops to be brought home. Location: News conference at the LBJ Memorial Grove parking lot near the pentagon, off the GW Parkway. March will then be to the Pentagon to deliver petitions to Secretary Rumsfeld.

ELECTION REAX _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute holds a forum on the results of the 2006 election, with John Samples of the institute, Michael McDonald of Brookings Institution, others. Location: 1000 Masschusetts Ave. NW.

ELECTION-BLACK VOTE _ 12 p.m. The National Coalition on Black Civic Participation Unity '06 Coalition holds a briefing on the impact of the black vote on the election. Highlights: 12 p.m. Panel discussion on what happened. 1:30 p.m. Panel discussion on the future. Location: National Press Club.

NEW CONGRESS-ETHICS _ 12 p.m. News conference by Campaign Legal Center, Common Cause, Democracy 21, League of Women Voters, Public Citizen and US PIRG to call for immediate lobbying and ethics reforms in the new Congress. Location: National Press Club.

AEI-MIDTERMS _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute's Election Watch series hosts an assessment of the 2006 midterm elections by AEIs political team. Participants are AEI's Karlyn H. Bowman; John C. Fortier; Norman J. Ornstein; and James K. Glassman. Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, Twelfth Floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

HEALTH CARE _ 12:15 p.m. The Alliance for Health Reform and the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation hold a briefing on the role of long-term care in the broader health insurance picture. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

POST-ELECTION ANALYSIS _ 12:15 p.m. Catholic University's Department of Politics hosts a post-election discussion. Location: Catholic Univeristy, Life Cycle Institute Auditorium, 620 Michigan Ave. NE.

MIDEAST _ 12:30 p.m. The New America Foundation holds a discussion with Yossi Beilin, member of the Israeli

DOJ_NMG_0092465

Knesset, on the Mideast peace prospects. Location: 7th floor, 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

ELECTION-POLL _ 1 p.m. Campaign for America's Future co-director Robert Borosage and Democratic pollster Stan Greenberg release a new post-election poll. Location: National Press Club.

ELECTION-RELIGION _ 1 p.m. The American Humanist Association holds a new conference to launch the Appignani Humanist Legal Center with the announcement of its first case, a lawsuit addressing a church-state separation violation that will be the product of a mid-term ballot initiative. Location: National Press Club.

MORIAL-ELECTIONS _ 2:30 p.m. Marc H. Morial, president and CEO National Urban League, holds a post election press briefing. Location: National Press Club, National Press Building, Holeman Lounge.

CHINA-MIDEAST-IRAN _ 3:30 p.m. Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty hold a briefing with John Calabrese of American University on Chinese-Mideast relations and Iran. Location: 4th floor conference room, 1201 Connecticut Ave. NW.

EDUCATION _ 3:30 p.m. Deputy Secretary of Education Raymond Simon and Senior Policy Advisor in the Office of Elementary and Secondary Education Catherine Freeman hold a telephone conference to brief reporters on the updated status of the growth model pilot program. Notes: Call in number: 888-913-9969. Passcode: GROWTH.

US-INDONESIA _ 4 p.m.Ambassador of Indonesia to the U.S. Sudjadnan Parnohadiningrat addresses a National Press Club afternoon newsmaker. Topic: ``The U.S.-Indonesia Relationship: Bulding a Partnership Between Two Large Democracies." Location: National Press Club, Lisagor Room.

RUBIN _ 7 p.m. Former Labor Secretary Robert Rubin speaks to the Economic Club of Washington's dinner meeting on the U.S. economy. Location: Ritz-Carlton Hotel, 1150 22nd St. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0092466

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Thursday, November 09, 2006 11:16 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Battaglia, John T; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gunn, Currie (SMO); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McDonald, Esther Slater; McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John (USAEO); O'Quinn, John C; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Shaw, Aloma A; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 11/9/06 Civil Division News

High court hears cases on ban of abortion method; The justices are to decide whether to uphold a 'partial-birth' prohibition passed by Congress in 2003.

Lawyers Prep for American Indians' Suit

Government will increase use of False Claims Act to combat health fraud

Settlement ends case vs. school

Census taker's tactics lead to federal lawsuit By Bruce Finley

Los Angeles Times

November 9, 2006

High court hears cases on ban of abortion method; The justices are to decide whether to uphold a 'partial-birth' prohibition passed by Congress in 2003.

By David G. Savage
Times Staff Writer

WASHINGTON — A Bush administration lawyer urged the Supreme Court on Wednesday to uphold the nation's first criminal ban on an abortion method, saying so-called partial-birth abortions are "too close to infanticide" and not a medical necessity.

Safe alternatives are always available, U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement said in defending a law passed by Congress in 2003.

But two abortion-rights advocates argued that the ban, if put into effect, would unwisely limit the options of doctors who perform abortions in the second trimester and would expose some pregnant women to more dangerous surgery.

These doctors believe that the procedure medically known as dilation and extraction, or D&X — in which the fetus is removed intact — "reduces the risk of serious complications," including bleeding and infection in the uterus, said Priscilla Smith, a lawyer for the Center for Reproductive Rights in New York.

"What Congress has done here is take away from women the option of what may be the safest procedure for her," said Eve Gartner, a lawyer for the Planned Parenthood Federation of America.

The case could prove a turning point for the Supreme Court on abortion. With the arrival of President Bush's two conservative appointees, there appears to be a five-vote majority, including Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, to uphold stricter regulation of abortion.

Six years ago when the court struck down a Nebraska ban on the practice, Kennedy wrote an impassioned dissent, describing D&X as "abhorrent."

Abortion-rights advocates hope he will switch sides. But Wednesday, Kennedy suggested that the disputed procedure might be "purely elective and not medically necessary."

New Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. said nothing. But he and Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. have been counted as likely to uphold the federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act.

The measure, a proud achievement of Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress, coincidentally came before the court the day after its prime sponsor Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) went down to defeat and the GOP lost control of Congress.

Most of the two-hour argument Wednesday was about the scope of the law, which would ban a procedure used only after the 16th week of pregnancy. Critics call it "partial-birth" abortion because doctors extract the living fetus partway from the uterus, then collapse its skull before pulling the fetus the rest of the way out.

Minimizing the law's impact, Clement described D&X as a "very aberrant, atypical procedure" and said a ban would affect "a very small minority of second-trimester abortions."

Most such abortions use "dilation and evacuation," or D&E, in which the fetus is dismembered in the uterus before it is removed.

Moreover, a doctor who planned to remove the fetus intact could "induce fetal demise at the outset" — injecting it with a drug to stop its heart — without violating the law, Clement said, because the fetus would emerge dead.

Some medical experts, however, say such injections pose too great a risk of exposing the woman to a deadly chemical.

Even if the law is upheld, Clement said, doctors can go to court and ask for an exception that "focuses on particular medical conditions" that call for the D&X procedure.

Several liberal justices objected during the argument to talk of "infanticide." They stressed that most second-trimester abortions involved fetuses that could not live on their own.

Some "are only 4 or 5 inches long. They are very different from fully formed babies," Justice John Paul Stevens said.

"So anything about infanticide, babies, all that, is just beside the point because what this bans is a method of abortion," added Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

Clement refused to back down. Congress was interested in "maintaining a bright line between abortion and infanticide," he said.

Once a fetus emerged alive from the uterus, if it were killed, "I think we'd call that murder," he added.

The two lawyers arguing against the law sought to portray its reach as broad. They stressed that the ban does not use medical terms, such as D&X or D&E.

It could "place doctors at risk of prosecution" for D&E abortions if they removed a large part of the fetus, said Gartner, Planned Parenthood's lawyer. Rather than banning only one procedure, the law could ban the most common second-trimester procedure, she said.

Roberts disagreed. What counts is the doctor's intent, he said. A doctor who intends to do a D&E "wouldn't be covered by this law," he said.

Roberts conceded the D&X procedure might have "a marginal impact on safety" for patients, but he questioned whether that should be enough to strike down the entire law.

Smith replied that medical experts said the issue went well beyond marginal benefits.

"The reduction in risk is significant," she said, saying the D&X method "reduces the risk of serious complications, such as uterine perforation, which … lead to hysterectomies and infertility."

After Congress passed the law, judges in San Francisco, New York and Omaha barred it from taking effect. The Supreme Court heard the government's appeal in two cases Wednesday and will issue a ruling in several months.

END

AP

November 9, 2006

Lawyers Prep for American Indians' Suit

By JAMES MacPHERSON Associated Press Writer

BISMARCK, N.D.-Attorneys for American Indian farmers and ranchers are gathering information and witnesses for a discrimination case against the federal government.

Attorneys planned to meet Thursday near Fort Yates near the South Dakota state line to collect data for the lawsuit, which was filed in 1999. The lawsuit alleges the U.S. Department of Agriculture discriminated against native Americans in the granting of loans beginning in 1981.

"This is an information-gathering trip - we want to reach out to people in South Dakota about the case," said Joe Sellers, lead attorney for the American Indians.

Sellers, said his Washington, D.C.-based firm will gather up to 100 Indian ranchers and farmers to serve as witnesses at trial. He said about 50 have been found so far, mostly in North Dakota, Montana and Oklahoma.

The meeting near Fort Yates targets Indian producers from South Dakota who believe they have been discriminated against by the USDA, Sellers said.

The lawsuit was granted class-action status in 2001. It alleges the USDA denied or delayed loans, or did not approve enough money to keep farms afloat financially.

The case, Keepseagle vs. Johanns, formerly Veneman, refers to Fort Yates rancher George Keepseagle and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns. Ann Veneman was agriculture secretary when the lawsuit was filed.

Attorneys estimate the number of Indian plaintiffs could be in the tens of thousands. A settlement figure has not been calculated, but would likely be in the "hundreds of millions," Sellers said.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan said at a hearing in September that he believes Indian farmers and ranchers are entitled to a trial. The case mirrors a separate civil rights case brought by black farmers in 1997, and settled two years later.

Sellers said he and USDA lawyers have been meeting with a magistrate to resolve some of their differences and decide on a trial date, but no decision has been made.

USDA officials have not responded to questions about the allegations.

END

CCH® Medicare

11/9/06

Government will increase use of False Claims Act to combat health fraud

The federal False Claims Act (FCA) is the primary government weapon in combating health care fraud since it covers a broad range of activities and includes huge penalties and settlement potential, according to John Brennan, a Partner at Crowell & Moring LLP. He spoke at a Crowell & Moring seminar on October 26-27, 2006 in Washington, D.C.

Since 1986, $17 billion has been recovered under the FCA, including $12.4 billion in HHS-related cases alone. In 2004, 80 percent of all FCA recoveries were via whistleblower cases, he noted. "Whistleblower cases are rising exponentially," he said.

False claims prosecutions will “follow the money,” said Brennan, adding that prosecutions will increasingly involve Part D participants, the pharmaceutical product marketplace, medical device manufacturers, and fiscal intermediaries and carriers.

Contractor immunity decreasing. The scope of FCA immunity for Medicare contractors may be narrowing, said Brennan, who discussed recent case law. Prior to the Medicare Modernization Act of 2003, which eliminated the absolute immunity defense prospectively, immunity was available only in the "absence of gross negligence or intent to defraud the United States." But court cases have held that the 1965 Medicare Act did not preclude absolute immunity for contractors. No immunity is available now in situations where an intermediary or carrier acted with "reckless disregard or with intent to defraud the government," he said. Moreover, the government has agreed that qualified immunity was not intended to be applied retroactively to pre-MMA matters.

In U.S. ex rel., Parikh v. Premera Blue Cross (see ¶301,913), a program auditor, Parikh, alleged that his employer, a Part A fiscal intermediary, sought payment for services not rendered. DOJ did not intervene. Premera filed a motion to dismiss, saying it had "full pre-MMA immunity" based on prior case interpretations. The court found Congress' statutory language in MMA 2003, which provides only qualified immunity, indicative of its original Medicare Act intent and denied the motion to dismiss. "The door may now be open for pre-MMA false claims actions against contractors who acted with 'reckless disregard' or with 'intent to defraud' the government," Brennan said.

END

Tri-Town News (Howell, NJ)

Settlement ends case vs. school

Lakewood Cheder School, a New Jersey nonprofit corporation that operates a children's school in Lakewood, has agreed to pay the federal government more than $1.2 million to settle allegations that it submitted false certifications for payment under the National School Lunch Program, U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie announced.

The settlement resolves allegations against Lakewood Cheder School for violations of the False Claims Act, which permits recovery of triple the amount of damages to the government plus penalties, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Rudolph A. Filko, deputy chief of the Civil Division of the U.S. Attorney's Office.

"This is an abuse of government funds that takes money away from other children who are truly in need and deserving of these resources," said Christie. "It is wrong, and we will continue to look for such misappropriations and recoup that money so that it can serve the intended recipients."

According to the settlement agreement, between 1996 and 2000, Lakewood Cheder School submitted false information and statements to the U.S. Depart-ment of Agriculture through the state of New Jersey, Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Child Nutrition.

The false information resulted in excessive payments to Lakewood Cheder School under the National School Lunch Program. Specifically, it was alleged that Lakewood Cheder School submitted claims for school lunches that were served at about 90 private residences which were ineligible and unapproved school sites under the program.

Under terms of the settlement, Lakewood Cheder School does not admit liability.

More than 1,100 preschool age children were claimed by Lakewood Cheder School to have received the lunches at the ineligible and unapproved sites. In this way, the school obtained an increased payment of $953,421 under the National School Lunch Program to which it was not entitled. The settlement amount is $1,295,549.

Christie credited special agents from the U.S. Department of Agriculture, Office of Inspector General, under the direction of Special Agent-in-Charge for Investigations Brian L. Haaser, and auditors from the U.S. Attorney's Office Affirmative Civil Enforcement Unit, with investigating the case.

The case was handled by Assistant U.S. Attorney Rudolph A. Filko, deputy chief of the Civil Division.

END

Denver Post

November 9, 2006

Census taker's tactics lead to federal lawsuit By Bruce Finley

Denver Post Staff Writer

A Colorado man who claims an overzealous U.S. census worker hit him with her vehicle after hounding him to complete a population survey took his case to federal court Wednesday.

In a civil lawsuit filed Wednesday against the government, Thomas Martinez claims former census worker Susan Dyck's tactics included peering through windows at his rental duplex in Wheat Ridge. Dyck at one point "misrepresented herself as a potential renter" and made late-night phone calls "attempting to convince him to complete a census inquiry," the lawsuit said.

On Feb. 14, 2005, Martinez confronted Dyck and told her he'd call police, according to the lawsuit. Then "in the process of attempting to flee," Dyck backed her vehicle into Martinez, the lawsuit said.

Dyck, in an interview, described her behavior as entirely within the scope of her duties as a census worker.

"The lawsuit is entirely without merit," she said.

Census officials recently rejected Martinez's claims. A Jefferson County jury last year acquitted Dyck on criminal charges.

Now federal attorneys "are in the process of reviewing the allegations," said Jeff Dorschner, spokesman for the U.S. attorney.

Dyck worked as a census field representative, dispatched with a laptop computer to gather data. The lawsuit accuses the government of negligence and seeks unspecified damages.

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, November 13, 2006 8:13 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Monday, November 13, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061113.pdf; dojclips061113.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Lawyers To Argue Ressam Sentence Before Appeals Court (AP)....3

War News:

Democrats To Press For Phased Withdrawal From Iraq (LAT)....4
Democrats Push For Troop Cuts Within Months (NYT)....6
Bush And Democrats Square Up Over Iraq (FT)....7
Democrats To Propose Iraq Pullout (WT)....8
Senators Push For Timetable For Withdrawal From Iraq (USAT)....10
Democrats' Challenge: Stay In The Center (NSWK)....10
We Won! Now What The Heck Do We Do? (USNEWS)....13
The Peril Of Opportunity (USNEWS)....13
"We Have To Start From A Level Of Trust" (TIME)....14
Lieberman A Wild Card In Iraq Policy (WP)....15
Bush Must Call For Reinforcements In Iraq (FT)....17
Iraq Is Gone. Now What? (WP)....18
Oh, The Humanities! (WP)....19
Iraqi Prime Minister Promises Government Shake-Up (NYT)19
Iraq Prime Minister Plans Big Reshuffle (FT)....21
Blasts Kill Dozens Of Iraqi Police Recruits (WP)....21
Iraqi Leader Scolds Parliament, Promises Change (LAT)....23
Iraqi Leader, Feeling Pressure, Promises To Remake Cabinet (USAT)....24
Iraqi Prime Minister Pledges To Reform Cabinet (LAT)....25
Al-Maliki Vows Cabinet Shake-up (WT/AP)....26
Influence Rises But Base Frays For Iraqi Cleric (NYT)....27
Cleric Al-Sadr May Hold Iraq's Future In His Hands (USAT)..29
Iraq's Secret Death Chambers (TIME)....31
Violence In Iraq Claims At Least 159 (AP)....33
For Iraqis, News Is A Deadly Business (CSM)....35
Shi'ite Fanatic Rises In Iraq To Fill Void Left By Zarqawi (WT)....36
Dalai Lama Wants Saddam Spared (AFP-Y)....37
Insurgent Activity Rising In Afghanistan (AP)....37
Afghan Army Could Help Unify A Nation (LAT)....38
U.S. Pressed To Go Beyond Military Action (WT)....42

Corporate Scandals:

KB Home CEO Resigns Over Backdated Options (WSJ)....43
Convicted Executives Forced To Sell Homes (USAT)....45

Criminal Law:

Nigeria Bribery Case Heats Up Again (HC)....47
Witness Against Murder Inc. Gang Gets Freedom (WT)....49
Identity Thief Is Often Found In Family Photo (NYT)....51
Staving Off Modern-day Pirates (LAT)....53
Authorities Discredit Latest "sighting" Of James "Whitey" Bulger (BOS)....55
Was That Whitey Departing The Departed? (BOSH)....56
Police Believe Slaying At Md. FedEx Site Was Random (WP)56
Petty Disputes Spur Most D.C. Killings (WT)....57
Va. State Police Swap '10-4' For 'Message Understood' (WP)58

Civil Law:

Partial-Birth Replay (WP)....60

Civil Rights:

Sex Predators TV Show Raises Rights Issues (LAW)....60
A New Way To Sue (WSJ)....62

Antitrust:

Are Private Buyouts Good For The Economy? (CSM)....62

Environment:

Inside The Beltway (WT)....64

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Satellite Gear Aided In Finding Arellano (SDUT)....65
Accused Drug Dealer Reaches Plea Agreement After Laced Heroin Deaths (NBC10)....66
7 Indicted In Prospect Heights Crack Sting (PROJO)....67

Another View: Smokescreen Of Medical Pot Clouds View Of The Dangers (SACBEE) 67
Jewelry Theft Ring Is Busted Up, FBI Says (SLPD) 68
Insurgent Activity Spikes In Afghanistan (AP) 69
UN: Iran, Afghanistan, Pakistan Need To Share Drugs Data (AP) 70
U.S. Reaffirms Support For Embattled Kabul Government (WP) 70

Immigration:

Hunch Unravels Immigrant Wedding Scam (WP) 71
Democrats May Proceed With Caution On Immigration (WP) 73

Congress-Administration:

Can Bush Sr. And His Team Save Son's Presidency? (NSWK) 75
The Rescue Squad (NSWK) 76
Changing The Guard (USNEWS) 79
Searching For A Strategy (TIME) 80
The New Face: A Spy With Fresh Eyes (NSWK) 83
A New Man. Next, A New Plan For Iraq? (USNEWS) 83
Rescue Squad (USNEWS) 84
How History Will Judge Donald Rumsfeld (NSWK) 85
When "Oops" Isn't Enough (TIME) 86
Zakaria: What The Baker Commission Is Ignoring (NSWK) ... 87
Democrats Signal Hope For Approval Of Gates (FT) 88
Gates Would Leave Fidelity To Take Defense Post (WSJ) 89
Gates Likely To Sustain Terror War (WT) 90
Will Rumsfeld's Reforms Last? (CSM) 91
Bush Faces GOP Ire Over Rumsfeld Timing (AP) 93
Rumsfeld And The Realists (WSJ) 94
Places For Progress (TIME) 95
After The Triumph, The Tribulations (TIME) 96
Post-Thumpin' Politics (USNEWS) 97
Health's Ailment (USNEWS) 98
My Mother, My President (TIME) 99
Lame-duck Congress Takes Roost (LAT) 99
For Post-Election Congress, Extensive To-Do List Is Awaiting Action (NYT) 101
Washington Lame Ducks Have Heavy Agenda Bush, GOP Congress Take Last Try At Goals (AJC) 102
Setting Aside Differences (WSJ) 104
GOP Pressed On Offshore Drilling Limits (AP) 106
Don't Force An Energy Bill (NYT) 107
The Lame-Duck Congress (WP) 107
Blocked: Bye-Bye To Bolton? (NSWK) 108
Bush Stands By Keeping Bolton As U.N. Ambassador Despite Opposition (WP/AP) 109
Bolton And Bipartisanship (WSJ) 110
Carmakers Seek More Attention From Bush (USAT) 110
Renewable Fuels May Provide 25% Of U.S. Energy By 2025 (WSJ) 110
True Blue Populists (NYT) 111
Return To Rubinomics? (WP) 112
Democrats: Identify Pork Sponsors (USAT) 113
Speaker-to-be Is No Stranger To Earmarking (LAT) 114
Reid Pledges Earmark Reform, But May Benefit (LAT) 115
'There Is No Reason To Wait' (USAT) 117
Pelosi On Drugs (WSJ) 118
Congress's Sci-tech Agenda To Shift Under Democrats (CSM) 119
Pelosi Backs Murtha For Majority Leader (AP-Y) 120
Pelosi Endorses Murtha As Next Majority Leader (WP) 121
Supply Side Can Mike Pence Win? (WSJ) 122
A GOP Unchanged (WP) 124
In New Senate, The Middle Rules (CSM) 125
Array Of Fresh Faces Set For 110th Senate (WT) 126
McConnell Had Hoped To Be Majority Chief (AP-Y) 127
Study Health-Plan Options Carefully This Open Season (WP) 128
Hiding From Oversight (NYT) 129
Truth About The Trade Deficit (NYT) 130

Other News:

Karl Rove: The Architect's Faulty Specs (NSWK) 130
"A Passing Thing" (TIME) 131
Will: Retreat From Exuberance (NSWK) 132
Reaching For The Center (TIME) 133
What Voters Really Want (USNEWS) 135
How The West Is Being Won (NSWK) 136
Washington Whispers (USNEWS) 136
Where The Republicans Went Astray (NSWK) 137
Alter: The End Of The Road For U.S. Conservatism (NSWK) 140
Quinn: The Economic Perception Gap (NSWK) 141
Steele Interested In Heading RNC (AP-Y) 142
Two Democrats Struggle As Georgia Bucks A Trend (NYT) 143
Fresh Off The Farm In Montana, A Senator-to-Be (NYT) 144
How Many Wins Make Up A 'Wave'? (WP) 146
Midterm Election Leaves Political Landscape Blurry (WP) ... 147
The Media's Dark Role (WT) 149
For Democrats, How Long A Honeymoon? (WP) 151
McCain Edges Toward '08 Presidential Run (AP-Y) 152

DOJ_NMG_0092475

McCain To Form Committee To Explore White House Bid (WP) 153
McCain Takes Step Toward 2008 Race (WT) 154
And They're Off! (USNEWS) 155
Shaken And Stirred (USNEWS) 156
Time In Senate May Be Irrelevant If Obama Runs (WP) 157
Hillary's Dilemma (USNEWS) 158
Flank Stakes (USNEWS) 158
Bill, George Show Keeps Laughs Coming (AP-Y) 159
YESTERDAY (WP) 160
A Charity With An Unusual Interest In The Bottom Line (NYT) 161
Confessions Of A Values Voter (USAT) 162
Tax Epiphany (WSJ) 164
As Vietnam Trip Nears, Bush Rejects Iraq Link (USAT) 165
In Vietnam, Old Foes Take Aim At War's Toxic Legacy (WP) 166
Vietnam Frees U.S. Citizen Convicted Of Terrorism (WP) 168
Bush, Putin To Bask In Trade Deal (AFP) 169
SKorea Balks At Measures To Sanction North (AP) 170
Early December Proposed For NKorea Talks: Russia (AFP) 170
Nuclear Deals Said To Be Thwarted (LAT) 171
Olmert Tackles Iran On U.S. Visit (WT/AP) 171
Olmert Arrives In US For Talks With Bush In New Political Climate (AFP) 172
In New Middle East, Tests For An Old Friendship (NYT) 173
How Bush And Olmert Could Help Each Other (WP) 177
Q&A: Israel's P.M. On Iran, Lebanon, Palestinian State (NSWK) 178
Syria A 'Dangerous' Country, Says Rice (AFP) 180
Hamas Endorses Peace Conference (WT/AP) 180
As Hezbollah Seeks Power, Lebanon Is Feeling Edgy (NYT) 181
Iran Vows Retaliation If Israel Strikes (AP) 183
Iran Criticizes Security Council Over Threat Of Sanctions (NYT) 183
Islamic Militants Claim Capture Of Town (AP) 184
Tension Rises In Somalia As Islamists Expand Reach (NYT) 185
Hizbollah Ministers Quit Lebanon's Cabinet (FT) 185
Lebanese Cabinet Thrown Into Crisis By Hezbollah Exit (WSJ) 186
China Sub Secretly Stalked U.S. Fleet (WT) 187
U.S.: Castro's Health Is Deteriorating (AP) 188
U.N. Envoy Meets With Ugandan Rebel (NYT) 189
Ugandan Rebel Emerges To Talk With U.N. Official (WP/AP) 190
A New Al Jazeera With A Global Focus (NYT) 191
¡Viva El Capitalismo! (NYT) 192
Ortega's Encore (TIME) 193
Felipe Calderón (TIME) 195
Our 'Africa' Lenses (WP) 195

TERRORISM NEWS:

Lawyers To Argue Ressam Sentence Before Appeals Court (AP)

By Gene Johnson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, November 13, 2006

SEATTLE (AP) -- The Justice Department says there is "precious little" to explain why Ahmed Ressam received a sentence of only 22 years for plotting to bomb Los Angeles International Airport on the eve of the millennium. Ressam's lawyers say the sentence was a decade too long.

A three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will hear their arguments Monday.

Both sides are challenging aspects of the punishment U.S. District Judge John C. Coughenour imposed last year. Ressam's lawyers, Thomas Hillier and Michael Filipovic, believe that one of the nine counts he was convicted of should be thrown out, which would reduce the sentence by 10 years.

The U.S. Attorney's Office has suggested that Coughenour's decision to sentence Ressam to less than the 35 years it requested may have been colored by a distaste for the Bush administration's treatment of "enemy combatants." In their appeal, prosecutors repeatedly cited Coughenour's comments at sentencing, when he said Ressam's case illustrated that U.S. courts are plenty capable of handling terrorism cases.

"We did not need to use a secret military tribunal," the judge said at the time, "or detain the defendant indefinitely as an enemy combatant, or deny him the right to counsel, or invoke any proceedings beyond those guaranteed by or contrary to the United States Constitution."

DOJ_NMG_0092476

Customs agents in Port Angeles, across the Strait of Juan de Fuca from Canada, caught Ressam with explosives in the trunk of his rental car when he arrived by ferry in December 1999. The arrest prompted the cancellation of millennium celebrations at Seattle's Space Needle. He was convicted of terrorism and explosives charges at trial in 2001, then decided to tell investigators what he knew about al-Qaida in an effort to win a shorter sentence.

"We believe the district court seriously erred in straying so far from what would have been the advisory guideline sentence, which was 65 years to life," U.S. Attorney John McKay said. "Even taking into account his cooperation, the sentence was far too short. Ressam has told us he intended to kill as many people as he could at the Los Angeles Airport. That's what he should be sentenced for."

Coughenour noted that before the trial, the government offered Ressam the chance to plead guilty in exchange for a sentence of 25 years, with no cooperation required; the judge reasoned that 25 years represented the government's assessment of Ressam's crime, and any cooperation he later provided should be discounted from that. The government disagreed, saying that since Ressam didn't accept the 25-year offer, it shouldn't factor into the court's decision.

Ressam's testimony helped convict one of his co-conspirators, but his cooperation came to a halt by early 2003. Years of solitary confinement, broken by periods of intense interrogation, had taken their toll on his mental health and corrupted his memory, his lawyers insisted.

The government didn't buy it and was furious that without further help, it had to dismiss cases against two of Ressam's alleged co-conspirators, Samir Ait Mohamed and Abu Doha.

On appeal, Ressam's lawyers are arguing against his conviction on one count of carrying explosives during a felony. The felony was providing a false name and other information to customs agents.

Hillier says that during trial, jurors were not asked to find that Ressam carried the explosives "in furtherance of" providing the false information, as he says the law requires. The crime carries a mandatory minimum of 10 years in prison.

Gene Johnson has been covering courts and legal affairs for the AP since 2000.

WAR NEWS:

Democrats To Press For Phased Withdrawal From Iraq (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats poised to take control of Congress said Sunday that they would press to begin a phased U.S. military withdrawal from Iraq within four to six months, part of an agenda aimed at overhauling key aspects of U.S. policy in the Middle East.

"First order of business is to change the direction of Iraq policy," said Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), who is in line to become chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee next year when Democrats become the majority party in both chambers of Congress.

Senior White House officials countered that setting timetables for U.S. troop withdrawals would weaken the Iraq government and embolden insurgents, but they acknowledged a need for fresh ideas on Iraq and expressed a new willingness to negotiate with Democrats on an array of foreign policy issues.

White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten indicated that the president would block legislation calling for a scheduled withdrawal.

"I don't think we're going to be receptive to the notion there's a fixed timetable at which we automatically pull out, because that could be a true disaster for the Iraqi people," Bolten said on ABC's "This Week," one of two Sunday talk shows on which he appeared.

Even so, he added, the White House is "willing to talk about anything" and is prepared to adjust tactics.

The developments came as President Bush and members of his national security team prepared to meet today with a panel of foreign policy experts who have been charged with developing proposals for how to proceed in Iraq. The panel is headed by James A. Baker III, who served as secretary of State when Bush's father was president, and Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman who chaired the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0092477

The urgency of the work of that commission was underscored Sunday by the continuing violence in Iraq, where nearly 100 people were killed in a 24-hour period, including 38 in twin suicide bombings at a police recruiting center, the deadliest strike on a police facility in months. In addition, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki harshly criticized fellow lawmakers for placing partisan concerns above the national interest, and he promised major changes in his Cabinet.

The comments by Levin and others offered a glimpse of how the Democrats' control of Congress might alter foreign policy, which has been dominated by Republicans and the Bush administration since the Sept. 11 attacks more than five years ago.

Senior military officials have recently voiced increasing concern that the security benefits of keeping large numbers of troops in Iraq are outweighed by significant downsides to the heavy U.S. presence. Among them are a perceived reluctance by Iraqis to take the lead in stemming the violence as long as U.S. forces are there.

"We have to tell the Iraqis that the open-ended commitment is over and that we're going to begin to have a phased withdrawal in four to six months," said Levin, who also appeared on "This Week."

Levin was joined in his call for a phased pullout by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who is in line to become chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader in the Senate, told NBC's "Meet the Press" that decisions on drawdowns should rest with U.S. military officers in Iraq. Still, Reid said that "we need to redeploy" and that a withdrawal should start within several months.

Given the results of last week's elections, the Baker-Hamilton panel, formally known as the Iraq Study Group, has become a focal point for members of both parties as they seek an upper hand in setting the Iraq agenda. The panel is expected to deliver its findings by the end of the year.

Levin said he hoped the commission would endorse calls for a phased pullout. But Bush is likely to use his meeting with the panel today to make the case for elements of the administration's approach.

Iraq was a key factor in Republican losses in last week's election, with nearly six in 10 voters participating in exit polls saying they disapproved of the war and a majority calling for a withdrawal of some or all U.S. troops.

Even so, it's unclear how far GOP lawmakers will be willing to go to challenge the White House and back calls for a drawdown. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said Sunday that he still believed the United States needed to send more troops to Iraq to curb sectarian violence and reduce the influence of heavily armed Shiite militias.

"I believe that there are a lot of things that we can do to salvage this, but they all require the presence of additional troops," he said on "Meet the Press."

"The question, then, before the American people is 'Are we ready to quit?' And I believe the consequences of failure are chaos in the region, which will spread," said McCain, who is widely seen as the front-runner for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination.

Members of both parties said they expected the Baker-Hamilton commission to recommend that the United States hold a conference with representatives from Iraq's neighbors to seek greater cooperation in pacifying the country and creating a stable government.

Biden told ABC that Iran and Syria should be included in such a conference because of their influence in the region. Baker recently met with an Iranian envoy at the United Nations to discuss the prospects for cooperation.

But a proposal that calls for joint meetings with Syria and Iran would pose thorny diplomatic problems for the administration, which has labeled Iran part of an "axis of evil" and has been reluctant to engage either country.

Bolten stopped short of rejecting such a conference, but made it clear that the White House doesn't believe dialogue with Iran and Syria would improve matters.

"I don't think there's been a communications problem. There's been a cooperation problem," he said. "Iran and Syria have been meddling in Iraq in a very unhelpful way."

Iran has ties to Shiite groups in Iraq, has large numbers of intelligence operatives in the country and has been accused of supplying components for bombs that have been used to strike Iraqi and U.S. troops.

DOJ_NMG_0092478

Democrats Push For Troop Cuts Within Months (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg, Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 12 — Democratic leaders in the Senate vowed on Sunday to use their new Congressional majority to press for troop reductions in Iraq within a matter of months, stepping up pressure on the administration just as President Bush is to be interviewed by a bipartisan panel examining future strategy for the war.

The Democrats — the incoming majority leader, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada; the incoming Armed Services Committee chairman, Senator Carl Levin of Michigan; and the incoming Foreign Relations Committee chairman, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware — said a phased redeployment of troops would be their top priority when the new Congress convenes in January, even before an investigation of the conduct of the war.

"We need to begin a phased redeployment of forces from Iraq in four to six months," Mr. Levin said in an appearance on the ABC News program "This Week." In a telephone interview later, Mr. Levin added, "The point of this is to signal to the Iraqis that the open-ended commitment is over and that they are going to have to solve their own problems."

The White House signaled a willingness to listen to the Democrats' proposals, with Joshua B. Bolten, the chief of staff, saying in two television appearances that the president was open to "fresh ideas" and a "fresh look." But Mr. Bolten said he could not envision the White House signing on to a plan setting a timetable for the withdrawal of troops.

"You know, we're willing to talk about anything," he said on "This Week." "I don't think we're going to be receptive to the notion there's a fixed timetable at which we automatically pull out, because that could be a true disaster for the Iraqi people. But what we've always been prepared to do, and remain prepared to do, is indeed what Senators Levin and Biden were talking about, is put pressure on the Iraqi government to take over themselves."

The spirited exchanges on the Sunday morning talk shows — a staple of weekend life for the political elite here, especially on the Sunday after an election that blew through Washington like a tornado — came at a delicate moment for the White House on Iraq. The bipartisan panel on strategy, led by James A. Baker III, the secretary of state under the first President Bush, and Lee Hamilton, a Democratic former congressman, will be at the White House on Monday to begin its final round of interviews.

The panel will meet separately with Mr. Bush and members of his foreign policy team, including the secretaries of state and defense, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency and the director of national intelligence, and will then interview Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain by videoconference. On Tuesday, the group plans to meet with Democratic foreign policy leaders.

The panel is expected to make its recommendations by the end of the year, and Democrats said they did not intend to push a resolution for troop withdrawal until after the report was issued. But after Tuesday's election, in which Republicans took what Mr. Bush has called "a thumping," Democrats used their Sunday appearances to signal that they believed they had a mandate about Iraq and would seize on it.

"The people have spoken in a very, very strong way that they don't buy the administration policy," Mr. Levin said on ABC. Mr. Reid, in an appearance on CBS, said troop redeployment "should start within the next few months."

In June, the Republican-controlled Senate rejected two amendments on troop reductions backed by Democrats. One called for all United States combat troops to be withdrawn within a year. The other, whose sponsors included Mr. Levin, called for troop reductions to start by the end of the year without setting a deadline for complete withdrawal.

In the interview after his television appearance, Mr. Levin said that any resolution about troop reductions in the next session of Congress would not contain detailed benchmarks mandating how many troops should be withdrawn by specific dates.

As Democrats outlined their proposal to reduce the American presence in Iraq, Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona and a likely presidential contender for 2008, reiterated his stance that there were not enough American troops there.

Appearing on the NBC program "Meet the Press," Mr. McCain said that "the present situation is unacceptable" but added that any withdrawal from Iraq would create chaos throughout the Middle East.

Mr. McCain, emphasizing the importance of breaking the back of the Mahdi Army, the militia allied with the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, said that the Iraqi prime minister "has to understand that we need to put down Sadr, and we need to take care of the Mahdi Army, and we need to stop the sectarian violence that is on the increase in a nonacceptable level, and I think that the best way to assure that is for him to know that we will do what's necessary to bolster the — train and equip the Iraqi army, et cetera."

DOJ_NMG_0092479

Mr. McCain added, "If we send the signal that we are leaving, of course, he's going to try to make accommodations with others, because he knows what is going to be the inevitable result."

After a week in which both parties used the fallout from Tuesday's midterm elections to promise a new era of bipartisanship, the Sunday television interviews suggested that profound differences remained over Iraq, the issue that proved central in the elections.

But there was one area on which Democrats hinted they might find common ground with the White House: the confirmation of Robert M. Gates, the former C.I.A. director, to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who had become a magnet for criticism about the war and whose departure was announced by Mr. Bush the day after voters handed Democrats majorities in both houses of Congress.

"I'm inclined to vote for him now," said Mr. Biden, who voted against Mr. Gates for the job of C.I.A. chief 15 years ago, adding, "To put it very, very bluntly, as long as he's not there, Rumsfeld is there."

The White House is clearly looking to the Baker-Hamilton group to provide a path toward progress in Iraq. Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton have already told committee staff members to begin drafting parts of the report. But other commissioners did not see any of those drafts before the election, two members of the commission said in interviews last week.

"I guess the thinking was that anything that gets circulated before the election would get leaked, and one side or the other might use that for electoral purposes," said one member, who was granted anonymity because the commission is supposed to operate in secrecy.

Other members of the commission speculated that Mr. Baker, in particular, had been waiting to see the outcome of the elections, perhaps calculating that a major victory for the Democrats would put the White House in less of a position to challenge the recommendations.

The commission will meet again the week after Thanksgiving, when many of the most critical debates about options are expected to take place among commission members.

Mr. Baker has already made some of his views known. In television interviews, some timed to promote a book he has just published, he has expressed skepticism that a rapid withdrawal can be accomplished without setting off chaos or civil war, and has been doubtful that partitioning the country will work.

The message from White House officials on Sunday was that the president was indeed open to new ideas on Iraq, as long as they did not involve a plan with a specific date for beginning the drawing down of troops.

Dan Bartlett, counselor to Mr. Bush, said on Fox News that the president had directed the chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, Gen. Peter Pace, to assess strategy in Iraq and would be open to listening to "good suggestions," regardless of where they came from.

But Dana Perino, the deputy White House press secretary, said in an interview that Mr. Bush remained adamant that decisions about how to deploy troops would be made by military commanders in Iraq.

"That didn't change overnight on November 7," Ms. Perino said.

Bush And Democrats Square Up Over Iraq (FT)

By Krishna Guha, Jean Eaglesham

Financial Times, November 13, 2006

The promise of bipartisan co-operation in Washington following the congressional mid-term elections came under immediate strain on Sunday as the White House squared up to the Democrats over the US ambassador to the United Nations and strategy for Iraq.

Josh Bolten, the White House chief of staff, told ABC's This Week that the administration would make a final attempt to have John Bolton, the controversial UN ambassador, confirmed during the lame duck session of the outgoing Republican-dominated Congress, which begins today.

DOJ_NMG_0092480

Meanwhile top Democrats stepped up calls for the US to adopt a timetable for a phased withdrawal from Iraq and backed direct talks with Iran and Syria.

Although courteous in tone, the renewed sparring shows how difficult it will be to sustain the bipartisan approach to government pledged by leaders of both parties following last week's vote, in which the Democrats won control of both houses of Congress for the first time in 12 years.

On Saturday, President George W. Bush told the nation: "We must put these elections behind us and work together on the great issues facing America."

Forging ahead with the confirmation of Mr Bolton, though, will be divisive.

Mr Bolton was given a temporary recess appointment by Mr Bush but needs Senate approval to continue in the job.

Joe Biden, the incoming Democrat chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, said the confirmation bid would fail. He warned the White House not to try to find a procedural device to bypass the Senate and keep Mr Bolton in his job.

Carl Levin, the incoming Democrat chairman of the Senate armed services committee, told the same programme he would reintroduce his motion calling for a phased withdrawal from Iraq starting in four to six months, and claimed a number of Republicans would now support it.

Harry Reid, the incoming Senate majority leader, later endorsed the call for a redeployment beginning "in the next few months". But he hedged his bets saying he would not insist on a precise date.

For the White House Mr Bolten said: "I don't think we are going to be receptive to the notion that there's a fixed timetable at which we automatically pull out," he said. The US had to give the Iraqi government the support it needed to succeed, he said, warning that the alternative would be "truly disastrous".

Mr Bush on Monday meets James Baker and Lee Hamilton, leaders of the Iraq Study Group charged with finding ways forward in Iraq. Many experts predict the ISG will recommend that the US open direct talks with Iraq's neighbours Iran and Syria.

Mr Biden, the Democrat, said the US should talk to both countries, a position backed yesterday by moderate Republican Senators Arlen Specter and John McCain - who repeated his calls for more US troops to be sent to Iraq.

Mr Bolten continued to resist the idea of talks with Iran and Syria. "I don't think there has been a communication problem. There has been a co-operation problem," he said. "Iran and Syria have been meddling in Iraq in a very unhelpful way."

He reiterated the administration's charge that Iranian weapons are being used to kill US soldiers in Iraq and declared "that needs to stop."

But in a potentially important concession, he told CNN "nothing is off the table."

Tony Blair will seek to use the state of flux in Washington politics to try to persuade the US to include efforts towards a wider peace settlement in the Middle East – in particular Lebanon and Palestine, and including talks with Syria and Iran – as part of a revised Iraq strategy.

In a speech at the Guildhall on Monday, the prime minister will argue that the conflict in Iraq has evolved and the strategy to deal with it must also evolve.

He is expected to reinforce this message when he gives evidence to the ISG panel by video-link on Monday.

The UK's efforts to influence a change in Washington's approach to Iraq come amid continued bloodshed there.

Four British servicemen were killed and another three seriously hurt on Sunday in an attack on a patrol boat in Basra.

In a separate incident, the US military said three American soldiers had been killed in combat while operating in western Al-Anbar province.

Two suicide bombers killed 35 people and wounded 60 at a police commando recruiting centre in western Baghdad, according to reports.

Democrats To Propose Iraq Pullout (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092481

The two top Senate Democrats on foreign policy yesterday said they will introduce a resolution in January calling for troops to start being withdrawn from Iraq by this summer, a move that Sen. John McCain said would put the U.S. in the worst of both worlds.

Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat in line to lead the Senate Armed Services Committee, said his party's election victory last week vindicates calls for a change of strategy in Iraq and said withdrawals would need to start this year, despite White House opposition to any timetables, a stance it also reiterated on yesterday's political shows.

"The people spoke dramatically, overwhelmingly, resoundingly, to change the course in Iraq," he said during an appearance on ABC's "This Week." The Senate's "first order of business is to change the direction of Iraq policy."

"We need to begin a phased redeployment of forces from Iraq in four to six months, to begin that redeployment," he said. "We have to tell Iraqis that the open-ended commitment is over."

On the other hand, Mr. McCain said on NBC's "Meet the Press" that the U.S. troop presence in Iraq would need to be increased to achieve victory and said he would favor a total withdrawal if that didn't happen.

"I believe that there are a lot of things that we can do to salvage this, but they all require the presence of additional troops," he said.

Moderator Tim Russert said: "It sounds as if McCain is saying, 'Either send more troops in, secure the country and win, or make the decision and get out.' "

"I think that that's pretty much my position," said the Arizona Republican, who is considering a run for the White House in 2008. "Maybe it's more nuanced than that."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., who appeared on the same ABC segment as Mr. Levin, said he backed the Michigander's resolution and elaborated on some of its other details.

It also would call for "a political settlement in Iraq, put pressure on the Iraqis to insist upon a means to distribute the oil equitably, to make sure that there's some form of federalism and to deal with the militias, and call for an international conference," said the Delaware Democrat who is expected to take the reins at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Besides Mr. Levin and Mr. Biden, Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming majority leader, also called for a redeployment of troops from Iraq, which he said "should start within the next few months," although he said the withdrawal should be phased.

"We need to have a redeployment in Iraq. What does that mean? Pull everybody out now? Of course not," Mr. Reid said during an appearance on CBS' "Face the Nation."

White House officials said yesterday that President Bush opposes a specific timetable for withdrawal and partitioning of Iraq, but that he is willing to reconsider proposals on conducting the war.

"I don't think so. And I think it would be a very bad idea," White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten said when asked on CBS' "Face the Nation" whether his boss would support a timetable, although he added that "nobody is happy with what our situation in Iraq is now."

Still, Mr. Bolten told ABC's "This Week" that "the president's open to fresh ideas here."

"The president obviously wants to take a whole fresh look at what we're doing in Iraq," he said on CBS.

Mr. Bush will meet today with members of a commission, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, that Congress appointed to make recommendations about U.S. policy in Iraq.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett also denied speculation that the administration, based on reports about the Baker-Hamilton panel, is considering a partitioning of Iraq into regions based on ethic or religious makeup.

"I think many observers and experts watching the political process in Iraq would say that that would be a mistake to go that route," he said during an appearance on "Fox News Sunday." "Most importantly, the sovereign government of Iraq believes that that would be the wrong way to go. To partition the country would only increase sectarian violence and strife, not call for reconciliation."

Mr. McCain added that he opposes a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. forces.

"I believe that a withdrawal, or a date for withdrawal, will lead to chaos in the region, and most military experts think the same thing," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0092482

However, Mr. Levin and Mr. Biden both said they would not support cutting off funds for the war, a move some liberals have demanded but which Rep. Nancy Pelosi, likely the next speaker of the House, ruled out the day after the election.

"As far as I'm concerned, it's absolutely off the table," Mr. Biden agreed.

Senators Push For Timetable For Withdrawal From Iraq (USAT)

USA Today, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Congressional Democrats continued to press ahead on Sunday with proposals to start withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq but faced resistance from the White House and a top Republican.

Democratic Sens. Carl Levin of Michigan and Joseph Biden of Delaware said they expect some Republican support for a resolution calling for troops to begin coming home as soon as March.

Levin is in line to be chairman of the Armed Services Committee when Democrats become the Senate majority in January; Biden is set to be chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

"We're going to urge the president on a bipartisan basis, hopefully, to change course in Iraq by doing a number of things," Levin said on ABC's This Week. "Not only telling Iraqis that we're not there in an open-ended way, but also to set some milestones here so that we can begin to withdraw in four to six months."

White House chief of staff Josh Bolten said President Bush wouldn't support that idea.

"We clearly need a fresh approach," Bolten said, but "I don't think we're going to be receptive to the notion that there's a fixed timetable at which we automatically pull out, because that could be a true disaster for the Iraqi people." Bolten appeared on talk shows on ABC, CBS and CNN.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., meanwhile, called for more American forces to be sent to Iraq. "I believe that a withdrawal, or a date for withdrawal, will lead to chaos in the region, and most military experts think the same thing," said McCain on NBC's Meet the Press. "I believe that there are a lot of things that we can do to salvage this, but they all require the presence of additional troops."

Bush and his national security team are scheduled to meet today with the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel formed to re-evaluate U.S. involvement in Iraq and propose policy changes. Bush removed Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld last week after Democrats won control of Congress, saying voters wanted new ideas on handling the war.

Before the elections, Bush had accused Democrats of being weak on national security, suggesting that a Democratic triumph on Election Day would amount to a victory for terrorists. Exit polls showed about six in ten voters disapproved of the war in Iraq, and they voted overwhelmingly for Democrats.

Not all Democrats were united behind Levin's idea of a withdrawal timetable. Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said on Fox News Sunday that a fixed timetable is "probably not the way it's going to work."

Democrats' Challenge: Stay In The Center (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - Like any newly elected congressman, Indiana's Brad Ellsworth has a lot to learn. Before he had even digested his victory over Republican incumbent John Hostettler last week, Ellsworth was poring over forms and factoids, shipped straight to Indiana from some new friends on Capitol Hill. "They're asking me what kind of BlackBerry I want," said a mildly exasperated Ellsworth. "I don't know what kind of BlackBerry I want. I've always just used a cell phone." As his campaign staffers caught up on sleep, Ellsworth worried over pension plans, travel arrangements and finding a home in the nation's capital. "Did you know that some [congressmen] live with seven or eight other guys?" he asked. "People back home would be amazed."

But wide-eyed as he may be, Ellsworth has already learned a crucial rule for survival in Washington: find allies you can trust. Two days after his victory, he placed a call to another newly elected Democratic congressman, North Carolina's Heath Shuler. Shuler is a former NFL quarterback; he and Ellsworth, a sheriff, had been two of the "macho Democrat" stars of the '06 cycle—manly men whose conservative positions on issues like abortion and gay marriage had helped them win in their Red States. Now Ellsworth was calling to congratulate his soon-to-be colleague and to say that the two should stick together in the new House. After all, he said, they both had to answer to the same kind of conservative constituents back home—and both know they won't last long in Congress if they go native in D.C. "We both won; now we're both in the same boat," Ellsworth said. "We've got to remember that the people back home put us here and they can take us back out."

DOJ_NMG_0092483

Most Democrats in Washington weren't thinking so far ahead. After 12 years in the minority, the Democrats swept control of both houses of Congress—and the party leadership reveled in the exotic new pleasures of victory. Rahm Emanuel, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, danced on national television. Harry Reid, the usually staid Senate Democratic floor leader, kissed the television screen in his hotel suite when a network projected Claire McCaskill the winner in her hard-fought Missouri Senate race. Nancy Pelosi, soon to be the first female Speaker of the House, paraded across the broadcast networks, a proud grandma in an olive pantsuit, proclaiming herself "thrilled."

But Pelosi has been around long enough to know that in Washington the party never lasts too long. She will soon be judged on her ability to make the Congress work, no simple task for an incoming Speaker whose majority in the House is thin and is made up of members with loyalties to different generations, regions and ideologies. Fresh-faced conservatives like Ellsworth might say they don't "want our president to be viewed as weak," but they won't have much say about the matter with powerful Democratic committee chairmen like John Conyers and Henry Waxman mulling investigations on issues like Iraq-war contracts and NSA wiretaps. And while President George W. Bush was quick to say he'd offered Pelosi a list of "Republican interior decorators" to help her spruce up her new office, no one in either party expects the White House to bend over backward to help the Democratic Congress find its groove.

The challenges facing the Democrats are massive—changing the tone in Washington, working with a polarizing president, addressing the deficit and, ahem, coming up with some kind of new plan for Iraq. It is far from clear that Pelosi, Reid and their cohorts have the mettle to stick together and take them on. After all, they are Democrats. But if the party's 2006 performance proves anything, it's that discipline isn't a foreign concept to this crew. The leadership of the new majority has already put out word that members will pay a price if they jeopardize the party's attempts to place itself on a centrist footing. Liberal activists, who poured countless hours and millions of dollars into the '06 effort, are eager for the Dems to deliver on a progressive agenda. But the leadership is talking up a domestic program that steers clear of social issues and seeks consensus on the minimum wage, college tuition and trade. Thrilled as they may still be with their victory, many Democrats are now realizing that that their future depends on a tricky proposition: actually becoming the centrist, big-tent party they've spent two years claiming to be.

Pelosi is an odd champion of the center. Only 34 percent of respondents in the NEWSWEEK Poll had a favorable impression of her in part because, as the congresswoman from San Francisco, she has spent her career being lampooned by conservatives as the chief spokesperson for America's loony left. A strong supporter of abortion rights and same-sex marriage, she was a favorite target for Republicans this fall trying to portray her party as extreme. (Ellsworth's opponent ran an ad against him claiming a vote for Ellsworth would be a vote for Pelosi "and her radical plan to advance the homosexual agenda, led by Barney Frank.") The voters who re-elected Pelosi to her 11th term by an overwhelming margin also handily approved a measure calling for the impeachment of Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney.

Still, the "San Francisco liberal" label has never really quite fit Pelosi. She gained political entree in the city not by protesting in Haight-Ashbury but by holding fund-raisers in ritzy Presidio Heights. While others in her generation were burning their bras and draft cards, she was dressing her five children in plaid pinafores and marching them off to the Convent of the Sacred Heart. "There isn't one shred of evidence that she's veered off to the left with the Democratic caucus," says her friend, Washington Congressman Jim McDermott. "In fact, some of us on the left wish she would tilt a little more our way from time to time."

Pelosi developed her strategy for claiming the Speaker's gavel by consulting corporate America—not your typical liberal play. After the party's disastrous defeat in the 2004 elections, she began casting around for fresh ideas on how the Democrats could reintroduce themselves to the American people. "I decided to go to the private sector," she told NEWSWEEK, "and ask them how to become No. 1."

Through her staff, Pelosi found her way to a group of corporate-image consultants including high-tech entrepreneur Richard Yanowitch, computer-software marketer John Cullinane and Jack Trout, a marketing strategist who'd worked with big corporate clients like Merck and IBM. "I specialize in differentiation," Trout says. "I told her, 'That's your problem—you haven't found a way to differentiate the party from the Republican Party in a clear, simple way'." Trout encouraged Pelosi to take advantage of the weak points in Karl Rove's base-driven Republican strategy. "You've got to go the opposite way," he told her. "It's Marketing 101. Say 'We're about good governing for all, not a privileged few ... ' Bring back the big-tent idea."

DOJ_NMG_0092484

Pelosi liked what she heard. The centrist messaging dovetailed nicely with Emanuel's strategy of recruiting candidates who could run in Red States and highlight conservative positions on cultural issues. As the elections approached, she made sure that the old bulls of Congress were onboard. In the final days of the campaign, she held conference calls with senior members, urging them not to deviate from the party's emphasis on restoring civility, integrity and fiscal responsibility in Congress. "She doesn't want to be Speaker for two years," says an aide. "We can do it," but "we have to keep our people together."

Already, Pelosi has made it clear that she will brook little dissent as Speaker. When Conyers, the presumed chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, raised the possibility of bringing articles of impeachment against President Bush earlier this year, Pelosi quickly chastised him, saying any talk of impeachment would distract from the Democrats' message.

Veteran House committee chairmen understand Pelosi's need for loyalty, and share her desire to win. But they are also eager to conduct a reality check on President Bush. No sooner were the election returns in than Henry Waxman, the soon-to-be chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, directed his aides to draw up an "oversight" plan for the panel. With a staff of more than 80 investigators, Waxman has instantly become the most formidable of White House adversaries. (Two top D.C. lobbyists and a white-collar defense lawyer, who asked to remain anonymous discussing still-hypothetical investigations, told NEWSWEEK they were already getting nervous phone calls from prospective Waxman targets, seeking counsel about what to do if they get hauled before his committee.) Waxman's interest in oversight could quickly lead him to the Jack Abramoff scandal. This worries some leadership aides who remember that Republicans frittered away their popularity in the '90s by persecuting the White House from Capitol Hill. (Waxman has said he's not interested in payback, but rather accountability).

The most difficult debate facing the Democrats will be over Iraq. After six years of decrying their lack of oversight on military policy, party leaders now have co-ownership of the Iraq account. Many Democrats say the party should focus its energy on pressing the White House for a change of course in current policy, rather than dredging up old debates over the manner in which the administration took the country to war. But Carl Levin, the new chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, says he also intends to demand access to some 58 internal Defense Department memos dealing with prewar Iraq intelligence and military planning. These memos involve the Pentagon's Office of Special Plans and the Counter-Terrorism Policy Evaluation Group, two secretive units that have been accused of cooking the books on Saddam's weapons of mass destruction and alleged ties to Al Qaeda. "There [is] still some significant unfinished business in the area of documents that have been denied us," Levin told NEWSWEEK.

Less likely to dominate and divide the party, at least for the moment, will be old debates over abortion. Many in the leadership are convinced that the party was successful in the midterms because it de-emphasized cultural issues and backed pro-life candidates like Pennsylvania's Bob Casey. "The reason this election went well for the Democrats is that [they] decided to have a bigger tent on abortion," says Rachel Laser of Third Way, a Democratic think tank. "Democrats should always be the party of abortion rights, but they should also become the party of reducing abortion."

Republicans, of course, will do their best to keep values issues on the table and search for other openings to exploit. But Bush is at least going through the motions of putting the bitter campaign behind him. "If I sit here and mope about it, what is that going to prove?" he asked a senior aide after the election results came in. (The aide declined to be identified discussing a private conversation with the president.) Bush lunched with Pelosi and peppered her with questions about her daughter Alexandra, a filmmaker Bush befriended when the younger Pelosi was making her documentary "Journeys With George." (Cheney was also present at the lunch, says an aide to Pelosi, but said hardly a word the whole time.)

No one expects the bipartisan era of good feeling to last. And it won't be long until Pelosi's ability to ride herd over her ranks will be tested. Eli Pariser, the executive director of the grass-roots organization MoveOn.org, says the party won votes not by tilting rightward but by backing "bold, populist, progressive candidates ... and by connecting with people around the formula of being for the little guy." MoveOn supports the agenda Pelosi and Reid have announced—but sees it as only a small start. The group wants the Democratic Congress to come up with comprehensive plans for alternative energy and global warming and wants U.S. troops out of Iraq by the end of next year. "People want responsible redeployment," Pariser says. Meanwhile, some Dems are already trying to oust MoveOn hero Howard Dean from his perch as party chairman. Clinton ally James Carville began floating rumors that defeated Tennessee Senate candidate Harold Ford Jr. could replace Dean—without consulting Ford, who says he isn't interested in the job.

DOJ_NMG_0092485

Viewed from any partisan vantage point, many of the pending items on the Democratic agenda seem small-scale—harking back to President Bill Clinton's triangulation strategy. A baby-steps approach will be crucial to keeping the coalition together but may nonetheless prove frustrating to newcomers like Ellsworth, who ran on promises of big, fast change. For his part, Ellsworth says he doesn't have any plans to challenge the more liberal and more seasoned Democrats he'll soon be working beside. What will he say to Barney Frank, the congressman whose "homosexual agenda" Ellsworth's opponent tried to link him to in the campaign? "I don't know what I'll say to him," Ellsworth says. "He's got to represent his people and I've got to represent mine."

With Eleanor Clift, Michael Isikoff, Jonathan Alter, Debra Rosenberg, Karen Breslau and Richard Wolffe

We Won! Now What The Heck Do We Do? (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

One hard job-winning-is over. Now for the much harder job-governing. Flushed with their narrow wins in the House and Senate, Democratic Party leaders couldn't strike a bipartisan chord fast enough: "Partnerships," said House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi, "not partisanship." In his first post-election press conference, Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the master tactician behind the House victory, called sternly for governing from the "vital center"-five times. Harry Reid, the Senate majority leader-elect, chimed in: "It's a time for results."

That won't be as easy as it sounds. Democrats hold a relatively modest 229-to-196-seat majority in the House (with 10 seats undecided at the end of last week) and an advantage of just one in the Senate. The president, of course, still has his trusty veto pen. To get results then, Democrats will have to hold the centrist and left wings of the party together and work with Republicans if they're going to get the kind of results they'll need to impress voters in '08.

The new crop of Democrats is a pretty varied lot-Iraq veterans, antiwar candidates, social conservatives, gun-control foes, fiscal hawks. In the House, Democrats picked up at least 29 seats, many of which are in traditionally red districts in states like Indiana and North Carolina that President Bush won handily in 2004. In the Senate, much the same is true, with new Democratic members from Montana, Missouri, and Virginia. Centrist Democrats, like the New Democrats and the Blue Dogs, will swell in numbers by up to around 20. Can the leadership deal with such a polyglot group and find a way to persuade them all to work together? "Pelosi is from a very liberal district and is a very liberal congressperson," says Democratic lobbyist Thomas Hale Boggs Jr. "But she is a very street-smart politician, and she is a pragmatist."

Despite their enthusiastic show of unity last week, some Democrats in the House are already squabbling. "Everyone recognizes why we're in the majority," says Matt Bennett, a Democratic strategist. "It's because of moderates." Not so fast, counters the left's Robert Borosage, head of the progressive Campaign for America's Future. The election results, he says, reflect "the increasing power of a populist anti-[Iraq]-war wing of the party." Indeed, the election of majority leader-a contest likely to pit John Murtha, the Pennsylvania Vietnam vet who called for troop redeployments, against current Minority Whip Steny Hoyer, who's more cautious on Iraq-is already exposing the deep tensions within the party. "It is a real division," says Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University, "but I don't think it is insurmountable."

Others aren't so sure. While there may be some wrangling about the direction of the party, many of those in line to become committee chairmen are liberal old warhorses. Among them: 51-year House veteran John Dingell is set to take over the Energy and Commerce Committee; 31-year member Henry Waxman will chair the House Government Reform Committee; 25-year veteran Barney Frank is set to take over the committee that oversees Wall Street policy. "The American people want Democrats to provide real accountability to the Bush administration, not political payback," Waxman tells U.S. News. "There is an enormous difference between the two, and we'll stick to accountability."

The Peril Of Opportunity (USNEWS)

By Gloria Borger

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092486

Now that it's the morning after, elated Democrats might take a moment to come to grips with the new reality: Their congressional takeover brings to Washington a wave of new members more like Bill Clinton than Howard Dean. They're largely more moderate than liberal, more fiscally conservative than old-fashioned big spenders. Some like the president's tax cuts. Others, like Sen.-elect Bob Casey of Pennsylvania, are antiabortion. Or pro-gun, like Virginia's newest senator, Jim Webb.

And one more reality check: This election wasn't really about the Democrats. It was about the other guys-and how they couldn't run Washington or manage the war. There was no Democratic agenda beyond their "Had Enough?" bumper sticker. Did it work? Yep. But did it produce a mandate? Nope-at least not beyond the marching orders to clean up Washington, fix Iraq, and get something done.

It's a huge opportunity for the Democrats. If they're smart, they'll find a way to grab it-and fast. Immigration reform and the minimum wage top the list. Then, of course, there's finding a way out of Iraq. That's what the voters want. What they do not want is a slew of subpoenas by Democratic committees, finger-pointing about intelligence failures, scapegoating, and more talk of filibusters. And now that Donald Rumsfeld is gone, how many more times can the president cry uncle? He lost; the Democrats won. Let the governing begin.

Those instructions apply to both parties: It's not going to be easy for an administration so used to cultivating its base to reach across the aisle. (Heck, Republicans in Congress say the White House never even reached out to them.) Nor will it be a cakewalk for Democrats to keep all those liberal committee chairmen from throwing darts at their favorite targets. But the public ordered cooperation, and those who refuse to listen do so at their own peril. Consider the numbers: More than a quarter of all voters called themselves independents, self-proclaimed refugees from both parties. And 47 percent said they are moderates—voting overwhelmingly Democratic. If Democrats turn left, they can forget about the White House.

The public will be watching their approach to Iraq. Voters don't want to relitigate the decision to go to war; most, in fact, were coconspirators. Nor are they interested in providing future Democratic presidential candidates with the proof that they were lied to about Iraq's weapons, so they can excuse their pro-war votes. Voters blamed the administration for mismanagement and incompetence, and that's what they want to end. And they want the war to end, too—but in the right way. If that doesn't happen, voters in 2008 could be looking for someone to take the fall. They'll ask: Whom do we blame? The people who got us into the war? Or the ones who got us out?

The first brawl? No doubt about it, Democrats now have some uncomfortable choices to make. Their base supporters want an immediate withdrawal from Iraq. Their newly enlarged moderate contingent is more open to finding some other way. Democrats papered over their differences during the campaign because being against Bush on Iraq was enough. That won't work now. But instead of seeking some kind of unified road map, House Democrats now seem intent on fighting among themselves. Consider the race for majority leader: Rep. John Murtha, who wants a near-immediate withdrawal from Iraq, is challenging colleague Steny Hoyer, who does not. "It's not a fight we should be having," confides a top House leadership aide. "Who wants the first brawl inside the Democratic caucus to be about the war?" Precisely.

Democrats have just months to reach consensus before they have to start voting on spending bills for the war. And if there's no plan, what will they do? Cut off funds for the troops? Hardly. The public wants to see Democrats working with Republicans to unravel the knot. That could well happen if the bipartisan Iraq Study Group comes up with a palatable exit strategy. At least that's what both sides are privately hoping.

It's all refreshing, for a change. After six years of base politics—in which each party appealed to its most partisan supporters—the middle is making a comeback. That's good news for 2008; expect the presidential wannabes to start preaching bipartisanship. After all, the public is already there. It just took some time for the political leaders to catch on to the voters' orders on governing: Just do it.

"We Have To Start From A Level Of Trust" (TIME)

By Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, November 13, 2006

TIME What will it mean to be the first woman Speaker of the House?

DOJ_NMG_0092487

PELOSI It is a sensational feeling. Women walk up to me on the street. Every place I go, they are so thrilled. It is a source of inspiration for a lot of people. What it means is, I have to uphold the highest ethical standards and to have the most open and bipartisan Congress, to do so in a way that makes women proud and makes sure that pretty soon we'll have another woman Speaker of the House.

TIME Can Democrats trust President George W. Bush enough to work with him?

PELOSI I think we have to start from a level of trust. On some issues where there is consensus, we can cooperate and build bridges of trust.

TIME Oblivious, in denial, incompetent, dangerous. Do you regret using any of these words to describe the President?

PELOSI No.

TIME Should at least 30,000 troops be home from Iraq by this time next year?

PELOSI Yes. I would hope at least that number would be out of harm's way. They are viewed as an occupation force. Our presence there is a magnet for terrorists.

TIME If President Bush had fired Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld two months ago, would you be in the position you are now?

PELOSI Yes. Donald Rumsfeld is an employee. The President of the United States makes the policy, and the more he campaigned, the better we did.

TIME If Bush vetoes one or two of the bills you pass in the House, will that be a sign that he's not prepared to work with you?

PELOSI No, it's just a sign he disagrees with us.

TIME Will Americans see their taxes raised by Democrats?

PELOSI Middle-income families in America will see their taxes reduced.

TIME Is it correct that you might have hearings about how Hurricane Katrina was handled, but looking forward?

PELOSI Yes, exactly. The point is, What are the lessons learned from Katrina? Katrina still lingers. The challenge is still there for us. We have to address the issue of natural disasters in a way that doesn't say that your survival depends on your economic well-being.

TIME Will your performance as Speaker have implications for Hillary Clinton if she runs for President?

PELOSI I'm not sure you would have asked a man that about another man. But since this is unusual, I will respect your question. I think it's really important for the people of our country to see that women can wield power and success in this rarefied and high altitude of power. I don't think Hillary Clinton, though, needs any validation from any other woman. She is an experienced Senator, articulate and a force in her own right.

Lieberman A Wild Card In Iraq Policy (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Voters seemed to be speaking loudly and clearly about Iraq last week when they elected war critics such as Bernard Sanders of Vermont, Sherrod Brown of Ohio and James Webb of Virginia to the Senate.

Yet they also gave a fourth term to Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, a staunch supporter of the war, and in the narrowly divided Senate that will convene in January, the veteran Connecticut Democrat is positioning himself to become a key figure in discussions about U.S. policy in Iraq.

Yesterday, Lieberman -- who won as an independent last week -- spelled out his vision for a congressional working group of Democratic committee chairmen and senior Republicans to monitor the course of the war and work with President Bush to bring it to a successful end.

"We're not going to fix this and succeed in Iraq without working across party lines," he said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

As Congress returns this week to Washington for a post-election session -- the final stint with Republicans in charge -- Lieberman is already asserting his status as a self-described political freelancer, beholden to neither party.

DOJ_NMG_0092488

He has pledged to "sign up" with the Democrats for the 110th Congress but has made it clear that his motives are at least partly practical. By organizing with the party, even though he lost the Democratic primary to Ned Lamont, Lieberman will retain his 18 years of Senate seniority and rise to the chairmanship of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

Both sides are seeking to please this political wild card.

Republicans and the White House are indebted to Lieberman for supporting the unpopular war throughout his tough election campaign. They view him as a valuable bridge to their Democratic adversaries on national security issues.

Many Democrats remain angry with their former vice presidential nominee for not bowing out after his primary loss to the more liberal Lamont. Still, they recognize that he is crucial to their one-seat Senate majority.

Pro-war in an antiwar state, Lieberman is one of the few prominent war defenders to survive a tough challenge on Nov. 7, and with his victory comes a measure of validation.

Speaking in Hartford last Wednesday, Lieberman remained unwavering in his opposition to Democrats' calls for withdrawing troops from Iraq. "What we are doing now there is not working, but that doesn't mean in any sense that it is time for us to retreat," he said. "This is a test in a very difficult and dangerous hour in our history."

But his victory also was something of an aberration, and whatever the fate of Lieberman's proposed bipartisan group, which he pledges to introduce in January, his continued support of Bush's stay-the-course approach places him well outside the Democratic mainstream.

"The voters spoke on Tuesday that they're unhappy with the status quo," Lieberman said. However, he added, "I don't believe they want us to pick up and leave."

Yet Senate Democratic leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) and other Democrats called yesterday for the Bush administration to begin withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq in the next few months.

The new Congress, said Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), in line to chair the Armed Services Committee, "is willing to implement the people's will and to put some pressure on this president to change course in Iraq, forget the stay-the-course policy that is no longer viable." Levin said on ABC's "This Week" that redeployment should begin within four to six months.

The Senate will include nine new members who are Democrats or who will organize with the party, and most of them either opposed the war or demanded a radical change of course.

Webb, a former Marine whose son is serving in Iraq, advanced a detailed plan to wind down U.S. involvement in the war by moving troops to other points in the region, such as Jordan and Kuwait, while beginning multilateral diplomatic talks. Jon Tester of Montana called for "a clear plan to give the Iraqi military control of their own country and bring our troops home."

Brown and Sanders, who opposed the war as members of the House, are seeking troop withdrawals. Claire McCaskill of Missouri was less vociferous in her opposition to the war but laid out a two-year timeline "to transition to a multinational security force and redeploy our troops."

Democratic leaders have promised a raft of initiatives as they take control of Congress, from a minimum-wage increase to alternative-energy incentives. But a major goal is to force Bush to reconsider his war strategy and his refusal to set a timetable for troop withdrawal. The current Republican leadership rarely challenged Bush in public, holding few of the hearings and floor debates that are mainstays of the legislative branch when it comes to major national events.

The ground could start shifting as early as next month. The independent Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a Republican, and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), is expected to make a series of recommendations on the future course of the war.

Although some observers conjecture that the election results may have damaged the group's likelihood of reaching recommendations both parties can support, its report could become a catalyst for a free-flowing dialogue on the war.

"Democrats will say this is a bipartisan effort," said James B. Steinberg, a Democratic national security expert and former Clinton administration official. If the recommendations prove reasonable, he noted, "it's going to be hard to say no."

In the Senate, Levin and Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) are certain to be major players in the war debate, along with the new Foreign Relations Committee chairman, Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), a likely presidential candidate in 2008. Lieberman, according to Steinberg, is unlikely to be invited into the huddle.

"They're not going to turn the policy over to the guy who's the closest to the administration," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0092489

Relations within the party are a bit touchy. Some Democrats hope that Lieberman's collaborative spirit does not translate into going too lightly on the administration by failing to scrutinize spending and policy priorities that fall under the homeland security panel's jurisdiction. Reid, who is expected to become Senate majority leader, spoke to Lieberman after his reelection and is urging his colleagues to forgive and forget.

"The only way we're going to be successful is to stay together," Reid said.

One scenario is that Lieberman could emerge as an interparty broker on Iraq along with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the presumptive front-runner for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008.

"There's the potential there for some interesting coalitions," said Jennifer Duffy, who monitors the Senate for the independent Cook Political Report.

Bush Must Call For Reinforcements In Iraq (FT)

By Robert Kagan, William Kristol

Financial Times, November 13, 2006

President George W. Bush has just over two years left in office. The central question facing him is: what kind of Iraq will he bequeath to his successor? Will it be a metastasising mess dumped on the doorstep of the next president, or an Iraq on the path to stability and success? The answer will determine how this president should be remembered by future generations.

There are, of course, other grave issues that will consume the Bush administration over the next two years: the continuing need to defend Americans from terrorist threats; Iran's efforts to acquire nuclear weapons; containment and weakening of a nuclear-armed North Korea; an increasingly belligerent Russia; and manifold challenges presented by a rising China. But the fact remains that Mr Bush (correctly, in our view) took the nation to war to remove Saddam Hussein, and the success or failure of that war will be central to his legacy.

The trajectory is downward towards failure. Indeed, this has been the case for more than three years, ever since Pentagon officials decided to put far too few troops in Iraq to bring stability after Hussein's ousting. The result has been not only a consistently inadequate level of forces. The endless cycle of promised draw-downs, deteriorating security and cancellation of the proposed draw-downs has been politically disastrous in both Iraq and the US.

In Iraq, US policies have steadily undermined public confidence that America has either the will or capacity to provide the security Iraqis need. So they have turned to their own sectarian armed groups for protection. That, and not historical inevitability or the alleged failings of the Iraqi people, has brought Iraq closer to civil war.

These policies have been equally damaging in the US. The American people have rightly judged that the administration is floundering in Iraq and, worse, is not committed to doing what is necessary to succeed. This perception undoubtedly played a large part in last week's mid-term election. Now, many Americans are looking to the Iraq Study Group, the commission headed by James Baker and Lee Hamilton, for a face-saving, bipartisan way to withdraw from Iraq as quickly as possible. The great irony is that with nothing new to offer, the Baker commission's forthcoming report – if it takes the shape most observers predict – will probably suffer the same fate as similar past efforts.

There is a popular theory that the prospect of US withdrawal will force Iraqis to reach an accommodation with one another. This would be more plausible had it not been disproved by three years of painful experience. Instead of looking for a face-saving way to lose in Iraq, President Bush could finally demand of his top advisers a strategy to succeed: provide the US force levels necessary to achieve even minimal political objectives. This could begin by increasing US troops in Iraq by at least 50,000 in order to clear and hold Baghdad without shifting troops from other parts of Iraq. These operations could then be expanded into areas of insurgency. This strategy would not stabilise the country right away but could secure Iraq's vital centre and provide real hope for progress.

Those who claim that 50,000 more troops do not exist to send to Iraq are wrong. But it is true that US ground forces are stretched, and that steps are needed to increase their overall size.

If the president undertook to send the necessary troops, we have no doubt many likely recommendations from the Baker commission would make sense and could be supported. We share the commission's belief that the administration should actively seek bipartisan support for its approach to Iraq. Democratic hopefuls for the 2008 presidential elections should welcome any effort to ensure they are not left to deal with a collapsing country. There is much easy talk of how a victory strategy in Iraq has been rendered impossible by Tuesday's elections. This is nonsense. First, victory in Iraq is a national priority, and to abandon it because of a loss of House and Senate seats would be irresponsible. The Republican loss was largely due to lack of confidence that Mr Bush had a victory strategy for Iraq, not a belief that he was not exiting fast enough. If the president makes clear he has such a strategy, he will have the support to do what is necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0092490

As for the Baker commission's likely recommendation that the US should engage Syria and Iran in the search for solutions in Iraq, we are sceptical these countries want to help. But it is one thing to seek their help while the US is losing and its negotiating position is weakest, and quite another to engage in such diplomacy while increasing US force levels to try to improve the security situation.

Finally, as others have noted, if the Iraqis choose to organise their country in a less "unified" and more "federated" way, that is fine – as long as it is peaceful and stable. A peaceful, federated Iraq will, however, require no less of a commitment of US troops to provide security than a unitary one.

The president has two years to turn things around and leave a viable Iraq to the next president. It should be obvious that "staying the course" is a recipe for failure. So are politically driven exit strategies. The president is left with the choice: quit, or do what is necessary to succeed. We trust he understands that the task before him in Iraq is to find a strategy for success.

Robert Kagan is author of "Dangerous Nation" (Alfred A. Knopf) and a contributing editor at The Weekly Standard. William Kristol is editor of The Weekly Standard. This article is based on a longer essay in this week's Standard.

Iraq Is Gone. Now What? (WP)

By Monica Duffy Toft

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Some 3 1/2 years after the U.S. invasion, most scholars and policy analysts accept that Iraq is now in a civil war. But many policymakers have not been willing to face up to the consequences. The key question is how Iraq will be stabilized.

It is an important question, because the stability and prosperity of a post-civil-war state depends in large measure on how the war ends. The fighting can stop in a variety of ways -- by military victory or negotiated settlement. Historically speaking, military victories have been the most common and have most often led to lasting resolutions. So while a negotiated settlement may seem the most desirable end point, this resolution is frequently short-lived even with third-party support.

A negotiated settlement is what the United States has attempted to implement for the past two years in Iraq, and it is failing.

The process of writing and adopting a constitution and electing a president and parliament were all designed to give each of Iraq's communities a say in the government. Although the Kurds and the Shiites participated fully in the process, the Sunnis did not. Consequently, the Sunnis do not see the government as representing, much less protecting, their interests. Although the Kurds participated in the formation of the government, they have maintained their distance while strengthening their own militia.

The trend lines in Iraq are toward a continuation of this fragmentation. So the argument in favor of a sustained U.S. presence to help enforce a peace settlement ignores both the situation there and past precedent.

Military victories, by contrast, historically result in the most stable outcomes. The reason is that typically a strong faction with a robust military is preserved. In these instances, problems with democratization, governance and political institutions certainly remain, but the state that survives retains its monopoly on the legitimate use of force and is able to leverage that legitimacy to stabilize and institute peace. Only after peace is achieved can issues of democracy, development and justice be dealt with.

Although the United States seemed to have forgotten the centrality of a state's monopoly on the legitimate use of force when it summarily disbanded Iraqi security forces, it subsequently relearned this lesson. The United States and its Iraqi partners are desperately trying to rebuild Iraq's security forces in order to have more effective policing. The problem is that it is already too late for "Iraqi" security forces to reestablish stability. The Iraqi government's forces are increasingly identified as "Shiite" forces. As it stands, schisms will continue to grow, neighbor will attack neighbor, quasi-states with their own militias will solidify and the challenges of stabilizing an Iraqi state will escalate by an order of magnitude.

What does all this mean for Iraq's end state? First, it means the end of the state of Iraq as we have known it. Iraq is rapidly disintegrating, and there is no longer anything that can stop the disintegration, save perhaps an invasion by Israel, Iran or Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0092491

Second, having missed a number of critical opportunities from the beginning of its campaign to topple Saddam Hussein and establish democratic government in Iraq (the latter proposition dubious at best), the United States is now faced with an awful choice: leave and allow events to run their course or lend its dwindling support to one or more of the emerging states.

If it leaves, the Shiites will brutally settle accounts with the Sunnis before, perhaps, opening hostilities against the Kurds (with tacit support from Iran and Turkey).

If it supports the Kurds and Shiites -- the two peoples most abused under Hussein, most betrayed by the United States since 1990 and, as a result, the two most worthy of our support on moral grounds -- it risks alienating important regional allies: Turkey, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Pakistan. On the other hand, doing the right thing (supporting the Shiites) also means doing the most practical thing, which is ensuring a stable peace and establishing long-term prospects for democracy and economic development. As a bonus, it is possible that U.S. support of the Shiite majority might pay diplomatic dividends as regards Iran's impending nuclearization.

If the United States supports the Sunnis, it will be in a position very close to its Vietnam experience: struggling to underwrite the survival of a militarily untenable, corrupt and formerly brutal minority regime with no hope of gaining broader legitimacy in the territory of the former Iraq.

Moreover, even if successful, supporting the Sunnis -- in effect the incumbents in what was until recently a brutal dictatorship -- will result in a much greater likelihood of future war and regional instability (not to mention authoritarianism), even with a formidable U.S. military presence (and the less-than-formidable U.S. presence has already become politically untenable in the United States).

It is high time the United States and its allies began national discussions about the relative merits of leaving or staying and, if they stay, about the merits of supporting the Sunnis, Shiites or Kurds. Either way, what we now think of as Iraq is almost certainly as gone as what we once thought of as Yugoslavia, and for the same reasons.

The writer is an associate professor of public policy at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government. She is the author of "The Geography of Ethnic Violence" and is finishing a book on the termination of civil wars.

Oh, The Humanities! (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Wednesday, on the hung-over morning after midterm voters told President Bush what they thought of the Iraq war, a White House news release arrived in our inbox, with the cryptic subject line "PERSONNEL ANNOUNCEMENT."

Hidden therein was a list of this year's National Medal of Arts and National Humanities Medal winners, to be honored the next day by the president and first lady Laura Bush in the Oval Office. No invite, no number to call for information, just a list.

Why so little fanfare? Could it have been because the humanities honorees included Middle East scholars-turned-Bush advisers Fouad Ajami and Bernard Lewis, whose views helped get us into Iraq in the first place?

On the day of the prestigious ceremony, the White House Web site featured -- nothing.

Iraqi Prime Minister Promises Government Shake-Up (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 12 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said Sunday that he was planning a major shake-up of his cabinet, apparently to redress his six-month-old government's failure to curb widespread corruption, reduce sectarian violence and improve public services.

Speaking to a closed session of Parliament, Mr. Maliki suggested that some of his ministers were incompetent but said he had been forced to accept his cabinet under pressure from the country's major political blocs, according to several legislators. The prime minister asked for more independence in choosing new cabinet members.

The parliamentary session came on a day when at least 100 people were found dead or reported killed in mayhem throughout the country. In one attack, a pair of suicide bombers detonated themselves outside a police recruitment center in Baghdad, killing at least 35 potential recruits and wounding at least 56, the police said. Military officials reported that four British soldiers and three American soldiers died in attacks in Anbar and Basra provinces.

DOJ_NMG_0092492

During the parliamentary session, Mr. Maliki did not disclose which ministers he planned to replace. But legislators close to the prime minister said he did not intend to change the political distribution of the cabinet seats. Mr. Maliki's cabinet is mostly Shiite, but includes representatives of Iraq's main ethnic and sectarian communities.

The proposed shake-up, coming as the Bush administration has begun a major reassessment of U.S. policy in Iraq, appeared to be an effort both to curry American favor and to placate Mr. Maliki's domestic detractors, including Sunni Arab leaders demanding a greater role in government and more action against Shiite militias accused of spawning death squads.

The Maliki administration has been facing mounting criticism from American officials and some Iraqi leaders impatient with the prime minister's inability — or unwillingness — to disarm militias, particularly those linked to the most powerful Shiite parties that form the basis of his ruling political alliance. Mr. Maliki has been so concerned about growing American disenchantment that last month he sought, and received, assurances from President Bush that the United States was not plotting to unseat him.

Several months ago, Mr. Maliki expressed his intention to replace several of his 36 ministers, but Sunday's announcement suggested far more sweeping changes that, according to some legislators, could involve more than half of the cabinet.

Mr. Maliki was nominated as prime minister on April 21 and his full cabinet was ratified by Parliament on May 20. But he told legislators on Sunday that he was essentially sidelined by the major political blocs during the ministerial selection process. In some cases, he said, a minister's name was presented to him only minutes before the nomination was made public.

Hassan al-Sined, a Shiite legislator and an adviser to Mr. Maliki, heralded Sunday's announcement as a "courageous move" because it represented an admission that the government's performance had been weak.

But others questioned the prime minister's sincerity and wondered whether Mr. Maliki was not simply trying to blame the political blocs for his lackluster progress.

"Now that he has not succeeded, he doesn't want to shoulder all the responsibility," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish legislator.

According to a statement issued by his office, Mr. Maliki called on the legislators to unify behind his national reconciliation plan, a strategy he unveiled in June to reduce violence through amnesty and dialogue. He also asked them to suspend their criticism of the government and to declare their loyalty to a unified Iraq above religious and sectarian allegiances.

After the parliamentary session, Salman al-Jumaili, a Sunni Arab legislator, said: "Let me tell you, all this talk means nothing for us unless we see some decisions and practical moves taken on the ground. We hope that there will be a chance for reform before things get worse."

The attack outside the police recruitment center, in western Baghdad, came Sunday morning as scores of men were waiting to pass through checkpoints that led inside the building. The two bombers waded into the crowd and detonated their hidden explosive belts, spraying metal balls and shrapnel.

Recruiting centers have been an occasional target for insurgents trying to interfere with the government's efforts to build the Iraqi security forces. The chief spokesman for the Ministry of Interior, which oversees the police forces, said that in spite of measures adopted to safeguard recruits as they arrive at the centers, bottlenecks inevitably formed at the entrances. "There's no way to protect against such accidents," said the spokesman, Abdel Karim Khalaf.

A spokesman for Britain's Ministry of Defense said in London that the four British soldiers were killed and three wounded when their patrol boat was bombed Sunday on the Shatt al Arab waterway in the southern city of Basra. Military officials said it was unclear where the bomb had been hidden or how it was detonated.

At least 125 British troops have been killed in Iraq since the American-led invasion in 2003, officials said. Prime Minister Tony Blair has been under considerable public pressure in Britain to draw down British troops in Iraq. The American military command announced Sunday that three American soldiers were killed Saturday in an insurgent attack in Anbar Province, bringing the tally of American troops killed so far this month to 27.

DOJ_NMG_0092493

In addition to those killed at the recruitment center, at least 25 people were killed on Sunday and 65 wounded in more than a dozen other attacks reported by the authorities in Baghdad and Baquba. In addition, at least 33 bodies, all showing signs of torture and with gunshots to the head, were found in Baghdad and in Diyala Province, the ministry official said.

One of the bombs exploded near the house of Sheik Abu Ali, who works for the Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the most revered Shiite cleric in Iraq, a police official said. Three of the sheik's children were killed in the blast, the official said.

Iraq Prime Minister Plans Big Reshuffle (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, November 13, 2006

Nouri al-Maliki, Iraq's prime minister, told parliamentarians on Sunday that he was planning a "comprehensive" reshuffle of ministers in his national unity government, and scolded lawmakers for failing to show their loyalty to a united Iraq.

The declaration is part of an apparent push to revive an initiative to bring the country's quarrelling sectarian blocs into a national pact, after the government was accused by both Sunni and Shia of failing to protect them.

"The prime minister has called for a comprehensive cabinet reshuffle appropriate for the current situation in the country," said a statement from the prime minister's office issued after the parliamentary session.

The statement came as violence continued to rage in and around Baghdad, with a suicide bombing outside a police recruiting centre in the capital yesterday killing at least 33 people.

Meanwhile, police were searching south of the capital for gunmen who killed 10 Shia travellers and kidnapped about 50 others late on Saturday.

A leading Shia politician warned that local tribes were heading to the area to join the search – a development that could herald a fresh round of violence.

Speaking before parliament, Abd al-Karim al-Anzi said the kidnappers had worn Iraqi army uniforms and complained that security forces were not doing enough to rescue the hostages.

The incident illustrates how each round of violence diminishes the public's already shaky confidence in the state.

This lack of confidence has led to a reluctance on the part of the country's different factions to compromise over control of security agencies deemed essential to their community's survival and explains the rise of local militias.

Yassin Majid, prime ministerial press adviser, said that the reshuffle could include between seven and nine ministers, but did not say what those ministries would be.

Iraqi parliamentarians have been forecasting a reshuffle for months, but this is the clearest indication from the government so far that a change in the government is imminent.

Criticisms have focused on the vital interior and defence ministries, which control the security forces. The interior ministry is held by independent Shia politician Jawad al-Bolani, who has attempted to purge officers connected with Shia militias and recently referred some others accused of torture to trial.

But according to many Sunni, the government has not moved quickly enough to fulfil its pledge to create a non-sectarian police force.

The defence portfolio is held by Abd al-Qader al-Ubaidi, an independent Sunni Arab.

In choosing new ministers, Mr Maliki will face the challenge of winning approval from parties that have seen little interest in reaching compromises, and instead appear to have sought control over government agencies to give them an edge in the country's sectarian conflict.

In the closed session, Mr Maliki told the attendant lawmakers: "You all have militias. I will not accept a government made up of militiamen," according to a parliamentarian quoted by the Associated Press.

Under pressure from the US, Mr Maliki is trying to reach consensus among Iraqi politicians on a range of divisive issues including control of the country's oil resources, disarming militias and insurgents and the scheduling of provincial elections.

Blasts Kill Dozens Of Iraqi Police Recruits (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092494

BAGHDAD, Nov. 12 -- Two suicide bombers detonated explosives Sunday as a crowd of men gathered in front of a police recruiting center in central Baghdad, killing at least 35 people and wounding 56 in one of the deadliest suicide attacks in Iraq this year.

The blasts, coming hours before Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced plans for a major cabinet shake-up, delivered the latest blow to U.S. and Iraqi efforts to strengthen the country's fledgling security forces. Such efforts are a key element of the U.S. strategy to draw down troop strength and contain the sectarian violence that is pushing the country toward civil war.

At Baghdad's Yarmouk Hospital, young men with bandaged limbs lay in small beds, writhing in pain. Some said they had come from as far away as the southern city of Basra to join the police force because they were unemployed and needed to feed their families.

"We were all sitting down waiting for instructions from the loudspeaker. Suddenly, there was a huge amount of fire and dust," said Ali Mutashir, 35, limping slowly across the cream-colored floor, his tan shirt splattered with dried blood. "We fled toward a side street. Then came another blast of fire. It threw me against a wall."

The bombers detonated explosives belts almost simultaneously around 9:30 a.m., Interior Ministry officials said. Some witnesses said two mortar shells fell minutes after the bombings, as they were fleeing the scene.

The officials said they expected the death toll to rise because many of the wounded were in critical condition. As of late Sunday, there were differing accounts of the toll, with one Interior Ministry official saying that as many as 42 people had been killed.

The attack comes as the Bush administration and the Iraqi government prepare for a shift in U.S. policy in Iraq in the wake of the Democratic takeover of both houses of Congress in elections last week. U.S. military commanders and the Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, a former congressman, plan to recommend alternative ways of dealing with Iraq as pressure mounts to withdraw U.S. troops.

Faced with his own pressures, Maliki called for a sweeping reorganization of his cabinet in a closed session with Iraqi lawmakers Sunday, echoing a similar statement he made earlier this month. His office said in a statement that Maliki had "called for a complete ministerial reshuffle in accordance with the current situation," but it provided no details of the shake-up, which had been rumored for weeks.

Maliki's six-month-old government is under pressure from the United States, its main patron, to stop sectarian strife, disarm militias that have infiltrated government ministries and root out widespread graft by government officials. The prime minister also faces growing criticism from Iraqis frustrated with the government's failure to provide basic services, employment and security.

Maliki's efforts have so far been ineffective, as he struggles to balance the needs of his diverse political allies inside the government -- some of whom operate the militias he is trying to disband -- against the demands of a politically weakened Bush administration.

On Sunday, Maliki had in effect acknowledged that his government was weak, said Hasan Suneid, a lawmaker and close aide of the prime minister's. Maliki told lawmakers in the closed session that he had been forced to accept ministers chosen by political blocs and that some were incompetent, said Suneid, who attended the meeting. Maliki asked the blocs to nominate new people for his cabinet, based more on their qualifications than on their political loyalties.

"From the first day, Maliki knew that his cabinet is not in a shape that can face all the challenges of the country," Suneid said. "But now he's seeing he cannot keep silent about some ministries. A new cabinet needs to rise. . . . Personally, I am expecting a reshuffling of more than half the cabinet."

Sunday's bombing was the bloodiest assault on a police recruitment center since January, when a suicide bomber killed 70 police recruits in the western city of Ramadi. Sunni Arab insurgents frequently target police, to deter recruitment and also because national police are widely believed to be infiltrated by Shiite militias keen on protecting the interests of their sect.

Less than a half-hour after the suicide attacks, two bombs targeting a national police patrol exploded on a main artery in central Baghdad, killing three policemen and wounding five others. The blasts also killed two civilians and wounded seven, said Col. Kareem Hamza, an Interior Ministry official. On Saturday, policemen were attacked in the cities of Baqubah and Kirkuk.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the recruits killed or injured Sunday would "receive all the salaries and rights of any other employee at the Ministry of Interior."

DOJ_NMG_0092495

In other violence, the U.S. military announced the combat-related deaths of three U.S. soldiers in Anbar province, bringing to 27 the number of American troops killed this month.

At least 50 bodies were found behind a regional electrical company in Baqubah and 25 others in Baghdad, the Associated Press reported.

A car bomb killed one civilian and wounded four in the central Karrada district of the capital, and a roadside bomb wounded four in the Radwaniyah district of southwestern Baghdad, Khalaf said.

At Yarmouk Hospital, Mutashir, the wounded recruit, said three of his relatives, also police recruits, had been killed in the bombing. One was burned so badly that his corpse could be identified only by a scar on his leg.

Two of his cousins were seriously wounded, including Ali Jumat, 23, who was lying in a bed. His body was peppered with pink shrapnel splotches. His hair was singed brown from the explosion's flames. His eyes were deep red.

When asked why he wanted to become a policeman, Jumat appeared to be in even more pain. "I am the only supporter of my family," he replied, before closing his eyes.

Iraqi Leader Scolds Parliament, Promises Change (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki scolded lawmakers at a closed Parliament session Sunday for putting sectarian concerns over national interests, and promised sweeping Cabinet changes, following complaints that his unity government has been ineffective at containing violence that killed nearly 100 people in 24 hours.

He later told journalist he has authorized the use of "extreme force" against private militias blamed for surging bloodshed between Iraq's dominant Muslim sects that has claimed more lives lately than the anti-U.S. insurgency.

"There cannot be a government and militias together. One of the two should rule," al-Maliki said in a session Sunday with Iraqi newspaper editors that was broadcast on national television. "I personally will not be in a government based on militias."

It was unusually tough language for a leader widely criticized for not standing up to key members of his governing Shiite coalition, some of whom are backed by militias blamed for killing sprees against the Sunni Arab minority.

The bodies of at least 33 victims of sectarian killings, many of them cuffed and tortured, were found in parts of Baghdad and Baqubah in the 24 hours ending Sunday night, officials said.

At least 65 other people were killed in bombings, drive-by shootings and other attacks Sunday, including 38 who died in twin suicide bombings at a police recruitment center in Baghdad .

Frustration has been mounting on all sides at the unrelenting toll. Sunni political leaders in recent weeks have threatened to walk out of the government, undermining a multi-ethnic coalition that U.S. officials had hoped would blunt the violence. .

Shiites in Diwaniya, a strife-torn region south of Baghdad, threatened to take up arms Sunday and hunt down the kidnappers of at least 11 fellow tribesmen if the government failed to find them, provincial leaders said.

There also has been intense pressure from U.S. officials who want al-Maliki to commit to timelines to make the tough political and security decisions needed to contain the bloodshed.

Al-Maliki demanded in the closed session that lawmakers set aside personal interests and partisan loyalties for the sake of national stability, according to his office.

Al-Maliki's aides had previously indicated he planned to replace a few members of his Cabinet, but Sunday's statement suggested the changes would be broader.

Al-Maliki asked for a free hand in shaping the new government, complaining he had no say over current members, who were selected by the main political blocs after months of wrangling.

"He even said he was only given some of the names five minutes before he announced them," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish legislator.

Othman did not expect the balance among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds to change in a new government, but he said al-Maliki wanted to select names himself within those blocs.

There was no word on when the new Cabinet would be announced.

DOJ_NMG_0092496

Sunni lawmakers welcomed al-Maliki's tougher stance against militias but questioned whether he would be as effective against Shiite militias as Sunni groups.

"There will be selectivity in dealing with the sides that are carrying guns for and against the government," Sunni legislator Salim Abdalla predicted.

Underscoring the gravity of the violence, two suicide bombers joined a crowd waiting outside a Baghdad police recruitment center and detonated the charges strapped to their waists, said Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Khalaf.

He said the coordinated attack had "the fingerprints" of al- Qaida in Iraq, the country's most feared terrorist group.

The near-simultaneous blasts killed 38 people and injured more than 50, according to officials at the nearby Yarmouk Hospital.

Salah Hasnawi, a 21-year-old Shiite, was among those waiting to clear security to enter the center when the attack happened.

"I was thrown to the ground," he said from a bed in Yarmouk Hospital, where he was being treated for shrapnel wounds to both legs. "I tried to run, fearing other explosions, but my legs wouldn't carry me."

He was saved, he said, by two Sunni men who survived the first blast unscathed only to be wounded by the second.

"We tried to carry him to the hospital, then we felt the second explosion," said one of the two, 23-year-old Mousa Zoubayi.

Zoubayi's face was burned and shrapnel sliced into his back, arm and one eye. He said he did not think Hasnawi's other rescuer survived the second blast.

South of the capital, in Najaf, a bomb planted in a pile of sand in front of the home of Sheikh Abbas Alsarraj killed two of the Shiite cleric's sons and injured a third, police said.

Iraqi Leader, Feeling Pressure, Promises To Remake Cabinet (USAT)

USA Today, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's prime minister, a Shiite Muslim, promised Sunday to reshuffle his Cabinet after he accused lawmakers of disloyalty and blamed Sunni Muslims for sectarian violence that claimed at least 159 more lives.

Also Sunday, the country's defense minister challenged Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's contention that the U.S. military should pull back and let the Iraqi army take control of security all across the country. Defense Minister Abdul-Qadir al-Obaidi said his men are still too poorly equipped and trained to do the job.

“We are working hard to create a real army, and we ask our government not to try to move too quickly because of the political pressure it feels,” al-Obaidi said. “Our technical needs are real, and that is very important if we are to be a real force against insecurity.”

Al-Maliki has called for U.S. troops in Iraq to be confined to bases and to be called on only in emergencies. He predicted that the Iraqi army could crush violence within six months. Last month, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey said that it would take 12 to 18 months before Iraq's army was ready to take over — and that the Iraqis would still need some U.S. backup.

The prime minister promised a Cabinet shakeup during a closed session of the parliament Sunday, his office said in a statement.

“The government's performance has been unconvincing,” said Khaled al-Attiya, the Shiite deputy parliament speaker who chaired the closed session. “That's why the prime minister wishes to change the Cabinet.”

Al-Maliki is under pressure from both Washington and his fellow Iraqis to curb violence. The United States is leaning on him to disband Shiite militias believed responsible for many of the killings. His government, however, relies heavily on the support of parties tied to militias, such as that of Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

In the latest violence, two suicide bombers blew themselves up simultaneously Sunday outside a police station in western Baghdad, police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razaq said. The attack killed 35 police recruits. It was one of several bombings in the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0092497

In Baqouba, the Iraqi army's provincial public affairs office said troops found 50 bodies dumped behind the offices of the provincial electric company. Nineteen of the bodies were taken to a morgue. The army was waiting for U.S. bomb-disposal teams to arrive before moving the other 31, for fear that they were booby-trapped.

Abdul-Razaq said Baghdad police had found 25 bullet-riddled, handcuffed bodies in several parts of the capital. Dozens more bodies were found around the country.

After nearly 48 hours without reporting a death, the U.S. military said three soldiers assigned to the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division died Saturday of combat wounds in Anbar province, the insurgent stronghold west of the capital.

Four British servicemen died in an attack on a patrol boat in Basra's Shatt al-Arab waterway, the Defense Ministry said in London.

Iraqi Prime Minister Pledges To Reform Cabinet (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — Prime Minister Nouri Maliki scolded lawmakers Sunday for putting sectarian concerns over national interests and promised sweeping Cabinet changes after complaints that his unity government has been ineffective at containing violence.

Maliki later told journalists that he had authorized the use of "extreme force" against private militias blamed for the growing bloodshed between Iraq's dominant Muslim sects, including the deaths of nearly 100 people in 24 hours.

"There cannot be a government and militias together. One of the two should rule," Maliki said in a session Sunday with Iraqi newspaper editors broadcast on national television. "I personally will not be in a government based on militias."

It was unusually tough language for a leader widely criticized as failing to stand up to key members of his governing Shiite coalition, some of whom are backed by militias blamed for nightly killing rampages against the Sunni Arab minority.

The bodies of at least 33 victims of sectarian killings, many handcuffed and tortured, were found in Baghdad and Baqubah in the 24 hours ending Sunday night, officials said.

At least 66 other people were killed in bombings, drive-by shootings and other attacks Sunday, including 38 who died in twin suicide bombings at a police recruitment center in Baghdad.

Three U.S. soldiers assigned to the Army's 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division died Saturday of wounds sustained in combat in Al Anbar province, the military said Sunday.

Frustration has been mounting on all sides over the unrelenting toll. Sunni political leaders in recent weeks have threatened to walk out of the government, undermining a multiethnic coalition that U.S. officials had hoped would blunt the violence.

Shiites in Diwaniya, south of Baghdad, threatened to take up arms Sunday and hunt down the kidnappers of at least 11 fellow tribesmen if the government failed to find them, provincial leaders said.

There also has been intense pressure from U.S. officials, who want Maliki to commit to timelines to make the tough political and security decisions needed to contain the bloodshed.

Maliki demanded in a closed session of parliament that lawmakers set aside personal interests and partisan loyalties for the sake of national stability, according to his office.

The prime minister's aides had previously indicated that he planned to replace a few members of his Cabinet, but Sunday's statement suggested the changes would be broader.

Maliki asked for a free hand in shaping the new government, complaining he had no say over current members, who were selected by the main political blocs after months of wrangling.

"He even said he was only given some of the names five minutes before he announced them," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish legislator.

Othman did not expect the balance among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds to change in a new government, but he said Maliki wanted to select the names within those blocs.

There was no word on when the new Cabinet would be announced.

DOJ_NMG_0092498

Sunni lawmakers welcomed Maliki's tougher stance against militias but questioned whether he would be as effective against Shiite militias as Sunni groups.

"There will be selectivity in dealing with the sides that are carrying guns for and against the government," predicted Sunni legislator Salim Abdalla.

Underscoring the gravity of the violence, two suicide bombers joined a crowd waiting outside a Baghdad police recruitment center and detonated charges strapped to their waists, said Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Khalaf.

He said the coordinated attack had "the fingerprints" of Al Qaeda in Iraq, the country's most feared terrorist group.

The near-simultaneous blasts killed 38 people and injured more than 50, according to officials at nearby Yarmouk Hospital.

Salah Hasnawi, a 21-year-old Shiite, was among those waiting to clear security to enter the center when the attack occurred.

"I was thrown to the ground," he said from a bed at the hospital, where he was being treated for shrapnel wounds to both legs. "I tried to run, fearing other explosions, but my legs wouldn't carry me."

He was saved, he said, by two Sunni men who survived the first blast unscathed, only to be wounded by the second.

"We tried to carry him to the hospital, then we felt the second explosion," said one of the two, Mousa Zoubayi, 23. "I saw body parts scattered here and there, even in the trees and rooftops of houses that have been abandoned by their owners because of the danger in this area."

Zoubayi's face was burned and shrapnel had sliced into his back, arm and eye. He said he did not think Hasnawi's other rescuer survived the second blast.

Asked whether he knew that the man he helped save was a Shiite, Zoubayi said: "I saw a man who was in need of help and that is why I helped him. It makes no difference whether he is Shiite or Sunni."

South of the capital, in Najaf, a bomb planted in a pile of sand in front of the home of Sheik Abbas Alsarraj killed two of the Shiite cleric's sons and injured a third, police said.

Al-Maliki Vows Cabinet Shake-up (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The Shi'ite prime minister promised yesterday to reshuffle his Cabinet after calling lawmakers disloyal and blaming Sunni Muslims for raging sectarian violence that has claimed at least 159 more lives -- including 35 men waiting to join Iraq's police force.

Among the unusually high number of dead were 50 bodies found behind a regional electrical company in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, and 25 found scattered throughout the capital. Three U.S. troops were reported killed, as were four British service members.

Also yesterday, the Sunni defense minister challenged Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's contention that the U.S. military should quickly pull back into bases and let the Iraqi army take control of security countrywide. Defense Minister Abdul-Qadir al-Obaidi said his men still were too poorly equipped and trained to do the job.

"We are working hard to create a real army, and we ask our government not to try to move too quickly because of the political pressure it feels. Our technical needs are real, and that is very important if we are to be a real force against insecurity," Mr. al-Obaidi said.

Mr. al-Maliki wants the Americans confined to bases, where they can be called in emergencies, but he boldly predicted that his army could crush violence within six months if left alone to do the work.

The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, said last month that it would take 12 to 18 months before Iraq's army was ready to take control of the country with some U.S. backup.

Lawmakers from Mr. al-Maliki's Islamic Dawa party said Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani was at the top of the list to lose his post in the coming Cabinet shake-up, which the prime minister promised during a closed-door parliament session yesterday, because that has reached civil war proportions in Baghdad and the center of the country.

DOJ_NMG_0092499

Mr. al-Bolani, a Shi'ite whose police and security forces have failed to halt unbridled sectarian killing, is an independent. The United States had demanded that the defense and interior posts be held by officials without ties to the Shi'ite political parties that control militia forces.

Mr. al-Maliki is under pressure both from his people and the United States to curb violence, with Washington leaning on him to disband Shi'ite militias, whose death squads are thought to be responsible for much of the killings.

The prime minister's hold on power depends on both the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, with its Badr Brigade military wing and radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's political movement.

The interior minister controls police and other security forces, which already are infiltrated by the Badr Brigade and the Mahdi Army, the armed wing of Sheik al-Sadr's political movement.

After nearly 48 hours without reporting a death, the U.S. military said three soldiers assigned to the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division died Saturday of combat wounds in Anbar province, the insurgent stronghold west of the capital. Their deaths raised to 2,848 the number of service members who have had died since the start of the war in March 2003.

Four British troops were killed in an attack on a patrol boat in Basra's Shatt al-Arab waterway in southern Iraq, the Ministry of Defense said in London.

Influence Rises But Base Frays For Iraqi Cleric (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 12 — Few have ever described Moktada al-Sadr, the mercurial leader of Iraq's mightiest Shiite militia, as a statesman.

Yet there he was last month sitting on a pristine couch with the prime minister (no longer cross-legged on the floor), making public calls as well as sending private text messages to aides discouraging sectarianism, and paying visits to the home of Iraq's most senior Shiite cleric.

For years an angry outsider, Mr. Sadr, 33, has moved deep into the inner sanctum of the Iraqi government largely because his followers make up the biggest and most volatile Shiite militia. Now, after more than a year in power, he and his top lieutenants are firmly part of the establishment, a position that has brought new comfort and wealth. That change has shifted the threat for the American military, which no longer faces mass uprisings by Mr. Sadr's fighters when it enters their turf.

But the taming of Mr. Sadr has produced a paradox: the more settled he becomes in the establishment, the looser his grip is over his fighters on the streets and those increasingly infiltrating the security forces. In the two years since they fought against American tanks at Mr. Sadr's command, many have broken away from the confines of compromise that bind him, and have taken a far more active role in killing, something his supporters say worries him. He says he is trying to weed them out — 40 were publicly dismissed last month.

The increasing violence of some of his followers mirrors the overall unraveling of Iraq, which has become less centrally controlled and far more criminal since the American invasion in 2003. The situation is one of the highest priorities for the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress in the United States.

The Sadrists "are really facing a problem," said one Shiite politician. "They formed a militia. It expanded. Now each one is a cell. This is the dangerous thing."

As always with the elusive Mr. Sadr, who has rarely granted interviews to foreign journalists, it is not clear whether his public pronouncements and efforts at reform are sincere, or how long they will last. But in Iraq, power flows from the barrel of a gun, and he, better than anyone, knows that.

Mr. Sadr's new prominence in politics is partly a result of intense American and Iraqi efforts. For most of 2004, Iraqi leaders shuttled south of Baghdad to Najaf, where he lives, to persuade him to get followers in his militia, the Mahdi Army, to disarm and also to ask him to enter the political process. Eventually, he did, though many of his followers kept their guns.

Now parties loyal to him control the single largest portion of seats in Parliament and elevated the prime minister to power. They control five government ministries.

DOJ_NMG_0092500

Mr. Sadr is often described as fickle, image-obsessed and having a short attention span. But lately, he has cut a more sophisticated image. He rented and refurbished a large house near his own for guests in Najaf, after returning from a monthlong trip early this year. It was his second visit abroad, and he met with princes and kings of Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon and Iran, according to a Shiite politician close to him.

"Now they can sit on couches," instead of rugs, he said. Perhaps most significant, Mr. Sadr has been paying visits to the son of Iraq's most senior Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, and apparently learning the arts of negotiation and compromise.

"Nowadays he's communicating better," said Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser. "Grand Ayatollah Sistani is trying to bring him within the fold."

While all this is happening, however, the war has grown far deadlier for Iraqis on the street, and many of Mr. Sadr's supporters are following a fresh crop of more militant Mahdi commanders.

It is not that poor, young Shiites no longer follow Mr. Sadr; his image still adorns concrete walls. Religious rap songs play just as loudly on the streets of Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite slum in eastern Baghdad that is the heart of his support. But Mr. Sadr's new call for calm — one he is required to make as a part of the Iraqi establishment — is not satisfying to many, who are deeply angry at sectarian killings by Sunni militias.

"When a worker is killed because he's from Sadr City, what do you expect from his family?" said a 26-year-old graduate student from Sadr City. "It is a fact that he will try to take revenge."

One result is a small proliferation of senior militia leaders — a coalition intelligence official said in September there were at least six — striking out on their own. One new commander is a fishmonger who goes by the name Abu Dera, meaning "man of the shield." According to legend, an American tank fired directly on him and missed.

Although his supporters deny it, Sunnis say Abu Dera is one of the city's biggest killers, responsible for thousands of murders of Sunnis whose bodies are surfacing daily in a giant garbage dump less than a mile from his block. He is often referred to as "the Zarqawi of the Shiites," a reference to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia who was killed by American forces last June.

The Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who is Shiite, has given the approval for the American military to arrest him. They have tried and failed at least twice.

Abu Dera clearly inspires Shiites who want to take the law into their own hands, or as they see it, carry out justice for Sunni aggression while their government looks on helplessly.

"Mahdi Army has killed the main insurgent figures," said the 26-year-old in Sadr City. "It did a favor for the Americans and the government."

The fracturing of Mr. Sadr's militia traces the arc of Iraq's history since the American invasion. In 2004, the American military was the common enemy, and Mr. Sadr's followers even joined Sunnis to fight in Falluja. But as vicious attacks by Sunni militias intensified, perception of the enemy shifted, and Iraq's two main sects began fighting each other.

One result has been a spectacular spike in killing — the monthly death toll in the capital has been double the rate of a year earlier — and Mr. Sadr's militia is being blamed.

At first, Mr. Sadr denied that his forces were responsible. Some Shiite Iraqi officials have said that many people claim Mahdi affiliations, even Sunni militants. Whatever the case, the killing has gotten so bad that he considers it a threat to his power, his supporters say.

"Now he's become very worried," said the politician who had discussed Mr. Sadr's trip abroad. "The violence has reached this point of being out of control." Even Mr. Maliki, the prime minister, has noted the predicament. "We don't know what Mahdi Army means any more," he remarked ruefully to a [news service] reporter recently.

Mr. Sadr has tried to fashion his organization after Hezbollah, the Lebanese Shiite militia commanded by Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, which showed its efficiency and unity of purpose during the war with Israel this summer, instituting exams for new members and dismissing wayward heads of his offices. In Basra, in the south, he is on his seventh since 2003. But Mr. Sadr has been thwarted by his undisciplined forces.

Mr. Sadr has disavowed a number of his commanders. At a Friday Prayer last month, the names of 40 dismissed Mahdi Army commanders were read aloud at a lectern in front of a sea of men holding umbrellas against the hot sun. Among them were

DOJ_NMG_0092501

Hassan Salim, the leader of the Mahdi Army in Baghdad, and Hajj Shimel, a prominent cleric. Abbas al-Kufi, Mr. Sadr's strongman enforcer, arrived from Najaf to attend the reading.

That public response fits snugly with the agenda of the American military, which is chipping away at the most corrupt edges of Mr. Sadr's empire through arrests.

Even though the military has made more than six forays into the area since early August, including an Oct. 25 attempt to arrest Abu Dera, Mr. Sadr has been largely silent, and the only repercussions were a few angry public remarks by Mr. Maliki.

Indeed, the challenge Mr. Sadr presented to the American military in 2004, when his followers fought tanks in flip-flops, seems to have melted away.

"We have arrested people who in 2004 we would have had to move M1 tanks to Sadr City to suppress an uprising over," said one intelligence official who spoke to reporters in September about Mr. Sadr's army. That is in part because Mr. Sadr is standing by a newly declared truce with the Americans and also because of the Sadrists' new proximity to power, well-connected local residents critical of the Mahdi militia say.

During a recent raid, area residents said, $4 million was found in the house of one militia member.

"Now Mahdi leaders have the money, they have the Parliament," said a merchant who asked not to be identified for safety reasons. "They do not want to risk it by fighting. Those who tasted the sweets will never give them up."

American and Iraqi officials say Iran is also a major financial source.

But while the unraveling of Mr. Sadr's unified militia takes away some problems for the military, it also creates new ones through the infiltration of the Iraqi security forces.

"You have more points of entry," said Lt. Col. Eric Schacht, whose soldiers patrol areas of largely Shiite eastern Baghdad.

American officials have urged Mr. Maliki to take up this problem with Mr. Sadr and, to some extent, he has. But sectarian divisions have hardened in politics, and Shiite leaders, incensed at what they say is an American obsession with militias, have treated Mr. Sadr gently.

"We find his arguments very true," said a Shiite lawmaker, Sami al-Askiri. "We agree with him."

Cleric Al-Sadr May Hold Iraq's Future In His Hands (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — Muqtada al-Sadr, the anti-American cleric President Bush once dismissed as the head of a "band of thugs," has emerged as one of the most powerful forces in Iraq, commanding a large militia and a growing political organization.

U.S. and Iraqi forces passed on a chance to arrest al-Sadr two years ago. Instead, Iraq's Shiite leaders encouraged him to enter the political process. The idea was to co-opt a threat to the Iraqi government. Critics say the plan backfired, placing Iraq's future in the hands of a firebrand whose Mahdi Army militia has intensified religious warfare and threatened the country's stability.

"I believe that the Mahdi Army continues to pose a threat," Sen. John McCain said in Arizona last week. "I believe al-Sadr has to be taken out."

That may not be realistic. "There are no good options in dealing with al-Sadr," says Wayne White, who formerly headed the State Department's Iraq intelligence team and is now at the Middle East Institute. "He has grown too powerful to be addressed in any reasonable way."

As President Bush and the Democrats in charge of a new Congress plot a new direction in Iraq, al-Sadr remains a huge obstacle unless the Iraqi government does what it has been unwilling or unable to do so far: neutralize him through political negotiations or a military confrontation.

His political group, for example, controls the Health Ministry and has used it to harbor death squads, infiltrate hospitals and punish al-Sadr's enemies, says Ayad al-Samarrai, the deputy chairman of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni group.

The U.S. military estimates the Mahdi Army has between 6,000 and 10,000 militants in Baghdad. Al-Sadr's militia and al-Qaeda in Iraq are among the groups most responsible for religious warfare, according to the latest Defense Department report to Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0092502

The Bush administration has urged the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to confront Shiite militias, including al-Sadr's Mahdi Army. Al-Maliki, who relies on al-Sadr for political support, has been slow to act, saying it may not be until next year before militias are disarmed. Al-Sadr's support was instrumental in putting al-Maliki in power.

Because of al-Sadr, "Al-Maliki was able to become prime minister despite the fact that other political parties had gained more seats in parliament," says Vali Nasr, author of The Shia Revival. "He is al-Sadr's prime minister."

Al-Sadr, 33, comes from one of Iraq's most prominent religious families. He's the fourth son of Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, one of the country's top religious leaders. The senior al-Sadr was gunned down along with two of his sons in 1999, allegedly by Saddam Hussein's henchmen.

Al-Sadr lacks his father's scholarly credentials, but he is charismatic, and his fiery sermons have attracted a large following among the country's Shiites, according to a 2004 report in the Middle East Quarterly. Al-Sadr's power is concentrated in Sadr City, a Shiite slum of about 2 million people in eastern Baghdad that was named for his father. Al-Sadr's followers include legions of poor, disaffected youths, who also make up the backbone of his armed militia.

"He's kind of a spokesman for the dispossessed," says Chris Toensing, editor of the Washington-based Middle East Report.

As early as July 2003, while most Iraqis were still celebrating the fall of Saddam's regime, al-Sadr was using his pulpit at a mosque in Kufa, south of Baghdad, to urge young recruits to join his new army. While Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most prominent Shiite religious leader, counseled patience, al-Sadr was whipping up his followers with anti-American speeches.

His forces clashed with U.S. forces in Najaf and Baghdad in 2004. Hundreds of his followers died in pitched battles with American troops. The militants were no match for superior U.S. training and firepower. But the revolt helped solidify al-Sadr's reputation.

In April 2004, an Iraqi judge issued an arrest warrant charging al-Sadr with the murder of a rival cleric, Abdul Majid al-Khoei. The U.S.-backed al-Khoei was hacked to death in April 2003, allegedly by al-Sadr's followers, as he left a Shiite shrine in Najaf.

Al-Sadr, however, was never arrested. Instead, he was invited to join the political process as part of the deal that ended his revolt.

Members of political parties loyal to al-Sadr won 30 seats in the 275-member parliament in elections last December. As a cleric, al-Sadr does not take a direct role in politics. But his supporters were given control of six Cabinet positions, including the Health Ministry.

On the streets, his militias have remained strong. "What makes him powerful is that he's the most effective military force in this sectarian conflict," Nasr says.

Al-Sadr has denied that his militia has been involved in criminal activity. Common criminals often identify themselves as Mahdi Army militants to carry out kidnappings and killings, says Bahaa al-Araji, a lawmaker loyal to al-Sadr.

Last month al-Sadr fired 41 members of the militia linked to illegal activities, al-Araji says, adding that there are rogue elements acting outside al-Sadr's control.

Iraq's Health Ministry is a case study in how al-Sadr used his government role to consolidate his political and military support.

Ministry-run hospitals have been used as a weapon against rival Sunnis, according to critics, such as Sunni lawmaker Mithal al-Alusi. "It's a jungle," al-Alusi says. "What (al-Sadr) has done with that ministry is criminal."

Last month, a Sunni man was taken to Kindi Hospital in central Baghdad for a gunshot wound, says Omar al-Jubouri, human rights director at the Iraqi Islamic Party.

He was shot and killed in his hospital bed, al-Jubouri says. His brother went to retrieve the body. He brought 17 male relatives along for protection, but they were quickly outgunned by an even larger group of armed men, believed to be the Mahdi Army, al-Jubouri says. The group was kidnapped and killed, he adds.

Two days later, the family picked up the 19 bodies, escorted by an Iraqi army convoy, from the Baghdad morgue. Al-Jubouri says some of the bodies showed signs of torture, including drill holes to the skull and electrocution burns.

DOJ_NMG_0092503

So many Sunnis have been followed and killed after picking up relatives at the ministry-controlled Baghdad morgue that al-Jubouri's party regularly coordinates Iraqi army convoys to escort the families, he says. “We'll wait until we have 17 or 18 bodies waiting,” he says. “Then we'll send for the convoy.”

Convoys are not always safe. On June 12, Ali al-Mahdawi, a physician and head of the Diyala Province health department, arrived at the Health Ministry headquarters with six bodyguards for an 8:30 a.m. meeting with Health Minister Ali al-Shemari, al-Samarrai says.

Al-Mahdawi had been nominated by Sunni political leaders to be deputy minister. After arriving at the ministry, three of the bodyguards waited in the parking lot, while three escorted the doctor to the meeting, al-Samarrai says. When the meeting ran late, a bodyguard in the parking lot called al-Mahdawi on his mobile phone.

“Don't worry, he's with friends,” a voice on the other end said before switching off the phone. Al-Mahdawi and the three guards haven't been seen since, al-Samarrai says. “Most probably, he's dead now,” he says. “It happens so often. Everybody knows about it. And they're not doing anything about it.”

Health Ministry spokesman Qasim Yahya would not comment on the allegations.

Mahdi Army militants have used Health Ministry and associated offices to detain and torture abductees, most of them Sunnis, according to U.S. officers.

Last month, U.S. and Iraqi troops raided a compound belonging to a social organization named for al-Sadr's father, says Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, commander of the Army's 1st Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment, which assisted in the raid. U.S. investigators believed the compound was run by al-Sadr loyalists, he says. One room contained a long wooden bench stained with blood and urine, indicating victims were tortured there, Smiley says.

Militia infiltration is not the ministry's only problem. The ministry also has become less effective since al-Sadr took over, says Jaleel Hadi al-Shamary, a physician and general director of the Karkh Health Department in western Baghdad.

Qualified bureaucrats have been replaced by party loyalists, leading to a steady exodus of qualified doctors and other officials, he says. About 600 of his department's 3,000 doctors have resigned or left the country, he says.

“The Health Ministry is in a real state of collapse,” al-Shamary says. “It's a scientific ministry and needs a scientific mind to run it. But … high-ranking officials are chosen due to their affiliation to the party.”

U.S. troops say a two-story complex linked to the al-Sadr organization in a nearby neighborhood also is being used as an illegal detention center. “Torturing, killing, everything under the sun happens there,” says 2nd Lt. David Michael Stroud, a platoon leader with the 1st Battalion, 23rd Infantry. “It's the heart of darkness.”

The complex is considered a “no-touch” zone, since it's aligned with al-Sadr, Stroud says. U.S. and Iraqi army units often need Iraqi government permission before raiding government offices. The Shiite-dominated government sometimes is reluctant to allow raids of al-Sadr associates. “It makes it difficult if someone is sponsoring or being complicit with criminal activity who's in a government position,” Smiley says. “It disrupts the essentials to making progress.”

Al-Maliki's government has targeted some Mahdi Army officials, and Iraqi security forces have clashed with the militants several times this year. In August, U.S. and Iraqi troops, working on a tip about a kidnapping ring, raided the Health Ministry offices and arrested five of al-Shemari's bodyguards.

Adil Muhsin Abdullah, the inspector general of the Health Ministry, says he has not received any reports of deaths squads or kidnapping cells linked to ministry-controlled hospitals or offices.

Al-Maliki has been reluctant to let U.S. troops launch large-scale attacks against the Mahdi Army because it would make the militia more popular and undermine rival Shiite parties, including his own Dawa Party, Nasr says. Recently al-Maliki's government ordered the removal of Iraqi and U.S. military checkpoints that had been placed around Sadr City.

“The government is paralyzed against these militias,” says Mahmoud Othman, a leading Kurdish lawmaker. “Groups in parliament are not working as a team and don't have a united agenda, making government and parliament unable to do much. The whole thing is getting more complicated by the day.”

Iraq's Secret Death Chambers (TIME)

By Brian Bennett

DOJ_NMG_0092504

Time, November 13, 2006

Before he is put to death, Saddam Hussein will be allowed one last phone call. He will be given a glass of water, a moment to pray and an opportunity to make a statement about his life and crimes. The entire event will be recorded on video to be stored in the Iraqi government archives. Then his neck will be slipped into the noose of a 2-in.-thick hemp rope. A few moments later, his life will end.

That's how recent executions have proceeded in Iraq--at least when the equipment works. Since the Iraqi government reintroduced capital punishment in 2004, several executions have been beset by glitches and logistical snafus. At first, executioners used an old rope left over from Saddam's regime that stretched too much to break the condemned's neck; it sometimes took as long as eight minutes for the hanged to die. New ropes brought in for later executions jerked harder on the convicted person's spine, but executioners soon noticed the cords fraying on the bend of the reinforced steel installed in the cement ceiling of the gallows. During a recent round of executions, on Sept. 6, the rope snapped after 12 hangings, sending a condemned man plummeting 15 ft. through the trap door onto the hard concrete floor below. Miraculously, he survived. "Allah saved me!" he shouted. "Allah saved me!" For 40 minutes, prison guards, officials and witnesses engaged in heated arguments over whether or not to interpret the broken rope as divine intervention.

It may not be an efficient process, but the death penalty is back in vogue in Iraq. After the U.S. invasion, capital punishment was suspended by L. Paul Bremer, head of the now-defunct Coalition Provisional Authority, but interim Prime Minster Iyad Allawi reinstated it a year later. Since September 2005, when three men were hanged in the southwestern city of Kut after being convicted of running a murder-and-kidnapping ring, the Iraqi government has executed 50 prisoners convicted of murder or kidnapping, says spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh. An adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki says the government plans to execute "two or three more batches of 14 or 15 each" in the coming months. Al-Maliki told the BBC last week that Saddam too could be hanged "before the end of the year." For the beleaguered Iraqi government, the practice of executions plays a political role as well as a legal one: amid the inescapable violence on Iraq's streets, the death penalty plays well with Iraqis tired of seeing gangs commit murder with impunity. "From the Iraqi point of view," says al-Maliki's adviser, "they don't like to see a lot of people get killed every day and have a low number of executions."

And yet an examination of the way the death penalty is administered in Iraq casts doubt on the government's candor about the frequency of executions, and that raises questions about whether justice is being flouted in Iraq's rush to execute. According to an Iraqi official involved in coordinating executions, the hanging rope has been used more extensively than has been publicly acknowledged by the Iraqi government. Three days of secret executions took place between December 2005 and March 2006, says the official, who attended all three sets of hangings. When the additional executions are taken into account, according to an official in the Prime Minister's office who declined to give an exact number, approximately 90 have been executed, almost double the officially declared tally.

The government's underreporting of executions reflects a general lack of transparency in the process. Hangings are conducted in secret, at a heavily fortified location in Baghdad built by an American contractor. Only a few officials are notified beforehand, and the vast majority of the names of those executed are never made public. Human Rights Watch, which monitors the fairness of judicial systems around the world, is concerned about the ability of defendants in Iraq to get a fair trial and access to a thorough appeals process. Iraq has repeatedly rebuffed requests from the Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights for statistics on the country's death-penalty cases, leading the high commissioner to request that Iraq commute all death sentences. The government has refused. In a written response to the U.N., the government said that suspending capital punishment would "undermine our policy on crime," citing capital punishment as a "public deterrence."

That was the objective when the Iraqi government announced in March that they had executed an infamous psychopath and insurgent hit man named Shukair Farid, "the butcher of Mosul," whose gang slaughtered more than 200 during a yearlong rampage in the northern city. Farid, a police lieutenant, had gained fame after appearing on the hit reality-TV interrogation show Terrorism in the Hands of Justice, on which he told in gruesome detail of the scores of Iraqi lives he took, often using his uniform to trap victims. Farid didn't go easily. On the morning the convoy of Iraqi officials drove out to oversee the execution, 30 cars ambushed them with gunmen firing PKC automatic weapons. After fighting their way through to the gallows, the executioners were surprised at how defiant Farid was as he faced his own death. When asked to verify his identity before they put the rope around his neck, Farid said, "That's me, so what." "That guy was ready to go to hell, I guess," says a government official.

DOJ_NMG_0092505

But there are many others on death row who continue to profess their innocence. Women doing time for murder in Baghdad live in a single 10-bunk cell in Khadamiyah Women's Prison in the northern part of town near the Tigris River. There waits Zayneb, a brown-haired woman in her late 20s wearing a black head scarf, convicted in September of conspiring with her husband to murder three relatives. The judge gave her three death sentences, one for each relative who was murdered. She says she didn't have anything to do with their deaths. She has only one chance to appeal the ruling before she faces the noose. The reality of her predicament sinks in as Zayneb looks at the empty bunk across the room, until recently occupied by a friend of hers who has been transferred to another jail to wait for her own execution. "We spent a long time together here," Zayneb says, tears welling up in her copper-colored eyes. "They took her two days ago." She sees little hope for herself. "I am convicted of three crimes. If one is waived, what about the other two? For sure I will be hanged."

The saving grace for defendants like Zayneb is that Iraq's judicial system operates at a crawl. It's a "lethargic process," says Basam Ridha, an adviser who has been tasked by al-Maliki to hasten the punishment. Some cases, says Ridha, have taken a year or more just to be heard by the investigative judge, who decides if the case needs to go to trial or not. Other prisoners short-circuit the process and find ways to get out of prison, either by paying their jailers or, in some instances, bribing the judge to dismiss their case.

Saddam, though, is almost out of time. If his sentence is upheld by the appeals court, Iraqi and U.S. officials say the plan is for him to be hanged from the same gallows used for common criminals. That could change for security reasons, says a U.S. lawyer working closely with the court, but even a technical snafu probably won't be enough to save him now. Remember the man who slipped the noose, believing Allah had saved him? His reprieve didn't last long. "We hanged him," says an Iraqi official who watched as prison guards took down his body and wheeled it into the adjacent refrigerated morgue. "We followed the law." With reporting by M. Ezzat, Mark Kukis/Baghdad

Violence In Iraq Claims At Least 159 (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, November 13, 2006

The Shiite prime minister promised Sunday to reshuffle his Cabinet after calling lawmakers disloyal and blaming Sunni Muslims for raging sectarian violence that claimed at least 159 more lives, including 35 men blown apart while waiting to join Iraq's police force.

Among the unusually high number of dead were 50 bodies found behind a regional electrical company in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, and 25 others found scattered throughout the capital. Three U.S. troops were reported killed, as were four British service members.

Also Sunday, the country's Sunni defense minister challenged Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's contention that the U.S. military should quickly pull back into bases and let the Iraqi army take control of security countrywide.

Defense Minister Abdul-Qadir al-Obaidi rejected calls by al-Maliki for the U.S. military to speed transfer of security operations throughout the country to the Iraqi army, saying his men still were too poorly equipped and trained to do the job.

"We are working hard to create a real army and we ask our government not to try to move too quickly because of the political pressure it feels. Our technical needs are real and that is very important, if we are to be a real force against insecurity," al-Obaidi said.

Al-Maliki wants the Americans confined to bases for him to call on in emergencies, but he boldly predicted his army could crush violence within six months if left alone to do the work.

The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey last month said it would take 12 to 18 months before Iraq's army was ready to take control of the country with some U.S. backup.

Key lawmakers from al-Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party said that in the coming Cabinet shake up, which the prime minister promised during a closed-door parliament session Sunday, Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani was at the top of the list to lose his post because police and security forces were failing to quell the unbridled sectarian killing that has reached civil war proportions in Baghdad and the center of the country.

DOJ_NMG_0092506

Al-Bolani, a Shiite who was chosen in June and a month after al-Maliki's government was formed, is an independent. The United States demanded that the defense and interior posts be held by officials without ties to the Shiite political parties that control militia forces.

Al-Maliki is under pressure both from his people and the United States to curb violence, with Washington leaning on him to disband Shiite militias believed responsible, through their death squads, for much of the killings.

Al-Maliki is dependent on both Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, with its Badr Brigade military wing, and radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's political movement for his hold on power.

The interior minister controls police and other security forces which already are infiltrated by the Badr Brigade and the Mahdi Army, the armed wing of al-Sadr's political movement.

After nearly 48 hours without reporting a death, the U.S. military said three soldiers assigned to the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division died Saturday of combat wounds in Anbar Province, the insurgent stronghold west of the capital. Their deaths raised to 2,848 the number of service members who have had died since the start of the war in March 2003.

Four British servicemen were killed in an attack on a patrol boat in Basra's Shatt al-Arab waterway, southern Iraq, the Ministry of Defense said in London.

In Sunday morning's bombing targeting police recruits, two men detonated explosives strapped to their bodies simultaneously, police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razaq said. The attack, killing 35 men outside the police station near western Baghdad's Nissur Square, was one of several blasts in the capital.

Police and police recruits, who are largely Shiite Muslims, have been regularly targeted by Sunni insurgents, al-Qaida in Iraq and other terrorist organizations aligned with it.

In Baqouba, the Iraqi army's provincial public affairs office said troops found 50 bodies dumped behind the offices of the provincial electric company.

Nineteen of the bodies were taken to the morgue in Baqouba and the army was waiting for U.S. bomb disposal teams, fearing the 31 other bodies behind the electrical company were rigged with explosives.

Abdul-Razaq said Baghdad police had found 25 bullet-riddled, handcuffed bodies in several parts of the capital. Dozens more bodies were found around the country.

Al-Maliki confirmed an Associated Press report 10 days ago about the coming government shake-up during a closed-door parliament session in which he responded to public charges by lawmakers that the government was complicit in the killing of members of the Sunni minority, two parliamentarians told AP.

Some Shiites had complained al-Maliki was being unduly harsh in dealing with Shiite militia members. Al-Maliki told the lawmakers that their speeches were affecting the security situation, according to Shiite legislator Bassem al-Sharif.

Dhafer al-Ani, of the Sunni Iraqi Accordance Front, told AP that al-Maliki's comments "were disappointing because they were sidelining (Sunnis) and included threats." In remarks earlier in the week, al-Maliki blamed Sunnis alone for Iraq's violence.

On Saturday, al-Maliki told editors of local newspapers that Syria, which the U.S. and his government accuse of allowing foreign fighters to cross into Iraq, wants to start afresh with Iraq.

"We have the same desire," al-Maliki said in a videotape of the remarks to Iraqi journalists on Saturday.

Foreign Ministry Undersecretary Labib Abbawi said Sunday that Syria's Foreign Minister Walid Moallem had accepted an invitation to visit Iraq, though no date was set.

The opening to Syria comes with the expected release in the United States of recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana.

It was believed the commission would recommend trying, among other things, to engage both Syria and Iran, Iraq's eastern neighbor.

___

AP correspondent Qassim Abdul-Zahra contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0092507

For Iraqis, News Is A Deadly Business (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD

At dawn, a guard at the fledgling Iraqi television station watched helplessly as a death squad - more than a dozen heavily armed men with silencers on their pistols and many with Iraqi police uniforms on their backs - rolled up in a convoy to Al Shabiya TV.

He immediately phoned the station's anchorman, Firas al-Rikabi, at his nearby home. The guard was beside himself, warning Mr. Rikabi to "try to run away." After 75 minutes, the gunmen left the station, and Rikabi arrived to find 11 of his journalist colleagues dead.

No one heard a single shot.

The professional hit, conducted last month, delivered one of this year's heaviest blows to Iraqi journalists. Amid the swirl of sectarian bloodletting and insurgent attacks, the Iraqi media faces the treacherous task of navigating the political differences between parties, and widespread ignorance about their role.

The label "independent" media in Iraq has become a death sentence, in what has become the world's most dangerous environment for local journalists. Already this year 55 Iraqi journalists have been killed - more than any other year - and four remain hostages.

"Now we are facing a crisis," says Rikabi, who was to be a news program host for the nascent Al Shabiya TV, which was attacked before it had even begun regular broadcasts.

"When they see their friends dead in front of their eyes, they are very angry, very sad," says Rikabi, who, like many, has taken heed of the threats and has decided he will no longer appear before the camera. Instead, he found another job in media. "We believe: If they want to kill us, even if we are working in the Green Zone, they will kill us because they have power."

The dangers of Baghdad were evident again Sunday, when 52 people lost their lives in the Iraqi capital - including 35 in a double suicide strike against police commando recruits. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told a closed session of parliament he wanted a "comprehensive cabinet shake-up" and pledge of loyalty to a unified Iraq.

A growing number of incidents in recent months have demonstrated the insurgency and militia's power to target and intimidate. There have been a string of media murders against print, radio, and TV journalists. When Al Shabiya TV was hit, it was the second such attack in a fortnight.

"There is no progress. We are going backwards," says Ziad al-Ajili, head of the Iraqi Journalistic Freedoms Observatory, an Iraqi free speech watchdog group that tabulates attacks against Iraqi journalists.

"The level of freedom has dropped to a very low level, because the insurgents and militias have relations with the government," says Mr. Ajili.

"When they see the government close Al Sharqiya TV, Al Arabiya and Al Jazeera, [insurgents and militias] think they have a right to kill journalists."

The proof is in the numbers, which Ajili's group - formed in 2004, and now with a string of 30 observers reporting from across Iraq - keeps careful count of on-line, name by name.

Seven Iraqi journalists were killed in 2003. When the insurgency took root in 2004, the toll jumped to 50. In 2005 another 44 died; 2006 has already set a record, with 1-1/2 months to go. In many cases, attackers steal the mobile phones of their victims, and call and text message threats to all their colleagues in the address book.

When Nakhsin Hama Rashid, a woman who broadcast for a government-backed Kurdish TV program, was murdered two weeks ago, everyone in her phone list received this text warning on their mobile phones: "Today Nakhsin, tomorrow you."

The political dimension is also growing, as political parties - usually in the government, often with ties to their own powerful militias, and owners of their own sympathetic media outlets - seek to influence independent voices.

The number of court cases against journalists, for example, surged from just two or three last year to 10 so far this year. While there have been rumors that lawmakers have recently begun to draft a press law, no one has seen a copy nor expects it to uphold any freedoms.

DOJ_NMG_0092508

"Until now, there is a dictatorship in the Iraqi mind," says Ajili. "They are targeting independent journalists all the time." He points to the case of Sunni journalist Ahmad al-Rashid of Al Sharqiya TV. He was driving through a Sunni area, when a three-man hit squad in another car, almost certainly Sunnis, shot him dead.

"These results [tell us] politicians want journalists to be the voice of their parties. When you join parties, you get protection from them," says Ajili. Passage of any press law, he says, would "end many journalist freedoms."

"This is very difficult for journalists, even more difficult than the assassinations," says Ajili, noting that no case involving an attack on journalists has been solved. "We can't work, if we are giving all the sacrifices with no democracy."

The Al Shabiya TV attack, many journalists here believe, also has political motivations. If the killers were a Shiite death squad, as is widely believed, attacking a TV station with a largely Shiite staff and a Shiite manager, the reason may be that the station was calling for Iraq to stay unified.

That message is contrary to the position of some key Shiite parties, which demand a federal Iraq.

"The targeting of journalists is from the government itself, and parties in the government," says Rikabi, who also survived a brief capture by insurgents in 2004, was beaten heavily, and threatened repeatedly with death. Insurgent groups believe all journalists "work for the occupation."

And the third problem, he says, is that today's Iraq has left no room for dialogue. "There is not another opinion. But if there is a disagreement, they will kill you."

Which is why Ajili has spent much of his own money upgrading security at his home, and keeps his AK-47 assault rifle beside him at night "like a soldier going out on a mission." Sometimes his friends call him and ask if he will reserve space on his media freedom group's website, where photographs and details of all killed Iraqi journalists are posted.

Limitations of work in Iraq hit home for Ajili during a recent trip to Jordan. Ajili says he slept just three hours, overwhelmed by the ability to move safely anywhere.

"I felt free, using my microphone in the streets," he says. "I wanted to do so many stories."

Shi'ite Fanatic Rises In Iraq To Fill Void Left By Zarqawi (WT)

By Colin Freeman

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Less than six months after an American air strike ended Abu Musab Zarqawi's campaign of Sunni terrorism, an equally brutal fanatic has emerged on the Shi'ite side of the religious divide.

Abu Deraa's trademark method of killing is a drill through the skull rather than a sword to the neck, but his work rate is just as prolific as the former al Qaeda in Iraq leader's and shows the same diabolical artistry.

In the past year, he and his followers are thought to have killed thousands of Sunnis, their victims' bodies symbolically dumped in road craters left by al Qaeda car bombs.

Stopping monsters such as Abu Deraa -- whose nom de guerre means "the shield" -- is a top U.S. priority as it tries to halt sectarian violence, which regularly claims 100 lives a day.

But the Shi'ite-dominated government has shown a marked reluctance to sanction the kind of large-scale operation necessary to arrest him in his stronghold of Sadr City, a vast Shi'ite slum in eastern Baghdad.

Taking action against him could cost it valuable support among other Shi'ite militias who, despite official disdain for Abu Deraa's bloodthirstiness, value the fear that such a loose cannon inspires in their enemies.

"We are proud of leaders like Abu Deraa," said Hassan Allami, 25, a fighter with the Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi's Army, which Abu Deraa quit earlier this year to form his own faction. "His drills destroy the crazy minds of the Sunnis."

The worsening of interreligious bloodshed reflects badly on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, whose chief task when he took power in June was to win back Sunni confidence in the political process by stamping out the tacit backing of Shi'ite militias such as the Mahdi's Army.

Yet, increasingly, men such as Abu Deraa appear to operate beyond anyone's control. He is among at least 20 former Mahdi's Army commanders who are pursuing their own agendas, sometimes sectarian, often simply criminal.

DOJ_NMG_0092509

Sheik al-Sadr may be a thug himself, coalition officials say, but at least he represented a single, identifiable authority. If dozens of freelance players emerge alongside him, negotiation becomes impossible.

"The whole thing is becoming increasingly localized, with people like Sadr being outflanked by extremists whom he can't control," said Eric Herring, the British author of "Iraq in Fragments," a study released last year that charts Iraq's breakup into innumerable competing factions. "It's possible that we may eventually remember Sadr as a moderate."

The emergence of local warlords with their own agendas is not confined to the sectarian front lines of Baghdad. In the city of Amara, in Shi'ite-dominated southern Iraq, local Sadrists are in a violent power struggle with the Badr Brigade, a rival Shi'ite militia backed by Iran.

In the capital, the two factions sit together as fellow members of the Shi'ite Unity parliamentary block. But in Amara, they have been fighting pitched battles since the British army ended its permanent presence in the city in August.

Both factions have tried to stake out political territory by introducing rafts of Taliban-style restrictions, including banning music at weddings, segregating schools, shutting Internet cafes and stopping people from watching Western satellite-TV channels.

"The Mahdi Army heard I had a satellite dish that was tuned to the Western channels," said Abu Fadl, 45, a teacher. "They went up to my roof, removed it and then beat me. Then they sold the receiver in the central market. They aren't doing this for God, just to show who is in power."

Maj. Charlie Burbridge, a British forces spokesman, insists that such complaints are not widespread. But he agreed that if they were happening, it was more a product of territorial squabbling than any genuine Islamization.

"I think if someone gets their satellite dish smashed up by the Mahdi Army, it is probably because they belonged to the Badr Brigade," he said.

Maj. Burbridge added that the situation in Amara was "a significant test of the Iraqi government and security forces, but we believe they can cope."

Mr. Fadl, however, said, "I wish the British would come back."

Dalai Lama Wants Saddam Spared (AFP-Y)

AFP, November 12, 2006

Tibet's exiled spiritual leader the Dalai Lama has appealed for Saddam Hussein's life to be spared, saying the deposed Iraqi president was not beyond redemption.

"The death penalty is said to fulfil a preventive function, yet it is clearly a form of revenge," the Nobel peace laureate told reporters as he ended a two-week visit to Japan.

"However horrible an act a person may have committed, everyone has the potential to improve and correct himself," he said.

"I hope that in the case of Saddam Hussein, as with all others, that human life will be respected and spared."

An Iraqi court sentenced Saddam, ousted in a US-led invasion in 2003, to hang on November 5 for the deaths of 148 Shiites in an Iraqi village in 1982, after an attempt to assassinate him.

Iraq's Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki has said he expected Saddam to be hanged before the end of the year.

The Dalai Lama has been critical of the US-led invasion of Iraq despite his relationship with US President George W. Bush, who has met with him in defiance of China.

China, which sent troops into Tibet in 1950, accuses the Buddhist monk of being a "splittist" and opposes his frequent travels overseas.

The Dalai Lama has said he was seeking greater autonomy for the Himalayan region within China and opposed all forms of violence. He fled into exile in India in 1959.

Insurgent Activity Rising In Afghanistan (AP)

By Jason Straziuso

AP, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092510

Insurgent activity in Afghanistan has risen fourfold this year, and militants now launch more than 600 attacks a month, a rising wave of violence that has resulted in 3,700 deaths in 2006, a bleak new report released Sunday found.

In the volatile border area near Pakistan, more than 20 Taliban militants — and possibly as many as 60 — were killed during several days of clashes, officials said Sunday.

The new report said insurgents were launching more than 600 attacks a month as of the end of September, up from 300 a month at the end of March this year. The violence has killed more than 3,700 people this year, it said.

Afghanistan saw about 130 insurgent attacks a month last year, said the report by the Joint Coordination and Monitoring Board, a body of Afghan and international officials charged with overseeing the implementation of the Afghanistan Compact, a five-year reconstruction and development blueprint signed in February.

The violence "threatens to reverse some of the gains made in the recent past, with development activities being especially hard hit in several areas, resulting in partial or total withdrawal of international agencies in a number of the worst-affected provinces."

The report said that the rising drug trade in Afghanistan is fueling the insurgency in four volatile southern provinces. The slow pace of development is contributing to popular disaffection and ineffective implementation of the drug fight, it said.

Afghanistan's poppy crop, which is used to make heroin, increased by 59 percent in Afghanistan this past year.

Insurgents have launched a record number of roadside bombs and suicide attacks this year, and there have been clashes all year between insurgents and Afghan and NATO security forces, particularly in the southern and eastern provinces near the border with Pakistan.

The 3,700 deaths the report attributes to insurgent-related violence is comparable to the number of deaths — about 3,500 — tallied by The Associated Press this year based on reports from the U.S. military, NATO and Afghan officials.

In the east, Gen. Murad Ali, the deputy Afghan army commander for Paktika province, said 20 bodies were recovered from fighting in Bermel district in the last several days. In addition, he said, two trucks carrying Taliban fighters were destroyed by airstrikes or artillery fire, and officials estimated 40 fighters were killed in those strikes.

Four NATO soldiers and three Afghan soldiers were injured, he said, though a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force said he was not aware of any serious injuries among NATO troops.

Maj. Luke Knittig said the operations in Bermel, which borders Pakistan, were part of an ongoing Afghan-NATO mission to root out Taliban militants before winter.

"We know we've engaged in successful operations in Bermel with a purpose, and we think those have had a very positive effect against insurgent activity there," Knittig said.

Knittig said Ali's estimate of 60 dead fighters "sounds about right to me," but he did not have an independent estimate of the number killed. "We are not into the numbers game here lately," he said.

Death tolls in remote areas of Afghanistan are almost impossible to verify and often vary widely.

Abdul Baqi Nuristani, the provincial police chief, said only 25 militants have been killed in Bermel the last couple days. He said three Afghan and three NATO soldiers were injured in what he called "a very big battle."

Ali said tribal elders took the bodies of eight Pakistani fighters back over the border to be buried.

Afghan officials have repeatedly accused Pakistan of not doing enough to prevent Pakistani or other foreign fighters from crossing the border to launch attacks. Pakistan says it does all it can, though border attacks have increased since a September agreement led the Pakistani military to pull out of its lawless tribal region.

Bermel is home to a military base that hosts both Afghan and U.S. soldiers. NATO-led troops aided by military aircraft killed 15 suspected insurgents in the district on Tuesday after troops on patrol came under attack.

Afghan Army Could Help Unify A Nation (LAT)

By David Zucchino

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

THE commander of Afghan troops confronting the Taliban here is a career officer with a clipped gray beard and a formal bearing who once fought for a Soviet-backed puppet government. His deputy is his former enemy.

DOJ_NMG_0092511

Many of their soldiers fought for or against the Russians, against the Taliban or for various warlords — except those so young they had never picked up a rifle.

From this unwieldy mix, the U.S. military and the Afghan government are attempting to create something Afghanistan has never had: a national army that is made up of all the country's ethnic groups and represents a unified central government.

Five years after the fall of the Taliban government, thousands of well-armed insurgents have reemerged to seize large swaths of southern Afghanistan.

In many districts, warlords, opium dealers and corrupt police help the religious extremists exert authority. Except for their fortified, American-built bases in the south, Afghan army units control virtually no territory, and they depend totally on the Americans for supplies and support.

The continued presence of foreign troops, who repeatedly have killed Afghan civilians by accident, and the U.S.-backed government's failure to improve the quality of life or rein in local warlords angers Afghans, pushing some of them back into the arms of the Taliban.

"People are very upset and disappointed with the government," said Col. Abdul Raziq, a brigade commander in southern Afghanistan.

Officers of the new Afghan army know that the Taliban hold will not be broken until they can establish enough security for the government to provide essential services. Until they do, U.S. and North Atlantic Treaty Organization forces won't be able to go home.

But with fighting escalating and the Afghan army entirely dependent on the U.S. military, the day when foreign troops can leave seems a long way off.

The army is important for reasons beyond security. Afghanistan has no unifying institutions. The government of President Hamid Karzai controls Kabul but little else. The national police force is notoriously corrupt and, in the hinterlands, often loyal to warlords or opium merchants.

Instilling loyalty to the national government will require changing the nature of Afghanistan. The army is a place to start.

"To the Afghan people, the words 'Afghan national army' are sweet words," said the Afghan commander here, Maj. Gen. Rahmatullah Roufi, 49, whose 205th Corps is responsible for six volatile southern provinces. "They've never had a real national army before, only tribes and militias. There's a hunger for it."

His deputy, Brig. Gen. Khair Mohammed, 50, said officers were willing to forget the past. Mohammed, a trim, energetic man, gestured toward one of his battalion commanders, who drew to attention and saluted.

"He was a communist, and I fought against him," Mohammed said. "But that was the past, and we Afghans don't look back. Now we're all brothers, all Afghans, and that's the way of the future."

Relying on Americans

THE army has been built from scratch since U.S. trainers arrived at the end of more than 20 years of warfare that swept up Roufi, Mohammed and many men of their generation.

It has grown in the last five years to 36,000 trained soldiers and officers, more than halfway to the goal of 70,000 men. The troops enjoy productive relations with 1,200 U.S. and NATO trainers at 85 bases. A few battalions now take the lead during combat operations. Searches of towns and villages are conducted by Afghan soldiers, not American troops.

But the army is still directed and supplied by U.S. and NATO forces. U.S. officers say they plan operations jointly with Afghan commanders, but some Afghan officers say the Americans dictate the scope of operations by controlling supplies, vehicles and air support.

Uniforms, trucks, fuel, food and ammunition are provided by the U.S. Equally important, the Afghans rely on Americans for air support, attack helicopters, artillery and air medical evacuation. And U.S. officers are clearly in command.

Nor do the Afghans control media coverage. U.S. officers blocked Times journalists from being embedded in an Afghan unit, despite approval by Roufi and the Afghan Defense Ministry.

Roufi complained that his authority had been undermined. "It's frustrating to me, and kind of shameful as well," he said.

Afghan privates and generals alike complain that they are sent into battle in ordinary Ford Ranger pickups with no body armor or helmets, while U.S. soldiers wear flak vests and travel in armored Humvees.

DOJ_NMG_0092512

Raziq said his military communications equipment was so bad that he relied on his own cellphone.

The Afghans disparage their weapons, generally old and balky AK-47s collected from the private armies of warlords.

"Our enemy's weapons are much more modern than ours," said Roufi, who commands about 7,000 men.

"We fight on the same ground and under the same threat as the Americans and the coalition, but we don't have what we need to operate independently. This has a poor effect on our soldiers' morale," said Gen. Zahir Azemi, the army's chief spokesman.

U.S. soldiers, except when sent out on combat missions, live in air-conditioned barracks with cable TV and Internet access. They eat in modern dining facilities that are more like shopping-mall food courts than mess halls.

By contrast, most Afghan soldiers live in poorly maintained buildings, where some men segregate themselves by ethnicity. In the barracks behind Roufi's headquarters in Kandahar, his men cooked lamb and rice on the floor, next to a laundry drain. In the bathroom, mud smeared the showers, and sinks were clogged with food scraps and garbage.

With their scruffy beards and slender frames, the Afghans appear to lack the fitness and discipline of their U.S. counterparts. Although their Afghan-made uniforms are paid for by the U.S. and similar to the ones worn by American troops, some Afghans are more comfortable wearing slip-on loafers than combat boots. Afghan soldiers also tend to prefer traditional scarves to helmets.

U.S. trainers, while praising Afghans for their courage, complain of lax discipline, petty thefts and poor maintenance of weapons and equipment. The Afghans will often run up hills or charge into caves wearing virtually no armor and without waiting for backup. And while U.S. troops are stoic and focused during combat missions, many Afghans are freewheeling and talkative.

The trainers constantly urge Afghan commanders to discipline their men. They say at least two bases have been abandoned by Afghan units after American trainers were transferred out.

For American troops, the Afghans' blase attitudes toward supply lines, coordinated planning or maintaining effective communications can be maddening.

"These guys fight magnificently. They run to the fight, not away from it," said Col. Michael "Jeff" Petrucci, who is Roufi's counterpart and mentor. "But they cannot sustain operations over a long period."

Lt. Jason Elphick, a U.S. trainer, said Afghan soldiers tended to operate "hour by hour" rather than planning ahead. They work hard in the mornings, he said, but in the afternoon, when U.S. trainers want them to clean and maintain their weapons, "all they want to do is nap."

Some critics say disbanding the Afghan militias that initially dominated the army robbed the force of experienced mujahedin fighters. Under a United Nations-sponsored disarmament program, the militiamen were demobilized and trained for civilian jobs. Critics say that left the army dependent on young recruits with no combat experience.

The roughly two years needed to replace militiamen with recruits has given the Taliban time to reestablish itself in the south, its traditional power base, said Ismail Khan, a Tajik warlord who commanded a powerful militia that was largely disbanded when he was appointed energy minister.

"The one force that knew how to defeat the Taliban was disarmed," he said.

Asked whether he had faith in the army to defeat the Taliban, Khan thought for a moment and replied, "No."

'Not just one tribe'

THE typical army recruit arrives at a training center in Kabul in a baggy tunic and trousers, his possessions crammed into plastic shopping bags. He has no other job prospects and no military experience. More likely than not he is illiterate.

Asadullah Jalal Abad, 19, a fresh-faced Pashtun from a rural eastern village, said he signed on because he was tired of working as a day laborer in Pakistan. But he also wants to serve his country by providing security for all of its ethnic groups, he said.

"In my village, people want the army to come there. They know it serves everybody, not just one tribe," Abad said the day he arrived at the Kabul training center, where he was eager to learn how to fire a rifle.

Lyagat, 25, a Pashtun who, like many Afghans, uses one name, arrived the same day, having given up a job as a driver.

"I don't even know how much the army pays, but it doesn't matter," he said. "I want to help protect my country. It's a very young country and needs my help."

DOJ_NMG_0092513

Lyagat said he had assumed that units were segregated by ethnic group but was pleased to learn that he would not be serving strictly with Pashtuns.

"I found out it's not the Pashtun army or the Tajik army," he said. "It's the national army."

The Kabul center turns out 1,000 trained recruits a month on hot, dusty fields where the Afghans flop on their bellies and fire at distant targets. Training has been increased from six weeks to 15 weeks, and the size of trained battalions from 400 men to 1,200.

More so than in Iraq, the Afghan army is designed to reflect the country's ethnic balance. U.S. and Afghan commanders say the army's ethnic makeup generally matches the national population — about 42% Pashtun, 27% Tajik, 9% each Hazara and Uzbek, and numerous smaller groups.

In Iraq, the national army is dominated by Shiite Muslims, many loyal to Shiite militia commanders. The Afghan army at first incorporated Tajik-led militias of the Northern Alliance, the U.S.-backed warlords who helped defeat the Taliban. And initially, the defense, interior and foreign ministries were held by Northern Alliance Tajiks. Now Pashtun, Hazara and Uzbek officers have filled some commands once held exclusively by Tajiks, U.S. and Afghan officers said.

Roufi and Mohammed are Pashtuns, as is Defense Minister Abdul Rahim Wardak.

Although many young men join to serve their country, Roufi said, the army's main attractions are steady, if low, wages, a place to live and ample food.

"These are very poor young men, and this is a good life for them," Roufi said. "And most Afghans have never had any discipline. They get discipline here, and they find it agreeable."

The pay is meager. A first-year Afghan soldier earns $70 a month, less than a common laborer. The top enlisted man makes $180 a month, a major $300, a colonel $400 and a general $530.

Although the army has attracted more than enough recruits, the low pay means that many of them won't reenlist when their three-year tours are up.

"For every 1,000 recruits who graduate from basic training, at least 500 will leave after three years to find other work — either in Afghanistan or Pakistan or Iran," Raziq said.

Soldiers often disappear for days or weeks while making their way home to give money to their families. Afghanistan has no national banking system, so soldiers are paid in cash. In some battalions, soldiers claim, commanders skim cash for themselves. In others, the cash arrives several weeks late.

Some soldiers return weeks later, expecting to rejoin their units and get paid as if they had never left.

Some soldiers have quit and returned home to protect their families from retaliation by the Taliban. Commanders say it is a pervasive threat.

Roufi said his wife and children lived in Kabul, protected by his extended family. Mohammed lives with his wife and eight children in a bombed-out former Soviet apartment complex, guarded by soldiers on the Afghan military base in Kandahar.

"Everyone in the command worries about threats to their families. These threats are very real," Roufi said. Several soldiers said an officer who recently returned to Kabul to check on his family was captured and hanged by the Taliban.

Brig. Gen. Douglas Pritt, a member of the Oregon National Guard who commands the training effort, said the low retention rate was the Afghan army's biggest problem. The U.S. is working to improve weapons and equipment, he said, and Afghans should be working to offer reenlistment bonuses and pay increases.

"Here's what I tell the [Afghan] corps commanders: 'I understand your desire for better and more equipment. That will happen. But right now the biggest issue facing you is retaining soldiers,' " Pritt said. " 'You need to focus on that … take care of them so that their basic needs are met so that they aren't inclined to leave.' "

A formidable enemy

FOR centuries, Afghans have adopted guerrilla tactics to defeat invaders. U.S. trainers want them to do the opposite, learning to fight as a modern counterinsurgency force. As the Afghans have absorbed those lessons, the insurgency has gained strength.

Fighting the Taliban on its home turf is proving troublesome. Even Afghan soldiers have difficulty distinguishing civilians from Taliban fighters.

DOJ_NMG_0092514

Taliban fighters have funneled weapons and supplies from Pakistan as they emerged from hiding in towns and villages across the south. They have built an elaborate network of caves and tunnels to ambush Afghan and foreign troops and then disappear. They attack in larger groups and are mounting bolder operations.

"The intensity of the [Taliban] threat is infinitely worse than just a year ago," Petrucci said. "Now the Taliban will mass, they will maneuver and they will not break contact like they used to. They'll grab you by the belt, and they won't let go."

The Taliban controls southern districts through intimidation and terror, Afghan commanders say, and the army cannot protect civilians from reprisals.

The Taliban also has built alliances of convenience with opium dealers and warlords. Corrupt district commissioners, nominally loyal to the central government, also help the insurgents, Roufi said.

"These are the real snakes in the sleeve," Roufi said of the commissioners.

Brigade Sgt. Maj. Kefaitullah, the top enlisted man in an Afghan unit here, said the Taliban capitalized on the frustration ordinary Afghans felt toward the government, particularly over civilians killed by U.S. forces.

Taliban spies and sympathizers have infiltrated the army, providing or selling information, U.S. and Afghan officers said. Local men monitor the main gate of the Kandahar base, using cellphones to alert Taliban fighters of approaching U.S. and Afghan army convoys.

Capt. Andre Sison, a U.S. trainer, said he didn't trust all Afghan soldiers. "But the ones I train in my company, I trust enough to go out with them every day on combat ops," he said.

Asked whether the army had been infiltrated, Pritt said: "Certainly I think so. But I know of no situations in which information was directly leaked that compromised an operation."

To help prevent leaks, rank-and-file soldiers are not told beforehand of the times, dates and locations of operations, Pritt said. The U.S. uses other countermeasures, he said, including putting out false information and monitoring communications to see if it's passed on.

Taliban fighters use call signs and code words in radio communications, something U.S. trainers are trying to teach the Afghan army to do, Sison said. Too often, Afghan officers simply shout commands into their radios.

Roufi said it worried him that his enemy had adopted successful tactics used by Iraqi insurgents, including roadside bombs, suicide bombings and assassinations of government officials.

There were just two suicide attacks in Afghanistan in 2002, six in 2004, 21 in 2005 — and 91 so far this year. Roadside bombs are becoming larger and more effective. Of the 29 soldiers in his corps killed in the previous month, Roufi said, most were hit by roadside bombs. Two days earlier, three of his men had been killed by a roadside bomb.

Kandahar and other southern provinces were the Taliban's stronghold.

"They'll do anything to get it back," Roufi said.

As he spoke, a convoy of Ford Rangers roared up to his command center, the trucks coated in dust as soldiers returned from a combat mission. The general pointed out that the men wore no vests or helmets and that the Rangers were ordinary pickups. He said his soldiers would need better equipment before they could even think about operating without U.S. support.

"That truck is like a piece of tissue paper," he said. "If a bomb explodes, everyone inside will die. An armored Humvee would be much better."

U.S. Pressed To Go Beyond Military Action (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

NEW YORK -- Pakistan, a key ally in the war on terror, welcomes an expected reappraisal of U.S. policy in Iran and Afghanistan, and thinks military action alone is "not the answer" to the threat posed by extremists in the two countries, its prime minister says.

Shaukat Aziz told The Washington Times that he would like to see a more nuanced approach to battling extremism, which includes massive investment and economic assistance to the two countries in order to build a sense of well-being for the poor and disenfranchised.

DOJ_NMG_0092515

In New York for meetings at the United Nations, Mr. Aziz also said the world needs to focus more seriously on Afghanistan's narcotics trade, which is becoming an increasingly important source of terrorist financing. By some estimates, the trade accounts for half of Afghanistan's gross domestic product.

An American commission headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton is expected to recommend strategies for the Iraq war before year's end, a development that Mr. Aziz welcomed.

"We believe that conflicts like Iraq, Afghanistan and so on need to be carefully reviewed because military action is not the answer or the solution to such a crisis," he said.

"We must work on winning the hearts and minds of the people. We have to involve the people, to give them the sense that the world cares and their future tomorrow will be better than yesterday."

The United States has spent about $38 billion on infrastructure and development projects in Iraq since the invasion in 2003, but Mr. Aziz said more must be done to address "root causes," namely poverty and hopelessness, and to make extremist ideologies less attractive.

The prime minister gave an implicit reminder that the United States must leave Afghanistan eventually, in consultation with the Afghans, their neighbors and myriad stakeholders.

"History is full of examples where we didn't focus too much on exit strategy," Mr. Aziz said. "A good exit strategy is one which leaves that country, that area, peaceful, economically and politically empowered. ...

"We are the most important stakeholder, and we are there for life. We cannot take off; countries cannot change their neighbors."

Mr. Aziz declined to comment on the U.S. midterm elections last week or the resignation Wednesday of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

He downplayed Washington's continued demands that Pakistan do more to prevent al Qaeda and Taliban fighters from crossing in and out of Pakistan, arguing that it is in Pakistan's national interest to fight narcotics, extremism and terrorism in Afghanistan.

With parliamentary elections due late next year, the Pakistan government faces a delicate balancing act, seeking to address U.S. demands without alienating a Pakistani public that could deliver its votes to a political coalition that is thought to be aligned with the Taliban.

"In our neighborhood, a lot of events are taking place that can impact us," said Mr. Aziz, whose military sustained more than 40 deaths in a suicide bombing last week. "We are not doing this to please anybody; we are doing this in our own national interest. ... Terrorism knows no borders."

The prime minister also defended his country's agreement to allow tribal leaders to take charge of one portion of the 1,700-mile border with Afghanistan, saying that the area is difficult to police.

Asked whether similar deals may be struck in other tribal, agencies, he said: "If we can restrict activity that is prejudicial to our security, it will be done. At the right time and right place we will do more."

Mr. Aziz is a member of an elite panel advising the United Nations on how to consolidate and better coordinate aid activities in the field. His staff said he had no official contacts with Washington during the visit, focusing instead on the local Pakistani community and economic business.

After repeated assassination attempts against Mr. Aziz and President Pervez Musharraf, the prime minister travels in a tight security cocoon that is noteworthy even by U.N. standards. A city block in front of his hotel was sealed off to automotive traffic during his stay.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

KB Home CEO Resigns Over Backdated Options (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092516

The stock-options fraud scandal claimed one of the nation's most successful and highly paid chief executives, KB Home's Bruce Karatz, who agreed to leave the company after an internal investigation found that he backdated his own option grants to increase his pay.

KB Home, a home-construction company once known as Kaufman & Broad, said Mr. Karatz would immediately leave his posts as president, CEO and chairman. He will forfeit about $13 million in gains from the backdating as part of an agreement with the company, based in Los Angeles.

Also departing is Richard B. Hirst, executive vice president and chief legal officer, and Gary A. Ray, the head of human resources. Mr. Hirst resigned, and Mr. Ray was terminated, the company said. A person familiar with the investigation said both Mr. Karatz and Mr. Hirst cooperated with the internal investigation.

Messrs. Karatz, Hirst and Ray couldn't be reached to comment.

Mr. Karatz is one of the highest-profile casualties of the stock-options scandal, which has now claimed the jobs of more than 50 executives and directors, including William McGuire, the chief executive of UnitedHealth Group Inc. More than 130 companies, including KB Home, are under federal investigation in a wide government action. Five former executives at the companies have been charged with criminal wrongdoing.

KB Home didn't detail how the backdated options came to pass, though it said Mr. Karatz and Mr. Ray selected the dates for the options. A person familiar with the matter said that an investigation by KB Home's board determined that the dates were selected retroactively by the two men without permission of the board, though this person said the investigation didn't conclude that there had been intentional wrongdoing. The company said the misdated options were granted between 1998 and 2005.

KB Home said Mr. Karatz would be succeeded as CEO by Jeffrey T. Mezger, the company's chief operating officer. The company said Mr. Mezger wasn't involved in any options troubles. KB Home said it created the new post of nonexecutive chairman, and will conduct a search for the position.

Mr. Mezger takes the helm of the company amid a slow housing market, which has caused KB Home's sales and those of other home builders to plummet. He said in an interview that he expects the options investigation won't have any long-term effect on the company's operations or reputation and that its home-building brand remains "extremely strong." "I think this will be a seamless transition," Mr. Mezger said last night. "We see business as usual going forward."

MORE ON OPTIONS

• Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny1

• Perfect Payday: Complete coverage2

Options allow recipients to buy stock at a preset exercise price, generally set at the market price on the day they were granted. Backdating involves pretending that an option was granted on an earlier date when the market price was lower, conveying an opportunity for extra profit. The practice can lead to overstated profits and significant tax problems for the companies and executives involved.

Mr. Karatz, a 34-year veteran of KB Home, has been its chief executive since 1986. He has overseen tremendous growth, shepherding KB Home through a burgeoning real-estate market that had it building houses at a fast clip. From the end of 1995 through the end of last year, KB Home shares climbed tenfold. The company's stock has dived 40% this year as the property market rapidly chilled.

Along the way, Mr. Karatz has been among the nation's most highly compensated corporate executives. Since 1992, he has reaped nearly $180 million from exercising options, according to Standard & Poor's ExecuComp, a service that tracks executive compensation. Last year, he made more than $150 million from salary, bonus, restricted stock grants and options exercises, according to ExecuComp. The options exercises accounted for the bulk of his pay.

The backdating appears to have begun in 1998, when Mr. Karatz received more than 450,000 options. That year also apparently marked a shift to much larger options awards -- in each of several previous years, Mr. Karatz had received 100,000 options or fewer.

His grants between 1998 and 2001 appeared particularly well-timed. In that period, he recorded one grant dated the day the stock touched its lowest closing price of the year, another at a quarterly low, and two more at monthly lows.

DOJ_NMG_0092517

One grant of 450,000 shares carried the date of Oct. 25, 1999, and an exercise price of $17.75, the year's lowest close. KB Home shares subsequently rocketed upward, rising 25% by the end of November.

KB Home disclosed in August it was conducting an internal probe of its options grants, after being contacted by The Wall Street Journal about an unusual pattern of well-timed grants. The company also was the target of a shareholder lawsuit filed in July in Los Angeles County Superior Court alleging manipulation of past stock-options awards. The company has said it is studying the suit.

KB Home appears to have concentrated its options grants at the top. Mr. Karatz received 500,000 options in 2000, which was 30.9% of all the awards to employees. They were dated at a monthly low. Mr. Karatz has cashed all of those options out, for a total profit of about $54 million.

The $13 million he will forfeit is part of an agreement reached to refund the excess profit from backdating to the company, KB Home said. Mr. Karatz will repay the company to cover extra profit on already-cashed-out options, and his remaining outstanding options will be repriced.

The company said that it and Mr. Karatz haven't negotiated any terms of his departure other than the agreement to repay profits from backdating. To correct its accounting for the backdating, KB Home said it expected to take charges of no more than $50 million.

As of Nov. 30, 2005, Mr. Karatz had options for about three million KB Home shares, of which about 2.2 million he could immediately exercise, according to securities filings. The negotiations with the company over his departure will likely determine how much of that total he will walk away with. Under his employment agreement, some of his options remain in force if his departure is deemed a retirement. If he is terminated for cause, he could lose at least some of his outstanding options. Other severance terms also depend on how his departure is characterized.

The home-building industry isn't typically known for flash, but Mr. Karatz cultivated a high profile. He made a name for himself in the 1970s building a model house on the top of a department store in Paris to promote the company's homes in France.

Last year, he was instrumental in partnering with Martha Stewart to build and market homes together -- a move seen as increasing KB Home's name recognition in an industry that isn't known for having well-known brand names.

Convicted Executives Forced To Sell Homes (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, November 13, 2006

When CEOs sell their multimillion-dollar homes, it's usually because they're relocating to a different market, or trading up to an even bigger house.

In the case of Walter Forbes, the former Cendant chairman whose baronial 8-acre estate in New Canaan, Conn., is on the market for $12.5 million, the reasons are a little different.

Forbes, 63, was convicted two weeks ago of conspiracy and making false statements in connection with a massive fraud that cost Cendant investors $14 billion when it was exposed in 1998. Unless his conviction is overturned on appeal, he'll be relocating, all right, but most likely to a property surrounded by thick walls and concertina wire.

As such, Forbes is poised to join the pantheon of convicted former executives who've had to sell their trophy properties or luxury toys to pay off legal bills, settle civil lawsuits or meet criminal forfeiture requirements mandated by judges. Among them:

Dennis Kozlowski, former CEO of Tyco International

Kozlowski was convicted last year of stealing approximately $500 million in cash and stock. Prior to his trial, Kozlowski became the poster child of corporate excess when it was revealed that he spent millions of dollars of Tyco funds on a luxury apartment in Manhattan, filled with exotic details such as a $6,000 shower curtain, and treated his wife to a $2 million party for her 40th birthday on the island of Sardinia. Tyco shareholders picked up half the tab for the party.

Kozlowski, who's currently serving an 81/2-to-25-year sentence in a New York state prison about an hour outside Manhattan, has been selling assets in an attempt to pay $167 million in fines and restitution imposed on him by the judge who presided over his trial.

DOJ_NMG_0092518

Last week, Kozlowski's luxury ski home in Beaver Creek, Colo., featuring three wine cellars, sold for $10 million. The house's furniture is being sold separately for $750,000. Another property, an oceanfront mansion on Nantucket called Sea Rose Farm, has been on the market for $23 million but has not yet found a buyer.

Two months ago, Kozlowski sold his luxury yacht, the Endeavour, for $13 million.

Bernie Ebbers, former CEO of WorldCom

Ebbers was convicted last year of ordering his subordinates to cook the books in what turned out to be an $11 billion fraud. Ebbers began serving a 25-year prison term in September, but prior to sentencing, he turned over almost all his assets to a trust fund established to pay damages to WorldCom investors.

Ebbers, whose fortune at one time topped $1.3 billion, once owned the largest cattle ranch in Canada, as well as thousands of acres of timberland in the southeast USA. But when WorldCom's stock floundered, he had to borrow $400 million from his board of directors to meet margin calls from his bank.

His Mississippi mansion was sold in June for $7.5 million, and in May, sports mogul Stanley Kroenke purchased the cattle ranch for $68.5 million. The proceeds of these and other asset sales went to funds to pay investors and creditors.

Scott Sullivan, former CFO of WorldCom

Sullivan pleaded guilty to manipulating the company's earnings in 2004 and cooperated with the government's prosecution of Ebbers. As a reward for that cooperation, he received only a five-year jail sentence, but he still lost his assets to the same class-action lawyers who reached a settlement with Ebbers.

Sullivan's 30,000-square-foot mansion in Boca Raton, Fla., was sold last year for $9 million.

John Coffey, the class-action lawyer at Bernstein Litowitz Berger & Grossmann who got Ebbers and Sullivan to hand over most of their assets to the investor fund, said that the trend of convicted executives turning over their property to settle civil actions is a new development.

“For years and years, it wasn't usual that white-collar criminals had to sell their homes,” he said. “One of the things we wanted to do at WorldCom is change that. We picked both Scott Sullivan and Bernie Ebbers clean.”

One of the high points of his negotiations with the two men, Coffey said, was when he got Sullivan to come into his office and sign over the remainder of his 401(k) plan, a sum between $200,000 and $300,000, to the class-action fund.

Coffey says he succeeded with Sullivan and Ebbers because both men wanted to make a good impression on U.S. District Judge Barbara Jones prior to their sentencing.

Jeff Skilling, former CEO of Enron

Skilling was convicted in May of lying to investors about the company's financial condition and sentenced last month to 24 years and 4 months in prison. Prior to sentencing, he settled criminal forfeiture proceedings with the government by agreeing to sell his home and transfer all his assets, as much as $45 million, to a fund for injured shareholders.

In the case of Cendant's Forbes, the fines and penalties he'd have to pay if his conviction stands up could be staggering. After his top lieutenant, E. Kirk Shelton, was convicted last year of securities fraud in the same case, a judge ordered him to pay $3.2 billion in restitution. Forbes could get similar treatment.

On top of that, Cendant says it will try to recover a $47 million severance package it paid Forbes to oust him in 1998, as well as $15 million in legal fees advanced to him. Cendant lawyers say they will argue that Forbes' conviction nullifies both contracts.

Technically, Forbes' home in New Canaan, as well as two other homes he owns in Florida and Colorado, are not in his name, but his wife's. But since he transferred the titles of the properties after the investigation into the Cendant fraud began, forfeiture experts think lawyers won't have much difficulty winning rights to those assets.

“That's easier,” says Steven Kessler, who specializes in forfeiture cases.

In high-profile white-collar criminal cases in general, Kessler adds, “I have noticed that the houses are worth so much money that the government, either through criminal forfeiture or money judgments or restitution agreements, are getting defendants to sell their homes.”

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ_NMG_0092519

Nigeria Bribery Case Heats Up Again (HC)

Houston Chronicle, November 13, 2006

Several probes active, but charges have not been filed in delta inquiry

PARIS — There are new signs of life in a sprawling four-year investigation of whether a unit of Houston's Halliburton Co. and other oil-services companies paid huge bribes in the 1990s to land a $5.6 billion construction project in the Nigerian delta.

French and Swiss investigators are trying to gain access to specific bank records in Switzerland and other European countries to determine if tens of millions of dollars in suspected bribe money ended up in accounts linked to Nigeria's former military dictator.

In Britain, police and agents from the Serious Fraud Office this summer searched four homes and a business looking for links to the case, which began in 2002 when a French oil-services executive facing corruption charges told a judge about a $175 million "slush fund" he claimed had been used to bribe Nigerian officials.

The U.S. Department of Justice is looking into possible criminal offenses, and the Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating possible financial misdeeds. The Nigerian government is also conducting a formal investigation.

In late October, Halliburton officials reported to the SEC that a third person has been dismissed as a result of its own investigation of possible corruption in overseas projects and indicated it had reason to believe improper payments may have been made.

Despite these forward steps, no charges have yet been filed, and investigators concede they do not yet have enough detailed financial information to build an airtight case. They say they cannot yet establish exactly where the money ended up.

The complex case, which spans the globe from Africa to Europe to Houston, drew attention during the 2004 presidential campaign, when Democratic candidates used the allegations about bribery in Nigeria to attack Vice President Dick Cheney for his close ties to Halliburton, where he was chief executive officer from 1995 to 2000.

When the inquiry began, French officials suspected that Cheney might have played a role because he was in charge when at least one of the questionable payments was made. But French officials and lawyers now say that their investigation has not turned up any evidence against the vice president.

In Washington, Justice Department officials declined to comment on the matter.

How inquiry startedThe inquiry developed from allegations that executives from M.W. Kellogg Co., which became part of Halliburton subsidiary KBR, and French, Japanese and Italian oil-services companies formed a consortium called TSKJ that bribed Nigerian officials.

In a lengthy statement to the SEC in late October, Halliburton officials said the possible wrongdoing extended beyond Nigeria.

"We have reason to believe, based on the ongoing investigations, that payments may have been made by agents of TSKJ to Nigerian officials," the company stated. "In addition, information recently uncovered suggests that, prior to 1998, plans may have been made by employees of the M.W. Kellogg Co. to make payments to government officials in connection with the pursuit of other projects in countries outside of Nigeria."

Investigators and lawyers handling the inquiries in France and Switzerland say the investigation has been slowed in recent months because of the difficulty of obtaining the financial records because of bank secrecy policies that protect account holders.

"The French investigating judge has requested information from the Swiss, from Monaco, and from Great Britain, and for the moment he is waiting for the answer on the financial data," said Olivier Schnerb, a French lawyer who represents the whistle-blower who first alerted officials to the possible bribe scheme. "The mystery is how much money has been hidden."

The French and Swiss inquiries are headed by powerful "investigating judges" who can use the European version of subpoenas to question witnesses and obtain records. There is no equivalent in the U.S. judicial system, where prosecutors and police build criminal cases and must seek subpoenas from magistrates, often in adversarial proceedings.

The two judges are seeking access to private bank accounts in several countries, but this process is slow because individuals and banks can appeal in court before records are opened.

U.S. officials also seek this data.

Most of the transactions under investigation took place during the regime of the late Nigerian military dictator Gen. Sani Abacha. During his brief five years in power he is suspected of embezzling more than $3 billion from his country's treasury.

Swiss officials say it was brazen larceny on a scale rarely seen before or since. The inquiry involving Halliburton's subsidiary represents only a small part of a much larger series of legal actions to track and recover Nigerian national assets from Abacha's family.

"We don't know in Geneva exactly how much he stole," said Judge Daniel Dumartheray, the Swiss judge charged with investigating the Abacha regime's financial affairs. "He stole money directly from the state, and he used fraud, substantially raising the prices of contracts and getting paybacks, and he got bribes from people who paid to get contracts."

Money scattered globallyDumartheray said in an interview that the unprecedented attack on Nigeria's oil-swollen cash reserves was difficult to trace because the dictator had scattered his money in a number of countries where banking secrecy laws make investigation painstakingly slow.

"He also had money in the United Kingdom, in Jersey, in Lichtenstein, in Luxembourg, in France and perhaps in Israel," the judge said. "We don't know if we have knowledge of all that he did. He had the assistance of a lot of different intermediaries in other countries, and all those people helped him open accounts in the name of other companies, so his name doesn't appear."

The judge said the dictator used his immediate family to create accounts that helped him launder his stolen billions and that his son used false names and false passports to make it easier to hide money in various offshore accounts.

"All this makes it very difficult to get a paper trail of his money," Dumartheray said. "For an investigation, each time the money moves you have to write for legal permission to get the information, and people can fight it and appeal it and stop the inquiry."

One of Abacha's suspected cronies, Abubakar Atiku Bagudu, was arrested in Houston in May 2003 on an international arrest warrant charging that he had helped the Abacha family loot hundreds of millions of dollars in public funds.

He has since been extradited to Nigeria.

The trail also led to Britain this summer.

Serious Fraud Office spokesman David Jones said last week that four homes and one business in London and Somerset were searched on July 20 as part of the ongoing bribery investigation.

The unit only takes on investigations involving allegations of major malfeasance when large sums of money are thought to be involved, he said.

Death stopped plunderingAbacha's theft of his country's vast oil wealth ended with his sudden death from a heart attack in 1998. His elected successor, Olusegun Obasanjo, launched a global search for the money Abacha and his family squirreled away in secret accounts.

Already, the new Nigerian government has been able to have more than $1.1 billion returned from Switzerland and other countries where Abacha's funds were located. It has become the biggest money-laundering case in Swiss history, lawyers said.

In addition, lawyers said that roughly $800 million in bank accounts linked to Abacha have been frozen in Lichtenstein, Luxembourg, Jersey, France and Britain.

Enrico Monfrini, a Swiss lawyer representing the Nigerian government, said the scale of the corruption was staggering because Nigeria's oil revenues were so huge.

"We know many of the ways Abacha stole money, including having boxes of cash containing $40 million to $60 million delivered to the presidential villa," he said. "But the bribes have proved the most difficult to investigate because they were paid offshore. So there is often no way to know how much money was paid."

He said Swiss law allows an investigating judge to get financial data from specific bank accounts with a judicial order. The process is somewhat similar to obtaining a search warrant in the United States.

This tactic can be effective in many cases, but it does not work well when money is placed in accounts opened by intermediaries who are not known to authorities, or opened under fictitious names.

No fishing expeditions"You can't go on a fishing expedition," Monfrini said. "You have to name the specific person with specific suspicions and say the account contains the proceedings from crime."

DOJ_NMG_0092521

The investigation opened in 2002 after Georges Krammer, a former oil-services company executive facing possible criminal charges for alleged corruption, told a French investigating judge that the TSKJ consortium had set up a substantial slush fund used for bribing Nigerian officials.

The consortium was able to obtain contracts worth roughly $5.6 billion to build a liquefied natural gas plant on Bonny Island in Nigeria.

At the time, Krammer was working for Technip, a major French oil-services company that was part of the consortium, which also included Japan's JGC and Italy's Snamprogretti. His disclosures prodded French Judge Renaud van Ruymbeke, known in France as an effective fighter against corporate corruption, to begin a full-scale investigation of the consortium and its finances.

Some investigators involved with the case expect the Swiss to deliver financial information within a month. This would allow investigators in the United States, France, Switzerland and Britain to decide whether to file criminal charges.

Others fear more delays will slow the inquiry for months or years.

Halliburton's role in the possible bribery case only began in 1998, when it took over M.W. Kellogg, the American component of the TSKJ consortium, as part of a larger acquisition of Dresser Industries. Some of the suspected corrupt activities took place before Halliburton was involved.

M.W. Kellogg, an engineering and construction firm, is now part of KBR, formerly known as Kellogg, Brown and Root, which is part of Halliburton.

Halliburton's SEC statement said that some of the employees suspected of making improper payments are still active Halliburton agents and consultants.

Halliburton cooperatingHalliburton's lengthy statement indicates that the company is cooperating with the Justice Department and SEC investigations in the United States and with the Nigerian government inquiry.

Many company records have been subpoenaed and made available to investigators, Halliburton said in its SEC filing. Halliburton spokesman Cathy Mann said the company has been forthcoming in releasing information about the Nigerian affair.

"We have provided public disclosure about this matter for some time, and we have provided updates as appropriate," she said in an e-mail response to questions.

The SEC filing states that the SEC has subpoenaed A. Jack Stanley, a former executive dismissed in 2004 for allegedly receiving "improper personal benefits" from Jeffrey Tesler, a British lawyer who set up a company called Tri-Star that received payments from the consortium. Lee Kaplan, Stanley's lawyer, declined to comment on the case.

Halliburton has also severed its relationship with Tesler, who is being investigated by a number of agencies but has not been charged with any crimes. He and his lawyer declined to be interviewed for this article.

In addition, Halliburton states that a number of current and former employees and former executives have been subpoenaed by the SEC.

Halliburton officials have also declined to name the employee who was recently suspended or to reveal the location outside Nigeria where they believe improper business practices may have been used to obtain contracts.

The company agreed to the SEC's request for a so-called tolling agreement extending the statute of limitations.

The agreement in essence gives the government more time to conduct its investigation and the company to make its case.

Halliburton also asserts in its SEC filing that its managers have been cooperating with investigators in France, Nigeria and Switzerland and are aware of the investigation by the Serious Fraud Office in Britain, where Tesler is practicing law.

Witness Against Murder Inc. Gang Gets Freedom (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

A former high-ranking member of the Murder Inc. crime syndicate in the District, which was charged in 31 killings, has won a "very unusual" sentence that will keep him out of prison, newly unsealed court records show.

Maurice Andrews, 36, former confidant of D.C. drug kingpin Kevin Gray, faced 30 years to life in prison under federal sentencing guidelines after pleading guilty to racketeering charges related to several murders.

DOJ_NMG_0092522

However, in what prosecutors call a "very unusual" request, the U.S. Attorney's Office recently sought a sentence of time served and probation. Authorities cited Andrews' role as a key government witness in the prosecution of the violent street gang.

"He testified in dozens, literally dozens of criminal incidents that he was aware of, ranging from individual drug deals to murder," Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew G. Olsen said at Andrews' Sept. 29 sentencing.

U.S. District Court Judge Royce C. Lamberth sentenced Andrews, who has been in the federal witness-protection program for five years, to time served and five years' probation, according to a transcript of the hearing.

The proceedings had remained sealed until last week.

Federal authorities have called Murder Inc. the most violent gang in the District's history. It ran much of the city's crack cocaine and heroin trade during the 1990s and killed potential government witnesses, authorities said.

Several leaders of the gang -- including Gray, convicted of 19 murders, and Rodney Moore, convicted of 10 murders -- are serving sentences of life in prison without parole. A jury deadlocked on giving them the death penalty.

The Murder Inc. case resurfaced last month when government witness Bethlehem Ayele was fatally shot after her car was stopped in Alexandria. Police have described the killing of Miss Ayele, a restaurant owner and real-estate agent, as a targeted hit. She was one of several people who cooperated in the case.

Andrews pleaded guilty in July 2000. Among other charges, he admitted to supplying the gun used to kill one man and assisting in plans to kill two others.

One victim, Carlos Cardoza, was suspected of cooperating with investigators. According to testimony, Andrews drove contract killer Oscar Veal Jr. to Cardoza's house to have him killed. Asked how he felt upon learning Veal killed Cardoza, Andrews testified, "It just another thing, I mean, it was the life I was living at the time."

Veal, who also cooperated, admitted that he committed seven killings. He is serving 25 years in prison.

At his sentencing, Andrews apologized by saying: "I just got myself into something I couldn't get out of. I was too far in and I wanted out. But I didn't know how to get out."

Andrews grew up in Southeast. He worked sporadically in carpentry and clerical jobs, meeting Gray sometime in 1994. The pair clicked. They spent nearly every day together for five years, Andrews testified.

Andrews testified that Gray got drunk and told him about committing numerous murders. But Andrews added that he knew better than to directly ask Gray such questions.

"He gets suspicious and thinks you're asking him questions for a reason, and he ends up killing you," Andrews testified.

However, defense attorneys sought to discredit Andrews, saying he repeatedly lied under oath to get a reduced sentence.

One defense theory held that Andrews testified for the government because he needed help paying his medical bills after learning in jail he was HIV positive.

Under cross-examination in 2002, Andrews told Moore's attorney that he received $1,200 to $1,800 a month at various times after joining the witness-protection program.

He also said that he got money for furniture, a car and a job and that the government paid more than $1,600 of his unpaid parking tickets.

In January, Sebastian Graber, an attorney for Larry Wilkerson, whom Andrews testified against, filed court papers stating Andrews and other cooperating witnesses conspired to "put murders" on Gray, Wilkerson and others.

Andrews was "known for not telling the truth," and associates knew him by the nickname "Lie-Lie." Mr. Graber stated in court filings.

"Mr. Andrews is willing to lie and lie about murders," Mr. Graber told Judge Lamberth during a hearing in 2004.

Yet prosecutors say Andrews was a reliable and truthful witness, despite his reputation.

"Although he was known on the streets as a partyer and drug dealer who could not be trusted, he took his cooperation ... very seriously," Assistant U.S. Attorney Amy Jeffress wrote in a Sept. 27 memo to Judge Lamberth.

"We understand that a departure of this magnitude is very unusual," Miss Jeffress wrote, referring to Andrews' sentence.

"We believe, however, that defendant Andrews' extraordinary cooperation justifies this significant benefit."

It is not clear what Andrews has been doing for the past five years.

"He's got a steady job, pays his taxes and stays out of trouble," his attorney, James Lyons, told Judge Lamberth.

DOJ_NMG_0092523

"I'm going to keep doing what I've been doing," Andrews added.

Identity Thief Is Often Found In Family Photo (NYT)

By John Leland

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

In the five years since his divorce, Eric Wagenhauser had moved on with his life. He had remarried and was sharing custody of the three children from his first marriage. Then, last year, Mr. Wagenhauser discovered a new wrinkle on American divorce: his former wife had used the children's Social Security numbers to apply for nine credit cards in their names. She obtained two.

Mr. Wagenhauser's ordeal over the next year, which involved police departments in two Texas counties, banks, credit bureaus and the Social Security Administration, is familiar to many identity theft victims — the crime often begins at home.

Though most victims never learn who stole their identities, half of those who do say the thief was a family member, a friend, a neighbor or an in-home employee, according to surveys by the Federal Trade Commission and Javelin Strategy and Research, a private research firm. The surveys estimate that 9 million to 10 million Americans have their identities stolen each year.

Mr. Wagenhauser's former wife, Ivy Ash, began applying for credit cards in the children's names soon after the divorce. She ran up about $200 in unpaid bills, he said, which grew to about $1,000 with late fees and interest penalties. She pleaded guilty to two counts of fraudulent use of a credit card this year and is now in a Texas prison.

But the effect of the thefts is still being felt in the Wagenhauser household. "This has been a financial strain, and to be quite honest, you can hear my wife and I bickering right now over this," said Mr. Wagenhauser, a Houston construction worker. "We've had to go into marriage counseling ourselves because this has been so stressful on our own marriage, just dealing with it, the fighting, the arguments.

"It has almost reached the point where my wife and I have gotten a divorce over all the stress related to having to fight the crime. It stretches out over so many things. That's what makes it so devastating and insidious."

Identity theft involving family members takes many forms, said Betsy Broder, assistant director of the Federal Trade Commission's division of privacy and identity protection. A child steals a parent's identity to buy drugs, one sibling steals another's identity to try to avoid arrest or debt.

Identity theft is often difficult to solve and prosecute, and, in the case of families, victims may be reluctant to report relatives to the police.

The fraud went on for five years before Mr. Wagenhauser became aware of what was happening. By then, the mother's actions had created credit histories for two of the under-age children, which Mr. Wagenhauser worries will cause them future trouble.

"When my kids turn 18 and go to college, they're not going to be able to buy a car or get a student loan because they've got bad credit," Mr. Wagenhauser said. "No one's going to rent them an apartment. They're going to be turned down for jobs because there's so many companies that run credit histories."

"They're kids," he added. "They don't have any idea what's going on. All the sudden they're adults, and they're left holding the baggage."

Suspicious parents can look out for clues that their children's identities have been compromised, said Jay Foley, a founder and director of the Identity Theft Resource Center, a nonprofit organization that helps victims.

"Let's say Mom and Dad are divorced, and Junior goes to stay with dad," Mr. Foley said. "When he calls Mom, she sees the kid's name on the caller ID instead of Dad's. If that was set up in the kid's name, what else was set up?"

If young children start to receive applications for credit cards in the mail, it is a sign that someone with access to their Social Security numbers has applied for credit in their names, Mr. Foley said.

After their mother went to prison, Mr. Wagenhauser's children moved in with him. He and his new wife, Tracey, have not decided how they will explain the crime, or the punishment, to their youngest children, who are 10 and 8.

DOJ_NMG_0092524

"It's definitely estranged me from my oldest daughter," who is 15, Mr. Wagenhauser said. "My oldest daughter, who is old enough to understand, has been told that I am the one who put her mother in jail. She's not accepting that her mother is the one who did this to her and to herself."

Identity theft by a family member or someone close to the family is probably underreported and raises thorny questions about trust, responsibility and loyalty, Ms. Broder said.

"We see parents taking advantage of their children, and children taking advantage of their older parents," she said. "We can tell consumers and businesses to be careful about how they safeguard their personal information, but it's hard to tell people to safeguard their information from the people that they love."

For Brenda Bare, of Snellville, Ga., the identity thief was a trusted friend whom Ms. Bare, 58, had known for 22 years. The friend, a woman, had been living in Ms. Bare's house.

When Ms. Bare returned home in August after being away for a month to care for her mother, she discovered that 10 checks and a recently expired driver's license were missing. A credit card offer in her name was in the woman's bedroom with the application form torn off.

"I said, 'You have to leave here tonight,' " Ms. Bare recalled.

For the next two weeks, Ms. Bare tried to repair the damage. She found helpful a checklist for identity theft victims; versions are available from the Federal Trade Commission and the Identity Theft Resource Center. Ms. Bare discovered that four checks had been cashed, for about $400 in all, and that an application had been made for a credit card, though it had not been approved.

Because the crime was committed in her home by someone she trusted, Ms. Bare said she felt vulnerable.

"The first two weeks I slept with the front and back porch lights on, and if I would hear a noise, I was awake," she said. "I have a dog, but my dog knows her. But I'm feeling better about it and going on with my life."

Ms. Bare's checks had been cashed in another county. She finally tracked down the stores and banks where the checks were cashed, and local police officers issued arrest warrants. But even after her bank cleared her of responsibility for the forged checks, she said, she was still not off the hook.

"After the bank reimbursed my money, they went back to the merchant and took the money back from the merchant because the check was no good," she said. "So the store thinks I wrote a bad check, so they come after me. I had to go prove I didn't do this. This was a nightmare. My bank was supposed to close my checking account, but when I went back in there it was still open."

Although she canceled her credit cards and registered a fraud alert with credit bureaus, she said she was concerned that there was little preventing the thief from using her information again or selling it to someone else.

"There's still four or five checks that were never retrieved," Ms. Bare said. "My license was never retrieved. She can sell all this information. The D.A. just said, 'Oh, she won't do that again.' "

Identity theft by family members can put special pressure on the victims when there is a possibility of children, parents or former spouses going to jail or prison. Many victims pay the debts and choose not to involve the police or the courts, said Mari J. Frank, a lawyer who works with people whose identities have been stolen.

"It's such a breach of trust," Ms. Frank said. "When someone you don't know steals your identity, it's very impersonal. They just want money. But when it's a family member, it's far more emotionally destructive."

For a Michigan couple, the problem began in August with a notice that a bank had received a credit card application in their name. The couple declined to be identified because they are hoping to resolve the matter privately.

The couple immediately suspected their son, who had tried the same thing four years earlier. This time they found that he had obtained two credit cards, run up debts of more than $22,000 and applied for new cards or higher credit limits.

"The explanation was that we never helped him when he wanted the money," the father said.

After much soul searching, the parents said, they did not want to see their son put in jail. They negotiated a plan for him to assume the debt on one card and resigned themselves to paying a debt of about $5,000 on the second card rather than reporting the crime to the police.

DOJ_NMG_0092525

"We'd make an arrangement for him to pay us, but I'm sure he wouldn't," the mother said. "He has a unique way of getting around anything. It doesn't send a very good message, but putting him in jail is not going to help either. There aren't too many good options out there. If he goes to jail, he's not going to learn anything except to wisen him up to be street smart. What choices do we have? All our life from now on we have to watch our credit."

She blamed herself for the way her son had turned out. "I don't know what went wrong, but in the end we have to say it's our fault, and that is terrible to live with," she said. "I can't think of anything worse for a parent."

Staving Off Modern-day Pirates (LAT)

By John M. Glionna

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia — Noel Choong was working late the night he got the distress call: Just off the Malaysian coast in the darkness, a Japanese tugboat and barge were being attacked by a dozen pirates armed with AK-47s and rocket launchers.

The 154-man crew aboard the barge Kuroshio was frantic. As the vessel churned slowly northward through choppy waters of the Strait of Malacca, headed for Myanmar, it had suddenly been surrounded by three fishing boats.

The armed men stormed the little tug. Shots were fired. The captain and two others were taken hostage. The desperate barge crew plotted a rescue mission to free their shipmates, who were being held with guns to their heads.

A slender, tough-to-ruffle figure in his mid-40s, Choong urged the crew not to try anything stupid. "The pirates had high-powered weapons," he said later. "We told them: 'You're unarmed. You can't fight guns.' "

As his staff radioed for help from Malaysian marine police, Choong stayed on the phone with the terrified seamen. Pirates may be oceangoing desperadoes driven by poverty or greed, he assured them, but they usually are not killers.

Unless, that is, they were cornered or provoked.

"For that crew, this was a night from hell," Choong recalled. "I was just trying to be their friendly voice of reason."

Choong is a pirate catcher, a maritime crisis negotiator who handles the high-anxiety drama of modern-day pirate attacks in real time. He's also a detective, a high-seas sleuth with a host of shadowy shipping industry informants he uses to run down hijacked ships.

In the outlaw Strait of Malacca, whose waters are considered the most pirated in the world, his services as director of the International Maritime Bureau's Piracy Reporting Center are in near-constant demand.

The 550-mile-long channel, flanked by Singapore and Malaysia to the east and the Indonesian island of Sumatra to the west, is one of the world's most strategic international waterways and its busiest shipping lane. Each year, 60,000 vessels, the equivalent of nearly half the world's entire merchant fleet, negotiate the funnel-shaped shortcut between the Pacific and Indian oceans. They range from mammoth supertankers as large as city skyscrapers to tugs and barges.

Such seaborne commercial traffic attracts a sophisticated brand of piracy that has moved far beyond the scabbards and cutlasses of the 17th century.

Many are opportunists, Choong said, impromptu gangs of poor fisherman who can't resist the allure of lumbering, unarmed vessels laden with cash and goods: "They realized that robbing unarmed sailors is a lot easier than robbing a bank." Others are more ambitious and well-organized, professionals who plunder ships for crime syndicates, warlords, corrupt government officials and even regional terrorist groups.

In recent years, Choong says, emboldened pirates have become more sophisticated. They forge passports and other documents to turn working maritime vessels into slave- and drug-running ships. They use satellite phones and global positioning systems.

With high-speed fiberglass boats, they creep up from behind, using the cover of the ship radar's blind spot. With grappling hooks and expert climbing skills, they scale the vessel's mooring ropes and overpower isolated and vulnerable crews.

The pirates don't just use the cover of darkness. They also take advantage of national sovereignty laws.

Knowing that marine police must observe territorial boundaries, flotillas of fishermen from such places as Sumatra or freelance commandos from the Indonesian navy ambush ships and then race back to the safety of their sovereign waters, often just a few miles away.

DOJ_NMG_0092526

In a trick from centuries ago, pirates may disguise themselves to approach wary vessels. Some pose as marine police, uniforms and all, doing routine checks.

Shippers have retaliated: In the Strait of Malacca, vessels use powerful water hoses to blast would-be boarders off the deck or to swamp the boats below. Some post mannequins dressed in overalls and hard hats to give the impression of a larger crew. Captains of smaller boats spread carpet tacks on their decks at night, hoping to slow pirates, who often attack barefoot to give themselves a better grip and to minimize sound.

Bigger boats illuminate decks with floodlights and travel in a zigzag to create a wake to sink small boats. Day and night, the more watchful captains use closed-circuit TV to monitor the water around them. Some hire armed commandos for security, because in the anarchy and take-care-of-your-own credo of the high seas, isolated ships in jeopardy know they cannot expect help from another unarmed craft.

Many pirate attacks are hit-and-run robberies. In others, crew members are kidnapped for ransom, even tortured and killed. Countless vessels have been hijacked, their nameplates and paperwork swiftly changed, and turned into ghost ships used by syndicates for drug and slave smuggling.

Authorities estimate that only 10% to 30% of pirate attacks are reported. Still, in the last five years, 195 attacks on seaborne vessels in the Strait of Malacca have been logged, including 49 kidnappings and seven deaths. More than $1 million in ransom was paid last year by owners of ships transiting the passageway, statistics show.

By 2005, the shipping gantlet had become so dangerous that Lloyd's of London declared the strait a high war-risk area for insurance purposes, citing its "war, strikes, terrorism and related perils." The advisory was lifted this year after Singapore and Indonesia began coordinated air and sea patrols.

Although the last 12 months have brought an uneasy hiatus, Choong says recent incidents suggest piracy may be back — with an ominous new wrinkle.

In July, armed attackers boarded two United Nations-chartered vessels carrying tsunami relief supplies. In the first incident, six men in military fatigues brazenly stormed the ship before noon, one of the first reported daylight raids.

The next day, a dozen heavily armed men claiming to be attached to the Free Aceh Movement, an Indonesian separatist group, commandeered another U.N. ship. That same week, a gang of 35 pirates armed with machine guns and rocket launchers seized a fully loaded gasoline tanker and kidnapped its captain. He was later released with the vessel.

Choong and others believe such instances suggest the possibility of a major terrorist attack in the Strait of Malacca, which slices through the heart of a region rife with political and religious unrest. International security experts also fear that militants might commandeer a giant crude oil tanker for use as a floating bomb.

Just a mile and a half wide at its narrowest point, the strait is a crucial maritime choke point. Experts say terrorists could sink a huge tanker at a narrow juncture, wreaking environmental havoc and bringing international maritime commerce to a halt.

Though experts differ on its likelihood, some say the idea is not farfetched.

"If someone in 2000 said people could hijack planes and fly them into the World Trade Center, critics would have said, 'Oh, that's not going to happen.' But some incidents suggest terrorists are looking at the Malacca Strait," said John Brandon, director of the Asia Foundation, which monitors U.S.-Southeast Asia relations.

"Pirates recently hijacked and tried to learn to steer an oil tanker in the Malacca Strait. That raises a troubling question: Why do they want to learn to steer?"

Choong has given briefings to global investigative agencies such as Interpol and to anti-terrorism officials from numerous countries, including the United States.

His assessment is troubling.

"Singapore is vulnerable — it's very pro-West and surrounded by Muslim nations," he said. "Militants could cause environmental damage and cripple the world economy. What more could a terrorist ask for? Everything is there."

Choong came to the piracy reporting center in 1997, no stranger to the sea. As a former chief officer and merchant marine, the soft-spoken Chinese-Malay, who grew up here, knows the fear that pirate attacks inspire.

DOJ_NMG_0092527

A religious man who doesn't drink or smoke, he maintains a coolly professional anger against sea robbers and bandits who torture, kidnap and kill his fellow seamen. His employer, the International Maritime Bureau, is part of the Paris-based International Chamber of Commerce, whose fight against piracy is mandated by the United Nations.

From his 35th-floor office in a Kuala Lumpur high-rise 100 miles from the choppy waters of the strait, Choong keeps a bunkered-down mentality, always ready for the next pirate attack. The walls of his reception area are covered with world maps that bear red pins to mark the latest plunders.

Choong's purview is worldwide, from the troubled waters off Somalia and Bangladesh to the ungoverned South China Sea, but the Strait of Malacca is his most constant headache.

His role is not to make arrests or conduct criminal post-mortems after attacks. Rather, he runs a sort of 911 service for seaborne vessels under siege. Through daily situation reports, his agency offers vessels an early-warning system, giving crews a heads-up that they are entering waters with recent pirate activity.

He has also developed a network of informants, shipyard workers and fishermen who peddle tips to help track down hijacked ships. Many contacts are criminals, so Choong takes precautions: He's never photographed. Some family members do not know his job. He changes his route to work.

In delving into Asian organized crime syndicates, he and his team meet shadowy characters in big-city airports and dense jungles.

He wants information and he's willing to pay, money that comes from ship owners and insurers. "We tell our informants we can't guarantee their safety — and some do get killed. There's nothing we can do about that," he said.

"We don't get personal with them. That way we can live with it if they die."

Choong has been threatened. One source told him he could have anyone killed for $500. "I knew what he meant, and it scared me," he said. "But I tell these people that if you kill us, new people will be hired. If you bomb our headquarters, a new one will be built. You can't close us down."

Despite such threats, Choong's war against piracy goes on. Some battles end better than others.

On that night in March 2005, when bandits attacked the Japanese tugboat Idaten and its construction barge, the Kuroshio, Choong urged the barge crew by phone to take pictures of the pirate vessels for evidence.

For nearly an hour, the pirates held the tugboat's captain, chief engineer and a crewman at gunpoint. Then, sometime before midnight, the armed invaders fled with the three men. As Malaysian marine police escorted the tug and barge to port, Choong alerted the ship owner to begin the delicate task of negotiating the release of the hostages.

Over the next few days, the owners, along with Japanese government officials, kept up a dialogue with the pirates. Meanwhile, the hostages were spirited among fishing boats, and finally taken to the jungles of southern Thailand.

After the ship owners paid an undisclosed ransom that Choong described as "way above market value," the men were released, but the pirates escaped. The saga made headlines — with scant mention of Choong. And that's the way he likes it.

"This time nobody died," he said. "Still, it's a dangerous game."

john.glionna@latimes.com

Authorities Discredit Latest "sighting" Of James "Whitey" Bulger (BOS)

By David Abel

The Boston Globe, November 10, 2006

Authorities in California have investigated and discredited the latest reported sighting of fugitive Boston mobster James "Whitey" Bulger.

Bulger, 77, one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted fugitives, fled a month before his 1995 federal racketeering indictment and was later revealed to be a longtime FBI informant and charged with the murder of 19 people.

Since he vanished, authorities have investigated reported sightings of the fugitive throughout the world.

Monica Munoz, a spokeswoman for the San Diego Police Department, said last night that a security guard reported seeing someone in the city who looked like Bulger on Oct. 8 or 9. The guard last reported seeing the man board a trolley. But local transit officials did not find anyone matching the description, Munoz said.

DOJ_NMG_0092528

"It wasn't a credible sighting. Someone called and said they saw him. San Diego trolley security did look, but they didn't find him. That's how we know it wasn't a legitimate sighting."

Darrell Foxworth, an FBI agent in San Diego, said he had received reports from police about the alleged sighting, but he also determined they were not legitimate. "The Police Department had responded down there, conducted a limited investigation, and after reviewing the description, they determined it wasn't credible," he said.

Authorities in Boston could not be reached last night about the latest reported sighting.

Was That Whitey Departing The Departed? (BOSH)

By Dave Wedge And Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, November 13, 2006

California cop believes he saw Bulger flee flick

Notorious fugitive James J. "Whitey" Bulger may have starred in his own quick getaway scene after a cop spotted a man resembling the crime boss exiting a screening of the mob flick "The Departed" at a San Diego cinema.

Sources said an off-duty police officer spied the 77-year-old Bulger - or at least someone matching his description - leaving a downtown theater after watching the film, which stars Jack Nicholson as a dead ringer for the South Boston crime lord.

San Diego Police Department spokeswoman Monica Munoz confirmed the department responded to the report about three weeks ago.

The off-duty cop tailed the Bulger look-a-like out of the theater but lost him when the suspect hopped onto a trolley. San Diego transit cops searched the trolley system but were unable to find anyone matching the description, Munoz said.

A source told the Herald the cop recognized the man as Bulger from his "steely blue eyes" and muscular physique. A law enforcement source confirmed that authorities are probing the alleged sighting.

Samantha Martin, spokeswoman for the Massachusetts U.S. Attorney's Office, which is in charge of the Bulger Fugitive Task Force, declined comment.

The incident is the latest possible sighting of the crime boss who vanished in 1995 as an organized crime strike force made up of state police, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the Internal Revenue Service closed in. A longtime snitch, Bulger fled the night before he was indicted for 19 gruesome mob murders, thanks to a tip from his boyhood pal and longtime FBI handler John Connolly.

The last confirmed Bulger sighting was in London's Piccadilly Circus in September 2002.

The Task Force released a statement earlier this year saying authorities "run down every lead and exclude every look-a-like sighting." There were sightings reported in 19 countries in 2005.

In August, authorities released 25-year-old surveillance videos of Bulger in an attempt to ferret out more tips.

Bulger, who fled with longtime galpal Catherine Greig, has a $1 million bounty on his head and remains the FBI's No. 2 most wanted fugitive, behind only Sept. 11 mastermind Osama bin Laden. He has also remained a compelling media figure as stories about Bulger recently appeared in newspapers in England, where authorities once found Bulger's safety deposit boxes.

Police Believe Slaying At Md. FedEx Site Was Random (WP)

By Tara Bahrampour

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

She had emigrated from Guyana 19 years ago to give her children, Reina and Colin, a better life. After raising them and a younger daughter, Chantal, in a townhouse in Silver Spring, she moved to a spacious two-story brick house in Bowie. In August, Reina moved in, with her own two children, to save money to pursue her dream of becoming a nurse, like her mother.

That dream ended Saturday when Reina Natasha Lynch, 26, was found dead of a gunshot wound at the FedEx Ground distribution center in Beltsville, where she worked as a security guard. A colleague discovered her body at 7 a.m. in the booth at the entrance to the fenced compound on Trolley Lane.

Prince George's County police said yesterday that they had not found a motive. "We believe this was a random event," said Cpl. Stephen Pacheco. Investigators are looking for clues in Lynch's car and in security camera footage, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0092529

As rain lashed Evans's living-room windows yesterday afternoon, she tried to absorb the fact that her eldest child, "Tasha," was not coming home. Heart-shaped silver balloons bobbed near the ceiling, left over from Tuesday, when the family celebrated Evans's 48th birthday. Lynch and her children, Alexia, 7, and Ethan, 4, had given Evans a handbag and a card telling her that they loved her.

"She was very willing, a very hardworking, loving, determined person," Evans said. "Being a single parent, it was so hard, so I told her she could come home. . . . I'm just trying to figure out who would do such a terrible thing."

Evans's sister, Desaree David, said, "This is quite new for us."

"We are from a society that is quite mild-mannered," she said in the Caribbean cadence she shares with her sister. "You try to get your kids away from this, and you think this is the kind of thing that happens to other people, on TV. When it happens to you, you're not, kind of, insulated for it."

Away from where the sisters sat on pristine white couches, Evans's other children padded around fielding calls. Lynch's children flitted about energetically, holding bags of potato chips and grabbing at the balloons.

David described her niece, a graduate of Montgomery Blair High School, as "a brilliant student" who loved legal thrillers and her mother's pepper pot soup. She rose early each morning to drive a Montgomery County school bus; the weekend security job was for extra money, said her mother, adding that Lynch sometimes heard strange noises near the guard booth but chalked it up to nerves.

Lynch worked for Ronin Risk International, a security firm contracted by FedEx. Evans expressed anger at the companies. "I don't know who would just have one lone female guard just working at night," she said. "It's dangerous even for a man."

FedEx Ground spokeswoman Alison Sobczak said she had never heard of an employee being shot onsite and added that guard booths are typically locked at night.

Evans's son, Colin Lynch, 23, a radiography student at Washington Hospital Center, also works as a guard at the FedEx facility. He had offered to work his sister's shift that night because she was tired. Now, to ease his mother's fears, he will stop working there, he said.

Evans took a sleeping pill Saturday night but woke up crying. "It's too hard," she said, her voice breaking. "It's too fresh." She wiped away new tears. "We came here and worked really hard so we could achieve what we had. I brought them here so they could have a better life."

Now she will transfer that hope to her grandchildren, who will continue to live with her. Sitting close by, Ethan said he wants to be "a firefighter man." Alexia wants to be a police officer. "Alexia's the one who said this morning she wished she was there to help her mommy call 911," Evans said.

No funeral arrangements have been made. A reward of up to $25,000 is being offered for information leading to an arrest and indictment.

"Things were hard for her lately, but they were supposed to be getting better," Colin said. "I was trying to help her the best I could, and it was supposed to get better."

On Saturday, the family had planned to go to Six Flags America.

Hearing this, Ethan looked up and brightly chirped, "Six Flags!" -- remembering the promise of a few days ago.

Petty Disputes Spur Most D.C. Killings (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

The motive for most homicides in the District are arguments and petty disputes over perceived slights, accounting for more killings last year than robberies, domestic disputes, gang activity and drug wars combined, according to the Metropolitan Police Department.

"It's a pretty big deal among some people," said Chief Charles H. Ramsey. "A guy gets upset -- you know, 'You're disrespecting me.' Or they don't like the way you're looking at them. You'd be surprised at how many silly homicides we see."

The police department last year attributed 57 of the city's 196 killings to arguments, compared with 50 such killings among the city's 198 in 2004, according to a recently released department report tracking homicide information from 2001 to 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0092530

During those five years, 1,126 persons were killed in the District, 901 of them fatally shot. The report also states that about 1,058 of the homicide victims were black, about 36 were Hispanic and about 32 were white.

Arguments have accounted for a steady increase in the percentage of overall killings in the city since 2001, when they were the primary motive in 19 percent of the 232 homicides.

Chief Ramsey said that guns are a big part of the problem.

"The guns make them feel like they're more powerful," he said. "They overreact."

As recently as 2002, drugs were the primary motive in more than one-third of the city's 262 killings. As a percentage of total homicides, that figure has declined each year, accounting for just 10 percent, or 19 killings, last year.

Chief Ramsey said the decline in homicides attributable to disputes over drugs proves how hard police have worked to eradicate the problem.

The ages of homicide victims have remained fairly consistent. About two-thirds of them each year are 18 to 44.

The report states that in 2005, "nearly all" homicide victims 25 to 34 had a prior-arrest record. The number of juvenile and adult homicides also increase sharply beginning at about 10 p.m., factors that the police chief said he considered when declaring the recent crime emergency, which ended less than two weeks ago.

"I look at numbers and trends every day," he said. "When you look at these things, you can't ignore them."

Other large U.S. cities are reporting a similar trend.

In Milwaukee, where homicides increased from 88 in 2004 to 122 in 2005, the number classified as arguments increased from 17 to 45. That was the largest category of killings, as the number of gang and drug-related slayings decreased, according to the New York Times.

Disputes also made up the largest category in Houston. Homicides increased there 24 percent in 2005, with 113 of 336 related to disputes.

There were 380 homicides in Philadelphia last year, with 208 dispute-related. Drug-related killings, which accounted for about 40 percent of homicides during the early 1990s, accounted for 13 percent, the newspaper reported in February.

The District's report also states that for three straight years detectives have closed 60 percent of cases, peaking with last year's closure rate of 61 percent.

So far this year, police have closed 85 homicide cases for a closure rate of 57.4 percent.

There were 148 killings through yesterday. That figure is down 11.4 percent from the 167 killings recorded at that point last year and on pace to end 2006 with 174 killings. That would be the lowest total since 147 killings were recorded in 1985.

In 1997, the year before Chief Ramsey took over the department, there were 301 killings. The highest total during his tenure was 262 in 2002.

Va. State Police Swap '10-4' For 'Message Understood' (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, local governments have spent millions on high-tech radios to improve communication among police forces. Now, Virginia is taking the next step: changing the very way cops talk.

Starting this month, Virginia State Police have banned the "10 codes" used by generations of officers to flag everything from murders to bathroom breaks. Gone is the language of "10-4" and "What's your 10-20 [location]?"

The codes are as much a part of police culture as badges and coffee. But over time, individual police departments have adapted the codes in their own ways, creating confusion when they have to work together -- such as on Sept. 11.

Eager to avoid such mix-ups, Virginia's government has become one of the first in the nation to try to eliminate traditional cop talk. For months, officials in Richmond have worked with police and firefighters to come up with a substitute for 10 codes, finally deciding on a statewide "common language protocol."

In other words, English.

Police have reacted with a certain amount of 10-32 (alarm).

DOJ_NMG_0092531

"My first reaction was, 'You've got to be kidding me,' " said Trooper Steve Mittendorff, 26, as he patrolled the Dulles Toll Road early this month. "How am I going to stop using something I've been using all these years?"

The switch reflects why it is so challenging for the U.S. Department of Homeland Security to create a national emergency response system. If someone sets off a dirty bomb at the Pentagon, Arlington County police might be on the radio with officers arriving from Fairfax County, Alexandria, the District or Maryland.

To Arlington police, "10-13" means "officer in trouble." To Montgomery County police, the same code means "request wrecker." Even everyday police commands can get lost in translation: In Alexandria, "10-54" refers to an alcohol sensor. For Virginia State Police, it's livestock on the highway.

"It's nuts," said Chris Essid, who is leading Virginia's campaign to get all police and firefighters to switch to plain English. "I had no idea how attached people became to codes."A Simpler Time

The 10-code system started catching on in the 1920s, when police radios had only one channel. Officers needed to bark out information succinctly to avoid tying up the system. But over time, a Babel of codes developed.

The jumble wasn't such a problem when police were on different radio systems, or were not as tuned in to the potential for apocalyptic disasters. But five years ago, as law enforcement agencies rushed to the Pentagon, they found that sometimes they were speaking in different tongues.

Local "police were talking 10 codes. So were the Pentagon police. The FBI have their own little 10 codes," said Capt. Richard Slusher, communications officer for the Arlington Fire Department. "You didn't know what they were talking about."

Usually such mix-ups are just an inconvenience. But the potential for trouble is clear. A few years ago, an agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives called in a "10-50" while working in Maryland, police said. To Montgomery police, that means "officer down." Squad cars rushed to the scene -- to discover that, in the agent's code, "10-50" meant traffic accident.

After Sept. 11, federal Homeland Security officials required first responders to use plain English in events involving other agencies. But many officers like to keep the codes for day-to-day use within their departments.

Some officials, though, said they fear such officers will revert to their own 10 codes under the stress of a disaster. That's why Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) decided to urge all first responders to switch to plain language full time.

But getting rid of 10 codes has met considerable resistance from some officers. At stake are efficiency, safety and professionalism. Not to mention cool.

"The jargon is one of the things that sets the cops apart," said Tim Dees, a former police officer who is editor of Officer.com, a Web site run out of Beltsville. Not that police officers are alone, he noted: As shown by numerous TV shows, doctors and lawyers also love to snap out their jargon.

"It adds," he said, "a certain mystique."A Tough Transition

The day after Virginia State Police entered the plain-English era, Mittendorff was patrolling on the toll road. Night was falling, and the radio was squawking with news of rush-hour accidents.

Occasionally, a baritone voice would mutter a "10-46" (disabled vehicle) or "10-27" (requested license check).

"Everyone is trying to remember plain language," mused Mittendorff, an earnest officer with a Marine-style buzz cut. "I've been trying all day, and I keep slipping."

He pulled onto the side of the road, behind another cruiser with flashing red and blue lights. The driver, Trooper Jason Thomasson, 29, had just finished writing a traffic ticket. He and Mittendorff reminisced about the old 10 codes.

"I think they were a lot easier," said Thomasson, leaning on his friend's cruiser. "You can rattle it off a lot faster."

Mittendorff said he worries about troopers encountering greater danger now that their coded language has been stripped bare for anyone with a police scanner to understand.

"The public never knew what we were talking about," he said.

Virginia officials said they have created a simple set of four signals for cases in which police officers need to get radio information confidentially -- for example, if a suspect is on a terrorist list. As for the secrecy of the old 10 codes, Essid said, that's largely a myth.

"A lot of these codes are on the Internet," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0092532

Still, traditional cop talk will not disappear easily. Officials in the Washington area have been talking for months about taking a common approach to the issue, but it hasn't happened. Montgomery has gotten rid of codes, but Prince George's County hasn't. D.C. police have kept a handful of 10 codes.

Even in Virginia, the record is mixed. Alexandria police tried to abolish codes a decade ago but reverted. The codes were more effective, said Lt. James Bartlett, a spokesman, and they limited the time long-winded officers were on the radio.

But, clearly, the attraction goes beyond efficiency.

"It's just our own little language," said another officer on the Alexandria force, Capt. Hassan Aden. He uses 10 codes so instinctually that his 4-year-old son has picked them up. When the boy has soccer practice, for example, Aden says: "Hey, come on, we've got to 10-18," or hurry. Dinner is "10-7 time."

His police officers switch to common language when working with other departments. Still, after years of code, they must make a conscious effort to speak plain English.

"It's like a different language," he said.

CIVIL LAW:

Partial-Birth Replay (WP)

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

IT ISN'T EVERY day that the Supreme Court confronts a law materially identical to one it has already struck down. But that is what the justices faced last week when they heard oral arguments over the federal ban on partial-birth abortions. Six years ago, the court struck down state partial-birth laws -- ruling that Nebraska's ban was overly broad and lacked an exception for situations in which protecting a woman's health required the use of the disfavored procedure. In response, Congress enacted its own version of the ban, complete with nearly all of the faults from which the Nebraska statute had suffered. The Justice Department contends that the new law can be reconciled with the court's prior ruling. This is laughable. The only way to uphold this law would be to overturn the prior decision -- a step that the justices should not take, in the interest of women's health and out of respect for precedent.

"Partial-birth abortion" is a political term, not a medical one. If Congress had wanted to pass a ban on either late-term abortions or on the particular procedure normally associated with the "partial-birth" label, it was free to do so as long as it defined it carefully and maintained a health exception. It did neither. Instead, it defined "partial-birth abortion" in a fashion that could once again include some abortions performed using the method most common in the second trimester. And it sought to get around the court's insistence on a health exception by asserting, in a purported factual finding, that the procedure is never medically necessary to protect a woman's health.

This, as several lower courts have found, isn't true. And while the Supreme Court generally owes deference to congressional fact-finding, that does not entitle the legislature to get around the high court's constitutional holdings with factual assertions at odds with both its own legislative record and voluminous testimony in the lower federal courts.

The real question this case presents is whether the court, with Justice Sandra Day O'Connor retired, will continue to honor its precedent. In that sense, the case will shed important light on the court's new members, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., neither of whom tipped their hands at oral arguments. Both men testified eloquently at their confirmation hearings about their high regard for stare decisis -- the principle that precedents should generally be permitted to stand. Both would send a powerful message of respect for the court's institutional work if, in a case so politically loaded and with so many people expecting a predictable ideological split, they declined the invitation to either contort or reverse a high-profile precedent and merely applied it instead.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Sex Predators TV Show Raises Rights Issues (LAW)

DOJ_NMG_0092533

By Tresa Baldas, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, November 13, 2006

The NBC television series "To Catch a Predator," which features confrontations with men allegedly seeking sex with minors online, may be popular with viewers, but not with criminal defense attorneys, who claim the show raises a range of civil rights issues.

Seating an unbiased jury when a client's face has been splashed all over national television is nearly impossible, they argue. Miranda rights and search-and-seizure issues are also compromised by the show, they add.

In the last two years, 183 alleged online sexual predators have been formally charged as a result of being caught on the show, which has run sting operations in California, Florida, Georgia, New York and Ohio with the help of an online predator-watchdog group. More than 20 of those cases have resulted in guilty pleas or convictions, with the remaining cases still pending.

'TOWN SQUARE' TRIAL?

"Without question, it tramples on their constitutional rights to due process and a fair trial," said Blair Berk of Tarlow & Berk in Los Angeles, who is representing a doctor featured on the show that aired on Oct. 6. The man allegedly showed up at a house hoping for a date with who he thought was a 13-year-old girl he met online. People v. Wolin, No. SCR 495892 (Sonoma Co., Calif., Super. Ct.).

Berk likened the show's tactics to "trying someone in town square without giving them due process.

"How do you, with a ratings-driven TV show, with a client as the poster child for the theme of the show -- which is that everyone featured on the show is a sexual predator by definition -- how do you have any chance at securing that person the presumption of innocence, due process or the right to a fair trial?" Berk said.

"They are being tried on TV from a purely prosecutorial prospective."

"Dateline NBC" correspondent Chris Hansen denied claims that the program fails to guard against entrapment and violates defendants' right to a fair trial. He noted that the sting operations always start with the alleged predators initiating the contact with the decoy, not the other way around.

"We are very cautious about this. We understand that everybody is due their day in court," Hansen said. "But at the end of the day, it's no different than if [the alleged predators] walked into an investigation that was run by law enforcement."

He said that "the reality is that the proof of intent in many cases is in the chat log. And the chat logs speak for themselves."

Gary Bostwick of Sheppard, Mullin, Richter & Hampton in Los Angeles, an attorney for NBC Universal Inc., was unavailable for comment.

Chat logs spoke loud and clear to one federal judge who, in August, convicted Maryland Rabbi David Kaye -- snared in an NBC investigation -- of traveling across state lines to have sex with who he thought was a 13-year-old boy he met on the Internet. U.S. v. Kaye, No. 1:06 cr205 (E.D. Va.).

In his opinion, U.S. District Judge James C. Cacheris cited chat logs as "providing more than sufficient evidence that defendant persuaded, enticed and induced the young boy to engage in a sexual act."

According to court documents, Kaye's lawyers argued that Kaye was " simply dirty talking," and that Kaye was induced and enticed by the sting volunteer.

Cacheris rejected both arguments. Kaye is scheduled to be sentenced on Dec. 1.

Steven Harmon, who is defending five California men caught on the NBC show, including a lawyer, a homeland security officer and a teacher, said his main concern is whether or not he can get a fair trial.

"I'm just anticipating that dreadful moment of being in the courtroom when the judge informs the prospective jurors that this is one of those 'Dateline NBC' cases, and hear all the groans and see the rolling of the eyes and stares at my client," said Harmon of Harmon and Harmon in Riverside, Calif. "It's going to be very difficult to find a jury that will be able to listen to the whole story."

But "To Catch a Predator" doesn't tell a full story, argued Ian Friedman, an Ohio criminal defense lawyer whose firm is currently representing some men featured on the show.

To do so, Friedman said, "they'd have defense lawyers on who can explain to the viewers that this isn't a one-sided story."

Friedman, of Ian N. Friedman & Associates in Cleveland, said his firm has represented and advised about 100 men arrested in online predator stings, including a handful caught on the NBC show.

DOJ_NMG_0092534

"This show makes our jobs more difficult, just like 'CSI' makes a prosecutor's job more difficult," Friedman said, referring to a popular CBS television show about crime scene investigations.

A New Way To Sue (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

We'll soon find out if that humongous gender discrimination class-action lawsuit pending against Wal-Mart is an aberration -- or the legal wave of the future. And rest assured the trial bar is hoping for the latter with dreams of riches.

Last week, a U.S. District Court in San Francisco heard arguments on whether a gender discrimination lawsuit against Costco should also proceed as a nationwide class action. A decision is expected in a few weeks, and the proceedings have an air of deja vu.

The same San Francisco District Court (though not the same judge) heard the Wal-Mart case, which was initiated by the same plaintiffs' lawyer, Brad Seligman. Mr. Seligman is seeking punitive damages, back pay and injunctive relief in both cases, and he is also pushing the same legal theory as to why the claims should be pooled into a class rather than handled individually. He even has some of the same "expert" witnesses.

The Wal-Mart case accuses the retail giant of not promoting women and systematically paying them less than their male counterparts for comparable jobs. Mr. Seligman presented the court with nationwide company data that supposedly shows gender disparities in Wal-Mart pay and promotions. Next came testimony from a sociologist who said corporations tend to engage in stereotyping, followed by a statistician claiming that widespread stereotyping was the likely cause of the alleged discrimination.

Commonality is supposed to be the essence of class actions. Yet the vast majority of Wal-Mart employment decisions are discretionary and made by individuals at thousands of locations across the country. But never mind. The San Francisco court said plaintiffs' statistics could justify class treatment and certified the largest private civil rights case in history, a decision that is currently on appeal to the Ninth Circuit.

In the Costco case, plaintiffs lawyers are again arguing that statistical analyses and formulas are enough to justify a nationwide class certification and deny Costco the chance to dispute whether any individual plaintiff actually suffered discrimination. But in addition, they're claiming that emotional distress -- a highly individualized harm, if it occurred -- can be determined on a class-wide basis as well.

Talk about stereotyping. The idea that a court should assume every female member of the class suffered the same amount of emotional distress seems, well, sexist. Mr. Seligman has also teamed up with specialists like Bill Lann Lee of Lieff Cabraser, a prominent plaintiffs firm that has brought its share of securities, tobacco and consumer class actions. And these lawyers are ready to tee up every deep-pocketed retailer in America on similar accusations if courts let them.

That's why the big game here is getting a large class certified. Companies as large as Wal-Mart can afford to fight a class-action case, assuming they don't mind the negative publicity. But the plaintiffs bar knows that most companies will be pressured to settle rather than risk a jackpot verdict that could put them out of business.

The precedent here is what happened with "strike suits," the Milberg Weiss invention that had lawsuits pre-packaged and ready to go whenever a company's stock price dropped. They were a source of extortion for years until Congress intervened (over Bill Clinton's veto). If mere statistical imbalances can trigger a class action, companies will be forced to make pay decisions based on statistics rather than performance and merit. Ultimately, that leads to racial and gender quotas, all in an effort to avoid frivolous lawsuits.

If these radical legal theories hold up in the Costco and Wal-Mart cases, the trial bar will gain tremendous leverage. The costs for business, employees and American consumers will be high.

ANTITRUST:

Are Private Buyouts Good For The Economy? (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

DOJ_NMG_0092535

The Christian Science Monitor, November 13, 2006

The new birth of Burger King Corp. this year delivered the beef to the investing public: Under private management, the long-struggling company turned a corner and then made shares available on the New York Stock Exchange.

But the managers kept some major side orders to themselves. They took out a big loan and paid themselves a $367 million dividend and other fees as well. In all, they extracted cash worth about one-sixth of Burger King's market value.

That's one whopper of a payout, and it's not unusual these days.

Increasingly, investors with deep pockets are banding together to form "private equity funds." Just as the leveraged buyout firms did in the 1980s, they are buying up companies, restructuring them, and then selling them back on public stock exchanges - often for a supersized profit.

The practice isn't new, but it remains controversial. And the scale of the trend far exceeds what it was back when Henry Kravis and Michael Milken made their magazine cover debuts.

Hardly a week goes by without more major deals being announced. Meanwhile, the very success of these buyout funds is attracting billions more dollars from investors - raising the prospect of many more buyouts in coming months. In essence, the wealthy are deciding that if you want to make money in stocks, the stock market isn't the place to do it.

"Private equity is a very big deal. It has moved from the periphery of the capital markets 20 years ago much closer toward the center," says Robert Bruner, dean of the University of Virginia's Darden Graduate Business School.

With money pouring in from pension funds and other deep pockets, the trend shows no signs of stopping. It could end up engulfing companies as diverse as the Los Angeles Times newspaper and ailing automotive supplier Delphi Corp. Just last week, Bill Gates and a Saudi prince were among the investors backing a private buyout of Four Seasons hotels, while another buyout fund announced its plan to acquire the Outback Steakhouse.

Private equity is Wall Street jargon for massive funds - pools of money from large investors - used for owning and managing companies in private, rather than as companies listed on public stock exchanges.

Success begets more investment, especially at a time of rather tepid performance by traditional stocks and bonds. Like hedge funds, real estate, and commodities, private equity has become a new money magnet.

Sometimes the private equity funds pour their cash into young companies, but more of it has been going into buyouts of mature companies like Burger King or Hertz.

To supporters, the deals reflect the dynamism of America's capital markets, in which companies are made, remade, and sometimes broken into pieces by savvy investors. The result, arguably, is that capital finds its most efficient use. It not only enriches owners but helps to make companies more efficient and US workers among the most productive in the world. "We are all better off when companies operate well," Mr. Bruner says.

But skeptics, including some within the investment community, voice a number of concerns.

They say the deals are doing much more for the acquirers than for the economy at large, or even for the traditional shareholders who are forced to sell when the deals happen.

Indeed, the latest buyout wave may raise questions about both the virtue of private equity funds (are they really helping the companies that much?) and about the performance of traditional, publicly traded companies (why can't they do as well for their investors?).

"There is now little question that chief executives across America are increasingly content to allow private equity firms to somehow 'magically' deliver sparkling returns to their shareholders, which they themselves were incapable of producing during their time at the helm," write Henry McVey and David McNellis in a recent market strategy report for the investment bank Morgan Stanley in New York.

They argue that US corporations have essentially become too cautious about investing in new ideas to grow their business. The result is a buildup of cash, and a decline in debt.

That's one reason some of these public companies become tempting targets for private equity funds. The private buyers will plan to do some things that improve the business, so it can be resold later at a higher price. But they will also, often, tap free cash or borrow to provide dividends and fees that guarantee a high rate of return even before they sell.

DOJ_NMG_0092536

Burger King is a case in point. In 2002, a group of private equity funds bought the restaurant brand for $1.5 billion from its parent company, Diageo.

The private owners went through several CEOs, but finally got the hamburger chain sizzling again, with sales boosted by a value menu and new products. In the process, they made sure to get an early slice of the profits, with the $367 million dividend and other fees.

Clearly, the rich are getting richer here. But arguably the economy is also somewhat better off. Analysts see a larger, healthier company than in 2002. Burger King's market value is now more than $2 billion.

If the private equity had merely hollowed out the company with its cash extraction, it wouldn't be worth that much today, some experts point out.

But if private equity is helping corporate America be more productive, the returns may diminish at some point - partly because it's harder to find lucrative deals.

"I definitely think the returns [to private equity] are not going to be as robust as they've been," says Colin Blaydon , an expert on private equity at Dartmouth College's Tuck School of Business in Hanover, N.H.

ENVIRONMENT:

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

Burning Rex

More reaction to the sharply critical letter that Republican Sen. Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Democratic Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia sent recently to Rex W. Tillerson, otherwise welcoming him to his new post as chairman and chief executive officer of Exxon Mobil Corp.

The remainder of the three-page letter, shall we say, blasted a so-called "climate-change denial strategy carried out by and for Exxon Mobil" against global warming -- the senators accusing the oil giant of being "the primary funder of no fewer than 29 climate-change denial front groups in 2004 alone."

The bipartisan pair went so far as to request that Mr. Tillerson "publicly acknowledge both the reality of the climate change and the role of humans in causing or exacerbating it," even absent scientific proof of such a cause.

Now, one prominent Washington group is stepping forward to acknowledge receiving "modest funding from the energy sector, including from Exxon Mobil," although the National Center for Public Policy Research says such funding has never exceeded 1 percent of annual expenditures.

And while it "recognizes both that global temperatures have risen over the past 150 years and that anthropogenic greenhouse-gas emissions contribute to the greenhouse effect," the center calls attention to competing scientific data of the causes of global warming, and therefore believes that any anthropogenic signature is "likely to be modest."

And who can say they aren't right?

Nicolas Copernicus, as the center points out, was condemned for suggesting that the sun, rather than the earth, was the center of our universe. Giordano Bruno, meanwhile, was persecuted and ultimately burned at the stake for arguing that space extended beyond our solar system. And William Harvey was ridiculed by leading medical authorities of his day for suggesting that the heart was the center of the body's circulatory system.

"Copernicus, Bruno and Harvey were persecuted out of fear," it notes. "Each ultimately was proven to be correct."

As for Sens. Snowe and Rockefeller, the center charges they "are engaging in persecution of their own, attempting to silence dissenting voices ... and, as such, should be condemned by Americans of all political persuasions -- both left and right."

Eat your spinach

Still hesitate at the spinach counter, worried Popeye's leafy green bodybuilder will inflict harm instead of produce muscles?

DOJ_NMG_0092537

Dr. Henry I. Miller, a physician and fellow at the Hoover Institution, says while the recent outbreak (only 200 cases) of E. coli traced to fresh, bagged spinach garnered a lot of attention, it's only a drop in the bucket of 76 million cases and 5,000 deaths annually from food poisoning in the United States.

As far as the spinach contamination went, it seems some wild hogs rolled out of the mud and into the spinach patch. In fact, the good doctor prescribes in TCS (Technology, Commerce, Society) Daily that Americans' food is not only the least expensive, but the safest in the history of humankind.

"However, there is a limit to how safe we can make agriculture, given that it is an outdoor activity and subject to all manner of unpredictable challenges," states Dr. Miller. "If the goal is to make a field 100 percent safe from contamination, the only solution that guarantees this is to pave it over and build a parking lot on it."

Worth quoting

"Most of these markers stand over graves of Americans who came home to enjoy the peace they earned. Too many stand over the graves of those who gave their lives to protect that peace."

-- President Bush, in remarks this Veterans Day at Arlington National Cemetery

Buy a book

What do conservative commentator Pat Buchanan, North Dakota's Democratic Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, Republican former defense chief William S. Cohen, and Washington journalists Michael Isikoff and David Corn have in common?

Not a whole lot, quite frankly.

But they've each been selected as featured authors for Wednesday evening's (5:30 to 8:30 p.m.) National Press Club 29th annual Book Fair and Authors' Night, arguably Washington's most prestigious literary event.

Among this year's other authors on hand to sign their latest yarns will be John Dickerson, Ron Fournier, Doug Sosnik, David Maraniss, Helen Thomas and Frederic J. Frommer, whose book is perhaps the least controversial of this year's lineup: "The Washington Nationals 1859 to Today: The Story of Baseball in the Nation's Capital."

Then again ... .

•John McCaslin, whose column is nationally syndicated, can be reached at 202/636-3284 or jmccaslin @washingtontimes.com.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Satellite Gear Aided In Finding Arellano (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 11, 2006

Equipment revealed in court documents

U.S. agents used satellite equipment to track and arrest the suspected leader of the Arellano Félix drug cartel in a boat off the coast of Baja California Sur this summer.

Law enforcement officials hailed the arrest of Francisco Javier Arellano Félix, accused of running the drug cartel in recent years, as a key blow to the organization they say moved tons of drugs between Mexico and California.

Arellano is charged with racketeering and conspiracy to launder money and import drugs.

The existence of the satellite-tracking equipment was revealed in court documents filed by prosecutors this week in response to a defense lawyer's challenge that the arrests took place in Mexican waters and therefore are illegal.

In the papers, prosecutors said the arrests took place in international waters.

Investigators, led by the Drug Enforcement Administration, have been investigating the Tijuana-based cartel for years. In April, they identified a yacht, the Dock Holiday, that authorities said was bought by high-ranking members of the organization.

“On August 14, 2006, agents determined from global positioning satellite equipment that the Dock Holiday was at sea,” prosecutors wrote in the papers.

“At agents' request, the U.S. Coast Guard stopped and boarded the vessel in international waters – according to the GPS equipment, about 13 nautical miles – off the coast of Mexico.”

DOJ_NMG_0092538

Mexico has jurisdiction in waters within 12 miles of land, the prosecutors said.

Because the boat was registered in Delaware and its designated home port was Newport Beach, it was a U.S. vessel that could be legally boarded by the Coast Guard in international waters, they said.

Although the boat was flying a Mexican flag at the time, prosecutors said it was not registered in Mexico and was "not entitled to fly Mexico's flag."

Lawyers for Arellano and a passenger charged with lying to the Coast Guard about his name said they were surprised by the mention of the GPS device.

"We're informed that they got notice the vessel was at sea," said David Bartick, one of Arellano's lawyers. "I don't know who gave them notice, I don't know how they knew."

Jeremy Warren represents Cesar Niebla Lerma, the passenger charged with lying about his name. He said existence of a GPS device on the boat raises questions of how it got there.

Depending on how the device was planted, defense lawyers could argue that their clients' rights were violated, he said.

A DEA spokesman was unavailable yesterday, a federal holiday.

In an August news conference announcing the arrests, the head of the San Diego DEA office hinted that no informant tipped agents off to the location of the boat, despite a $5 million reward for information leading to Arellano.

"No one will be collecting that reward," John Fernandes said.

He wouldn't say at the time how agents knew the boat's whereabouts.

"These kinds of operations take surveillance, surveillance, surveillance," Fernandes said. "That's . . . boots on the ground, or in this case, boots on the water."

Eight men and three boys were on the boat. The boys and two of the men have returned to Mexico, and six of the men remain in U.S. jails. Only Arellano and Niebla face charges in the United States.

One of the others, a suspected cartel leader, Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, is facing extradition to Mexico, where he is wanted on racketeering and other charges.

The three others have refused a judge's order to testify before a federal grand jury here and are being held in contempt of court.

Accused Drug Dealer Reaches Plea Agreement After Laced Heroin Deaths (NBC10)

NBC 10.com, November 13, 2006

Dover Man To Spend At Least 20 Years In Prison

DOVER, Del. -- An accused drug dealer suspected of distributing fentanyl-laced heroin that killed a Dover man will spend at least 20 years in prison after agreeing to plead guilty to a federal drug charge.

A federal grand jury returned a six-count indictment in September against Joseph Bentley, 22, of New Castle.

On Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Wilmington, Bentley agreed to plead guilty to a single count of distribution of heroin and fentanyl resulting in the death of another individual. Prosecutors agreed to dismiss the other counts of the indictment.

The charge to which Bentley agreed to plead guilty carries a mandatory minimum 20-year prison sentence, and a maximum penalty of life in prison and $1 million fine. Federal prosecutors agreed to recommend a three-level reduction in the sentencing guideline range for his acceptance of responsibility in the death of Seth Boyd, 30, of Dover.

Bentley is the first person in Delaware prosecuted under a federal law that mandates prison time for a person who provides a drug that kills or seriously injures another person.

Boyd, who owned a business that sold vintage autographs and historical documents, was found dead in his home on April 28. An autopsy concluded that he died from respiratory failure due to inhalation of fentanyl.

Boyd's girlfriend told state investigators that Bentley had delivered 13 bags of heroin to Boyd's home on the day he died. State police found two empty heroin bags inside the home, one with a straw in it.

When state police arrested Bentley on May 5, he was carrying a copy of Boyd's obituary in his pocket.

DOJ_NMG_0092539

Authorities later obtained tape recordings of telephone conversations between Bentley and his father, Arthur Bentley, who was being held at Delaware Correctional Center in Smyrna on drug charges. According to an affidavit by a Drug Enforcement Administration special agent, Bentley told his father that a batch of heroin he had obtained had killed two of his customers.

As part of the plea agreement, Bentley will reimburse Boyd's estate for ambulance, medical, funeral and burial expenses.

7 Indicted In Prospect Heights Crack Sting (PROJO)

By Tatiana Pina, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, November 10, 2006

PAWTUCKET — After a 10-month investigation, a federal grand jury has charged seven men with drug trafficking for allegedly selling crack cocaine out of the Prospect Heights housing project.

During a news conference at Pawtucket police headquarters yesterday, U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente said that four of the seven have been arrested. The others are considered fugitives.

Corrente said law-enforcement officers disrupted a large-scale cocaine-trafficking ring in Prospect Heights.

Some of the men who are charged are suspected of being part of a loosely knit gang known as the Prospect Heights Posse, which has no known national affiliation, Pawtucket Police Chief George L. Kelley III said.

A total of 22 ounces of crack cocaine was recovered, according to Corrente. It has a street value of $22,000. One of the men was also charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm. Law enforcement officers recovered a 25 calibre pistol.

The investigation was conducted by city police and the Drug Enforcement Administration Task Force. Teams of federal agents and city officers arrested three men last week. One man was already in custody for his alleged role in robbing a delivery man at Prospect Heights.

John L. Kimborough, 38, of Pawtucket, who is also known as “Country,” was charged with distributing crack cocaine and being a felon in possession of a firearm. Jorge Henriquez, 22, of Central Falls, was charged with two counts of distributing crack cocaine, one of them involving more than 50 grams. Samuel Ross, 27, of Pawtucket, was charged with distributing more than 50 grams of crack cocaine; he was already in custody. Francisco Arias, 25, and Braulio D. Henriquez, 19, both of Central Falls, were each charged conspiracy to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine and possession with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine. Candido Rodriguez, also known as Jeilin Vasquez, 38, was charged with two counts of distributing more than 50 grams of crack cocaine. Fernando J. Torres, 22, of Pawtucket, was charged with distributing more than 50 grams of crack cocaine.

Arias, Rodriguez and Torres are considered fugitives. The other four men pleaded not guilty and are being held.

Another View: Smokescreen Of Medical Pot Clouds View Of The Dangers (SACBEE)

By Gordon D. Taylor, Special to the Bee

The Sacramento Bee, November 13, 2006

Pro-pot advocates often spread misinformation on the subject of so-called "medical marijuana." It's important to show the other side of the issue.

In the past 10 years, California has seen a surge of organized crime groups that have moved into the marijuana industry in a big way. Heavily armed drug cartels have made a multibillion-dollar business of going into our public lands and clear-cutting our pristine forests so they can cultivate enormous marijuana crops. Sophisticated criminal syndicates are buying homes in the Sacramento region and creating indoor marijuana factories in the midst of our family-oriented neighborhoods.

A rogue "pot club" industry has also developed throughout the state. Over the past two years, the DEA has participated in six enforcement actions against pot clubs operating in the Central Valley and inland Northern California. Shockingly, three of the six pot store owners were convicted felons, each of whom was armed with a handgun during the course of the investigations.

The largest of the six pot clubs sold marijuana to an astounding 400 people a day. Owned by two 26-year-old men, this Modesto pot club reported selling more than $3.4 million in marijuana within a six-month period. This pot club was going so well that the owners were paying their security guards $125 to $150 an hour.

Most of the people buying marijuana from these pot clubs do not appear to be seriously or terminally ill; they are able bodied, some even athletically fit, most in their 20s and some even in their late teens. These young people are purchasing marijuana not because they are seriously or terminally ill, but because they want to use marijuana for recreational purposes. To put it bluntly, they want to smoke marijuana to get high while using state laws as their shield.

DOJ_NMG_0092540

Marijuana has no proven safe and effective medical use and therefore remains a prohibited substance under federal law. Contrary to misinformation spread by many medical marijuana advocates, pot is not a harmless or soft drug. In fact, it's eight times more potent today than it was in the early 1970s. Sadly, more teenagers enter drug treatment for marijuana dependency than for all other illegal drugs combined.

It's up to each of us to not only protect our public lands and neighborhoods, but to educate our young people about the dangers of marijuana and help them see through the "medical marijuana" smokescreen. About the writer:

Gordon D. Taylor, a veteran DEA agent, has oversight of Drug Enforcement Administration operations in 34 counties throughout the Central Valley and inland Northern California. He is responding to the Nov. 5 Forum article "What a long, strange trip for state's medical marijuana laws."

Jewelry Theft Ring Is Busted Up, FBI Says (SLPD)

By Robert Patrick, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, November 13, 2006

FBI agents and police say they have broken a ring of crooks believed to have taken more than $1 million worth of goods from traveling jewelry salesmen in Missouri, Illinois and elsewhere since 2003.

In a sworn statement made public in federal court in St. Louis this week, FBI Special Agent Mark Wood wrote that investigators had known for years that a group of Colombian nationals was responsible.

Included were crimes in Des Peres in 2003, Clayton and Columbia, Ill., in 2005, and in Chesterfield, Frontenac and Town and Country this year, Wood wrote.

Five suspects were arrested, and two have been charged so far. The two, Dairo deJesus Giraldo-Soto and Roldolfo Aristizabal-Munoz, appeared in federal court in St. Louis this week to face charges of interstate transportation of stolen goods. They remain in custody.

Court documents laid out the scheme this way:

The men watched jewelry stores to identify visiting brokers and salesmen. Then they followed selected victims and either confronted them with a weapon or snatched merchandise from their unattended vehicles.

A motel employee tipped off investigators last month that some guests might be drug dealers. Drug Enforcement Administration agents followed the men, determined they were watching jewelry stores, and turned the matter over to the FBI and St. Louis County police.

Using a minivan and sedan, the suspects watched multiple jewelry stores in St. Louis County on Halloween. The next day, as investigators' suspicions mounted, the men parked close to Saettele Jewelers, near the St. Louis Galleria.

The suspects followed a jeweler as he left the store carrying a case, but lost him in traffic. They then watched two other jewelry stores before investigators who had been trailing them closed in.

Inside the minivan, officers found three men, a stun gun, a glass cutter, a tool used to make a hole in glass, knives, cell phones, jewelry tools, a global positioning unit and UPS shipping supplies.

They also pulled over the sedan and found two men and similar equipment.

None of the missing jewelry has been recovered. Police said the robbers would ship the loot to Miami and quickly leave town.

Giraldo-Soto told investigators that the men had come to the St. Louis area from Chicago, intending to rob or steal from salesmen, including the man at Saettele's.

He admitted the suspects' role in multiple similar thefts or robberies and said the men had shipped or driven the jewels back to Florida, where they live, officials said.

The fingerprints of Aristizabal-Munoz linked him to a June 28 robbery in Town and Country, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0092541

In that case, police said at the time, a salesman from New York left Novak Jewelry after about 20 minutes to find that his car wouldn't start. He got out and was confronted by three men with a stun gun, who took a case containing more than $425,000 in jewelry inside.

In the Frontenac case, two men took more than $250,000 from a jewelry salesman in a parking lot outside the Safe Deposit Co. at 515 Lindbergh Boulevard on July 11, police said at the time.

John Stobbs, the attorney for Aristizabal-Munoz, told a reporter Friday, "He maintains his innocence." Giraldo-Soto's public defender could not be reached for comment.

The three other men had not been charged as of Friday. Two of them had entered the country illegally, and one was an American citizen, police said.

Yet another Colombian native was sentenced to 22 months in prison in 2002 for the robbery of $500,000 in jewels from a salesman at a fast food restaurant in Glen Carbon in 2001. That Colombian, Leonardo Quintero of Florida, who also had Stobbs as his attorney, cooperated with investigators and spoke of a similar ring of thieves and robbers.

Heather Ratcliffe of the Post-Dispatch contributed to this report.

Insurgent Activity Spikes In Afghanistan (AP)

By Jason Straziuso, The Associated Press

AP, November 12, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Insurgent activity in Afghanistan has risen fourfold this year, and militants now launch more than 600 attacks a month, a rising wave of violence that has resulted in 3,700 deaths in 2006, a bleak new report released Sunday found.

In the volatile border area near Pakistan, more than 20 Taliban militants _ and possibly as many as 60 _ were killed during several days of clashes, officials said Sunday.

The new report said insurgents were launching more than 600 attacks a month as of the end of September, up from 300 a month at the end of March this year. The violence has killed more than 3,700 people this year, it said.

Afghanistan saw about 130 insurgent attacks a month last year, said the report by the Joint Coordination and Monitoring Board, a body of Afghan and international officials charged with overseeing the implementation of the Afghanistan Compact, a five-year reconstruction and development blueprint signed in February.

The violence "threatens to reverse some of the gains made in the recent past, with development activities being especially hard hit in several areas, resulting in partial or total withdrawal of international agencies in a number of the worst-affected provinces."

The report said that the rising drug trade in Afghanistan is fueling the insurgency in four volatile southern provinces. The slow pace of development is contributing to popular disaffection and ineffective implementation of the drug fight, it said.

Afghanistan's poppy crop, which is used to make heroin, increased by 59 percent in Afghanistan this past year.

Insurgents have launched a record number of roadside bombs and suicide attacks this year, and there have been clashes all year between insurgents and Afghan and NATO security forces, particularly in the southern and eastern provinces near the border with Pakistan.

The 3,700 deaths the report attributes to insurgent-related violence is comparable to the number of deaths _ about 3,500 _ tallied by The Associated Press this year based on reports from the U.S. military, NATO and Afghan officials.

In the east, Gen. Murad Ali, the deputy Afghan army commander for Paktika province, said 20 bodies were recovered from fighting in Bermel district in the last several days. In addition, he said, two trucks carrying Taliban fighters were destroyed by airstrikes or artillery fire, and officials estimated 40 fighters were killed in those strikes.

Four NATO soldiers and three Afghan soldiers were injured, he said, though a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force said he was not aware of any serious injuries among NATO troops.

Maj. Luke Knittig said the operations in Bermel, which borders Pakistan, were part of an ongoing Afghan-NATO mission to root out Taliban militants before winter.

"We know we've engaged in successful operations in Bermel with a purpose, and we think those have had a very positive effect against insurgent activity there," Knittig said.

DOJ_NMG_0092542

Knittig said Ali's estimate of 60 dead fighters "sounds about right to me," but he did not have an independent estimate of the number killed. "We are not into the numbers game here lately," he said.

Death tolls in remote areas of Afghanistan are almost impossible to verify and often vary widely.

Abdul Baqi Nuristani, the provincial police chief, said only 25 militants have been killed in Bermel the last couple days. He said three Afghan and three NATO soldiers were injured in what he called "a very big battle."

Ali said tribal elders took the bodies of eight Pakistani fighters back over the border to be buried.

Afghan officials have repeatedly accused Pakistan of not doing enough to prevent Pakistani or other foreign fighters from crossing the border to launch attacks. Pakistan says it does all it can, though border attacks have increased since a September agreement led the Pakistani military to pull out of its lawless tribal region.

Bermel is home to a military base that hosts both Afghan and U.S. soldiers. NATO-led troops aided by military aircraft killed 15 suspected insurgents in the district on Tuesday after troops on patrol came under attack.

UN: Iran, Afghanistan, Pakistan Need To Share Drugs Data (AP)

AP, November 13, 2006

TEHRAN (AP)--Iran and neighboring Pakistan and Afghanistan must share intelligence on drug smuggling, the head of the United Nations agency against drugs said Friday.

Antonio Maria Costa, the director of the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, finished a three-day visit to Iran by praising the government's efforts against drug trafficking, according to a statement issued by the agency.

Iran had seized 231 tons of opium in 2005, more than any other country in the world, the statement said.

But Costa warned the world's production of opium was far greater than what was being intercepted.

"Afghanistan has produced a record 6,100 tons of opium this year and about 80% of this will flow through Pakistan and Iran," he said in his statement. "Only about a quarter of this is likely to be intercepted - about half the success rate with the world cocaine trade.

"I urge these three countries, and their international partners, to establish an intelligence-sharing platform," he added. "If counter-narcotics police in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iran share intelligence, they could really hit the traffickers hard."

While in Iran, Costa met President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and other senior Iranian officials and made a helicopter trip to the Iranian border with Afghanistan and Pakistan, the statement said.

U.S. Reaffirms Support For Embattled Kabul Government (WP)

By Pamela Constable, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Nov. 9 -- A senior State Department official said Thursday that the Bush administration has been "surprised by the intensity of the violence" in Afghanistan over the past year, but he reiterated its "firm commitment" to support the embattled Kabul government.

Richard Boucher, the top State Department official on South and Central Asia, said this week's U.S. elections and the abrupt resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would have "no impact" on U.S. military policy here.

His comments came as he was finishing a three-day visit to Pakistan and Afghanistan. The governments of both countries have recently faced rising violence from Islamic insurgents and a drop in domestic popularity.

Boucher described Afghan President Hamid Karzai as an "excellent partner" who faces "very difficult tasks," and he said Washington was "firmly with the government and the people of Pakistan" in their fight against Islamic extremists. He also noted the "very strong support among Republicans and Democrats for the mission" in Afghanistan.

U.S. military officials here echoed those comments, saying troop levels would remain at roughly 20,000 for the foreseeable future; currently, more than 10,000 of them operate under the NATO flag.

Boucher said the key to combating a revived Taliban insurgency on both sides of the Afghan-Pakistani border was to "extend the benefits of government" to areas of conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0092543

Many Afghans have expressed anger over the lack of government protection and services in rural provinces, a void that has helped fortify the Taliban and allowed for an upsurge in opium cultivation. There is also growing resentment against the presence of foreign military forces, and Taliban leaders have attracted support by calling for resistance.

Boucher acknowledged that U.S. officials had all been surprised by the level of violence in Afghanistan over the past year, during which more than 1,500 people have been killed and 70 suicide bombs have exploded. But he said two recent peace accords signed between Pakistan's government and tribal leaders in the country's violent border regions were "hopeful signs."

In separate meetings with journalists this week in Kabul and Islamabad, the Pakistani capital, Boucher deflected questions about rising anti-American and anti-government sentiment in the tribal regions. He declined to directly address the widespread public belief that the United States was behind an Oct. 30 missile attack on a religious school in the Bajaur tribal region of Pakistan. That attack killed 82 people.

"The Pakistani government said it carried out this action, initiated this action, and that it was necessary because militants, terrorists, were at a training center," Boucher said Tuesday. "I have no reason to doubt that, and frankly from what I have seen, I have every reason to believe it."

Pakistani officials have said they attacked the site, but many Pakistanis are convinced that the missiles were dropped by a U.S. drone plane and that the school contained only young religious students.

Boucher declined to say whether the airstrike was based on U.S. intelligence or whether Pakistan had acted because of U.S. concerns that it was not doing enough to fight terrorism.

The missile attack has convulsed the tribal region. After a suicide bombing at a military training camp Wednesday killed 42 recruits, Islamic extremists said it was a reprisal for the Bajaur attack.

IMMIGRATION:

Hunch Unravels Immigrant Wedding Scam (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

They didn't hug. They didn't kiss. They didn't even sit together.

Many couples going to the Arlington County Courthouse seemed more like strangers than people applying for marriage licenses. A man named Sam often escorted them to the sixth-floor clerk's office. Sometimes, there would be a furtive exchange of money in the elevator.

Before long, some of the same people would be back, filing for divorce, their court papers littered with mistakes -- always the same mistakes.

"They misspelled 'circuit,' " said David A. Bell, the longtime Circuit Court clerk. "It was obvious something was going on."

Bell tipped off police, triggering a nearly four-year investigation that recently broke up one of the Washington region's biggest and most brazen immigration scams: an estimated 1,000 fake marriages. The scheme was centered in the area's little-noticed but rapidly growing community of immigrants from Ghana.

For immigrants, marrying a U.S. citizen is a quick ticket to citizenship. Along the East Coast and all the way to West Africa, at car dealerships, malls, parties and even a Home Depot, the word had spread: If you are in the United States illegally, go to Arlington. It's easy to get married in Virginia, because marriage laws are relatively lax. Arlington, with its proximity to the Metro system and the District, is especially convenient.

In recent weeks, 19 of 22 people charged so far in the undercover investigation have pleaded guilty in federal court in Alexandria, including bank tellers, car salesmen and health-care workers. Court testimony and interviews document how Ghanaian immigrants married U.S. citizens they had met the same day, then were coached on how to fool immigration inspectors, usually months later, into believing that the marriage was real. All they wanted, they said, was to stay in the United States.

Now, they will have to leave.

DOJ_NMG_0092544

Caroline Chepkwony, who entered the United States in 1996 as an employee of the Kenyan Embassy, sobbed on the witness stand recently as she told the judge that she found a sham husband for the sake of her 3-year-old son.

"This is why I entered into this marriage, just hoping to give my son the best life he can get," said Chepkwony, 36, as she pleaded guilty to marriage fraud. "And I figured out the only place he can get a better life is here in America."'The Program' Grows

As Latinos have migrated in record numbers to the Washington region, there has been a quieter exodus: from Africa, especially the Republic of Ghana. The Northern Virginia and Maryland suburbs are home to the second-highest concentration of Ghanaians in the nation, about 20,000.

One of the first to arrive was Samuel "Sam" Acquah. Born in Ghana in 1949, Acquah came to the United States on a student visa. He got a master's degree, a law degree from George Mason University and a $112,000-a-year job in the chemical engineering section of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office in Alexandria.

As more Ghanaians arrived, Acquah wanted to help them stay. Better yet, he thought, he could make money doing it by finding strangers to marry them quickly after their visas expired.

Informally, he named his business "the program." When a fellow Ghanaian called, Acquah would charge the immigrant $3,000 to $3,500. Two employees were Acquah's "contacts" and helped find U.S. citizens willing to get married for money. Acquah split the profit with his contact, who paid the U.S. citizen $500.

Acquah set up shop in his government office, using his government-owned fax machine to communicate about illicit marriages.

Word of the scheme spread to immigrants even before they left Ghana. "Those who were coming over here knew where to find an apartment, where to find a job and where to find a spouse," said one law enforcement official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

The business became so lucrative -- Acquah has admitted pocketing $200,000 -- that it spawned competitors. One key rival was Eric Amoah, a Ghanaian immigrant whose own fraudulent marriage to a U.S. citizen had been arranged by Acquah.

A short, balding man with a calm demeanor and five children, Amoah, 43, came to the United States in 1999. Marriage fraud helped put him through pharmacy school, and he worked as a pharmacy technician at Prince William Hospital in Manassas, even as his marriage business continued to mushroom.

Amoah put out word among the U.S. Ghanaian community, which grew from 20,889 in 1990 to 101,169 in 2004, according to U.S. Census Bureau estimates. At his five-bedroom house in Woodbridge, Amoah threw elaborate parties. At one such gathering, he met Markey Simpkins, a supervisor at a Home Depot in the District.

Simpkins became a contact and asked co-workers if they wanted to marry an immigrant for money. Those interested would get to meet Amoah or another Ghanaian marriage arranger. Simpkins pocketed $50 per introduction.

Abena Nkrumah heard about Amoah when she needed an operation for abdominal problems. One way to get health insurance, her doctor's office suggested, was to marry a U.S. citizen.

At an Alexandria shopping center, Amoah and Nkrumah bonded through their shared Ghanaian heritage. "He told me he can help me get married," said Nkrumah, a health-care worker, as she entered her guilty plea last month. She told U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III that she could not have stayed with her sham husband, saying he smokes. Ellis smiled.

Occasionally, the men and women would decide they liked each other and would stay married. Far more often, they lived separate lives before reuniting, however briefly, at immigration offices in Fairfax County and Baltimore. There, they would recite their made-up stories about how they met or invent details such as which side of the bed their spouse slept on. Immigrants who marry U.S. citizens can get a visa to stay in the country immediately, instead of having to wait years, and can speed their citizenship by several years.

Ghanaians drawn to this prospect flocked to Arlington from as far as New York and South Carolina. "People would come here for two days to get married and then go back," said Robin Crumblin, one of Amoah's key lieutenants.

Northern Virginia was the obvious choice to center the scheme. Couples can get a license within minutes -- there are waiting periods in the District and Maryland -- and get married the same day.

Occasionally, the phony couples would go to courthouses in Alexandria, Fairfax County, Manassas, the District or Maryland. But the vast majority went to Arlington. The courthouse is on a Metro line, and plenty of civil magistrates nearby can perform a quick ceremony. "Everything was right there in the same spot," Crumblin said in an interview before pleading guilty last month to conspiracy to commit immigration fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0092545

Crumblin, 44, can't read or write. She has eight children and lives in a public housing apartment in the District. But she achieved a position of prominence in Amoah's organization.

She met him through a friend, the first time in the parking lot of the Arlington courthouse. Her husband had been injured. She needed the work.

Crumblin's main job was to track down the U.S. citizens, up to a year after the actual marriage, so they could go with their Ghanaian spouse to the immigration office. Often, the search led her to a homeless shelter in the District or to a mother on welfare.

They often were not happy to see her. The U.S. citizens had been told that all they had to do for their $300 or so was get married. Now, they were demanding more money.

The Ghanaians, increasingly desperate, would have to pay. Crumblin felt caught in the middle. "They'd call my house at 4 a.m. and say, 'Where's my wife?' " said Crumblin, who says she regrets her role because of the example it set for her children.

Pressure was also building on Amoah, whose business had slowed in recent months. He suspected he was under scrutiny and became more secretive, working out of a Red Roof Inn in Springfield instead of his home.Prison, Deportation Loom

In early 2003, an Arlington courthouse clerk noticed the oddly distant behavior of some marriage license applicants. She compared notes with fellow clerks, who were noticing the same thing, then relayed her suspicions to her boss, Bell, who called Arlington authorities. Soon, a federal-state task force was infiltrating the various marriage fraud organizations through cooperators and undercover agents. The Arlington courthouse was put under surveillance. It took time to build the cases.

By this fall, prosecutors thought they had enough evidence. Most of those convicted probably will serve less than a year in prison. Acquah and Amoah, who recently pleaded guilty to conspiracies to commit immigration fraud and money laundering, are expected to spend more time there.

But the biggest price is yet to come. Virtually all of the Ghanaians and other West African immigrants convicted -- most of those charged were immigrants, although several U.S. citizens were charged as well -- will be deported. Some now face the agonizing choice of whether to leave their children born in the United States, who are U.S. citizens, or take them to Africa.

U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee offered a few words of comfort to Chepkwony at her recent plea hearing. But his sympathy only went so far.

"America is composed of -- is a nation of immigrants," he said. "Everyone here came from somewhere else. However . . . there are rules on how one can immigrate to live here permanently.

"You did not follow the rules."

Democrats May Proceed With Caution On Immigration (WP)

By Darryl Fears, Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

When election results started rolling in Tuesday, Cecilia MuÃ±oz said that she and other immigration advocates were "holding our breath." One by one, Republicans who had fought tooth and nail for stricter immigration laws fell, turning control of Congress over to the Democrats.

By morning, a 700-mile Mexican border fence passed by Republicans in a pre-election gambit had fallen flat with voters. A sharply worded GOP bill that targeted illegal immigrants and spurred marches by millions of Latinos in the spring appeared likely to fade into memory.

"I think this is the best environment we've had on the issue in quite some time," said Cassandra Q. Butts, a senior vice president for the pro-immigration Center for American Progress.

But when it comes to immigration, things are never easy. In the days after the election, Democratic leaders surprised pro-immigration groups by not including the issue on their list of immediate priorities. Experts said the issue is so complicated, so sensitive and so explosive that it could easily blow up in the Democrats' faces and give control of Congress back to Republicans in the next election two years from now. And a number of Democrats who took a hard line on illegal immigration were also elected to Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0092546

"It's not without its challenges, for sure," said Jeanne Butterfield, executive director of the American Immigration Lawyers Association. "You've got opposition in both parties. You still have restrictionists in the Republican Party. You have Democrats who've been reluctant to move on any kind of worker program."

Butterfield predicted that lobbyists and Democrats have less than a year to move legislation that could put some 12 million illegal immigrants on a path to legal residency, before the looming 2008 elections make a deal politically impossible. And analysts say the fate of President Bush's proposal to create a temporary worker program for 200,000 immigrants is in doubt, with labor's allies in charge.

In recent days, advocates have been burning up the phone lines talking to one another and to try to determine whom House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the presumed speaker of the next Congress, will appoint to key committees, and how the new Democratically controlled Congress will approach the issue.

Major challenges lay ahead. The Mexican border remains a sieve where an estimated 100,000 immigrants sneak into the country every year. Conservatives in the House, and some Democrats, want the border sealed with manpower, fencing and technological gadgets before they will even consider guest workers.

Mark Krikorian, executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies, which opposes increased immigration, said Democrats should implement an enforcement program first. Anything else might be political suicide.

"The Democrats need to get their majority reelected in the next two years," Krikorian said. "My sense is that the Democrats have grown up enough to know they can't get reelected trying to get everything they want."

Immigration experts are on the lookout for the kind of compromises that led to the flawed immigration reform laws of 1986 and 1996. In those years, a White House and Congress split between the two parties passed watered-down laws requiring employers to check the legal status of new hires to satisfy businesses and immigration advocates. They also failed to give enforcement agencies the money, staff, technology or practical ability to do the job.

The miscues paved the way for an explosion of illegal immigration.

"The question is, will this just be another split-the-baby approach, such as we saw in 1986," said Robert Bonner, commissioner of U.S. Customs and Border Protection from 2003 to 2005, "or are we actually going to do something that is going to seriously achieve the objectives of controlling the border?"

At the White House Friday, the Bush administration struck a bipartisan chord, trumpeting both border enforcement and a guest worker initiative. "The President believes a temporary guest worker program, where you will know if you're in or you're out, is going to relieve pressure on the border and also reduce the incentive for people to travel from Central America through Mexico in search of such jobs," said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

Bush supports a proposal by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) to allow foreign nationals currently outside the country to work in the United States temporarily. Illegal immigrants now in the country could work too, but only if they pay a $2,000 penalty for breaking the law, pay back taxes, undergo a criminal check, learn English, take civics lessons, go to the back of the employment line and then work six years with no legal problems.

The McCain-Kennedy bill would also strengthen the border and create a computerized system to check the legal status of workers. The Senate bill would authorize spending $400 million to expand a pilot program used by 5,000 employers to cover new hires by more than 8 million U.S. companies within 18 months.

But some experts are skeptical. The non-partisan Migration Policy Institute has said that the pilot system is flawed, will take at least three years to implement, and will fail unless it is made much more accurate. The MPI panel, co-chaired by former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) and former senator Spencer Abraham (R-Mich.) also said other steps are needed, such as producing tamper-proof Social Security or other employment ID card based on fingerprints or other unique identifying features.

Others say thousands of immigration investigators are needed to verify legal workers and track down those who remain in the country illegally.

DOJ_NMG_0092547

James W. Ziglar, former commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, said if Congress does take up an overhaul, "the recognition that enforcement has to be of equal stature is something that will occur this time, because the lessons learned from the 1986 act are still burning very brightly in the minds of people on both sides of the debate."

MuÃ±oz, a vice president at the National Council of La Raza, the nation's largest Latino civil rights group, said Democrats should move carefully ahead with a plan that satisfies both sides.

"This notion that it's dangerous to vote to support comprehensive immigration reform I believe to be false," she said. In Arizona, she said, voters rejected anti-immigration Republicans Randy Graf and Rep. J.D. Hayworth.

But, to show how complicated the issue is, Arizona voters also approved three referenda to make life tougher for illegal immigrants.

Anti-immigration Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), who was distraught after the election, believing a guest worker program was inevitable under the Democrats, now says he's changed his mind.

"It seemed to me that it was not going to be as easy for them as I had anticipated or feared," Tancredo said. "They're not putting it out there as their number one, out-of-the-box issue."

The more he thought about the issue, the more cloudy the future seemed.

"I don't know," he said. A temporary guest worker program "could certainly happen. I may be just skipping past the graveyard."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Can Bush Sr. And His Team Save Son's Presidency? (NSWK)

By Jon Meacham

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - George Herbert Walker Bush is a proud father; tears easily come to his eyes when he thinks of his children, all of them, and there is gracious deference in his tone when he talks about the son he calls, with emphasis, "The President." He is not given to boasting about or bragging on his family; he still hears his mother's voice warning him to avoid "the Great I Am," but several times over the past few years the 41st president has mentioned to visitors that the 43rd president has read the Bible in its entirety—not once, the father says, but twice, sticking two fingers in the air. If so, then the incumbent may recall the Song of Moses: "Remember the days of old, consider the years of many generations; ask thy father, and he will show thee; thy elders, and they will tell thee."

Ask thy father, and he will show thee: advice that, at long last, George W. Bush seems to be taking. Last week the president lost both houses of Congress and 16 more Americans died in Iraq, bringing the U.S. death toll to 2,844, with little discernible progress in sight. The war there has now lasted 44 months, the amount of time that elapsed between Pearl Harbor and VJ Day.

In a conference room filled with commemorative shotguns in his Houston offices last Wednesday, the father settled in to watch his son's post-election press conference on TV. Lunching on pizza, Bush Senior listened as George W. Bush said the loss of Congress was a "thumping," promised to "work with" a commission on Iraq chaired by James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton, and announced that Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld was resigning. Within two hours the president was in the Oval Office with Rumsfeld and his replacement: Robert M. Gates, Bush Senior's CIA director and the president of Texas A&M University, the home of Bush 41's presidential library.

In Houston the phones started ringing, and Bush 41 staffers were pulled away from their pizza. Reporters were calling and e-mailing: would 41 talk about 43's shake-up? The answer was no, though two perfunctory statements were issued (one for the College Station Eagle and one, as the former president put it, "for everybody else"). Still, the reality spoke for itself. Dad's team was back—a remarkable course correction in the political life of the son and, quite possibly, in the life of the nation.

The American people, as politicians like to say, spoke last week—and spoke in no uncertain terms. The 2006 vote does not suggest an eagerness for a sharp left turn. It seems, rather, to be a plea for a shift from the hard right of the neoconservatives to the center represented by the old man in Houston. The re-emergence of Iraq Study Group voices such as Baker, Gates and Alan Simpson—all longtime friends of Bush Senior—is not unlike the entrance of Fortinbras at the conclusion of "Hamlet." These are 41's men, and the removal of Rumsfeld—an ancient rival of Bush Senior's from the Ford days—is a move toward the broad middle. The apparent triumph of pragmatism over ideology on Iraq was welcome news, at least to the public. In the new NEWSWEEK Poll, 67 percent favor Bush Senior's internationalist approach to foreign policy over his son's more unilateral course.

DOJ_NMG_0092548

Did 41 help bring Gates to the Pentagon? The White House denies it, but, as a Bush friend told NEWSWEEK, "his fingerprints are all over this." (The friend refused to be identified for fear of alienating the family.) Given the mists of secrecy that envelop the 41-43 relationship, it is striking that the broad Bush circle believes he had a hand in the Rumsfeld succession: as an old CIA director, 41 rarely leaves any clues at all.

What the two Bushes discuss has long been a subject of endless guesswork. "In my experience, the two men spent most of their time talking about family matters, about sports, about fishing," former White House chief of staff Andy Card told NEWSWEEK. "They spoke to each other much more as father and son rather than as president and former president." Still, politics and policy do come up. "It would be wrong to assume that they never discuss Iraq, the state of play in the world and some personalities," Card said. "But it would also be wrong to assume that they discuss these things all the time. They are mutually deferential to one another."

The Bush family psychodrama is the stuff of perennial speculation but little information, since the two people who know the most about it—the father and the son—speak of it so infrequently. Yet its complexity, its blend of love and rivalry, is rich analytical territory. (Maureen Dowd of The New York Times, an unlikely e-mail pal of 41's, has spent so much time contemplating the generational drama that she ultimately published an excellent book on the topic, "Bushworld"; it ran to 544 pages.) In perhaps the most revealing on-the-record remark about their relationship made by either man, the son once told Bob Woodward that his father is "the wrong father to appeal to in terms of strength. There is a higher father that I appeal to."

As the war has gone badly and the years have ticked by—2003, 2004, 2005 and now much of 2006—the senior President Bush, the man who managed to capture just 37 percent of the vote in 1992, has grown in stature. Raising taxes and capping domestic spending in 1990, refusing to exceed the United Nations mandate after expelling Saddam from Kuwait, and deftly managing the end of the cold war and the reunification of Germany loom ever larger. Given the midterm reaction to the son's inattention to alliances and to the details of postwar Iraq, it is clear that many Americans are nostalgic for the skills and sensibility the first President Bush brought to the Oval Office—a reversal of historical fortune that has come, sadly for the father, at the expense of his son.

In terms of foreign policy, it is true that 41 was more a realist than an ideologue—the prose to Reagan's cold-war poetry. And it is also true that the son would prefer to be remembered not as a second George Bush but as a second Gipper—a big, transformative president who confronted a mortal threat to the nation with steely soul and soaring words. Hence, it seems, the innate appeal of the neoconservative argument, advanced in part by Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney (a 41 figure who got neocon religion after 9/11), to strike Iraq in a noble bid to transform the Middle East.

In classical terms, the tragic figure is someone whose inherent flaws are evident from the beginning. In the wake of September 11, we knew our president's virtues. He was resolute, disdainful of dissent; like his hero Winston Churchill, Bush dismissed critics he believes spin around with "the alacrity of squirrels." But we also knew Bush's vices. Resolution can harden into stubbornness; a refusal to listen to criticism can breed isolation.

Hindsight, of course, is a luxury, and life often appears clearer in retrospect than it does at the time, in the arena. The bet Bush has made in the Middle East is a grand one, and history is made, and people are freed, by grand gambles. The American Founders gambled with Britain in 1776; Churchill gambled with Germany in 1940; Reagan gambled with the Soviet Union in the 1980s. The line between triumph and tragedy is a thin one, and things may yet work out.

Or so we must believe. Faith is important to the Bushes, always has been, and to return to the Bible the president knows so well, there is a New Testament verse familiar to patrician politicians from Theodore Roosevelt and his cousin Franklin to Prescott and George H.W. Bush: "To whom much is given," the Scriptures say, "much is expected." Much has been given to George W. Bush, and now, in the twilight of his term, as his father's men step in, he has been given another great gift: one more chance to set things right.

The Rescue Squad (NSWK)

DOJ_NMG_0092549

By Evan Thomas

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - The rendezvous in the supermarket parking lot was a secret. On the Sunday before the elections, Robert Gates, the president of Texas A&M University and the deputy national-security adviser and CIA director in the administration of President George H.W. Bush, drove two hours from College Station, Texas, to the small town of McGregor, where he switched from his own car to one driven by White House chief of staff Josh Bolten. Gates was quietly taken to President George W. Bush's office on his ranch at Crawford, where the two talked long enough to convince Bush that Gates was the man to replace Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Guests at the presidential ranch, assembled for the 60th birthday of First Lady Laura Bush and the First Couple's 29th wedding anniversary, didn't even notice Gates's coming and going.

Across the state of Texas, at his house in Houston, James A. Baker III was following his favorite Sunday-afternoon routine. He was taking a nap. Later, it would be widely speculated that Baker was somehow in on the secret, that he helped arrange the firing of Rumsfeld and the appointment of Gates as part of a fundamental power shift, a last-ditch rescue operation—by the old guard of Bush 41 to save Bush 43 from sinking ever deeper into the Iraq morass. Baker is the co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, which is looking for a solution to the Iraq riddle, and Gates was a fellow commissioner, as well as a mutual friend of Baker and of Bush 41. Rumsfeld would have been a surefire obstacle to whatever Baker was proposing. Gates is likely to welcome the Iraq Study Group recommendations as if they were his own (which, in a manner of speaking, some of them are). Baker is one of the great behind-the-scenes manipulators of any age. So, NEWSWEEK asked the former secretary of State, Treasury secretary, White House chief of staff and all-around Wise Man, was he in on the deal?

"You don't have a virgin here," Baker said with his customary twang. Indeed not. He meant he wasn't about to be lured by a reporter into spilling any secrets—not, of course, that he had any secrets to spill. (The White House says that Baker had nothing to do with the Pentagon swap.) Baker warned against getting too optimistic about some sudden deliverance from the agonies of Iraq. "Look," he protested. "This is not a precooked deal. And there is no magic bullet."

Baker is known for lowering expectations shortly before he delivers the goods. But he has reason to want to downplay his role and the prospects for success. Over the next month or so, the Iraq Study Group must find a middle way, a plan of action that can be characterized neither as "cut and run" nor "stay the course." Judging by the election returns and the exit polls, it's what the people want—along with an end to rancorous partisan squabbling and ideological posturing. But getting a plan—and carrying it out—will be difficult to achieve.

For one thing, Baker still has to convince George W. Bush. At his post-election press conference, the president looked like a base runner trapped in a rundown, unable to go forward or scurry back. The president is probably stuck—he will have to embrace some kind of compromise approach on Iraq. He didn't look too happy about it. As he japed and mugged and fidgeted, he seemed worried by something more than Iraq or the election returns; his whole character appeared to be wrestling with some more personal, inner demon. Last week Bush's aides were resisting the story line that Bush was caught in a cosmic episode of "Father Knows Best." The president himself was said to be indifferent to the press chatter. "I don't care," he told his advisers when they asked him, the morning after the elections, how he wanted to deal publicly with the suggestion that he was picking one of his father's advisers. "He doesn't think the neocons ran him over a cliff and now he has to go to Dad," said a senior Bush aide, preferring to remain anonymous while discussing Oval Office conversations. "It's not the way he sees this. He wants the best and brightest."

It is an irony of history, and the tragedy of the Bush family saga, that President Bush has all along had the best and the brightest just a phone call away. His father is a deeply seasoned and wise foreign-policy expert. Had, say, Sen. John McCain been elected, Bush 41 would have been jetting around the globe helping to resolve conflicts. Instead, aside from some tsunami and Hurricane Katrina relief work, Bush Senior has been relegated to watching all those political talk shows his son refuses to watch, wincing each time he hears his son's name being mocked or criticized. George H.W. Bush has been, in effect, sidelined by nepotism. He has repeatedly told close friends that he does not believe it is appropriate or wise to second-guess his son, or even offer advice beyond loving support.

This time, however, was different. A source who declined to be identified discussing presidential confidences told NEWSWEEK that Bush 41 left "fingerprints" on the Rumsfeld-Gates decision, though the father's exact role remains shrouded in speculation. "This would have been done by nuance and indirection. Forty-one would have said to 43, 'One of the people who I've been talking to who might be helpful is Bob Gates'," said a veteran of previous GOP administrations who declined to be identified talking about the Bush family. A onetime director of the CIA and loyal member of Skull and Bones, his Yale secret society, Bush "is a master of deniability," says an old aide to Jim Baker, who asked for deniability while discussing Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0092550

Baker's role in the affair remains shadowy. He was spotted with both Bush father and son, as well as Bob Gates, in early October at the launching of the new aircraft carrier USS George H.W. Bush. But the four men may have just been discussing the Texas A&M football team. Baker, like Bush, is not likely to have been plotting in public. "For a meeting like that," says the former Baker aide, "the maximum number of people involved is two."

It's not even clear that Baker ("Bakes," to Bush 41) and Bush (el jefe, to Baker) spoke to each other about the Rumsfeld-Gates switch. Baker's relationship with the Bush family is close but rivalrous, and it has endured jealousies and suspicions. The two men became friends while playing doubles at the Houston Country Club in the 1970s ("although I still preferred and continued to play singles," writes Baker in a typical aside in his just-published memoir, "Work Hard, Study ... and Keep Out of Politics"). The two dads and their eight boys played an annual Turkey Bowl at Thanksgiving. ("It was touch football, but the touching sometimes looked a lot like tackling.") Baker has, on occasion, wondered why he wasn't the one elected president. Barbara Bush was widely reported to be miffed at Baker for not trying hard enough to get her husband re-elected in 1992.

George W., who sometimes reflects his mother's resentments, did not call on Baker for advice when he was preparing for his presidential run. "That was okay with me," writes Baker, who nonetheless answered the call when George W. needed a good lawyer to take on the Florida voting fiasco in 2000. Baker's cleverness and diligence for the Bush clan in its hour of need were possibly decisive. But make no mistake: Baker is no mere lawyer for the Bushes. Trying to describe Baker's role and his true allegiances in the Iraq Study Group, the former Baker aide quotes Justice Louis Brandeis, who once said that in certain cases the lawyer has a responsibility to represent the situation, not the client. In this case, the situation is the national interest in getting a solution to the Iraq mess—not protecting the president or the Bush family. "It so happens that this also serves Baker's interests," says the aide. As his memoir makes clear, Baker cares deeply about being remembered as a statesman, not a pol or a hired gun.

When the Iraq Study Group was launched in March 2006, the inspiration of some retired Washington foreign-policy mavens, its conclusion seemed destined for a dusty shelf. Baker had been fairly quiet on Iraq. Though it was generally known that the Bush 41 crowd was skeptical about invading Iraq, most of the attention fell on Brent Scowcroft, who was outspoken in his disappointment with Bush 43's advisers. "Dick Cheney I don't know anymore," Scowcroft told The New Yorker. Baker signed on to the Iraq Study Group only after getting Bush 43's personal assurance that the White House wanted him to take the job. (According to a source knowledgeable about the study group who requested anonymity discussing sensitive negotiations, Baker also received a backstage promise that Rumsfeld would stay out of the way as the commissioners interviewed generals and diplomats.) Baker did not have high hopes or expectations, he says. But the group—in part because of Baker's winning aura, and in part because Baker had a hand in choosing them—attracted first-rate commissioners like former justice Sandra Day O'Connor and ex-New York mayor Rudy Giuliani. Baker's co-chairman is tailor-made for bipartisanship. Lee Hamilton, a longtime Democratic congressman and former chairman of the House foreign-affairs committee, was known for fair-mindedness and deep substantive knowledge, qualities he showed again as co-chair of the 9/11 Commission. Baker refused to pose for NEWSWEEK unless Hamilton was photographed as well. "This has got to be bipartisan," says Baker. "Or it's not going to happen." Baker knows that if newly emboldened Hill Democrats see the Iraq Study Group as a tool of the administration and wait until the new Congress in January to call for their own pullout plan, the hopes for a middle-way compromise could collapse.

Baker's style is to prearrange deals by patiently and quietly lining up the parties before going public. He has had more success at bringing together potential adversaries than any one Washington politician or statesman in modern history, at least since Clark Clifford. Baker's fingerprints are on many legislative accomplishments (for which congressmen took all the credit, like the Tax Reform Act of 1986). For the Iraq Study Group, he has reached out to Iranian, Syrian and Saudi diplomats; he has traveled to Iraq and met with local civilian and military leaders, and he has stroked the large and sometimes fractious egos of his own commissioners. He may have a difficult time with hard-liners like former attorney general Ed Meese, who stepped into a commissioner's slot vacated by Giuliani (who quit possibly to pursue his presidential ambitions). Baker will have a month or more to line up his commissioners before they make their final report in December. But "we can't wire it," he insists.

DOJ_NMG_0092551

The commissioners are just now receiving a draft of the recommendations. The contents are a closely guarded secret, but the commission is certain to call for some kind of diplomacy with Iraq's neighbors, reversing the Bush administration refusal to negotiate with enemies like Iran and Syria. "There are going to be some things in this report that the administration is not going to be excited about," says Baker, choosing his words carefully. There may also be some kind of call for a troop drawdown or redeployment, though Baker says he is very reluctant to dictate to the U.S. military.

Baker says he drops in on President Bush from time to time to "chew the fat." But he insists he has not discussed the work of the Iraq Study Group. "Timing is everything for Baker," says the former aide, and the timing was not right until Bush could see the public registering its dissatisfaction at the polls. Baker is an avid hunter of wild turkeys, a sport that requires endless patience. "You can wait all day and you only get one shot," says the former aide, who marvels at Baker's ability to sit for hours in the cold or heat, silent but watchful. "When the time comes, and it's only a split second, he doesn't hesitate to pull the trigger," says this aide.

Baker's powers of persuasion are formidable. James Carville, no slouch himself at the art of politics, once described him as "the gold standard." Although his tongue can be sharp—he once described Bush 43's core principles as "God and exercise"—Baker is probably the best pure flatterer in Washington, which is saying something. He is also always prepared. He was schooled by his father, a patrician Texas lawyer, in the "five P's": "Prior preparation prevents poor performance." Baker's father—who was known by his children, not always affectionately, as "the Warden"—did not tolerate weakness or excuse. When little Jimmy was slow to get out of bed in the morning, the Warden doused him with a bucket of cold water as he lay there.

Baker is at once earthy and genteel. He is the sort of Texan, one local writer once observed, who can be seen drinking beer out of a can while wearing black tie. One old Princetonian recalls, with a certain awe, that Baker was president of something called "the 21 Club." That meant that he had been chosen as the champion of his eating club (the most exclusive, of course) in a contest to drink 21 straight shots of hard liquor. Baker was the last man standing. This does not mean that he was a wild frat boy (Baker is the living antithesis of John Belushi)— just that he was willing to do what it takes. At the University of Texas Law School, to please his father, he pledged his dad's old fraternity. This required carrying a dead fish somewhere on his person for a week. He had been a Marine lieutenant and had a wife and a child at the time.

Baker is 76 years old, silver-haired, more easily tired, but still formidable. He would be the obvious choice to pursue the diplomatic initiative that the Iraq Study Group will surely call for. In fact, if President Bush is looking for a tag team of worldly, seasoned and persuasive ambassadors, he knows where to find a pair of old tennis partners who live not too far from each other in Houston. Would Baker take the job? "That's too hypothetical," answers the former secretary of State, who is no virgin.

With Richard Wolffe, Michael Isikoff and John Barry in Washington

Changing The Guard (USNEWS)

By Brian Duffy

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

"It does no harm to throw the occasional man overboard," observed British politician Ian Gilmour. "But it does not do much good if you are steering full-speed ahead for the rocks." One of the great lions of the London political scene in the middle of the last century, Gilmour would have been among the last people surprised by the sudden defenestration of Donald Rumsfeld by the man who, just days earlier, pronounced that his embattled defense secretary was doing a "fantastic" job. The course for the rocks in Iraq had been largely charted by Rumsfeld, with his failure to provide a post-invasion plan with even the remotest chance of success. To a gimlet-eyed observer like Gilmour, the ouster was all but inevitable. Yet such was the depth of the White House state of denial over Iraq-indeed, over the several glaring embarrassments that have blotted its second-term copybook—that even jaded observers wondered whether President Bush knew something they didn't know when he professed, on the very eve of his political Waterloo, confidence in an 11th-hour GOP triumph.

After his defeat in the general election in 1945, Churchill, another grizzled veteran of London's political fratricide, responded to his wife's vain efforts to comfort him. "If it is a blessing," he told her, "it is certainly very well disguised." The same, perhaps, may not be said for the voters' rebuke of the White House. A less chastening result and, who knows, the president might have been persuaded to stick with Rummy and, even if he had to refrain from using the actual words, to "stay the course." Blessings come in all sorts of strange packages, and this may prove one of the stranger but, in the end, more salutary.

DOJ_NMG_0092552

Psychobabble. One of Washington's more tedious parlor games has been the whispered wonderings about strains in the relationship between the younger Bush and his father. The return to center stage of one of the elder Bush's most trusted aides as Rumsfeld's replacement prompted a frenzied new round of psychobabble. Not only was Bob Gates the elder Bush's CIA director, but he also served as deputy to Brent Scowcroft, the older man's national security adviser and close friend. Scowcroft's break with the current White House over Iraq was offered as Exhibit A in the case for a rupture in the relationship between Bush père et fils. Hmm. If armchair psychology doesn't happen to be your thing, however, and you're one of the many millions of Americans whose vote seemed to express the belief that the Bush team has slipped its intellectual and political moorings, the casting of James Baker seemed to suggest a more simple if less charitable plotline: adult-supervision time!

To those most deeply cynical about the 43rd president, of course, such supervision was supposed to have been supplied by Dick Cheney. But when someone like Scowcroft, who has known and worked with the vice president for about 30 years, says the current Cheney is someone he "doesn't know," the evidence of something being seriously amiss is pretty hard to ignore. Which is why last week's White House drama seemed to offer more plots and tangled subplots than a Tolstoy novel, only without any of the brooding darkness. Nope, Rummy was out, Gates was in, good fellows all, smiles all around. Thus, it was on to lunch with House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi, then a grip-and-grin with Harry Reid, the incoming Senate majority leader. Hatchets buried, knives sheathed—lots of work to do.

The cockeyed optimists among us would have us believe that elections offer a chance for renewal, a fresh start. Such hopes have been dashed countless times, of course, but voters spoke with such force and clarity last week that perhaps this time will be different. Old Gilmour would be having none of it.

Searching For A Strategy (TIME)

By Michael Duffy

Time, November 13, 2006

In the heady days after the first Gulf War, Robert Gates liked to tell a story about his boss, George Herbert Walker Bush. As Bush 41 was preparing to invade Kuwait in 1990 and free that nation from the clutches of Saddam Hussein, Pentagon generals came up with what they thought was a clever scheme that might prevent the President from going to war. Gates was in the Oval Office when the generals brought in maps, charts and pointers and told Bush that Kuwait could be liberated only if he was willing to spend six months deploying half a million troops halfway round the globe. The reluctant generals were betting, Gates explained, that no U.S. President would agree to such a crazy and expensive adventure. But what made Gates smile when he told the story was the cool and determined way Bush responded to the uniforms' rush job. "Sounds right," said the old Navy pilot. "Do it." The generals left the Oval Office looking pale and drawn. And the biggest and most successful U.S. military operation since World War II got under way.

Soon it will be Gates' job to go into the Oval Office with his own set of pointers, maps and charts, and run a very different briefing for a very different member of the Bush family about a very different conflict in Iraq. This time, Gates will be advising George W. Bush on how to get out of--not into--a war, even though the President still believes, in the face of a humbling electoral repudiation and a U.S. death toll approaching 3,000, that the invasion of Iraq was wise, worthy and well planned. Gates' task as the new Defense Secretary is to preach change to a leader who has stuck to his line--despite all kinds of evidence to the contrary--for years now.

The Greeks believed that the gods visit the sins of the fathers upon their sons. But when it comes to the Bush family and Iraq, the tragedy runs from stem to root. And so over the next few weeks, key members of Bush's father's vaunted foreign policy team--the real A-team of the Republican foreign policy establishment--will step in and conduct what amounts to a family intervention. Led by former CIA Director Gates and former Secretary of State James Baker, who co-heads a commission on Iraq, Dad's former aides will present the son with a plan for saving his presidency and, with it, some remnant of the family's brand name. None of those involved will call it an intervention, but it's fair to say the nation's future is at stake. Although Gates and Baker will be out front, others who worked for the patriarch are helping behind the scenes. Dynasties don't get to be dynasties by neglecting the line.

DOJ_NMG_0092553

The task facing the Old Guard is to fashion an exit strategy from Iraq that can salvage U.S. prestige and avoid turning the civil war into an even wider and more violent catastrophe. There are only a few known knowns here: it surely pains the father that it has come to this. It is just as galling to the son that he had to invite his father's most trusted consiglieres to step in and help clean up his mess overseas. Neither man appreciates the chortling sounds coming from the vast Bush 41 crowd, which has long harbored grave doubts about the soundness of 43's foreign policy team. The biggest question is how the object of the intervention will react. As one senior official in the 41 White House says of the President, "He can fight this and turn into a constantly warring figure, or he can turn back into the friendly wise guy who gets along with everyone. The latter will serve him much better."

It does help Bush that the return of the realists comes at the very moment when both parties are looking for political cover on the war that went wrong. Although the leaders of the new Democratic majority in Congress say they plan to hold the Administration accountable for the spiraling costs, mismanagement and graft associated with the war, the reality is that the party remains divided over what kind of military strategy to pursue now. Democrats who voted for the war and have been on the defensive with the party's antiwar base are anxious to get behind any sign that points to an exit. Those who voted against the war but who don't have a clue about how to stabilize Iraq want to find a program they can get behind without looking like silly skedaddlers. The Republicans are equally torn, between realists furious at the Administration for refusing to change course sooner and true believers who fret that the White House is about to abandon the neoconservative project to bring democracy to the Middle East.

Given all those diverging views, it's understandable that Bush talks about the commission headed by Baker and former Representative Lee Hamilton the way a child who can't wait for Christmas talks about Santa Claus. Bush mentioned the commission four times in his press conference last week. The President opposed the creation of the panel last fall but eventually came around, in part at the urging of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Worried about whether the White House believed in the commission from the start, Baker insisted on meeting with the President before taking the job and insisted that Bush personally ask him to take it on. Baker told Bush in his private session that he was likely to come up with recommendations that Bush might not favor. Asked by Baker whether he truly backed an approach that would lead to a strategic change, Bush said he did.

Since then, relations between the White House and the study group haven't always been perfect. When a White House official made skeptical statements in early fall about the group's direction, angry Democrats on the panel warned Baker that they would not be part of a charade. Baker in turn went on TV and reported that the White House was still on board, while privately informing the West Wing to shut down the skeptics for good. Baker has been strict about stressing the bipartisan nature of the group--which includes Clinton advisers like Leon Panetta and William Perry as well as former Wyoming Senator Alan Simpson and Reagan Attorney General Edwin Meese--and he told TIME it will act only by consensus. Still, everyone agrees that Baker is the first among equals.

So far, the Baker group has convened a number of listening sessions; its deliberations as a group begin this week. It is already evident that the panel is not laboring under illusions about the grim outlook for the U.S. enterprise in Iraq. The commission returned from its brief trip to Baghdad in September collectively stunned by the chaos--which is interesting, since they barely got to see it. They apparently saw enough: the donning of the body armor, the corkscrew approach in the Air Force cargo plane, the harrowing treetop chopper flight into the Green Zone--it all left the commissioners shaken, according to an adviser to one member. There are no plans to go back.

Instead, something akin to a shadow State Department has sprung up to figure out how to extricate the U.S. from Iraq. Baker and Hamilton reached deep into the government's foreign policy ranks--active and retired--and plucked their favorite generals, spooks and analysts to work in complete secrecy, installing some in a nondescript building that houses the U.S. Institute of Peace. Some 50 advisers, both here and in Iraq, have kicked in reports and working papers; Baker and his team have fired questions back at those who are the most promising. Baker has been in touch with representatives from Iran and Syria, countries the U.S. isn't keen to cozy up to. And about a dozen longtime aides and diplomatic wizards, including Brent Scowcroft, the grand master of the foreign policy establishment, are in communication with Baker and Hamilton as they go down to the wire. The bipartisan pragmatism encouraged by the Baker-Hamilton group, says Clinton U.N. Ambassador Richard Holbrooke, marks an end to the era when U.S. foreign policy was crafted by people who looked at the world as they wanted it to be, not the world as it was. Says Holbrooke: "Now there is a tremendous wedge between the neoconservatives and the rest of the national-security community."

DOJ_NMG_0092554

Getting out of Iraq will require the sort of hard choices between interests and ideals that the Bush Administration has been historically reluctant to make. The Baker group is considering a series of proposals that will include calling for intensive regional diplomacy, such as direct, high-level talks with Iran and Syria--something the Bush team has resisted for months. Most significant, the commission plans to outline a plan for redeploying--that is to say, pulling out--some U.S. troops over the next year. The group is also considering telling the Shi'ite-led government in Baghdad that U.S. troops will stay and help steady the country only if the government puts an end to sectarian violence. If the killings continue, the U.S. will pull out quickly. "If these things don't happen," said Les Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations, "we're going to have to move out faster."

Baker has been talking to the President directly for months. The two men have a long history. It was Bush who installed himself in Washington in 1986 to keep an eye on his father's presidential campaign, then being run by Baker. And it was Baker who led the legal fight in Florida that handed W. his presidency in 2001. But if Baker is now laying the groundwork for another bailout of the man he once referred to as Junior, he can also thank Bush for bringing him back to center stage at a time of genuine national crisis. Baker has held three Cabinet posts, overseen a fourth agency and run five presidential campaigns. Untying the Gordian knot that is Iraq would cement his reputation as one of the nation's premier wise men of the past 30 years.

It is tantalizing to imagine that Baker, who plans to issue his report next month, pushed Bush to dump Rumsfeld for Gates. A former Baker aide last week called the coincidence of timing "painfully obvious" and noted the appointment of Gates to the Baker commission last year. There is also the fact that Rumsfeld has long been resented by many Bush 41 loyalists, who recall the way Rumsfeld schemed to get Bush appointed director of the CIA in 1976 to prevent him from becoming Gerald Ford's running mate that year. But there were more pressing reasons for Rumsfeld to go--and quickly. "Baker wasn't going to let his report come out," says a Gates aide, "so that Rummy could stomp all over it." As for Bush 41, he is staying above the nitty-gritty of the takeover, says one of 41's former aides, but "he's definitely in the loop."

It will fall to Gates to execute the Baker plan. Bush first approached Gates about joining his team more than a year ago, when he was looking for a new director of national intelligence. As a former CIA director, Gates found the offer tempting but declined after he decided that the job amounted to little more than overseeing a vast bureaucracy rather than running a real intelligence operation. Bush didn't offer the Pentagon job to Gates until early last week. A little cloak-and-dagger was used to sneak Gates onto the President's ranch for his job interview: he was instructed to meet White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten and his deputy, Joe Hagin, at a supermarket parking lot in nearby McGregor, Texas, for the drive to Crawford. The President slipped out to meet Gates at the new office that opened on the ranch in 2004.

Having worked at the White House and run the CIA, Gates will manage the budgets, bureaucrats, jargon and generals on the Pentagon's E-Ring easily enough. But he will be judged by only one rule: whether he can organize what a Baker aide calls "the orderly transition and exit from Iraq." Someone who has worked with him describes Gates as "serious, subtle, reflective, never curt or abrupt." Departing CIA directors are flooded with offers of corporate jobs and strategic intelligence posts. Instead, when Gates left government in early 1993, he fled to Washington State, where he spent the next few years in a library working on his memoirs.

That was, in many ways, a return to where he started. He rose through the CIA's analysis directorate as a Russia scholar during the 1970s until plucked for stardom by Reagan spymaster William Casey. Gates had a reputation as a tough-nosed hard-liner; in fact, Gates was never a mirror image of the shrewdly moderate Baker. During the first Bush Administration, Gates was far more skeptical of Mikhail Gorbachev and his perestroika program than was either Baker or the President. Gates' closest ally in that minor crusade was none other than then Defense Secretary Dick Cheney. Gates' nickname in the first Bush White House was Eyeore: no matter the topic, he always seemed to worry about the worst-case scenario. Gates, who has a healthy sense of humor, was usually the first to admit he was the in-house pessimist.

He has also seen his share of controversy. Partly because he worked for Casey, Gates was a minor player in the Iran-contra scandal and was criticized for skewing intelligence analysis on the Soviets to suit hard-liners in the Reagan White House. More than 30 Democrats--10 of whom are still in the Senate--opposed his nomination to be CIA director in 1991. Gates went into his confirmation that year carrying a small, white oblong stone in his pocket, a memento of a hike he had taken in the Olympic mountains the summer before. He wanted a reminder of what he had to look forward to in case his nomination failed. He may want to dig that stone out of his closet. Given the current Administration's record of laundering intelligence, Gates is sure to endure another round of questions about his past in his confirmation hearings next month.

DOJ_NMG_0092555

But Bob Gates is probably under no illusions about the limitations he faces. He once told TIME that people who go to work at the White House pass through two distinct stages of astonishment. At first, they are amazed at what the place can do. But then they are quickly disillusioned by what it cannot accomplish. Putting an Iraqi exit plan in front of the President will be relatively simple. Winning Bush's full support may be harder. And executing it in a country where strategic planning is almost an oxymoron may prove beyond any man's--or any White House's--capability.

The New Face: A Spy With Fresh Eyes (NSWK)

By Dan Ephron And Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - How does the incoming Defense secretary really feel about the war in Iraq? At sessions of the Iraq Study Group over the past months, Robert Gates was careful not to show his cards. But on the commission's long flight home from a fact-finding mission to Baghdad in September, after several drinks had been poured, the Republican panelist let loose on the Bush team. "He said they really screwed up Iraq and, to a large extent, he couldn't figure out why it happened," a source close to Gates who was on the plane told NEWSWEEK. Particularly foolish, Gates thought, were the decisions to occupy Iraq with a relatively small force and to purge the Iraqi civil service of Baath Party members. "He couldn't believe there was such a degree of incompetence," said the source, who did not want to be named because panelists were trying to keep their discussions out of the media.

That's one side of Gates. Since retiring from public service in 1993, the career intelligence officer has shown a capacity to speak truth to Republican (and Democratic) power. His 1996 memoir, "From the Shadows," takes his former boss at the CIA, William Casey, to task for shutting out Congress and scorning oversight. A 2004 study he coauthored with Democrat Zbigniew Brzezinski criticized the Bush administration's policy of not speaking to Iran. But his record as a CIA analyst, as deputy national-security adviser to the first President Bush and as CIA chief in the early '90s shows another side as well. Melvin Goodman, who served under Gates in the CIA's Soviet division, says the boss knew how to spin raw intelligence into the kind of briefs politicians wanted to read. Goodman cites a Gates-ordered CIA analysis that supported allegations of Soviet involvement in the 1981 assassination attempt on the pope as a particularly glaring example of skewed intel. "He always serves his masters," Goodman told NEWSWEEK after Gates's appointment last week. (Gates could not be reached for comment).

So which side will he show President Bush? Gates owes a debt to Bush Senior. The former president helped erase the Iran-contra stain on Gates's record from the 1980s (when he was alleged to have been less than candid about when he learned of the illegal transfer of funds to Nicaraguan rebels from profits on arms sales to Iran) by picking him to head the CIA in 1991. Last week, four days before his appointment as secretary of Defense, Gates dined with Bush and wife Barbara at a football dinner at Texas A&M University, where Gates has served as president since 2002. He did not bite as readily when the son came calling. Twice, Gates turned down job offers from the younger Bush, first to be the National Intelligence director and later to serve as deputy secretary of State. And then there's Iraq. Though the panel Gates sat on until last week will probably stop short of calling for a troop withdrawal, it will certainly urge Bush to change course.

For Gates and others on the panel, the Iraq trip appears to have marked a turning point. After traveling in an airliner for 13 hours to Kuwait, the commission members boarded a military C-130 for the 90-minute flight to Baghdad. Most of the panelists sat in the hull, along with about 25 soldiers who were returning to the front. One commission member remarked how young they looked, according to a source who traveled with the group. "To see these young men really brought home the reality of the mess in Iraq and the price we're paying to be there," the source said. It's a mess Gates now owns.

A New Man. Next, A New Plan For Iraq? (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine And Kevin Whitelaw

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092556

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld didn't appear on any ballot last week, but the war that he and President Bush have waged in Iraq emerged as perhaps the most decisive factor in the Republican defeat. After a dreadful year of worsening sectarian violence and revenge attacks, polls have clearly shown a diminishing faith in the Bush administration's ability to turn things around in Iraq-nearly 6 in 10 voters said they disapprove of the war.

President Bush wasted no time in announcing Rumsfeld's resignation (though insisting that the departure was planned regardless of the election's outcome). The nomination of former CIA Director Robert Gates for the Pentagon post is a clear signal that the White House is trying to shake off its history of "stay the course" rhetoric. But while Bush's motivation might have more to do with politics than with military strategy, Gates could make a real difference. A member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group led by former Rep. Lee Hamilton and former Secretary of State James Baker, who served in the first President Bush's administration, Gates could be a critical bridge between the White House and the clutch of foreign-policy graybeards many Republicans and Democrats are looking to as a lifeline— a last-gasp chance to reverse the downward trend in Iraq.

Shifting gears. The choice of Gates eases the way for Bush to latch on to at least some of Baker's proposals, due out soon. Baker's group could point to a strategy that "is a little different— or totally different," Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, who next month will become the No. 2 commander in Iraq, tells U.S. News. In any event, he adds, "it's going to be very much a factor."

The Baker report is expected to cement a shift in emphasis from creating a model democracy in the Middle East to simply achieving stability in Iraq-still no small feat. "Both the American people and the Congress don't want this to last a lot longer," says a senior U.S. military official. "You'll always get the party line of 'stay the course,' but everybody realizes that it's to a point." The question of an American troop surge, advocated by Republican Sen. John McCain, will come to the fore as well. "Do we need more people, or do they become a greater irritant?" asks Odierno. "There comes a time when you wear out your welcome."

Challenges. There are no magic bullets in Iraq. The underlying problem is that America's ability to change the dynamic there appears to be continually diminishing. The Sunni insurgents remain disturbingly strong—October was the deadliest month for U.S. soldiers in nearly two years. And troops have been unable to quell the sectarian violence. A vaunted security plan for Baghdad has failed to stem the bloodshed, Iraqi security forces remain unreliable, and U.S. officials have been unable to persuade Iraq's government to confront the Shiite militias or their leaders. The White House was particularly discouraged by what National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley found on his recent trip to Iraq. "The situation there is as complex as it's ever been and is getting more complicated every couple of weeks," says a senior administration official.

Rescue Squad (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

Within the tightknit world of Bush family and friends, it came as no surprise when the president named Robert Gates as his new defense secretary. President Bush has, after all, turned to members of his father's governing team on a regular basis to bail him out of jams or give him a lift. He chose Dick Cheney, his father's defense secretary, as his running mate in 2000. He brought in James Baker, his dad's secretary of state, to run the legal operation that gave him the presidency in 2000. He recruited Andrew Card, his father's transportation secretary and confidant, as his first White House chief of staff. He named Condoleezza Rice, his father's Russia expert, to be national security adviser and promoted her to secretary of state. Now James Baker is back at the center of the action as cochairman of the Iraq Study Group, which will make recommendations on a new Iraq policy in the next several weeks.

The choice of Gates allows the commander in chief to at least create the perception that he is looking for a fresh start in Iraq. Certainly Gates doesn't have the baggage of Donald Rumsfeld, the man he will replace at the Pentagon and widely considered the architect of the war. Equally important, as a private citizen, Gates has criticized the administration for failing to use diplomacy aggressively enough to extract the United States from Iraq. And Gates has a track record of success. He was part of George Herbert Walker Bush's national-security team, one of the best in recent years. "The father's team has a proven track record," says a member of 41's administration. "They handled the dissolution of communism, the falling apart of the Soviet Union, the Persian Gulf War, the liberation of Panama—and all were successes. These are people who knew what they were doing."

DOJ_NMG_0092557

Leaving the Aggies. Gates, president of Texas A&M University, site of the George Bush Presidential Library and Museum, was deputy national security adviser under George Herbert Walker Bush and director of central intelligence from 1991 to 1993. "He's pragmatic; he's a listener; he builds coalitions," says a former adviser to the father. That makes him a typical acolyte of the elder Bush—and the opposite of the arrogant Rumsfeld. The hallmarks of the elder Bush's national-security team were caution, pragmatism, and a commitment to diplomacy. This is far different from the central premises underlying the younger Bush's foreign policy—a belief in preventive war, a de-emphasis on international coalitions, and a campaign to spread democracy around the world.

Former aides to the father and some GOP advisers to the current White House think the departure of Rumsfeld, a longtime pal and ally of Dick Cheney, will leave the hard-line vice president isolated in the government. Others aren't so sure. No one knows whether Bush is ready to budge from his commitment to winning the war in Iraq and creating a democracy—a stance that Cheney strongly endorses.

Yet even if Bush does not make big changes in Iraq policy, there were many political and PR advantages to making the Pentagon move. Dumping Rumsfeld, 74, and naming Gates, 63, on the day after the election, Bush managed to shift the media's attention away from the GOP's disastrous losses on November 7. It also gave Bush some breathing room as he tries to rebuild public and congressional support for the Iraq war. Bush and his senior advisers acknowledge that a big reason for their setbacks at the polls was growing opposition to that conflict. By pushing Rumsfeld out, Bush removed the biggest symbol of his Iraq policy and a very divisive figure in Washington.

How History Will Judge Donald Rumsfeld (NSWK)

By John Barry And Michael Hirsh

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - There weren't many people in the Pentagon brave enough to give bad news to Donald Rumsfeld. Jim Roche, though, was one. The Air Force secretary and his boss shared Chicago roots and Washington ties going back 30 years—and, like Rummy, the white-haired Roche had made a lot of money in business. In the fall of 2002 it was becoming clear inside the Pentagon that George W. Bush intended to invade Iraq. A worried Roche dragooned the then Army secretary, Thomas White, to join him for a frank talk with Rumsfeld, according to a knowledgeable source who asked for anonymity because he was describing a private conversation. With some trepidation, the pair marched up to Rummy's elaborate dark-paneled office in the E-Ring, the power corridor of the Pentagon. "Don, you do realize that Iraq could be another Vietnam?" Roche asked. Rumsfeld, a political survivor of the Watergate era whose main goal was to exorcise the ghost of Vietnam forever—restoring American power and prestige in the world—was outraged at the very suggestion. "Vietnam? You think you have to tell me about Vietnam?" Rumsfeld sputtered. "Of course it won't be Vietnam. We are going to go in, overthrow Saddam, get out. That's it." Then he waved them out of his office.

Now Rumsfeld himself has been thrown out after six stormy years, a chastened if still-proud man who will spend the rest of his days grappling with the judgment of history. His tenure at the Pentagon is thick with irony. The squinty-eyed tough guy whom Bush once described as a "matinee idol," the podium wit who declared "I don't do quagmires," is now viewed as the author of one of the worst quagmires in American history. The "forward-leaning" ex-wrestler who wanted to project American strength abroad may now be blamed by historians for revealing the limits of American power—and weakening the nation's position in the critical Middle East.

When Rumsfeld arrived to take over the Pentagon for the second time in January 2001 he acted like a man on a mission. Rumsfeld came equipped with a glittering résumé: Princeton wrestling captain. Naval aviator. Congressman at 30. White House chief of staff at 42. Defense secretary at 43 (the youngest ever, way back in 1975). Fortune 500 CEO and turnaround specialist. And with 30 years of global experience, Rumsfeld had a clear vision for Defense. He wanted to draw down America's giant cold-war garrisons around the world and transform the U.S. military into a high-tech, "agile" force suited for expeditionary warfare around the globe.

Rumsfeld actually achieved a good part of this vision. He elevated the role and size of Special Forces, turning them into a separate worldwide command. He gave Special Operations—the global SWAT teams of the 21st century—the lead in the war against terrorism. He changed the way the Army and Navy operate worldwide, making both services more nimble. Finally, Rumsfeld began a profound shift of America's basic military approach to threats abroad, away from the old requirement of fighting three wars simultaneously (for example, in North Korea, Europe and the Mideast) and toward a new force organized to face unknowable contingencies.

DOJ_NMG_0092558

But much of that transformational work may be forgotten in the history books. Instead, largely thanks to Iraq, Rumsfeld will likely go down as an erratic and arrogant manager who sullied America's reputation by allowing interrogation abuses at Abu Ghraib and other U.S.-run detention centers abroad; who haughtily dismissed advice from U.S. generals and senators alike to put in enough troops (in part because he didn't want another Vietnam), and who preferred to deny the reality of the Iraqi insurgency rather than confront it. Bush, in announcing Rumsfeld's departure last week, called him "a superb leader in a time of change." But that is a distinctly minority view in Washington, where it is hard to find any defenders of Rumsfeld, either Democrat or Republican. "He will be seen as the Robert McNamara of this generation," says retired Lt. Gen. William Odom, referring to the Vietnam-era Defense chief who has spent the last 40 years trying live down the carnage that occurred on his watch.

Rumsfeld himself is all too aware of this view, his associates say. That is one reason he wanted to stay on at the Pentagon through Bush's second term. Rumsfeld was hoping that by then things might have turned for the better in Iraq. Instead, Bush told Rumsfeld last week that enough was enough. If the violence in Iraq does abate over the last two years of Bush's term, credit will now go to Rummy's successor, Robert Gates, rather than to him.

Some of Rumsfeld's critics also say that much of his transformation was superficial. He was unable to pare down U.S. nuclear forces despite Bush's pledge to do so, sponsoring giant budgets filled with cold-war-era weapons. And they say he was unpardonably negligent in his handling of the central issue of his tenure, Iraq, which is likely to be the subject of fresh inquiries by the Democratic-controlled Congress. "Rumsfeld demanded responsibility for all of postwar Iraq and then did nothing with it," says a former senior Defense official who spoke anonymously "because I have to work in this town." "He tried to destroy the interagency process. And I think he was successful."

Historians will probably argue for decades over who gets most of the blame for the mistakes made in Iraq. But Rumsfeld's talent for bureaucratic infighting did work against success there. He offended allies, played down the State Department's role in planning for postwar Iraq and actively stymied Condoleezza Rice's efforts to do her first-term job as national-security adviser, which was to coordinate between agencies, according to numerous accounts. Sometimes he didn't even return her calls. "Rumsfeld treated Condi like the hired help," says a White House staffer who would discuss the relationship only if he was not identified. "He did everything he could to humiliate her. And the president never intervened." Two weeks ago, Iraq inspector general Stuart Bowen concluded that the Pentagon is still not working well with State in coordinating Provincial Reconstruction Teams, on which the administration once placed high hopes in Iraq.

Rumsfeld was not blind about Iraq. He foresaw clearly the pitfalls of a long foreign occupation. He planned to reduce the U.S. presence in Iraq to some 30,000 troops within months of the March 2003 invasion; if he'd had his way, he would have quickly handed over power to the Iraqis. "The secretary saw the Iraq war as his best chance to force the U.S. Army to abandon its cold-war model of a massive buildup taking months—what they did in Gulf War I—and move to a swifter, leaner way of operating," says one of his former top aides who would discuss him only anonymously. But once it became clear that Bush wanted a deeper democratic transformation of Iraq—one that would require a longer occupation—Rumsfeld failed to adjust. And that may be history's bottom line on his troubled tenure.

When "Oops" Isn't Enough (TIME)

By Michael Kinsley

Time, November 13, 2006

In the original film of Mel Brooks' The Producers, Zero Mostel advises a blithering Gene Wilder, who has just unintentionally observed Mostel's character trying to seduce an elderly woman: "You mean 'oops,' don't you? Just say 'oops' and get out!" Yet sometimes even "oops" is not enough.

Kenneth Adelman and Richard Perle said "oops" earlier this month. As personality types, these two longtime Washington hawks couldn't be more different. Adelman is relentlessly cheerful and upbeat, while Perle is legendarily gloomy and dark. But both played a role in pushing the U.S. into war in Iraq--Adelman in an influential Washington Post Op-Ed promising that the war would be "a cakewalk" and Perle warning of catastrophe if we left Saddam Hussein and his weapons unmolested. Now, interviewed in Vanity Fair, they say it all may have been a mistake. Oops!

DOJ_NMG_0092559

Yet in Vanity Fair's quotes, there is no note of contrition. It's not their fault. In fact, dispensing with Saddam, establishing peace and democracy in Iraq and then watching those ideals spread throughout the Middle East is still a good idea. It's just that President George W. Bush bungled the job. Among other things, he failed to recognize the degree of "disloyalty" within his Administration, says Perle--who was chairman of Bush's Defense Policy Board--thus proving the accusation even as he makes it.

Opponents of the Iraq war ought to be happy for two such prominent converts. So why is their conversion so enraging? Well, first, howzabout an apology? It's maddening that there's no cost for being wrong, even when it translates into thousands of people dead and billions of dollars down the drain. In our culture of value-free celebrity, in which a famous ax murderer equals a famous actress equals a famous Nobel Peace Prize winner, Adelman and Perle have merely earned another 15 minutes as hot guests on the talk shows. They have reason to be pleased, having deserted the Bush Administration five minutes ahead of the other rats. But they should try not to show their pleasure.

Second, you don't get to assume the success of your intentions then plead a shrugging "Who knew?" when they don't pan out. I also am in favor of toppling dictators, establishing democracy and watching it spread painlessly throughout every region where there is no experience of it. Not only that: I am in favor of turning sand into ice cream and guaranteeing a cone to every child in the Middle East. But you can't turn sand into ice cream. That is not a defect in the execution of the idea. It is a defect in the idea itself. Although Perle and Adelman and others may think they are dissing the Bush Administration when they talk about its incompetence in failing to turn sand into ice cream, they are also displaying the Bush Administration's key vice, which is assuming that things are how you wish them to be and not how they are.

Third, condemning Bush's conduct of the Iraq war has become an overly handy cop-out for people who don't want to support the war but can't bring themselves to say it was wrong. This would include almost every Democratic candidate in last week's midterm elections. What would these Monday-morning quarterbacks have done differently? Sent in more American troops? Puh-leeze.

What is the proper way to act when you have made a boo-boo on the scale of what Perle and Adelman now admit to? A brief period of silence might be in order, followed by a bit of ideological spring cleaning. If this big idea has turned out to be wrong, isn't it possible that some of their other ideas are also wrong? In fact, maybe their whole philosophy is mistaken. Perle and Adelman are both neoconservatives, or neocons, a group that prides itself on being tough-minded and pragmatic while rejecting liberals as soft and romantic. Yet they managed to turn a President who was elected on a promise to eschew nation building into Woodrow Wilson in cowboy boots, promising democracy everywhere.

Adelman and Perle probably put on a better display of chagrin when they are 20 minutes late for a dinner party than they have managed to come up with so far in concluding that maybe the war was not such a great idea after all. "Just say 'oops' and get out" might be an excellent policy for the U.S. at this stage in the Iraq war. But it's not sufficient for the people who got us into it.

Zakaria: What The Baker Commission Is Ignoring (NSWK)

By Fareed Zakaria

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - Press accounts of its deliberations suggest that the much-anticipated Baker-Hamilton report will make some intelligent recommendations. The committee will point out that America's strategy in Iraq must be placed in a broader regional context. For three years, America's Iraq policy has largely ignored the rest of the Middle East. That was no accident. The neoconservative vision was always that Iraq would be made anew, shorn of the flaws and ailments of the Arab world. Before the invasion, senior policymakers speculated that Iraq's postwar government would recognize Israel. "The road to Jerusalem runs through Baghdad," they were fond of saying. Immediately after the war, a senior international diplomat attached to the Coalition Provisional Authority was embarking on a trip to Iraq's neighbors, and he asked Paul Bremer what message to deliver to them. The answer: none. The region was the problem, not the solution.

DOJ_NMG_0092560

This absence of a regional strategy left Iraq open to its neighbors' most irresponsible instincts. Iran and Syria have helped keep the violence there on the boil. Saudi groups and individuals have funded Sunni militants. None of the surrounding nations would benefit if Iraq actually did collapse, setting off territorial disputes, sending refugees into neighboring lands and exporting Iraq's instability. Such an outcome can still be avoided, but only with active support from these countries. The Baker-Hamilton commission can be expected to recommend a major regional effort.

The panel will also surely suggest intensive efforts to get the various groups in Iraq to forge a national compact. The elements of such a deal are clear—regional autonomy, a sharing of oil revenues, amnesty and the demobilization of armed groups or their incorporation into the Army. And this political settlement would go a long way toward reducing the violence in the country.

But if the commission stops there, it will have missed its moment. These recommendations are the easy ones, accepted by almost everyone but a few ideologues. Some are already being tried. The United States has been pushing hard to get the Iraqis to make a political deal. The administration has been talking more to the neighbors of late and has even made some small overtures to Iran.

That's not enough. Even if Iran and Syria actually agreed to help stabilize Iraq, there's no certainty that their efforts would bring dramatic changes to the country. The violence in Iraq has taken on a life of its own, and the entire structure of political authority has become fragmented and decentralized. If Prime Minister Maliki and Ayatollah Sistani cannot rein in the violence of their own fellow Shiites, is it likely that Iran and Syria could?

Here is the tough question: What are America's objectives in Iraq and how can we achieve them? More bluntly, what is to be done with the roughly 140,000 U.S. troops stationed there? What is their mission? If they have new goals, do these require more Americans or fewer? Not to tackle this issue is to present a doughnut document—all sides and no center.

In answering this question, we need to keep three factors in mind:

This is not our chessboard. The Iraqi government has authority over all the political issues in the country. We may have excellent ideas about federalism, revenue-sharing and amnesty, but the ruling coalition has to agree and then actually implement them. So far, despite our many efforts, they have refused. There is a desperate neoconservative plea for more troops to try one more time in Iraq. But a new military strategy, even with adequate forces, cannot work without political moves that reinforce it. The opposite is happening today. American military efforts are actually being undermined by Iraq's government. The stark truth is, we do not have an Iraqi partner willing to make the hard decisions. Wishing otherwise is, well, wishful thinking.

Time is not on America's side. Month by month, U.S. influence in Iraq is waning. Deals that we could have imposed on Iraq's rival factions in 2003 are now impossible. A year ago, America's ambassador to Iraq had real influence. Today he is being marginalized. Thus any new policy that requires new approaches to the neighbors and lengthy negotiations carries the cost associated with waiting.

America's only real leverage is the threat of withdrawal. Many outsiders fail to grasp how much political power the United States has handed over in Iraq. The Americans could not partition Iraq or distribute its revenues even if Bush decided to. But Washington can warn the ruling coalition that unless certain conditions are met, U.S. troops will begin a substantial drawdown, quit providing basic security on the streets of Iraq and instead take on a narrower role, akin to the Special Forces mission in Afghanistan.

And one last thing: for such a threat to be meaningful, we must be prepared to carry it out.

Democrats Signal Hope For Approval Of Gates (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, November 13, 2006

Senior Democrats signalled on Sunday that they hoped to complete swiftly the confirmation process for Robert Gates to replace Donald Rumsfeld as the new US defence secretary during the "lame-duck" session of the outgoing Republican-dominated Congress which begins on Monday.

It may be one of the few concrete measures agreed over the coming weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0092561

Although packed with legislative initiatives, including bills on domestic wiretapping, the nuclear deal with India and a free trade agreement with Vietnam, political analysts are sceptical that the session will achieve much. They warn that many issues will have to wait until the new Democrat-controlled Congress convenes in January and some may disappear from the legislative agenda altogether.

The renewed effort by the White House also to win Senate confirmation for John Bolton, the US ambassador to the United Nations, during the lame-duck -session only complicates matters further.

Carl Levin, the incoming chairman of the Senate armed services committee, who voted against Mr Gates when he was nominated to be head of the Central Intelligence Agency in 1991, on Sunday told ABC's This Week: "I hope that his confirmation hearings can be held and that he will get a vote prior to the end of this Congress."

He reiterated his long-held reservations about the nominee but said: "I'm going to have a fresh look at him."

Joe Biden, the incoming chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee who also voted against Mr Gates in 1991, said: "I am inclined to vote for him now.

"I know some of his views on Iraq," he said. "I know he wasn't of the Rumsfeld school. And to put it very, very bluntly, as long as he is not there, Rumsfeld is."

Dan Bartlett, the White House counsellor, held out hope that the lame-duck session could pass substantial legislation.

"I'm not going to prejudge the outcome of this lame duck," he told Fox News Sunday. "On the terrorist surveillance programme, the president came to an agreement with key members of the US Senate and House."

Analysts, though, point out that the agreement was with Republicans critical of the wiretap programme and may not now be enough to satisfy victorious Democrats.

The White House wants the outgoing Congress to pass appropriations (spending) bills for 2007.

Political experts, though, doubt there is appetite on either side of the outgoing Congress for big legislation, following a decisive vote in favour of the Democrats in the mid-terms.

"Most lame-duck sessions amount to very little and that is especially true after a change in party control," said Larry Sabato, professor of politics at the University of Virginia. "Why would Democrats in the Senate permit the GOP [Republicans] to pass any significant legislation when they themselves will be taking charge in January?"

Norm Ornstein, a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think-tank, said many Republicans in the House probably just want to "get out of town".

He said Senate Republicans "would like to finish up several things they almost got through at the end of September – the India deal, the Vietnam free trade agreement, the extension of popular tax cuts, the oil drilling compromise" but added "one would not expect much".

Mr Ornstein said the India bill had a better chance of passing Congress during the lame-duck session than the Vietnam trade accord but said the odds were "less than 50 per cent for each".

Gates Would Leave Fidelity To Take Defense Post (WSJ)

By John Spence

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

Fidelity Investments said Robert Gates, the Bush administration's nominee for secretary of defense, is expected to resign as chairman of the mutual-fund company's independent trustees if his cabinet appointment is confirmed.

Fidelity also announced manager changes at several of its funds and said it will cut fees for the 529 college-savings plans it manages for Massachusetts and other states. "On behalf of Fidelity, we are grateful that Bob Gates has served the Fidelity funds and the funds' shareholders for the last nine years with distinction," said Fidelity Chief Operating Officer Robert Reynolds.

Mr. Gates would step down from his role at Fidelity to prevent any perceived conflicts of interest, observers said.

The closely held Boston company said on its Web site Thursday that Jennifer Uhrig was named portfolio manager of $20.4 billion Fidelity Blue Chip Growth Fund, taking over for John McDowell and Brian Hanson. Mr. McDowell is retiring from portfolio management, while Mr. Hanson will continue to oversee Fidelity Advisor Strategic Growth Fund and Fidelity VIP Growth Stock Portfolio, the mutual-fund firm said.

DOJ_NMG_0092562

The moves reverberated down the firm's management lineup, as Jason Weiner will succeed Ms. Uhrig at Fidelity Advisor Equity Growth Fund and Fidelity VIP Growth Portfolio. Mr. Weiner has managed Fidelity Independence Fund, Fidelity Fifty Fund and Fidelity Advisor Fifty Fund since 2003 and has worked as associate portfolio manager of Fidelity VIP Contrafund since March 2006, Fidelity said.

Meanwhile, Robert Bertelson will succeed Mr. Weiner at $4.6 billion Fidelity Independence Fund and Peter Saperstone was named portfolio manager of $1.2 billion Fidelity Fifty Fund and Fidelity Advisor Fifty Fund.

Fidelity said C. Robert Chow was named manager of Fidelity Equity Income II Fund, Scott Offen is in at Fidelity Advisor Equity Value Fund, and Richard Fentin was named portfolio manager of VIP Value Portfolio. The three are succeeding Stephen DuFour.

Finally, James Morrow is taking over for Timothy Cohen at Fidelity Advisor Diversified Stock Fund.

Some analysts were surprised at Mr. Bertelson's move to Fidelity Independence Fund given his unenviable record at Fidelity Aggressive Growth Fund, which he managed in the early 2000s. "He had a rough time of it between 2000 and 2002 when the fund lost about 75% and trailed the mid-cap growth peer group by a wide margin," said Dan Lefkovitz, an analyst at investment researcher Morningstar Inc.

Fidelity spokesman Vin Loporchio said Mr. Bertelson suffered from bad timing in taking over the fund right at the peak of the market for aggressive growth stocks in February 2000.

Mr. Lefkovitz said he was dismayed by the changes at Fidelity Blue Chip Growth Fund as well. "We've been sticking by this fund despite its underperformance because it was in an unloved part of market and had experienced managers with a good track record," the analyst said. "We were expecting better days ahead, but we don't have as much confidence in the new manager."

Fidelity Blue Chip Growth has a three-year annualized return of 6.2%, trailing the Standard & Poor's 500 by more than five percentage points, according to Morningstar.

Fidelity also is preparing to lower its fees and add more investment options for 529 college-savings plans it runs for Massachusetts and other states, a Fidelity spokeswoman confirmed.

The move, which was earlier reported by the Boston Globe, is expected to be formally announced this week. It comes as rivals such as Vanguard Group have unveiled similar fee reductions as money flows into 529 plans, driven by federal tax exemptions on the tuition plans becoming permanent. So-called 529 plans are investment programs run by states that help Americans contribute to college-tuition expenses. The plans are administered by asset managers who determine how the money is invested.

Fidelity spokeswoman Sophie Launay said the company is readying age-based index portfolios with fees capped at 0.5%, providing a cheaper option than those employing actively managed funds. She said Fidelity plans to do away with its $20 annual fee on all direct-sold plans, and is lowering the minimum monthly contribution to $15 from $50. Fidelity manages 529 plans in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Delaware, Arizona and, soon, in California. The company manages about $7 billion in direct-sold 529 plans, Ms. Launay said.

Gates Likely To Sustain Terror War (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

Defense Secretary-designate Robert M. Gates is not expected to rein in the aggressive global war on al Qaeda started by predecessor Donald H. Rumsfeld or reverse the transformation of the Army, but instead focus on how to win in Iraq and get American troops home, current and former Pentagon officials say.

"He definitely is not seen as someone wimping out on the global war," said a Pentagon adviser. "How he does it, and what tools, and who he entrusts with them, that's a whole different issue."

Mr. Gates, once confirmed by what Republicans hope will be a December floor vote, will arrive at the Pentagon needing to replace a number of senior aides to Mr. Rumsfeld who set policy on intelligence, special operations and the war itself.

DOJ_NMG_0092563

Some other officials Mr. Rumsfeld eyed for senior posts may be discarded because they would not get through a Democrat-controlled Senate, Pentagon officials said.

President Bush introduced his new defense secretary Wednesday and said Saturday that Mr. Gates was an "agent of change" in a sign of the growing momentum for a new direction in Iraq policy after election defeat for Republicans.

"He has experience leading large and complex organizations, and he has shown that he is an agent of change," Mr. Bush said in his weekly radio address. "He will provide a fresh outlook on our strategy in Iraq, and what we need to do to prevail."

That task will be Mr. Gates' overriding focus in the administration's last two years. The quiet government staff man and former college president will be the Pentagon leader the president hopes will ensure that Iraq is not as damaging in the 2008 election to Republicans as it was in 2006.

Mr. Gates resigned Friday from the Iraq Study Group, a blue-ribbon panel established by Congress to find new solutions for Iraq. The bipartisan group is headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, Indiana Democrat.

It is Mr. Gates' ties to Mr. Baker and Brent Scowcroft, former President Bush's national security adviser, that has Republican hawks worried. Mr. Gates worked with both in the first Bush administration as CIA director and deputy to Mr. Scowcroft.

Mr. Scowcroft opposed the war and is said to be cool to Mr. Rumsfeld's aggressive style of using the full force of the military to confront al Qaeda. He was among the team of aides who advised the first President Bush to end the fighting against Iraq in 1991 in the first Gulf war.

In an published interview two years ago in London's Financial Times, Mr. Scowcroft said Iraq was a "failing venture."

Mr. Baker's State Department practiced pragmatism at times over loftier goals. He already has said he supports talking to one's enemies, a sign the study group may recommend engaging in talks with Iraq's terrorist-sponsoring neighbors, Iran and Syria.

"I don't think you restrict your conversations to your friends," Mr. Baker told ABC News.

Some conservatives fear such language means Mr. Baker -- and Mr. Gates -- will urge a political agreement that rewards the two hard-line regimes that have supported the deadly Iraqi insurgency with millions in cash, training and weapons.

"Gates has no credentials as a military strategist or innovator," said Jed Babbin, a senior Pentagon official in the first Bush administration. "To replace Rumsfeld with someone lacking these credentials is more than worrisome. ... How will we proceed to win the war? It all comes down to how the president wants to proceed. That's the most important open question."

Mr. Gates will bring a new style to a Pentagon. While Mr. Rumsfeld is brash and combative, Mr. Gates is studious and measured.

He is not viewed as a conservative ideologue, but rather a career manager who rose through the ranks of the CIA's academic-style analytical branch at Langley headquarters. He is more bureaucrat than revolutionary like Mr. Rumsfeld, who pushed through more than 100 transformational reforms and policies.

Mr. Rumsfeld in particular brought special-operations forces off the shelf after the September 11 attacks and empowered commandos with money and manpower to become al Qaeda hunters.

"Rumsfeld understood modern war and real transformation," said an Army Special Forces soldier. "Let's hope Gates doesn't can Pentagon [intelligence] collection efforts in favor of his old alma mater. Let's also hope that generals don't convince Gates that true transformation means more artillery and bigger tanks."

The cupboard will be a bit bare at the Pentagon. Peter Rodman, the assistant secretary of defense who oversees Iraq and Afghanistan policy, told his staff last week he will leave with Mr. Rumsfeld. Stephen Cambone, a close aide to Mr. Rumsfeld and his top intelligence official, also will likely leave. Thomas O'Connell, the top policy-maker for special operations, already had said he would be leaving after the election.

Mr. Gates, who will bring in his own staff, is working out of the White House to prepare for confirmation hearings before the Senate Armed Services Committee. By law, he is not allowed to engage in policy-making until sworn in.

Will Rumsfeld's Reforms Last? (CSM)

By Keith S. Collins

DOJ_NMG_0092564

The Christian Science Monitor, November 13, 2006

Donald Rumsfeld's efforts as secretary of Defense to modernize the US military helped make American fighting forces more lean and muscular. He envisioned a military powered by information and relied on technology to deliver a more effective, more dominant, and more connected armed forces.

But not all experts believe the transformation has been helpful in the war on terror, and the sustainability of many of his reforms may ultimately depend on the ability of people to rise above intense negative feelings about him and see beyond his failings in the Iraq war.

"Rumsfeld made an impressive start [on military transformation]," says Andrew Krepinevich, executive director of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments in Washington. "He set out to restructure global basing posture and succeeded. He enlarged special operations. We have a strong precision-strike capability now."

From the beginning of his tenure in early 2001, Rumsfeld aimed to create a military firmly planted in the 21st century. He insisted that orders for powerful but, in his view, outdated weapons systems, such as the Comanche helicopter and the Crusader artillery, be canceled. He felt the 70-ton Crusader system, for example, was too cumbersome for the kind of rapid deployment needed in modern battlefield situations. After a bruising battle with Congress, he was able to kill the program in 2002.

Mr. Rumsfeld's intent was to change what he believed were old ways of thinking. Peter Singer, senior fellow at the Brookings Institution in Washington, says Rumsfeld wanted to send a message as much as to cancel programs. "He was telling the [armed] services: 'You have to have a new operating mentality,' " he says.

The military got the message. Discussions over designing the military of the future were once confined to universities and think tanks. But, Rumsfeld brought the debate to the Pentagon. Now, each branch of the military analyzes new ways to grow.

To help give his reforms momentum, Rumsfeld opened the Office of Force Transformation in late 2001, and he pushed the concept of "networkcentric warfare," the theory that a military can gain battlefield advantage through information advantage. The purpose, according to the Pentagon document "Elements of Defense Transformation," was to create "networked forces that operate with increased speed and synchronization and are capable of achieving massed effects, in many situations without the physical massing of forces required in the past."

Networkcentric warfare has been on display in Iraq. Singer points to a tale of marines under mortar fire during the second US offensive on Fallujah in November 2004. The soldiers' call for help went not to fellow marines but to an office in Nevada, which was controlling an unmanned Predator drone in the skies above Iraq. The "pilot" in Nevada steered the drone over the area and launched a missile that took out the mortar.

But not everyone was buying into Rumsfeld's vision. Fighting today's wars, some experts say, is not just about smarter technology but about smarter ways of handling people. Jim Dobbins, director of the RAND Corp.'s Security and Defense Policy Center and the Bush administration's first special envoy to Afghanistan, believes Rumsfeld's efforts at transforming the military are "largely irrelevant" to the counterinsurgency efforts in places like Iraq and Afghanistan, and in fact may be destructive.

Mr. Dobbins acknowledges that at the tactical level, networked weapons systems can be helpful. But computers can not gauge collateral damage. The drone's missile may take out the mortar, but it may also take out the entire house.

"If you substitute firepower for manpower, you kill innocent people and antagonize the population you are trying to help," Dobbins says.

The unexpected difficulties of the Iraq war ultimately soured many people on the value of Rumsfeld's reforms. Pinpoint attacks can effectively take out tanks and missile silos. But lightning strikes don't work in house-to-house raids or when rooting out guerrillas in caves. Those scenarios require manpower.

Rumsfeld's management style, often described as arrogant, also raised resistance to his ideas.

In some ways, the fate of many of Rumsfeld's reforms has already been determined.

"He was so preoccupied with transformation and wrong about Iraq, I don't think most of his concepts will be realized," predicts Loren Thompson, chief operating officer of the Lexington Institute, a think tank on military issues. "He had two [unsuccessful] challenges on his watch: finding Al Qaeda's leaders and the war in Iraq. So his achievement will be discredited."

Will the new nominee for Defense secretary, Robert Gates, continue with Rumsfeld's reforms? "My impression is that Gates is being hired to deal with Iraq," says Mr. Krepinevich. "I don't see him giving high priority to transformation."

DOJ_NMG_0092565

Bush Faces GOP Ire Over Rumsfeld Timing (AP)

By John Heilprin

AP, November 12, 2006

The White House is trying to soothe Republicans who say the party might have fared better on Election Day if President Bush had not waited until after the vote to oust Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"You could argue that either way, of what political effect an earlier decision on Secretary Rumsfeld would have had. But it doesn't matter," White House chief of staff Josh Bolten said Sunday.

"The president correctly decided that this decision does not belong in the political realm. And a decision as important as your secretary of defense should not be made based on some partisan political advantage. It would send a terrible signal to our troops, to our allies, even to our enemies," Bolten said.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich has suggested that if Bush replaced Rumsfeld two weeks before the election, voters would not have been as angry about the unpopular Iraq war. Republicans would have gained the boost they needed, according to Gingrich, to retain their majority in the Senate and hold onto 10 to 15 more House seats.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the outgoing chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, agreed with that assessment.

Bush should have removed Rumsfeld "as soon as he had made up his mind. And that's a hard thing to calculate. But it's highly doubtful that he made up his mind between the time the election returns came in on Tuesday and Wednesday when Rumsfeld was out."

"And if Rumsfeld had been out, you bet it would have made a difference," Specter said. "I'd still be chairman of the Judiciary Committee."

The same thought occurred to veteran Rep. Clay Shaw, R-Fla., who was on the verge of becoming chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. After the election, Shaw said that if Rumsfeld had stepped down before last Tuesday, Shaw and other Republicans might have won.

"It could have made a difference in who is running the Congress," said Shaw.

Bush said in an Oval Office interview with The Associated Press and other reporters on Nov. 1 that he expected Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney to stay in his administration until the end. A day after Democrats triumphed, Bush acknowledged he misled the reporters because he "didn't want to inject a major decision about this war in the final days of a campaign."

Bolten explained that when Bush spoke to the reporters, the president had begun seeking a replacement for Rumsfeld — but had yet to decide on a successor.

"The president was not going to replace Secretary Rumsfeld unless he was confident that he had a very strong replacement available to him to put in place," Bolten said.

More important, Bolten said, was that Bush's misdirection to the press was justified by military need.

"If he had said something other than what he said, if he had been equivocal about his support for Secretary Rumsfeld, that would have started an outbreak of then warranted speculation about Secretary Rumsfeld's tenure," Bolten said. "It would have undermined Secretary Rumsfeld's ability to lead the military in a time of war."

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said he did not buy the idea that the timing of the resignation would have made a difference with voters — but allowed that the president was concerned with appearances.

"Think about the signal it would have sent two weeks before the election if President Bush, desperate to change political polls, would have jettisoned his secretary of defense. It would have looked desperate," Bartlett said.

"It would have looked like it was made based on political motivations, not on the security interests of our country," he said. "And I think that would have weakened the president and Republican support going down the stretch of this campaign."

Rumsfeld's departure was a turning point in the administration's Iraq policy. Bolten and Bartlett, making the rounds of Sunday talk shows, said Bush will now welcome new ideas about the war, even from Democrats he once called soft on terrorism.

Some Democrats raised concerns about Bush's choice of former CIA Director Robert Gates to succeed Rumsfeld. The questions revolve around what Gates knew during the Iran-Contra affair, which involved two Reagan White House covert operations: selling arms to Iran to free U.S. hostages in Lebanon and supplying arms to the Contra guerrillas fighting the leftist government of Nicaragua.

DOJ_NMG_0092566

"I haven't decided what I'm going to do with Mr. Gates," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Bolten and Levin spoke on ABC's "This Week." Specter appeared on CNN's "Late Edition." Bartlett and Dean were on "Fox News Sunday."

Rumsfeld And The Realists (WSJ)

By Michael Rubin

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

On Dec. 20, 1983, Donald Rumsfeld, then Ronald Reagan's Middle East envoy, met Iraqi President Saddam Hussein in Baghdad. According to declassified documents, the Reagan administration sought to re-establish long-severed relations with Baghdad amid concern about growing Iranian influence. While U.S. intelligence had earlier confirmed Saddam's use of chemical weapons, Mr. Rumsfeld did not broach the subject. His handshake with Saddam, caught on film by Iraqi television, represented a triumph for diplomatic realism.

Iran and Iraq would fight for five more years, leaving hundreds of thousands dead on the battlefield. Then, two years after a ceasefire ended the war, Saddam invaded Kuwait. In subsequent years, he would subsidize waves of Palestinian suicide-bombers, effectively ending the Oslo peace process. Saddam's career is a model of realist blowback.

On Sept. 23, 2002, as Saddam defied international inspectors and U.N. sanctions crumbled under the greed of Paris, Moscow and Iraq's neighbors, Newsweek published a cover story, "How we Helped Create Saddam," that once again thrust the forgotten handshake into public consciousness. Across both the U.S. and Britain, the story provoked press outrage. NPR conducted interviews outlining how the Reagan administration allowed Saddam to acquire dual-use equipment. Mr. Rumsfeld "helped Iraq get chemical weapons," headlined London's Daily Mail. British columnist Robert Fisk concluded that the handshake was evidence of Mr. Rumsfeld's disdain for human rights, and Amy and David Goodman of "Democracy Now!" condemned Mr. Rumsfeld for enabling Saddam's "lethal shopping spree." While 20 years too late, progressives decried the cold, realist calculations that sent people across the third world to their graves in the cause of U.S. national interest.

What a difference a war makes. Today, progressives and liberals celebrate not only Mr. Rumsfeld's departure, but the resurrection of realists like Secretary of Defense-nominee Robert Gates and James Baker. Mr. Gates was the CIA's deputy director for intelligence at the time of Mr. Rumsfeld's infamous handshake, deputy director of Central Intelligence when Saddam gassed the Kurds, and deputy national security advisor when Saddam crushed the Shiite uprising. Mr. Baker was as central. He was White House chief of staff when Reagan dispatched Mr. Rumsfeld to Baghdad and, as secretary of state, ensured Saddam's grip on power after Iraqis heeded President George H.W. Bush's Feb. 15, 1991, call for "the Iraqi people [to] take matters into their own hands and force Saddam Hussein the dictator to step aside." In the months that followed, Saddam massacred tens of thousands of civilians.

While Mr. Rumsfeld worked to right past wrongs, Messrs. Gates and Baker winked at the Iraqi dictator's continuing grip on power. For progressives, this is irrelevant. Today, progressivism places personal vendetta above principle. Mr. Rumsfeld is bad, Mr. Baker is good, and consistency irrelevant. * * *

Progressive inconsistency will only increase with the unveiling of the Baker-Hamilton commission recommendations calling for reconciliation with both Syria and Iran. In effect, Mr. Baker's proposals are to have the White House replicate the Rumsfeld-Saddam handshake with both Syrian President Bashar Assad and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

The parallels are striking. First, just as Saddam denied Kuwait's right to exist, Mr. Assad refuses to recognize Lebanese independence (Damascus has no embassy in Beirut) and Mr. Ahmadinejad calls for Israel's eradication. Washington realpolitik enabled Saddam to act out his fantasies; evidence suggests both Mr. Assad and Mr. Ahmadinejad aspire to do likewise.

Second, just as the Reagan-era Rumsfeld turned a blind eye toward Iraqi chemical weapons, so too does Mr. Baker now counsel ignoring their embrace by the Syrian and Iranian leadership. Tehran used chemical munitions in its war against Iraq, and senior Iranian officials have also threatened first-strike use of nuclear weapons. Syria is just as dangerous: On April 20, 2004, Jordanian security intercepted Syrian-based terrorists planning to target Amman with 20 tons of chemical weapons. Mr. Assad has yet to explain the incident.

DOJ_NMG_0092567

And, third, there is the issue of detente enabling armament. Following his rapprochement with Washington, Saddam transformed investment into replenishment. The cost of ejecting Iraqi forces from Kuwait was far greater than any benefit borne of engagement.

Trade with Tehran has likewise backfired. Between 2000 and 2005, European Union trade with Iran almost tripled. During this same period, Iranian authorities used their hard currency windfall not to invest in schools and hospitals, but rather in uranium processing plants and anti-aircraft batteries. Mohammad Khatami, Mr. Ahmadinejad's predecessor and a man often labeled reformist by U.S. and European realists, showed the Islamic Republic's priorities when he spent two-thirds of his oil-boom windfall on the military. Said Mr. Khatami on April 18, 2002: "Today our army is one of the most powerful in the world. . . . It has become self-sufficient, and is on the road to further development." Subsequent discovery of Iran's covert nuclear facilities later that year clarified his boast. The Assad regime has shown its willingness to spend its discretionary income on a wide-range of weaponry and terror groups.

Realism promotes short-term gain, often at the expense of long-term security. With hindsight, it is clear that Mr. Rumsfeld's handshake with Saddam backfired. While it may have constrained Iran in the short-term, its blowback in terms of blood and treasure has been immense.

Why then do so many progressives then celebrate the return of realism? The reasons are multifold. First, having allowed personal animosities to dominate their ideology, they embrace change, regardless of how it impacts stated principles. Hatred of Mr. Rumsfeld became a principle in itself. Likewise, the same progressives who disparage John Bolton seldom explain why they feel forcing the U.N. to account for its inefficiencies or stick to its founding principles is bad. They complain not of his performance, but rather of his pedigree.

Second is a tendency to conflate analysis with advocacy. Progressives find themselves in a situation where they both embrace realism but deny reality. An Oct. 13 Chronicle of Higher Education article regarding a Columbia University professor's attacks on Azar Nafisi, author of "Reading Lolita in Tehran," highlighted the issue: "The conundrum, say these [Middle East studies] scholars, is how to voice opposition to the actions of the Islamic Republic without being co-opted by those who seek external regime change in Iran through a military attack." By embracing a canard, intellectuals convinced themselves of the nobility of ignoring evidence. Thus, Western feminists march alongside Islamists who seek their subjection while progressive labor activists join with Republican realists to ignore Tehran's attacks on bus drivers seeking an independent union, even as a Gdansk-type movement offers the best hope for peaceful change in Iran.

Both realism and progressivism have become misnomers. Realists deny reality, and embrace an ideology where talk is productive and governments are sincere. While 9/11 showed the consequences of chardonnay diplomacy, deal-cutting with dictators and a band-aid approach to national security, realists continue to discount the importance of adversaries' ideologies and the need for long-term strategies. And by embracing such realism, progressives sacrifice their core liberalism. Both may celebrate Mr. Rumsfeld's departure and the Baker-Hamilton recommendations, but at some point, it is fair to ask what are the lessons of history and what is the cost of abandoning principle.

Mr. Rubin, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, is editor of the Middle East Quarterly.

Places For Progress (TIME)

By Nathan Thornburgh

Time, November 13, 2006

Despite all the cordial luncheons and admissions that both sides love America, the President and the newly elected Democratic Congress aren't likely to find common ground on hot-button issues like stem-cell research and no-warrant wiretaps. Here's our pick of policies on which the two might actually do business:

Minimum Wage

The day after elections, the President's most prominent offer of cooperation came on this issue. Democrats have long made raising the federal minimum wage, which hasn't budged since 1997, a centerpiece of their platform. They want to boost it from $5.15 an hour to $7.25. The party's congressional members have pledged not to raise their own pay until the hike passes.

Education

DOJ_NMG_0092568

Democratic Senator Ted Kennedy is set to chair the Senate committee that oversees education. Although he has bitterly accused President Bush of underfunding the No Child Left Behind Act of 2002, Kennedy has said he still believes in its principle: using standards to lift every student's performance. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings told TIME last week that she and the Senator had made the act's reauthorization a joint priority even before the election. "Kennedy and I talked this summer about the need to get this done--win, lose or draw," she said.

Alternative Energy

The two parties have pledged to work together to develop alternative fuel sources. Look for more tax credits and subsidies to help companies develop green and renewable energy. The President, who said in his last State of the Union address that "America is addicted to oil," is scheduled to talk up hybrid and ethanol-powered flex-fuel cars this week. And his market-centric approach may find an ally in Michigan's John Dingell, the Democrat who will be in charge of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Unlike many of his party colleagues, Dingell, a friend of his state's auto industry, is against mandating higher fuel-efficiency standards for carmakers.

Immigration

Members of Bush's party spent much of this year deriding and stonewalling his compromise plan for reforming immigration policy, which called for enhanced border security along with a path to citizenship for certain working immigrants. A Democratic Congress is much more likely to craft a Bush-style solution. Bush and the Democrats may well start with modest reforms like the AgJobs bill, an attempt by Senators from both parties to normalize the immigrant farm-labor economy. It stalled in the House this year.

After The Triumph, The Tribulations (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty

Time, November 13, 2006

Herding cats. Pushing a string. Making yourself heard in a preschool where no one has had a nap. The analogies that have been used to describe what it's like to be in charge of Congress have always suggested that the titles Speaker of the House and Senate majority leader were someone's idea of a joke. But now that the high fives and jubilant photo ops are behind them, Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid have to run the place. Whether anything is actually accomplished on Capitol Hill over the next two years will depend largely on the skills these two leaders develop in maneuvering through the tricky challenges ahead.

Pelosi is known for her steel; no one crosses her without paying a price for it. And she will need every bit of that toughness to manage a caucus that promises to grow more fractious. Much has been made of the relatively conservative bent of the incoming freshman class of House Democrats, many of whom were recruited to run because they fit so well in districts that have been sending Republicans to Washington for years. Once they arrive, however, they will be working under a set of committee chairs who proudly and tenaciously represent the farthest-left edges of their party--and who have been chafing under the past dozen years of G.O.P. rule. Most of the rest of the Democratic caucus also tilts to the left and is just as anxious to reassert itself.

Filling the exceedingly sensitive post of House Intelligence Committee chairman will be a good test of how Pelosi works. Her fellow Californian Jane Harman, its ranking member, wants the job, but Pelosi doesn't particularly like Harman, so speculation is that Pelosi could go to the next in line, Florida's Alcee Hastings. That would please the black caucus, but there's no small political problem in the fact that in 1989 Hastings was impeached by the (Democratic) House and removed by the (Democratic) Senate from his federal judgeship for conspiring to take a $150,000 bribe (although he had been acquitted in court). Pelosi must also deal with a potentially bitter and ideological race for the majority leader's job, which is the No. 2 post in the Democratic leadership.

For all the internal intrigue, Pelosi's job at least gives her a tight command of the House floor and requires her to pull together only a simple majority to get things done. Reid must surely envy that. It takes the support of 60 Senators--enough to get past a filibuster--to get anything controversial passed in the Senate; he's nine short of that. And while the majority leader has power over the schedule, the Senate's arcane rules give any individual Senator the power to bollix up the works.

A person to watch will be incoming minority leader Mitch McConnell, one of the Senate's canniest operators. After wrangling with McConnell for years over campaign-finance reform, Senator John McCain declared, "There are few things more daunting in politics than the determined opposition of Senator McConnell." President Bush does not want to spend his last two years in office vetoing one Democratic measure after another. So McConnell will play a position much like the goalie in a hoc key game, blocking legislation from ever reaching Bush's desk.

DOJ_NMG_0092569

And finally there is the reality that the 2008 presidential campaign will be under way, and Reid oversees a chamber that is brimming with potential contenders of both parties. Primary politics in both parties rewards grandstanding and ideological pu rity, not compromise and teamwork. That's hardly a formula for compromise-- or for getting much of anything done.

Post-Thumpin' Politics (USNEWS)

By Michael Barone

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

The "thumpin'" that the Republican Party received last week will make profound changes in policymaking in Washington and in presidential politics. On the policy side, we have already seen something in the nature of parliamentary g overnment: Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld lacked the confidence of the new congressional majority and promptly resigned. George W. Bush and the Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi both expressed a hitherto indiscernible desire to work together, either out of con viction or out of calculation that it was in their interest to do so.

Democrats, having won a small majority in the House and a paper-thin one in the Senate, now visibly share the responsibility for governance, and we can expect for a time less of the scathing rhetoric they routinely deployed. Bush clearly hopes to yoke the Democrats in support of a common changed approach to Iraq. On domestic policy, there will be constant negotiations between congressional leaders and Office of Management and Budget Direc tor Rob Portman, complete with veto threats-much like those between Bill Clinton and Newt Gingrich. One can foresee areas of agreement. Bush will concede a fig-leaved minimum wage. On immigration, House Democrats and a solid Senate majority favor the Bush approach blocked by House Republicans. Advancing alternative fuels is another possibility. Some Democrats want tax-free savings vehicles for lower-paid workers; that sounds a lot like the individual investment accounts Bush proposed for Social Security. On some issues there will be no agreement-tax reform, probably. But big issues have been addressed in the past by divided governments.

In the process, Bush is decoupling himself from the Republican Party. House Republicans, with little chance to affect outcomes, will be mostly ignored as House Democrats were under Clinton. Senate Republicans, with the leverage of filibuster threats, will be brought into the loop. But congressional Republicans will be on their own in setting a course for 2008.

Narrow margins. As for presidential politics, we are still in an era of roughly even division between the parties. In the five House elections from 1996 to 2004, both parties received between 46 and 51 percent of the popular vote; final 2006 results ar e not in, but if they're outside this narrow range, it won't be by much. Bill Clinton tried to create a natural majority for his party but fell short. George W. Bush attempted the same for his party but has also missed the mark. The 2002 and '04 Republican majorities were too small to withstand the winds of 2006.

For a dozen years, our politics has been bitterly polarized, dominated by two baby boomer presidents who happen to have personal characteristics that people on the other side of the cultural divide absolutely loathe. Clinton in 1992 and Bush in 2000 both made genuine efforts to run as unifiers, but once in office proved to be dividers. The 2008 cycle will bring a different cast of characters. The leaders in the polls-Rudolph Giuliani, John McCain, and Hillary Rodham Clinton-all are, to varying degrees, in tension with their parties' bases. That suggests that they have the capacity, to varying degrees, to appeal across the cultur al divide and pull their parties above the 51 percent ceilings they've been under for the past 10 years. Other potential candidates—Republican Mitt Romney and Democrat Barack Obama—may have similar potential. The culturally conservative Republican base and the vitriolically anti-war Democratic base don't seem to have strong candidates, unless you count Al Gore and John Edwards.

For the next two years, political governance and presidential politics seem likely to proceed on two separate tracks, with little relation between them. House and Senate Democratic leaders may want to avoid confrontation on issues that will put their presidential candidates on the defensive. Bush seems less likely to worry about the effect of his decisions on possible Republican nominees. That leaves the initiative on setting a post-Bush agenda to the presidential candidates of both parties. They start off closely matched. Pollster Scott Rasmussen, whose final Senate numbers were spot on, shows Hillary Clinton trailing John McCain 48 to 43 percent and tied 46 to 46 percent with Rudolph Giuliani. Democrats may have thumped Republicans last week, but the political future is very much up for grabs.

DOJ_NMG_0092570

Health's Ailment (USNEWS)

By Josh Fischman

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

Last Wednesday morning, the clouds scudding over Lake Monona in Madison, Wis., did little to obscure Tammy Baldwin's bright view of the future. "I think we have the chance to make some real changes to healthcare," said the Democratic representative, who had celebrated her return to the U.S. House for a fifth term the night before on a terrace by the lake. The liberal Baldwin is cosponsor of a bill, with conservative Republican Tom Price of Georgia, to allow states to experiment with different ways to expand coverage and access. Not only does the bill enjoy broad bipartisan support, "but with the Democratic takeover of the House, we can move on the bigger issues. Democrats recognize healthcare is an immediate crisis," Baldwin says.

Indeed, crisis is a word being used more and more often to describe the U.S. healthcare system. Medicare is going to cost a staggering $30 trillion over the next 75 years, "and no one has any idea how we are going to pay for this," says Robert Moffit, head of health policy studies for the conservative Heritage Foundation. Plus we're not getting enough for the money: A 2003 study in the New England Journal of Medicine showed that only about half of all adults get the medical care recommended in established guidelines. And no one is doing anything about the more than 46 million Americans who are uninsured. "Congress has, in many ways, been asleep at the wheel," says Jeanne Lambrew, a health-policy expert at George Washington University.

Lawmakers are unlikely to wake up and enact major overhauls during the next two years, despite Baldwin's optimism. Big fixes will remain stuck in ideological gridlock, though small changes-such as allowing Americans to buy drugs from abroad or expanding state insurance coverage for low-income children-are possible, say a broad spectrum of policy analysts and congressional strategists. But larger reforms, such as incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's proposal to let Medicare negotiate prices directly with drug companies, are likely to hit a wall in the Senate, where Republicans are still strong enough to hold up legislation and have genuine antipathy to expanding government programs. "Changing the drug benefit is not going to happen," says a high-ranking Senate aide.

The problem is that there are deep, genuine divisions in how to fix healthcare. It's not just playing politics, says Price, an orthopedic surgeon who just won his second term: "Representative Pelosi and Tammy Baldwin may believe that a single-payer system is the answer. I think it would be a complete disaster for medicine." Letting Medicare negotiate drug prices, many conservative analysts think, would simply reduce the supply—"That's what price controls do," says Moffit—not contain costs. Baldwin, on the other hand, points to countries like Canada "that buy in bulk for lower prices and don't have shortfalls."

States' rights. The beauty of the bill that she and Price put together, Baldwin adds, is that it gets away from theoretical debates: "We give states the ability to experiment with different systems. We'll actually get to see what works and what doesn't." States would propose plans for children's health insurance, elder care, or drug subsidies to a bipartisan congressional commission. It would pick a slate of proposals, and Congress would vote yes or no on the slate. States would then get money to try these things out for five years. A similar bill in the Senate, cosponsored by Ohio Republican George Voinovich and New Mexico Democrat Jeff Bingaman, is also on the table. "This is the first thing we're going to act on," says Voinovich spokesman Chris Paulitz. "We think it's important, and we think we can get it passed."

States, in fact, are becoming laboratories for health reform, says Mark McClellan, former head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. "Massachusetts passed a way to expand insurance, and other states, like New Mexico, are considering it, too. I think states are where the action is now, and their experiments may eventually start some national movements."

Federally, there are some other opportunities for action come January. Funding for the State Children's Health Insurance Program has to be renewed, and that gives Congress the chance to broaden eligibility or shift funds for more preventive care. Drug reimportation is already beginning to garner bipartisan support. But anything more extensive, even if it moves through Congress, "is probably going to run into President Bush's veto pen," says Henry Aaron, a health policy analyst at the Brookings Institution. "And that pen may get quite a workout."

DOJ_NMG_0092571

My Mother, My President (TIME)

By Alexandra Pelosi

Time, November 13, 2006

Alexandra Pelosi is uniquely positioned to judge how the President and the future Democratic House Speaker will get along. At 36, she is the youngest of Nancy Pelosi's five children, and her famous HBO documentary, Journeys with George, was a backstage "video diary" of George W. Bush's 2000 campaign. She was the first to introduce the two. Her inside take on their relationship:

Back on the campaign plane when George W. Bush was a Governor running for President in 2000, he used to pass me notes to read to the Congresswoman from San Francisco. When a newspaper article touted her prowess at raising funds, he tore it out and wrote on it, "Ask her: Can I have some?" Or when a magazine ran its guesses for his vice-presidential short list, he wrote in "Pelosi," along with, "Can you get her to run with me?"

When my parents came to have lunch with me at an Oakland airport hotel where Bush was giving a speech in March 2000, he did what he did when any member of the traveling press corps was in his or her hometown: he summoned us to his room so he could meet the parents. As he talked about the rigors of life on the trail, my mother politely explained how she was working her heart out to help Al Gore win the state of California.

The next time I saw them together, George was in the White House, and he told me, "You ought to be proud of your mom." At the time she was fighting her heart out on the House floor against the Iraq war. On any occasion that I have seen them together in private, they have appeared to be the best of "frenemies"--campaign-trail speak for politicians who keep their friends close and their enemies closer.

They actually have a lot in common. His father was President, and her father served in Congress and then as mayor of Baltimore. They both came to politics later in life, and they both mean it when they say that elections are not everything; if they lose, life will go on. Bush has the ranch, and my mother has her grandkids. And, of course, some people have made the mistake of underestimating both of them.

During the 2000 campaign, George used to respond to the jabs from late-night comedians by saying, "Let them laugh at me. I am going to be their President." On the trail in 2006, as the doubters were calling the Democrats a permanent minority, my mother repeated her mantra: We have better candidates. When anyone used the tired phrase, "Where are the Democrats?", she explained that everything was going exactly as planned; she was like a submarine on a stealth mission to take back the House.

On the day the President first criticized her at a fund raiser, she knew that he had given her a gift. When the President of the United States mocks you, it puts you on the map. And when he mocks you publicly, the money rolls in. Sure, they have their ideological differences. By now you have heard everything they have said about each other. But plenty of presidential candidates have said worse things about their opponents before they have chosen them as their running mate or their designated successor (witness John McCain).

While reporters like to stir the pot and focus on the catfights, they don't seem to grasp that these are two seasoned professionals working at the highest level of American government with skin so much thicker than the rest of us. As Bush noted in his press conference on the day after the election, "This isn't my first rodeo." Or as my mother has always told me, "This business comes with a free head clipping. Every time you stick your neck out, they come around and cut it off."

George W. Bush and Nancy Pelosi both know that if you want to breathe the rarefied air at the highest echelons of the U.S. government, you have to ignore the media buzzards. When I was watching Fox News recently, and she walked into the room, I had to explain that Sean Hannity was spending the month leading up to the election warning America that Speaker Pelosi would destroy this nation. She asked, "Which one is Hannity?"

So as all of us spectators sit home on our couches watching the bloviators pontificate about the state of American politics, rest assured that George Bush and Nancy Pelosi are so busy that they do not hear a word of it. And if they did, they couldn't care less. They have a country to run.

Lame-duck Congress Takes Roost (LAT)

By Richard Simon, Joel Havemann

DOJ_NMG_0092572

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — The ousted Republican-led Congress returns to the Capitol this week to try one last time to shorten a long legislative to-do list, while the just-elected members will vote for new leaders in races that could signal the direction the parties will take next year.

The lame-duck session mixes a dispirited Republican Party and a Democratic Party that knows it will soon have the upper hand in both houses -- a potentially combustible cocktail.

At minimum, Congress must pass a temporary spending bill to keep the government running until the next Congress takes office. Getting much else accomplished could be difficult.

"Democrats won't allow anything to pass they don't like, and Republicans have little interest in starting the Democratic reign early," said Thomas Mann, a congressional scholar at the Brookings Institution. "It could be a very short lame-duck session."

As the old Congress wraps up, the freshman lawmakers will arrive. They won't be sworn in until January, but they will meet with President Bush, pick up congressional IDs and learn everything from the proper attire for the House and Senate chambers to the location of the members-only gym. And they will have a say in choosing leaders.

Two House races -- one Democratic and one Republican -- could reveal how the parties will position themselves in the next session.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., is poised to become the first female speaker of the House. The choice for House majority leader, the No. 2 slot, is between a moderate and a leading anti-war Democrat.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the current minority whip, faces Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, whose call for U.S. withdrawal from Iraq made him a favorite of party liberals.

Hoyer's supporters, including some of the new centrist Democrats, point to his tireless campaign to elect them. He visited 80 districts and raised more than $8 million. Murtha's backers say the former Marine's stance on the war was a significant factor in the Democratic victory.

Pelosi watchers are anxious to see how she finesses this one. Hoyer, although a committed Democratic soldier, fought Pelosi for the minority whip job in 2001, a race that left both bruised. Murtha has long been a Pelosi ally.

On the other side, three Republicans are battling to become their party's leader in the House, since the current House speaker, Rep. J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, has said he will not seek a leadership position.

House Republicans will choose between a veteran leader, whom some may want to blame for the party's loss of the majority, and two conservative challengers. Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the current majority leader, is facing Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana and Rep. Joe Barton of Texas.

The first order of business for the lame-duck Congress is to ensure that the government has money to run. Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the Senate Democratic leader, has advised current Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., who did not seek re-election, that Democrats would work with Republicans to clear spending bills for fiscal year 2007, which began Oct. 1, if they included "reasonable funding levels."

If Congress cannot finish the individual spending bills, lawmakers are likely to approve a "continuing resolution" that would keep the government operating at 2006 levels until the new Congress begins.

The session could extend some popular tax breaks that have expired or are due to expire, approve a U.S.-Vietnam trade pact in advance of Bush's visit to Hanoi on Friday, allow new offshore oil drilling and pass a nuclear deal with India, a Bush-administration priority.

Senate Republican leaders hope to win quick confirmation of Bush's nomination of former CIA chief Robert M. Gates to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as Defense secretary.

The White House wants the Senate to confirm the nomination of John R. Bolton as United Nations ambassador -- his current recess appointment expires when this Congress adjourns -- but he faces Democratic opposition, and last week a key Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, said he would not support him.

Another Bush priority also hangs in the balance: legislation that would rewrite domestic wiretap laws to give investigators the power to monitor e-mail and phone communications between suspected terrorists overseas and people in the United States without having to obtain court approval in advance. The House passed such a bill before the election, but the Senate recessed without taking action.

DOJ_NMG_0092573

"We hope that the Democrats would see the utility in having this critical tool in the war on terror," White House counselor Dan Bartlett told "Fox News Sunday." Reid told CBS's "Face the Nation" that "we'll be happy to take a look at it" but would not say whether action would be taken.

For Republicans, the session could offer the last chance to insert pet projects, or earmarks, into bills. "There may be a little bit of, `Oh my gosh, if I don't get it done in the lame-duck now, since I'm still in the majority, it will never get done,'" said William Hoagland, Frist's top budget aide.

A leading proponent of earmark reform, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., told NBC's "Meet the Press" that "elimination of earmarking" should be a high priority. "The system of earmarking is corrupting," he said.

Also this week, Sens. Russell D. Feingold, D-Wis., and Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., are expected to introduce a bill to rescind an Oct. 1, 2007, termination date for a special inspector general's office that monitors U.S. expenditures on Iraq reconstruction. "This is a proposal that enjoys broad bipartisan support," said Jim Manley, a Reid spokesman.

The inspector general has produced a series of reports highlighting waste and fraud in the Iraq rebuilding effort. Language that would shutter the investigative office was quietly included in a military authorization bill, in an apparent effort to prevent further embarrassment for the Pentagon and the administration.

Both parties still hope to hold a separate vote on a bill to extend the research-and-development tax credit, a college-tuition tax break and more than 40 other expiring provisions.

For Post-Election Congress, Extensive To-Do List Is Awaiting Action (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 12 — The Democrats won the midterm elections, but time has not run out on the Republican majority in Congress.

Despite devastating losses at the polls, Republicans will control the post-election session that opens Monday as lawmakers return to try to finish 10 overdue spending bills and other legislation that stalled because of pre-election gamesmanship.

Republican leaders have compiled an ambitious to-do list, hoping to dispose of energy legislation, a trade deal or two, a civilian nuclear treaty with India and other favored bills before turning over the keys to the House and Senate chambers to the Democrats in January.

Democrats have some measures they want completed as well, most notably the spending bills, to save them the added work next year.

President Bush, hoping to get the most out of the remaining days of a Republican majority, is pressing two contentious matters: legislation authorizing domestic wiretapping by the National Security Agency and the nomination of John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations. And the Senate has scheduled confirmation hearings for Robert M. Gates to be the new secretary of defense to begin the week of Dec 4.

Members of both parties in Congress have all but written off the wiretapping legislation and the Bolton nomination, given the strong Democratic opposition and the impending power shift. It is also uncertain how hard Congressional Republicans will be willing to press Mr. Bush's more divisive issues. Some have expressed anger at his decision to remove Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld the day after the election, contending that earlier action might have cut Republican losses.

"The only things that can get done in the lame duck are things that have the consent of both sides," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York. "You can bluster around all you want, but it is not going to happen. Anything controversial just by definition won't get done."

The White House still intends to seek approval of Mr. Bolton and the eavesdropping program, said Mr. Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow, but it is not doing so to be "provocative" in the wake of the election.

DOJ_NMG_0092574

"Those are goals: an effective U.N. ambassador, also an effective way of going after terrorists," Mr. Snow said. "Those are both constructive and important goals, and we'll see how the lame duck works through it."

Besides tackling a legislative workload that may take Congress well into December, the parties will elect new leadership for the 110th Congress. House Democrats and Republicans will decide contested races for top positions.

Though they will not be sworn in until January, members elected last week will be on hand for the leadership battles and for freshman orientation, creating the potentially awkward situation of bumping into the lawmakers they defeated. It looms as a difficult period for the 6 Republican senators and more than 20 House members who will be casting their final votes in the last gasps of the 109th Congress.

"We lost some good friends on our side, and we are going to miss those folks," said Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, who is expected to be elected the new Republican leader this week. "It will be sad."

Mr. McConnell said he thought that Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada and the incoming majority leader, laid out a reasonable agenda last week in a letter to Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader who is winding up his Senate career.

Mr. Reid urged Republicans to focus on the unfinished spending bills; a nuclear agreement with India; an offshore oil drilling bill; legislation to prepare for a potential flu pandemic and a biological attack; and a package of popular tax breaks.

"I think it is a good list, and if we can accomplish those things that would be a very productive lame duck," Mr. McConnell said, "and I like his attitude about it."

But the legislative agenda could shift quickly when lawmakers arrive with their own ideas of what should be on the table.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, elected as an independent, said Sunday on "Meet the Press" on NBC that he wanted Congress to take up the lobbying and ethics changes that died before the election. Some Democrats want to push changes in Iraq policy, and Republicans also expect Democrats to try to make early moves on domestic elements of their agenda.

In the first test of the bipartisan spirit that followed the elections, the House on Monday is set to approve a trade deal with Vietnam that Mr. Bush would like to have in his pocket as he travels to Hanoi this week for a regional trade meeting. But senators in both parties have raised objections to the deal that the administration is trying to resolve, and the fate of the trade pact is uncertain.

Washington Lame Ducks Have Heavy Agenda Bush, GOP Congress Take Last Try At Goals (AJC)

By Scott Shepard, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 13, 2006

Washington — The Republican-led Congress, which will yield to a new Democratic majority in January, reconvenes today for a lame-duck session with a long to-do list, including overdue spending bills and the election of new leaders.

But while President Bush hopes to push through some final measures and appointments before his GOP majority disappears, congressional Republicans may not be in much of a mood to legislate after the "thumping" they took in last week's elections.

The president's top priorities are legalizing his warrantless surveillance program, extending his tax cuts, Senate confirmation of John Bolton as United Nations ambassador and, the least controversial item, Senate approval of Robert Gates to succeed departing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

With so much to do, the postelection session could last until shortly before Christmas.

The session will be complicated by the fact that it will include House and Senate members who were defeated in last week's elections, which resulted in complete Democratic control of Congress for the first time since 1994.

"I don't think they're going to be in much of a mood to legislate," said Norm Ornstein, co-author of a new book, "Broken Branch," which describes the current Congress as a dysfunctional, deeply divided institution. "Don't be surprised if they pass a continuing resolution [to temporarily keep government programs funded at their current levels] and get the hell out of town."

Budget battle

DOJ_NMG_0092575

That may be too much to expect from a Congress that has operated for more than a decade in an atmosphere of strong partisanship — and has yet to pass a budget for much of the federal government.

The fiscal year began Oct. 1, but Congress has passed only two of the 11 annual spending bills for the government, for defense and homeland security.

A "continuing resolution" for the other nine appropriations bills expires at the end of the week. One option is another stopgap measure to continue the current levels into January, when Democrats will take over. The president, however, has urged Republicans to complete work on the spending bills to prevent the Democrats from changing his spending priorities for various agencies before the next budget cycle in 2007.

Wiretap stalemate

Bush also wants Congress to pass legislation legalizing the program he secretly initiated through the National Security Agency after the terrorist attacks of 2001 to eavesdrop on terrorist suspects in the United States without a warrant.

Democrats have argued that the program, as currently constituted, violates existing laws. "It needs to be done lawfully and with adequate checks and balances," said Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), who will take over as Senate Judiciary Committee chairman in January.

Even so, the administration plans to continue making its case that the program is a vital tool to fight terrorism. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is set to argue the case next weekend in a speech at the U.S. Air Force Academy.

Bolton bash

Democrats have blocked Senate confirmation of John Bolton to be U.N. ambassador since he was nominated by Bush in March 2005, arguing he is ill-suited for such a diplomatic role. Bolton is serving on a temporary basis because Bush sidestepped the confirmation process by nominating him during a congressional recess.

Bush wants Bolton confirmed by the Senate before the Democratic takeover, and on Sunday, White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten argued on ABC's "This Week" program that Bolton "has been a good ambassador" and "deserves confirmation."

Sen. Joe Biden (D-Del.), who will take over the Foreign Affairs Committee chairmanship in January, countered that if the president truly intends to be more cooperative with the new Congress, he should nominate someone else for the U.N. post. Bolton "doesn't even have the votes of a Republican-controlled committee" in the lame-duck Congress, Biden said, citing the opposition of Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), who was defeated Tuesday, to the nomination.

Rumsfeld replacement

Replacing Rumsfeld may be one area where Republicans and Democrats can agree before the end of the year. The Senate Armed Services Committee is scheduled the week of Dec. 4 to begin hearings on the confirmation of former CIA director Robert Gates. And Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), who will replace Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) as the committee chairman in January, said he will work with Warner "to see if [Gates' confirmation] can be achieved."

In his weekend radio address, Bush said Gates is an "agent of change" and "will provide a fresh outlook on our strategy in Iraq." Gates has been a member of the Iraq Study Group, which is looking at alternative approaches to the increasingly unpopular war.

House leadership

With House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California in line to become speaker of the House in January, the race to fill the post of House majority leader under the Democrats pits the current No. 2 Democrat, Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, against Rep. Robert Murtha of Pennsylvania. Hoyer claims most Democratic incumbents support his bid, but Murtha, who led the Democratic charge against the administration's war policies, says he is "working diligently" to win the post.

The job of House Majority Whip is expected to go to Rep. Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.), only the second African-American in U.S. history to rise to such a height in the Congress. Former Rep. William Gray (D-Pa.) served as majority whip in the early 1990s.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the architect of the Democratic takeover of the House, will take the No. 4 spot in the leadership, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

On the GOP side, House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has announced he won't remain in the GOP leadership. That sets up a race for House minority leader between the current No. 2 Republican, Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, against Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee. Pence argues that Republicans lost the Congress because "we lost our way." Similarly, Boehner contends that "the Democrats didn't win the election, we lost it." Both have promised to lead a return to the principles of limited government.

DOJ_NMG_0092576

Georgia Republican Rep. Jack Kingston of Savannah is seeking the chairmanship of the House Republican Conference, which develops the party's national congressional strategy. The position currently is held by Rep. Deborah Pryce of Ohio, who is still awaiting the results of her re-election bid.

The Democratic House leadership elections are scheduled on Thursday, the Republicans' on Friday.

Senate leadership

Democrats will select Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada to be the Senate majority leader in the new Congress on Tuesday. Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) is expected to remain in the No. 2 spot as whip. Sen. Byron Dorgan of North Dakota will remain chairman of the Democratic Policy Committee and Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, the top strategist in the Democrats' Senate takeover, will serve another term as chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Senate Republicans will pick their leaders Wednesday, and Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) is unopposed to become the GOP leader, succeeding Bill Frist of Tennessee, who is retiring. Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) says he has enough commitments to win election as Senate minority whip, the No. 2 post. But Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi, who lost the GOP leadership post to Frist, has been calling colleagues to assess support for a comeback.

Setting Aside Differences (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck, David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress returns today for a lame-duck session that may also test the wings of the Democratic majority taking over in January.

Republican leaders, still in power, faced a mountain of work unfinished when members left town to campaign. Amid postelection promises of bipartisanship, the coming weeks are an opportunity for the parties to show a willingness to put aside past power struggles and work together.

House and Senate leadership elections this week could yet be influenced by this same pressure, and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) surprised many last night by publicly endorsing Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) to take her place when she moves up to be the new speaker next year. A Marine veteran of Vietnam, Mr. Murtha has been an outspoken critic of President Bush's Iraq strategy. But the 74-year old lawmaker was a strong ally of the president's father during the first Gulf War, and as someone with a long history of trading votes with Republicans on the House floor, Mr. Murtha could be an asset to an otherwise largely liberal leadership team.

The president, after the setbacks in last week's elections, has his own stake in making progress during the session. This evening, the House will take up a Vietnam trade bill that Mr. Bush hopes to take to Hanoi when he leaves tomorrow for a summit of Asia-Pacific rim leaders. He also wants Congress to return after Thanksgiving to complete confirmation of Robert Gates, his nominee for defense secretary, whose hearings before the Senate Armed Services Committee begin the first week of December.

Mr. Gates's nomination to succeed departing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has been generally well received, but bipartisanship will have its limits in the White House effort to win Senate approval for John Bolton to continue as ambassador to the United Nations. He has served in a recess appointment that expires when Congress adjourns, no later than January, and a fight is brewing over whether to keep or replace him.

The added time needed to deal with these issues opens the possibility Congress may reach a compromise on major unfinished appropriations bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. There is a $5.5 billion gap between the Senate and House bills, but resolving the issue is a shared goal for the administration and Democrats, who would like to clear the decks before taking over next year.

Toward this end, the House will vote to extend to Dec. 8 a stopgap funding resolution that has kept the government operating since last month. The Senate is prepared to act quickly, too, and start talks on a bill funding veterans' medical care as well as housing and health-care for military families.

DOJ_NMG_0092577

Lawmakers also will test the waters on several stalled business-backed items that have bipartisan support. The House just Friday added to its schedule tonight a vote on a Senate-passed bill backed by biomedical companies and university researchers that would make it easier to prosecute animal-rights activists whose protests lead to property damage and personal injury.

Separately, biotechnology and venture-capital firms have hopes for authorization of a $1 billion fund to encourage the development of new vaccines and treatments for illnesses such as anthrax and smallpox. Republican and Democratic Senate aides met last week to hammer out differences on the bioterrorism bill, backed by Sens. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) and Richard Burr (R., N.C.). The proposal, a version of which already passed the House, stalled amid objections from some Democrats, but now it has been added to Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid's list of priorities for the lame-duck session.

On the tax side, high-tech companies and major manufacturers such as Boeing Co. are pressing for renewal of a research-and-development tax credit that was set aside in the Republicans' pre-election drive to cut federal estate taxes. The R&D tax credit, which would be increased and extended through 2007, is part of a larger $39 billion package of popular tax breaks, such as college-tuition deductions. And the Internal Revenue Service, preparing its 2006 tax forms, needs answers soon on whether they will be extended.

Eric Ueland, a top aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) said he "wouldn't rule out" the possibility that some members will want to try again to pass a permanent cut in the estate tax, slated to jump back up after 2010. The potential is there for a bipartisan compromise, albeit with a smaller reduction than what Republicans have offered thus far. But the estate tax is still such a sensitive issue for liberal Democrats that it would be very difficult in the time remaining to strike a deal.

Mr. Ueland said staying into December could revive hopes of completing Senate action on a nuclear-power pact with India. But just to get the Vietnam trade bill through the Senate before the president leaves for Asia tomorrow will require Mr. Reid of Nevada to corral his Democratic members. Other matters are so contentious that the soon-to-be-majority will simply use Senate procedures to block consideration until it is in power in January.

For example, President Bush reiterated last week that he wants Congress to give him the authority to conduct warrantless wiretapping of terrorism suspects. But Democrats have lodged strong objections to the proposal.

The stiffest fight may center on the Bolton U.N. nomination if Mr. Bush presses it. Democrats say Mr. Bush should alter course and nominate someone less hard-charging and with greater finesse in handling sensitive diplomatic matters. Making the rounds of Sunday talk shows, White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, however, showed no sign of backing down.

"He has done a terrific job there," Mr. Bolten said on CNN's "Late Edition." "He has helped lead the U.N. Security Council to good resolutions on Lebanon, on North Korea, a variety of other issues. So he has actually been a very effective U.N. ambassador and I think the country is well-served to have him where he is."

Some on Capitol Hill, though, appear unpersuaded. Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R., R.I.), whose vote would most likely be needed to move the nomination out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, last week told reporters in his state that he wouldn't support Mr. Bolton in the lame-duck session. Sen. Joseph Biden (D., Del.) who is expected to head the committee in the new Congress yesterday called for the White House to withdraw the nomination.

"There's a lot of competent people," Mr. Biden said on ABC's "This Week." "Send someone new up, Mr. President...He's going to lose."

To be sure, the House is an easier place for the Republican leadership to score political points on the way out the door. Speaker Dennis Hastert's office suggested that looking ahead to 2008, Republicans may decide they would benefit from another round of voting on warrantless wiretapping or making Mr. Bush's tax cuts permanent.

But if the new Congress is as open as Democrats promise, partisan political points may be less important than being able to build effective bipartisan coalitions.

In their own leadership races this week, the greatest focus among House Republicans appears to be in the race for the whip post now held by Rep. Roy Blunt. The Missouri Republican, who flirted with stepping down at one point, faces a conservative challenge from Rep. John Shadegg (R., Ariz.), and if Mr. Blunt falters in his race, his deputy, Rep. Eric Cantor (R., Va.), could yet emerge as a younger alternative able to reach out to Democrats.

Ms. Pelosi's public endorsement raises the stakes in what many in Washington had dismissed as an improbable race by Mr. Murtha against Rep. Steny Hoyer (D., Md.), the current Democratic whip and a more seasoned member of the leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0092578

Her letter shows her loyalty to a man who has backed her rise in the leadership -- and against Mr. Hoyer. "I respect her decision as the two are very close," Mr. Hoyer said, still confident he will win.

But the release of the letter will also influence freshmen Democrats coming to Washington this week for the caucus elections. Friday, Mr. Hoyer claimed support from 21 freshmen, and by countering with Ms. Pelosi's endorsement, the Murtha camp chose to play its ace in hopes of reversing this tide. It could be a costly move for Ms. Pelosi, but it also suggests the race could be a lot closer than Mr. Hoyer's camp has said.

GOP Pressed On Offshore Drilling Limits (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP, November 12, 2006

The Democrats' return to power is increasing pressure on House Republican leaders to accept a limited expansion of offshore oil and gas drilling.

Supporters of such exploration say the next Congress, with Democrats in control come January, probably will not tamper with the long-standing drilling bans that have protected most coastal waters for a quarter-century.

A stubborn standoff has festered for months between the House and Senate over developing more of the oil and gas resources in the Outer Continental Shelf. The dispute is expected to be an issue in the final days of the Republican-run Congress this week when lawmakers meet in a lame-duck session.

The proposal is of great importance to Louisiana and three other Gulf Coast states. They stand to reap hundreds of millions of dollars under changes to the way the government shares royalties from oil and gas taken from the Gulf of Mexico.

House Republicans pushed through a bill that would open coastal waters for drilling everywhere unless a state objects. That essentially would end a ban on such drilling that Congress has imposed annually for the past 25 years in most areas outside the western Gulf.

Even drilling supporters said there was no chance that measure can pass the Senate, which has approved a compromise: opening 8.3 million acres in the east-central Gulf, no closer than 125 miles of land, and leaving other areas alone.

House Republicans, however, have refused to consider the Senate version — until now, after last week's election that drove the GOP from power. Among the incumbents who lost was one of the leading cheerleaders for the broader House bill, Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif. He is chairman of the House Resources Committee, which developed the measure.

House leaders have not said whether offshore drilling will come up this week, but pressure to do so has mounted.

President Bush said he wants the issue on the agenda. Senate GOP and Democratic leaders want the House to pass their bill and send it to the White House. A broad coalition of industries that depend heavily on natural gas has urged approval now of the Senate's plan.

The Senate bill would begin sale of leases in the 8.3 million acre area within a year. Actual production probably would not start for several years after that.

"This is not a choice between two bills ... but between getting something done or doing nothing at all. The time has run out on compromise," said the Consumer Alliance for Energy Security, an industry group that includes energy and timber companies, chemical makers and manufacturers.

"We're sending a message as strong as we can. We're pushing them very hard to get it done," said Jack Gerard, president of the American Chemistry Council. He says more domestic production is needed to drive down natural gas prices.

The legislation dramatically would shift how the government shares royalty from offshore oil and gas production. Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Texas would get a substantial windfall.

The House bill eventually would give as much as three-fourths of royalties collected by the government to any state that allows offshore drilling.

The Senate bill would increase royalties for Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Texas from less than 2 percent to 37.5 percent. In 2017, this royalty share would apply to all oil and as produced in the Gulf, not just from the 8.3 million acres newly opened.

DOJ_NMG_0092579

Louisiana expects eventually to get an annual flow of more than $650 million a year, compared with about $32 million now from production in state-controlled waters, according to the state's congressional delegation.

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., says the additional money is needed to restore the Gulf Coast. Its barrier islands, wetlands and levees were ravaged by storms, including Hurricane Katrina.

"This is to provide a reliable stream of revenue so that the Gulf Coast states can secure an independent source of revenue to build these levees and restore this coastline," she said in an interview.

She fear that if the measure is not passed now, its chance of becoming law is slim.

Aside from Landrieu, few Democrats have shown much interest in broadening offshore oil production. Even limited expansion in the east-central Gulf worries many lawmakers; they see it as a step toward lifting the long-standing drilling ban in East and West Coast waters and off Florida's Gulf Coast.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., in line to be House speaker next year, strongly opposes lifting the drilling bans. She also has expressed concern about the revenue sharing provisions, although she has given guarded support to the Senate bill.

Other lawmakers, including Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., who will head the Energy and Natural Resources Committee next year, oppose the royalty changes. They say money collected from oil and gas taken from federal waters should stay in Washington.

Don't Force An Energy Bill (NYT)

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

President Bush's call for the lame duck Congress to pass pending "bipartisan energy legislation" before it leaves Washington forever is a very good example of why the House and Senate should limit their work in this final session to as few measures as possible. Congress needs to pass the budgets it failed to get done before the elections. And since no time should be lost in the Bush reassessment of Iraq, the Senate should consider the nomination of Robert Gates to be defense secretary.

And that should be the extent of the agenda.

The energy bill Mr. Bush apparently had in mind is in fact two bills, one in the Senate and another in the House. Both would authorize increased offshore drilling for oil and natural gas. But there are huge differences between them.

The Senate bill, co-sponsored by Mary Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, is a narrowly drawn measure that would open a section of the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas exploration and use part of the royalties to help rebuild Louisiana's battered wetlands and barrier islands. This page, setting aside earlier misgivings, has supported her bill because of its limited scope and its demonstrably worthy environmental objectives.

The House bill, by contrast, is a broad, mischievous and badly conceived piece of work sponsored by Richard Pombo, Republican of California, that, in a stroke, would lift a long-standing federal moratorium on oil and gas drilling along the entire American coastline. The bill has been vigorously opposed by most state governors from Maine to California.

There has always been a danger that the two bills would go to a conference committee where — the Senate's assurances notwithstanding — the usual horse-trading would produce a bad bill much along the lines of the House measure. That danger may now be greater. Mr. Pombo's defeat in last Tuesday's election raises the distinct possibility that he will make one last desperate effort to help his friends in the oil and gas industry before he retires into well-earned political obscurity.

The terrain during a lame duck session is notoriously treacherous. Our suggestion, therefore, is that Congress take a deep breath and postpone any energy legislation until next year. At that point, Ms. Landrieu, whose party will be in charge, can try again. Alternatively, she could work with other leaders to produce a true energy bill — a comprehensive measure that would also seek to reduce consumption by encouraging more efficient cars and alternative fuels. As Ms. Landrieu concedes, drilling is only part of the energy equation. That is especially true for a country that uses one-quarter of the world's oil while holding less than 3 percent of its reserves.

Several such bills have already been introduced in the Senate, with considerable bipartisan support. This is where Congress — and, one hopes, a newly receptive Mr. Bush — should put their efforts in the new year.

The Lame-Duck Congress (WP)

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092580

ALAME-DUCK congressional session when both the House and Senate are about to change hands isn't, as a general matter, the right time to make important policy decisions. When it reconvenes this week, the 109th Congress should concentrate on finishing up the business of the 109th Congress -- primarily, passing the 11 remaining spending bills for the 2007 fiscal year, which started in October. The temptation for Republicans will be simply to approve a continuing resolution keeping this year's spending at 2006 levels, leaving the new majority to make the tough choices when it takes over in January. But this would be an abdication of responsibility, forcing government agencies to limp along without knowing their final budgets. It would create a logjam for the new Congress, which will simultaneously have to be staffing up, dealing with the president's 2008 budget proposal and working on an expected emergency spending bill early next year.

Another pressing task should be to give the District of Columbia full voting rights in the House. The moment is right for this to happen, thanks in large part to the efforts of Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) to broker an agreement that would create a new seat in the District along with a new congressional district in Republican-leaning Utah. Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. has said he will call a special session of his state's legislature to create a new, at-large congressional district. This is a deal that would be fair to District residents without advantaging either party. We hope that President Bush, who appeared unfamiliar with the issue when he was asked about it at his news conference the other day, has been fully briefed and will be fully supportive.

There are other important items on the congressional to-do list -- as well as some that are "to-don'ts." Confirmation hearings and, if possible, a vote on the nomination of Robert M. Gates to become the new defense secretary would avoid delaying Mr. Gates's start in that important job. Congress should also approve normalization of trade relations with Vietnam in advance of the president's trip there this week and extend an expiring trade deal that provides benefits to key South American countries. The House has already approved a nuclear agreement with India; the incoming Senate Democratic leader, Nevada's Harry M. Reid, has put that item on his priority list as well, and the Senate ought to act on it. Having let slip through a provision setting a termination date for the inspector general for Iraqi reconstruction, Congress should pass a measure to fix this mistake.

Mr. Bush mentioned some other matters last week that would be better left for the new Congress. We would like to see carefully crafted legislation to provide a legal framework for the administration's warrantless surveillance program, but the measures that have been proposed so far go overboard in giving carte blanche to the administration. This is an important subject -- and one that ought to be taken up by the 110th Congress. Meanwhile, the president's last-ditch push to win confirmation of controversial U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton during the lame-duck session isn't a particularly good omen of presidential willingness to compromise with Democrats. Mr. Bolton's nomination is a matter the White House would do better to drop, for the lame-duck session and beyond, if Mr. Bush is serious about that new tone he talked about the day after the election.

Blocked: Bye-Bye To Bolton? (NSWK)

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - The White House and the new Democratic majority in Congress are ready to play hardball. Already they are tussling over John Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. President George W. Bush gave Bolton, an outspoken conservative, a temporary "recess appointment" to the U.N. post last year after Democrats and GOP moderates blocked his Senate confirmation. Bolton's interim job runs out at the end of the year, and minutes after the president's postelection lunch with presumptive House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, the White House asked the Senate to confirm Bolton permanently during a forthcoming lame-duck session. But Joe Biden, the Senate Democrats' incoming Foreign Relations chair, signaled that the Dems will continue to block Bolton—unless the administration turns over a set of ultrasecret National Security Agency intercepts that Bolton requested. Bolton said he needed to find out the names of Americans mentioned in them; Bolton's critics want to be sure he wasn't spying on subordinates.

GOP moderate Lincoln Chafee, who lost his Senate seat, also signaled his continuing opposition to Bolton, virtually guaranteeing the nomination will die in this Congress. To date, the administration has refused to give Dems the documents they want; three Capitol Hill officials, who asked for anonymity due to the sensitive subject, said Bolton's prospects will be even bleaker next year when Dems take over Senate control. The White House is currently standing by Bolton. But speculation is already circulating that he could be replaced by Zalmay Khalilzad, U.S. ambassador in Baghdad, or Paula Dobriansky, an under secretary of State.

DOJ_NMG_0092581

Other Bush aides given recess appointments could face similar fates. At the Defense Department the temporary appointment of Peter Flory, an assistant secretary whose brief includes nonproliferation and Star Wars policies, also expires by the end of this year. Senate Dems blocked a vote on his confirmation last year, complaining that Flory had dealings in 2002 with Ahmad Chalabi's controversial Iraqi National Congress, and that the Pentagon was stonewalling Senate requests for documents. Other recess appointees who need Senate approval to keep their jobs beyond the end of next year include Julie Myers, head of Homeland Security's plainclothes investigation bureau; State Department refugee coordinator Ellen Sauerbrey, and C. Boyden Gray, U.S. ambassador to the European Union. Emily Lawrimore, a White House spokeswoman, said: "President Bush is encouraging members of the Senate to confirm these highly qualified individuals as soon as possible."

Bush Stands By Keeping Bolton As U.N. Ambassador Despite Opposition (WP/AP)

By John Heilprin

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

President Bush will not relent in his defense of John R. Bolton, his nominee for U.N. ambassador, despite unwavering opposition from Democrats who view Bolton as too combative for international diplomacy, aides said yesterday.

The Senate's top Democrat said lawmakers have more pressing matters than Bolton to address in their lame-duck session before adjourning. "I think we should go to things that we can work together on," Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

But two of Bush's top advisers said that the White House is not backing down from pursuing Senate approval for Bolton to continue in the job.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Bolton has done a remarkable job. "He's proven the critics wrong on all the charges they've leveled against him," Bartlett said on "Fox News Sunday."

"I think if he actually was able to get a vote in the full Senate, he would succeed," White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten said on ABC's "This Week."

Bush gave Bolton the job temporarily in August 2005, while Congress was in recess. That appointment will expire when Congress adjourns, no later than January.

The White House resubmitted Bolton's nomination on Thursday. Finding a replacement for Bolton would come at a sensitive time for the Bush administration. It is counting heavily on U.N. diplomacy to help confront North Korea and Iran over their nuclear programs and to end fighting in Sudan's Darfur region.

Last week, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, said he saw "no point in considering Mr. Bolton's nomination again."

And Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.), who lost on Election Day, said he would not end his opposition to Bolton. That probably would deny Republicans the votes needed to move the nomination from the committee to the full Senate. Republicans now lack the 60 votes needed to force a vote.

Democrats said yesterday that Bush should alter course now and nominate someone less hard-charging, with greater finesse in handling sensitive diplomatic matters.

"There's a lot of competent people. Send someone new up, Mr. President," Biden said on "This Week." "He doesn't even have the votes in the committee. He doesn't even have the votes of a Republican-controlled committee today. We're going to have a hearing on him. There is going to be a vote on him. He's going to lose."

In the president's view, however, Bolton "has turned out to be a very effective representative at the U.N. and, in fact, has turned out to be something his critics expected him not to be," Bolten said. "He's turned out to be a good consensus builder, and it's been reflected on resolutions on North Korea, in Lebanon, in other ways."

Bolten played down speculation the administration might go around the Senate and find another way for Bolton to continue to represent the United States at the United Nations, perhaps by finding an alternative means of paying his salary or appointing him to serve as an acting or deputy U.N. representative.

DOJ_NMG_0092582

"I don't know about that," Bolten said. "Our effort is going to be to try to get him confirmed in the ordinary course."

Bolton And Bipartisanship (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

So let's see. Democrats retake the Senate, and their first act of "bipartisanship" is to declare that they'll deny a confirmation vote to U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton. And now, say the arbiters of Washington manners, President Bush is supposed to show his willingness to compromise by withdrawing Mr. Bolton's nomination.

If Mr. Bush obliges, he'll be taking a big step toward turning last week's GOP defeat into a rout. Mr. Bolton has performed in exemplary fashion as a recess appointee these last two years, winning plaudits from everyone except those who admire Kofi Annan and Hugo Chavez. He has followed State Department orders and argued forcefully for U.S. policy.

The opposition to Mr. Bolton is based on nothing save vindictiveness. Republican Lincoln Chafee, who would have lost his GOP primary without White House support and who finally did lose last week, now says he won't vote for Mr. Bolton though he had once supported him. Mr. Chafee is a mystery wrapped in a muddle even to himself. Democrats Chris Dodd and Joe Biden are trying to show that any political appointee who refuses to bend to their wishes can't be confirmed. They know other Democrats would vote to confirm Mr. Bolton if he made it to the Senate floor.

Having had one recess appointment, Mr. Bolton can't get another one and be paid. But he could retain his position and be paid if Mr. Bush names him to a non-confirmable post at State and then assigns him to the U.N. Ambassador's duties. Now, that's a compromise.

Carmakers Seek More Attention From Bush (USAT)

By Justin Hyde

USA Today, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — When the heads of Detroit's automakers finally meet with President Bush at the White House Tuesday, they will press for more recognition of their issues, from the rising cost of retiree health care to the advantages a weak yen gives the Japanese.

The three — General Motors CEO Rick Wagoner, Ford Motor CEO Alan Mulally and Chrysler Group CEO Tom LaSorda — also will attempt to draw distinctions between themselves and foreign automakers whose U.S. branches generate record profits. The meeting should “enhance the president's understanding of the importance of the domestic auto industry to the economic health of the United States,” General Motors Vice Chairman Bob Lutz said in a recent interview.

“What I'm looking forward to is just sharing with (Bush) the state of our industry and also talking about competitiveness going forward,” Mulally said Friday.

All sides expect no firm commitments from the scheduled 45-minute session, which will include Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Al Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Friday that Bush plans to use the meeting to “reaffirm his support for the American auto industry.” Snow said Bush also will thank them for their progress on flexible-fuel and hybrid vehicles.

The three topics that will likely dominate the meeting are health care, trade and energy. The automakers also are expected to share concerns about the yen's artificially low value, which helps Japanese firms' profits and hurts U.S. rivals.

Bush last met with the heads of Detroit's automakers in Michigan in 2003, as he canvassed the country to build support for his tax-cut package.

The last White House meeting was in 1997, when auto and union executives warned President Clinton that the Kyoto greenhouse gas reduction treaty could hurt their business.

Renewable Fuels May Provide 25% Of U.S. Energy By 2025 (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092583

WASHINGTON -- A new Rand Corp. study showing the falling costs of ethanol, wind power and other forms of renewable energy predicts such sources could furnish as much as 25% of the U.S.'s conventional energy by 2025 at little or no additional expense.

A second renewable-energy report soon to be released by the National Academy of Sciences suggests wood chips may become a plentiful source of ethanol and electricity for industrial nations because their forested areas are expanding, led by the U.S. and China.

Because use of renewable fuels to replace oil and cut emissions of carbon dioxide is an area on which Congress's coming Democratic leadership and the Bush administration agree, the studies are likely to hasten efforts to increase production incentives next year, either in a new energy bill or a farm bill. (See related articles.1)

"We hope it will help policy planners rethink the context," said Reid Detchon, executive director of the Energy Future Coalition, a foundation-funded bipartisan group. The coalition sponsored the study by Rand, a nonprofit research group known primarily for defense studies.

The Rand study concludes that because prices for gasoline, natural gas and coal are likely to remain high, their cost advantage over renewables will erode, furthered by the hope that ethanol from farm wastes will be available by 2020.

Renewable fuels now produce only 6% of the nation's energy, and about half of that comes from hydroelectric dams. The study assumes renewable-energy costs will keep dropping at the rate of recent years. It says raising the use of renewables to 25% of all U.S. energy consumed would reduce U.S. reliance on oil by about 20% or the equivalent of the imports from Saudi Arabia and Venezuela. The study says the expected growth of energy-related emissions of carbon dioxide, thought to be artificially warming the atmosphere, would be cut by two-thirds over the next 19 years.

Rand researchers modeled more than 1,500 economic scenarios and found that in most cases, increasing the use of renewable fuels -- which don't enlarge the atmosphere's carbon-dioxide buildup -- would be cheaper than federal regulations forcing the reduction of carbon-dioxide emissions, about a third of which come from vehicles.

The study notes there has been "little systematic analysis" of the costs of renewable fuels. Much of the debate has consisted of optimistic projections by environmental groups and doubts expressed by some academic skeptics, who say that making ethanol from corn consumes nearly as much energy as it produces and could raise food prices. Ed Murphy, a group director for the American Petroleum Institute, said policy that assumes there will be substantial improvement in ethanol technology "could be foolish and costly."

The Rand study's cost estimates assume progress will continue on making ethanol from farm wastes, wood chips and other forms of biomass that are much cheaper and more plentiful than corn. Given the interest in so-called cellulosic ethanol, more than 100 companies from the agricultural, chemical and biotechnology sectors will begin a three-day meeting here today.

The study on the growth of forests says forests in 22 of the 50 countries with the largest wooded areas are growing. Destruction of forests in tropical nations, however, continues, with Brazil and Indonesia experiencing the greatest losses.

Write to John J. Fialka at john.fialka@wsj.com2

True Blue Populists (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

Senator George Allen of Virginia is understandably shocked and despondent. Just a year ago, a National Review cover story declared that his “down-home persona” made him “quite possibly the next president of the United States.” Instead, his political career seems over.

And it wasn’t just macaca, or even the war, that brought him down. Mr. Allen, a reliable defender of the interests of the economic elite, found himself facing an opponent who made a point of talking about the problem of rising inequality. And the tobacco-chewing, football-throwing, tax-cutting, Social Security-privatizing senator was only one of many faux populists defeated by real populists last Tuesday.

Ever since movement conservatives took over, the Republican Party has pushed for policies that benefit a small minority of wealthy Americans at the expense of the great majority of voters. To hide this reality, conservatives have relied on wagging the dog and wedge issues, but they've also relied on a brilliant marketing campaign that portrays Democrats as elitists and Republicans as representatives of the average American.

DOJ_NMG_0092584

This sleight of hand depends on shifting the focus from policy to personal style: John Kerry speaks French and windsurfs, so pay no attention to his plan to roll back tax cuts for the wealthy and use the proceeds to make health care affordable.

This year, however, the American people wised up.

True to form, some reporters still seem to be falling for the conservative spin. "If it walks, talks like a conservative, can it be a Dem?" asked the headline on a CNN.com story featuring a photo of Senator-elect Jon Tester of Montana. In other words, if a Democrat doesn't fit the right-wing caricature of a liberal, he must be a conservative.

But as Robin Toner and Kate Zernike of The New York Times pointed out yesterday, what actually characterizes the new wave of Democrats is a "strong streak of economic populism."

Look at Mr. Tester's actual policy positions: yes to an increase in the minimum wage; no to Social Security privatization; we need to "stand up to big drug companies" and have Medicare negotiate for lower prices; we should "stand up to big insurance companies and support a health care plan that makes health care affordable for all Montanans."

So what, aside from his flattop haircut, makes Mr. Tester a conservative? O.K., he supports gun rights. But on economic issues he's clearly left of center, not just compared with the current Senate, but compared with current Democratic senators. The same can be said of many other victorious Democrats, including Bob Casey in Pennsylvania, Sheldon Whitehouse in Rhode Island, and Sherrod Brown in Ohio. All of these candidates ran on unabashedly populist platforms, and won.

What about Joe Lieberman? Like shipwreck survivors clinging to flotsam, some have seized on his reelection as proof of Americans' continuing conservatism. But Mr. Lieberman won only through denial and deception, for example, by rewriting the history of his once-fervent support for the Iraq war and Donald Rumsfeld. He got two-thirds of the Republican vote, but managed to confuse enough Democrats about his positions to get over the top.

Last week's populist wave, among other things, vindicates the populist direction that Al Gore took in the closing months of the 2000 campaign. But will this wave be reflected in the actual direction of the Democratic Party?

Not necessarily. Quite a few sitting Democrats have shown themselves nearly as willing as Republicans to bow to corporate interests. Consider the vote on last year's draconian bankruptcy bill. Mr. Lieberman voted for cloture, cutting off debate and ensuring the bill's passage; then he voted against the bill, a meaningless gesture that let him have it both ways. Thirteen other Democratic senators also voted for cloture, including Joe Biden, who has just announced his candidacy for president.

The first big test of the new Democratic populism will come over reform of the 2003 prescription drug law. Democrats have pledged to repeal the clause in that law preventing Medicare from negotiating lower drug prices. But the fine print of how they do that is crucial: Medicare reform could be a mere symbolic gesture, or it could be a real reform that eliminates the huge implicit subsidies the program currently gives drug and insurance companies.

Are the newly invigorated Democrats ready to offer a real change in this country's direction? We'll know in a few months.

Return To Rubinomics? (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

During their long years in the wilderness, Democrats lashed out against trade and globalization, even though denying the economic case for trade is like pretending that tax cuts pay for themselves. Now that they have won Congress, the Democrats must prove that they are more than the mirror image of their opponents. This means reviving the pro-market centrism of the Clinton era -- a spirit that lives on in the form of the Hamilton Project.

The Hamilton Project is the brainchild of Robert Rubin, Treasury secretary under Bill Clinton. Rubin's great virtue was to be as free of ideology as is possible in politics and to recruit a team of clever pragmatists to work for him. Not every Cabinet secretary would choose an intellectual bulldozer as deputy -- particularly one with a talent for political incorrectness. But Larry Summers could get to the right answer faster than most people could get out of bed, and that's what Rubin cared about.

Two years ago, Rubin teamed up with Peter Orszag, a laser-brained economist at the Brookings Institution. He no longer controlled the Treasury, but he persuaded a number of fellow Democratic grandees to finance a center for Rubinomics in exile; and Orszag served as policy director, commissioning a series of creative pragmatists to grapple with the nation's economic challenges. Anyone who laments the watery generalizations of the House Democrats' election platform should check out http://www.hamiltonproject.org/ . It is proof that Democrats do have sophisticated ideas. They just need congressional leaders to adopt them.

DOJ_NMG_0092585

During the recent congressional campaign, Democratic candidates mostly had the right diagnosis and the wrong prescriptions. They saw that middle-class and poor Americans have not experienced wage gains during the past five years of growth, and they saw that families are one health crisis away from financial hardship. But the Democrats' remedies -- bashing Wal-Mart, railing against globalization -- offered little more than symbolism for the poor and middle class while promising damage to the economy.

The Hamilton people are just as ready to acknowledge that Americans are hurting. They note that the probability of an average family experiencing an income drop of half or more has jumped from 7 percent to 17 percent since the early 1970s; and that the average spell of unemployment has gone from 12 weeks to 16 weeks since the 1960s. But the Hamilton people have a better solution than protectionism.

Their first prescription is to encourage workers to save for themselves. A simple reform -- requiring companies to make enrollment in a retirement plan the default option -- would greatly boost savings, since many workers currently don't enroll not because they don't want to but because they don't get around to it: One series of experiments found that making participation the default boosted coverage for newly recruited low-income workers from 13 percent to 80 percent. A recent law facilitated automatic enrollment in 401(k) accounts but did not require it; and the law did nothing for the more than 70 million workers at companies that don't offer pension plans but that could nonetheless enroll workers in IRAs.

The Hamiltonians also advocate reform of government savings incentives. The current system of tax deductions favors the rich, because deductions are worth most to people in the highest tax brackets. A janitor who saves a dollar gets no help from the government, whereas a chief executive who saves a dollar gets a 35-cent tax subsidy. The Hamiltonians would replace this upside-down system with tax credits that are worth the same to everyone, irrespective of their tax bracket.

The Hamiltonians also have ideas on unemployment insurance. The existing system is designed to protect workers who lose jobs, though in practice eligibility restrictions ensure that only one in three gets covered. It is not designed to help workers who find new work at a much lower wage -- even though the resulting hardship lasts longer. So why not create a new borrowing mechanism to help workers get through temporary layoffs, and use the savings to provide government insurance to workers who suffer acute wage losses?

In keeping with the Rubin pragmatism, some Hamiltonian ideas violate Democratic shibboleths. One paper demonstrates that teacher quality has nothing to do with whether a teacher is certified and argues that school principals should have the freedom to fire ineffective junior teachers -- which would not thrill the teachers unions. But nearly all the Hamilton proposals have three things in common. They would reduce the inequality that Democrats emphasized on the campaign trail. They would not bust the budget. And they would promote economic growth. If the political system can't make use of ideas that tick all these boxes, there is something desperately wrong with it.

Democrats: Identify Pork Sponsors (USAT)

By Peter Eisler, Kathy Kiely

USA Today, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats aim to open the next Congress in January with a new rule that identifies lawmakers who use legislative “earmarks” to help special interests — a change Republicans promised but didn't implement.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi said her first agenda item after being elected House speaker will be a vote to require sponsors of earmarks to be identified. Currently, lawmakers can remain anonymous in sponsoring an earmark, which is language in a bill that directs funds or tax benefits to a business, project or institution.

“There has to be transparency,” the California congresswoman told USA TODAY last week. “I'd just as soon do away with all (earmarks), but that probably isn't realistic.”

DOJ_NMG_0092586

Pelosi said some earmarks “are worthy,” and they can be a legitimate way for Congress to force fiscal priorities on the White House.

House Republican leaders adopted a disclosure rule in September, but no earmark sponsors have been identified under the rule because it effectively exempted bills that dictate spending for 2007.

Congress begins a lame-duck session today to consider unfinished 2007 appropriations bills. Those bills could give members another chance to insert anonymous earmarks. Regardless, the Republican rule expires at year's end, so Democrats would have to pass their own disclosure requirement.

Earmarking has drawn complaints from groups such as the National Taxpayers Union that say anonymity encourages wasteful spending. Conservative groups and some GOP lawmakers, such as Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., have said Republicans' failure to bring accountability to the process helped fuel the party's losses last week.

David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, cited earmark disclosure as one of several “needed reforms” that Republicans should back in the new Congress. “We hope that the party in which most of us have invested our trust will learn the right lessons” from the elections, he said.

Last month, a USA TODAY investigation found that many special interests got earmarks after hiring lobbyists who were relatives of lawmakers or staffers affiliated with the House and Senate appropriations committees.

According to the Congressional Research Service, the number of earmarks in appropriations bills has tripled in the past decade to about 16,000. One famous example was an earmark that set aside millions for a “bridge to nowhere” — a span over a remote Alaskan waterway to a sparsely populated island.

“You can't have bridges to nowhere for America's children to pay for,” Pelosi said. “Or if you do, you have to know whose it is.”

Speaker-to-be Is No Stranger To Earmarking (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — When the House passed a massive spending bill last November, Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi made sure her constituents knew what they were getting.

"Pelosi Secures $115 Million for San Francisco Transportation, Housing, Science and Arts," she proclaimed in a news release.

It wasn't an unusual announcement. Like many of her colleagues in Congress, Pelosi for years has celebrated bringing home the bacon to her district.

But now — as Pelosi prepares to take over the House after an election in which scandal helped drive Republicans from power — she is promising changes to the controversial practice of earmarking.

Earmarks are spending provisions dropped into bills — often anonymously, at the last minute and without public scrutiny. They were at the center of several high-profile scandals that undermined the GOP this year, when earmarks benefited special interests.

Pelosi has not been linked to any impropriety. And not all the federal funding Pelosi boasts about came from earmarks. But the presumed new House speaker has proved a champion practitioner of the earmarking process over the years.

During the last congressional session, her district received far more earmarks than a typical district, according to Taxpayers for Common Sense, a nonpartisan watchdog that tracks congressional spending.

Pelosi has helped direct tens of millions of dollars to subway and bridge projects in San Francisco. She has secured money to restore a historic schooner and convert the old San Francisco Mint into a history museum.

Citizens Against Government Waste, a critic of such "pork-barrel" spending, has calculated that Pelosi's district received nearly $31.3 million through earmarks in the last two fiscal years.

Among the biggest earmarks identified by the group were $5.6 million for the UC San Francisco neurology department and $4 million for Hunters Point Naval Shipyard. Both were inserted into the 2006 defense spending bill.

DOJ_NMG_0092587

Three years ago, the San Francisco Chronicle reported that Pelosi had secured $1 million for the University of San Francisco's Leo T. McCarthy Center for Public Service and the Common Good, which was started by her longtime advisor and campaign treasurer.

At the time, the 10-term congresswoman from California's 8th District said the center had received the funding on its merits.

Pelosi has defended her earmarking, including at a news conference in March. "There are many earmarks that are very worthy," she said. "All of mine, as a matter of fact."

And she has reaped the rewards. San Francisco's largest newspaper has extensively covered the millions of dollars in federal money she has helped bring home.

Pelosi says there is a distinction between earmarks for public projects, which she defends and are typically publicized, and those she calls "special-interest earmarks."

"It is the special-interest earmarks that are the ones that go in there in the dark of night that they don't want anybody to see, and that nobody does see, and that are voted upon," she said in March.

Special-interest projects, which helped fuel several recent congressional scandals, are often anonymously slipped into spending bills by lawmakers at lobbyists' behest.

Pelosi's approach to the issue is certain to come under renewed scrutiny. In one of her first acts as speaker, she has pledged to crack down on earmarking.

"I would just as soon do away with all of them," she told reporters this week.

This year, Pelosi was among those who assailed Republicans' use of the practice.

And when the House adopted a rule in September requiring authors of some, but not all, earmarks to be identified, she called it a "political gimmick to make it look as if something is happening."

The current Democratic proposal would not prohibit earmarks, but it would expand the requirement to identify earmarkers.

"It won't take long for the American public to realize that Nancy Pelosi and company were all talk and no action on earmark reform," said Kevin Madden, a spokesman for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

"Pelosi has been one of the biggest proponents and beneficiaries of pork spending."

Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider dismissed the criticism, promising that under Pelosi's leadership earmarks would not be abused as she said they were under the Republicans.

But budget watchdogs, who decried the GOP majority's use of earmarking over the last 12 years, are watching warily.

When a group of them sent Pelosi a letter last week noting that they were encouraged by her "stated support for real earmark reform," they closed with a warning: "We hope you and your colleagues will show the same dedication to enacting these reforms in the majority as you did to promoting them in the minority."

Reid Pledges Earmark Reform, But May Benefit (LAT)

By Chuck Neubauer And Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid vows to make reform of congressional earmarks a priority of his tenure, arguing that members need to be more transparent when they load pet projects for their districts into federal spending bills.

But last year's huge $286-billion federal transportation bill included a little-noticed slice of pork pushed by Reid that provided benefits not only for the casino town of Laughlin, Nev., but also, possibly, for the senator himself.

Reid called funding for construction of a bridge over the Colorado River, among other projects, "incredibly good news for Nevada" in a news release after passage of the 2005 transportation bill. He didn't mention, though, that just across the river in Arizona, he owns 160 acres of land several miles from proposed bridge sites and that the bridge could add value to his real estate investment.

Reid denies any personal financial interest in his efforts to secure $18 million for a new span connecting Laughlin with Bullhead City, Ariz.

DOJ_NMG_0092588

"Sen. Reid's support for the bridge had absolutely nothing to do with property he owns," said Rebecca Kirszner, Reid's communications director. "Sen. Reid supported this project as part of his continuing efforts to move Nevada forward."

But some Bullhead City property owners and local officials say a new bridge will undoubtedly hike land values in an already-booming commuter town, where speculators are snapping up undeveloped land for housing developments and other projects. Experts on congressional spending say Reid's earmark provides yet another sign of the need for reform.

"It's a really bad idea for lawmakers to earmark projects when they have a financial interest that could in any way be affected by it," said Norman Ornstein, coauthor of "The Broken Branch" a recent book that examines earmarking and other practices.

Ornstein said he did not have enough information to fully evaluate the Reid deal. But, he said, "we already have too many examples — including a number of Southern California representatives — who are very directly using this process to enrich themselves."

Said Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, a nonpartisan watchdog that tracks congressional spending, "Unwittingly, the taxpayer may have helped inflate the value" of Reid's property.

Earmarking allows congressional leaders, committee chairs and other insiders to insert narrowly targeted spending orders into pending legislation without going through the normal budget review process. Members of both parties defend earmarking as a way for Congress to get attention for local concerns when executive-branch agencies are unresponsive.

Earmarking was at the heart of the case against former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe), now in prison for using his congressional seat to secure federal funding for individuals who provided him personal benefits. It was also the basis for much of the wealth amassed by criminal lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who referred to the appropriations committee as "the favor factory."

Reform has been difficult to achieve in part, critics say, because leaders of both parties encourage earmarking to build popularity at home and power among fellow Congress members.

Reid is not the only powerful member known to use the practice. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a former appropriations panel member, has used earmarks prodigiously.

The minority leader of the new Senate, Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), is an active earmarker, as is current Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who last year secured funding for a highway interchange near property he owned outside Chicago. (He too has claimed there is no connection between his earmarks and personal land holdings.)

Last week, when Reid's status rose as Democrats took control of the Senate after the midterm election, the senator promised, like Pelosi, to make earmark reform a top priority when party members caucused.

"With Democrats running Congress, we are in a much better position to achieve real transparency and openness," said Kirszner.

In earlier years, Reid has boldly claimed credit for getting earmarks for his constituents. Last year, he boasted of securing $300 million in earmarks in the transportation bill.

When pressed about his position on earmarks in an interview on public television in January, Reid acknowledged abuses, but added: "There's nothing basically wrong with earmarks. They've been going on since we were a country."

Actually, earmarks have skyrocketed in recent years, from 1,439 in 1995 to 15,268 last year, according to a Senate estimate.

The proposed bridge between Laughlin and Bullhead City was not on the priority list sent to local members of Congress by either the Nevada or Arizona transportation agencies.

But beginning in 2003, local supporters of the bridge — which would be the second span connecting the two towns — found a receptive audience when they approached some members of the Nevada and Arizona congressional delegations. Civic leaders argued that an additional bridge was needed because traffic on the existing connector bridge, on the northern edge of Bullhead City, had become overwhelming.

Laughlin consists mainly of casinos and hotels, and has little housing or shopping. Most of the casino workers live across the river in Bullhead City, which also has shopping and a hospital. Elected officials say both communities would benefit from a second bridge.

DOJ_NMG_0092589

Reid's land, three to five miles from several proposed sites for the second bridge and near the local hospital, is undeveloped. New housing is springing up around it.

Acting on a request from the town of Laughlin, Reid, a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee's transportation subcommittee, in 2003 secured $500,000 for preliminary studies.

Last year, Rep. Jon Porter (R-Nev.), supported by Rep. Trent Franks (R-Ariz.), got $2 million for the bridge inserted into the House version of the transportation bill.

By the time Congress approved the $286-billion transportation bill, $18 million more in bridge funding had been added. Reid took credit in a news release for securing money that would kick the project into high gear. The bridge, still in the planning stages, is projected to cost $30 million to $40 million.

Arizona's two Republican senators voted against the entire transportation bill as pure pork.

Nowhere in Reid's statements about the project was any mention of his Bullhead City land holdings; he does list it on his Senate financial disclosure forms. He valued the Arizona land at $500,000 to $1 million in his most recent disclosure, which reported total assets of at least $2.2 million.

Reid's interest in the Arizona land dates back more than 20 years and, according to his staff, has been a long-running headache. He paid about $150,000 for 100 acres of the Bullhead City parcel, and his longtime friend Clair Haycock bought the remaining 60 acres for $90,000.

Californians who bought the property from the two in the early 1990s defaulted on a $1.3-million note and returned the land to Reid and Haycock.

In early 2002, Haycock sold out to Reid for $10,000, or about $166 an acre.

At the time, the Mohave County assessor valued the entire parcel at $339,620, or more than $2,000 an acre.

The low price resulted from Haycock's need to sell and Reid's lack of interest in buying, the two men said.

The investment "had been a losing proposition for about a decade running," Reid's staff said.

Haycock, who owns Haycock Petroleum Co. of Las Vegas, said in an e-mail that he needed to sell his share to liquidate a company pension plan, which owned the property.

He said in a statement that he "expected nothing from Sen. Reid" in return for selling him the property.

"Sen. Reid has never taken any official action to provide personal financial benefit to me, and I would never have asked," Haycock said.

City and county officials say that land values have been rising in Bullhead City as developers and speculators discover the area.

"Once they build a bridge, values will go up," said Frank Capotosto of the Mohave County assessor's office.

"A new bridge will increase value because there would be better circulation, " said Pawan Agrawal, public works director and city engineer for Bullhead City.

"A lack of a bridge depresses our growth."

California businessman Ken Renfroe recently bought property near Reid's that he intends to develop in five years or so. He believes that a new bridge will increase property values.

"I am sure it has already had a positive influence," he said of the proposal.

He paid $240,000 for 37.52 acres, an average of $6,396 an acre, records show.

Some other local real estate owners, however, question whether the bridge would increase land values.

Reid's office referred inquiries about land values to developer Robert Bilbray, a Reid supporter who works in the LaughlinBullhead City area.

Bilbray disputed the notion that Reid could stand to gain from the bridge construction.

Site plans have not been finalized, he said, and some proposed locations could decrease Reid's property value.

"The concept that Sen. Reid's property in Bullhead City, Ariz., will gain in value from another bridge between Bullhead City and Laughlin is ludicrous," he said.

‘There Is No Reason To Wait' (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0092590

By Pete Stark

USA Today, November 13, 2006

Democrats won both houses of Congress last Tuesday because Americans supported our pledge to change direction on several major issues, including the Medicare Part D prescription drug benefit.

There is no reason to wait. True, it is a complex problem, and 100 legislative hours is less than three weeks.

Consider, however, the middle-income senior who suddenly hits the "doughnut hole" and must come up with $2,850 in out-of-pocket cash for a drug to ease his or her cancer burden. For that person, quick congressional action might save a life.

I believe we must start work immediately to improve this incomprehensibly complicated plan, which overpays and deregulates private plans to the detriment of the beneficiaries and taxpayers.

The same Republicans who certified its cost as $400 billion over 10 years, knowing the true figure was north of $550 billion, generated some of the polls showing satisfaction with Part D.

Yes, premiums are lower than expected, not from market competition, but from massive Medicare subsidies to the insurance industry. With less than 3% overhead, universal coverage and lower prices, a Medicare-run plan could offer true competition. Medicare payments for physicians and hospitals have created no noticeable increase in the bankruptcy filings by them in the past decade. Why immunize the pharmaceutical industry from competition?

The Republican administration never even tried to save money. It forbid any negotiation on price or availability of drugs at the behest of the pharmaceutical industry. We can do better.

Former Health and Human Services secretary Tommy Thompson, faced with the anthrax threat, took just over a month to negotiate a 50% reduction in the price of the drug Cipro. There is no reason that Medicare cannot do the same and provide a drug benefit similar to my Blue Cross benefit or the various plans offered to USA TODAY employees.

If not now, when?

Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., is the top Democrat on the House Ways and Means health subcommittee.

Pelosi On Drugs (WSJ)

By Alain Enthoven And Kyna Fong

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

Nancy Pelosi has promised that when the Democrats come into control of the House, they will repeal the ban preventing Medicare from negotiating directly with pharmaceutical companies, within the first 100 hours. She must expect that this legislation will bring down drug prices dramatically. In fact, it is not obvious that allowing the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies will lead to lower prices than those achieved by private drug plans. There are several good reasons that government negotiations may not decrease drug costs.

First, negotiations are a bargaining process. The relative balance of bargaining power determines at which price the deal is struck.

People often confuse market power with bargaining power. The thinking goes, the larger the share of the market the buyer represents, the greater the bargaining power and thus the lower the prices negotiated. That line of reasoning fails with drugs, however, because the seller is frequently a monopolist so it cannot be threatened with replacement by a substitute. Instead, the only threat is exclusion from the market.

Rather than market share, a party's bargaining power is determined simply by its ability to say no, to walk away from the table without an agreement. Whether the government or a private drug plan has greater bargaining power is not clear. Which can walk away more easily and declare that some brand-name drug will not be covered on the formulary? Private plans like Kaiser or United are able to negotiate deep discounts with pharmaceutical companies precisely because of the plans' ability to say no -- the ability to include some drugs and to exclude others, allowing the market to judge the resulting formulary. On the other hand, when the government negotiates, its hands are tied because there are few drugs it can exclude without facing political backlash from doctors and the Medicare population, a very influential group of voters.

In fact, the government negotiating on behalf of Medicare beneficiaries may lead to some unintended adverse consequences. Since direct-to-consumer advertising is legal in the U.S., there is nothing preventing pharmaceutical companies from funding a torrent of advertisements for the "latest and greatest" drug, thereby creating a strong demand within the Medicare population for coverage of the drug. How firm can the government stand when negotiating for a drug being clamored for? This is not the sort of bargaining power that will lead to lower prices.

DOJ_NMG_0092591

Secondly, by acting as one large buyer, the government will cause price discounts to become more expensive for pharmaceutical companies. In other words, the minimum price that the pharmaceutical company is able to accept increases. All else equal, this will lead to higher, not lower, prices. When private drug plans are negotiating individually with pharmaceutical companies, those companies have the power to "price discriminate," meaning they can charge lower prices to some drug plans and higher prices to others. This ability allows for large discounts. If Pfizer is able to give a deep discount to Kaiser without giving a similar discount to United, then it is less costly for Pfizer to give Kaiser that discount. If, however, Pfizer can give a deep discount to Kaiser only if the same discount is granted to all other Medicare drug plans, then the discount becomes very expensive.

Experience with the Medicaid best-price rule, passed as part of OBRA '90, provides both empirical and anecdotal evidence of price discounts becoming more expensive when buyers' discounts are forcibly linked together. The best-price rule states roughly that Medicaid will be granted a price for a drug that is the lowest price offered to any buyer of that drug. If that price is not low enough, Medicaid receives a fixed discount off the average price. In effect, the best-price rule transforms all private discounts negotiated between a pharmaceutical company and a drug plan into public discounts for Medicaid. Research by academics, along with a slew of anecdotal evidence reported in the press, suggests that after passage of the Medicaid best-price rule, the days of deep discounts to private drug plans have been numbered. Instead, for most drugs the dispersion in prices has declined significantly and the overall level of prices has increased. Even with products for which there are therapeutic substitutes available, price competition has become less intense.

All that aside, many will argue that, clearly, government negotiations lead to lower prices -- just look at Canada, or Britain, or France. True, those governments may obtain lower prices than the public pays in the U.S., but the real question is: Do those governments negotiate lower prices than what would be negotiated were smaller groups of buyers able to deal individually with pharmaceutical companies? Moreover, a great advantage that governments in other countries have over the U.S. government is the ability to control entry. Without direct-to-consumer advertising, citizens in other countries don't even hear about new drugs until the government has approved the drug and negotiated an amenable price. Interestingly, with the expansion of the Internet and unrestrained information flow, other governments have been facing new challenges. Earlier this year, a well-publicized legal battle brought by a U.K. woman against the NHS's decision not to cover Herceptin for early-stage breast cancer has compelled the NHS to reverse its original decision and to offer coverage for that drug.

Finally, there is the familiar economic argument that the market-determined price is the only fair price. How can the government determine what price is "fair," what price appropriately reimburses pharmaceutical companies for all their research and development efforts? How can the government determine what prices will encourage the right levels of future innovation? The government negotiating prices only leaves room for additional gains through political lobbying and campaigning, activities at which pharmaceutical companies have proven themselves rather adept.

Congressional Democrats need to be careful in making the logical leap from market share to bargaining power. Empowering the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies is not necessarily equivalent to achieving lower drug prices. In fact, neither economic theory nor historical experience suggests that will be the outcome. Members should think carefully before jumping on the bandwagon -- this promise may bring just the opposite of what was ordered.

Mr. Enthoven is a professor emeritus at the Graduate School of Business at Stanford, where Ms. Fong is a doctoral student in economics.

Congress's Sci-tech Agenda To Shift Under Democrats (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, November 13, 2006

For clues to whether bipartisan cooperation in Washington will take root or disappear from the table as quickly as the china after last week's get-acquainted lunches at the White House, watch how some key science and technology issues play out.

DOJ_NMG_0092592

Ordinarily, broad science goals - such as better science education or the American Competitiveness Initiative - draw bipartisan support. But there are some divisive science topics on the Democrats' early agenda - namely embryonic stem-cell research - and these highly charged science and environmental issues will be one barometer of the durability of cross-aisle cooperation.

"If this stated spirit of bipartisanship is to occur, one of the best places to look is going to be in the area of science and technology," says Roger Pielke Jr., director of the Center for Science and Technology Policy Research at the University of Colorado at Boulder. "If it doesn't occur in science and technology, I wouldn't expect that it's likely to occur elsewhere."

The potential for fractiousness exists in a number of policy areas where the ideas of the new Democratic majority differ from those of Republican lawmakers or the Bush administration. Among them are funding for research into alternative-energy sources, what to do about global warming, the future of the space program, and charges that the Bush team has muzzled federal scientists and ignored scientific results in crafting environmental and public-health regulations.

Players who say they felt disenfranchised when GOP lawmakers dominated Capitol Hill view the Democrats' post-election ascension as an opportunity. Several environmental groups are slated to hold a joint press conference Monday laying out their collective agenda to address issues ranging from grazing on public lands and the state of national parks. They are expected to push for measures to curtail global warming that are tougher than the voluntary approaches the Bush administration has offered so far.

In the House, Democrats are identifying a series of hearings they want to hold that deal with these themes. In the Senate, Barbara Boxer (D) of California is slated to take the helm of the Senate Environmental and Public Works Committee. Last Thursday, in a briefing with reporters, she said she aims to draft legislation that contains elements of a California-like approach to curbing emissions of greenhouse gases. The state aims to cut greenhouse-gas emissions to 1990 levels by 2020.

The midterm election, which unseated several moderate Republicans, gave the GOP delegation a more conservative tone, analysts say. And several incoming Democratic freshmen take conservative positions on a number of issues.

Still, some environmental groups are optimistic that their issues will at least get a hearing. At best, they will find allies among the more-conservative freshmen.

"At least on some of the environmental issues - energy security, environmental health issues, even global warming - these are not always liberal versus conservative issues," says Karen Steuer, vice president for government affairs at the National Environmental Trust in Washington. "In the last Congress, we could frequently work in a bipartisan fashion [with individual Republican lawmakers] on a fair number of environmental issues." The barriers came at the doorstep of the GOP leadership, which "refused to bring our issues to the floor for a vote," she says. "We couldn't even get an honest debate and a vote."

With a presidential election only two years away, it may be unrealistic to expect large-scale changes in science or environmental policies, several analysts say. Instead, they continue, look for oversight hearings that are more robust.

One issue expected to receive more scrutiny involves what has come to be called the GOP's war on science. Inspectors general at NASA and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration are investigating allegations that political appointees have tried to muzzle scientists whose views, based on their research, run counter to Bush administration policy. In other cases, critics charge that political appointees at regulatory agencies such as the Environmental Protection Agency have disregarded the best available science in crafting environmental regulations that are weaker than critics say they should be. Many states are in open revolt against the EPA's rules for emissions of mercury and particulates, for example, opting to set up their own tougher regulations.

Another area ripe for tighter oversight is NASA and the president's Vision for Space Exploration, adds Ray Williamson, with the George Washington University Space Policy Institute. In hearings before the House Committee on Science, lawmakers from both sides of the aisle have expressed support for the effort in general. But, he notes, they worry that the White House isn't giving NASA the money it needs to do the job without sacrificing other important activities.

Pelosi Backs Murtha For Majority Leader (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092593

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, in line to become speaker of the House, stepped into a postelection power struggle among fellow Democrats on Sunday with a letter of support for Rep. Jack Murtha in the race to pick a majority leader.

"Your presence in the leadership of our party would add a knowledgeable and respected voice to our Democratic team," Pelosi, D-Calif., wrote Murtha. The Pennsylvania lawmaker is widely viewed as an underdog in a two-man race with Maryland Rep. Steny Hoyer in this week's leadership elections.

Murtha issued a statement saying, "I am deeply gratified to receive the support of Speaker Pelosi, a tireless advocate for change and a true leader for our party and our country."

Hoyer has been second-ranking in the Democratic leadership behind Pelosi the past four years. He issued a statement saying he was confident he would win the race.

"Nancy told me some time ago that she would personally support Jack. I respect her decision as the two are very close," Hoyer's statement said.

Pelosi and Hoyer have long been rivals within the party caucus, while she and Murtha are allies of long standing.

Murtha, a former Marine who is respected for his knowledge of defense issues, gained national attention last year when he said U.S. troops should be withdrawn from Iraq.

Murtha announced last fall he intended to run for majority leader if Democrats won control of the House, a pre-election jab at Hoyer at a time the Marylander was pledging support for Pelosi.

Both Hoyer and Murtha traveled on behalf of Democratic candidates during the campaign. Hoyer's office said he visited 82 congressional districts and raised or contributed $8.2 million to the party's candidates in the months leading to the elections. No comparable figures were immediately available for Murtha's efforts.

Since the election, Hoyer has released letters of support in the leadership race from senior Democrats as well as from more than half of the incoming lawmakers who won their seats last week.

In her letter, Pelosi began by noting that Murtha had requested her support. Noting his opposition to the war, she added, "Your leadership gave so many Americans, including respected military leaders, the encouragement to voice their own disapproval at a failed policy that weakens our military and makes stability in that region even more difficult to achieve."

One of Hoyer's supporters, Rep.-elect Baron Hill of Indiana, depicted Pelosi's letter as good news for the Maryland lawmaker. Hill said the letter was a statement of personal intent, adding, "She's not asking other members to vote for Murtha."

Pelosi Endorses Murtha As Next Majority Leader (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) endorsed Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) yesterday as the next House majority leader, thereby stepping into a contentious intraparty fight between Murtha and her current deputy, Maryland's Steny H. Hoyer.

The unexpected move signaled the sizable value Pelosi gives to personal loyalty and personality preferences. Hoyer competed with her in 2001 for the post of House minority whip, while Murtha managed her winning campaign. Pelosi has also all but decided she will not name the ranking Democrat on the House intelligence committee, Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.) to chair that panel next year, a decision pregnant with personal animus.

Pelosi had been outspoken about her frustration with Murtha's declaration that he would challenge Hoyer, currently the House minority whip, for the majority leader post long before Democrats had secured the majority. Many believed she would remain on the sidelines, just as Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) did earlier this year when three Republicans vied for the post of House majority leader.

But in her first real decision as the incoming speaker, Pelosi said she was swayed by Murtha's early stance for a withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq. Her letter of endorsement yesterday made clear that she sees Iraq as the central issue of the next Congress and that she believes a decorated Marine combat veteran at the helm of the House caucus would provide Democrats ammunition in their fight against congressional Republicans and President Bush on the issue.

"I salute your courageous leadership that changed the national debate and helped make Iraq the central issue of this historic election. It was surely a dark day for the Bush Administration when you spoke truth to power," she wrote. "Your strong voice for national security, the war on terror and Iraq provides genuine leadership for our party, and I count on you to lead on these vital issues."

DOJ_NMG_0092594

Murtha responded, "I am deeply gratified to receive the support of Speaker Pelosi, a tireless advocate for change and a true leader for our Party and our country."

Pelosi's decision could be a significant blow to Hoyer, who has worked for years to move up in the Democratic leadership. Political handicappers had regarded Hoyer to be the strong favorite when House Democrats meet Thursday to choose a majority leader for the 110th Congress. Although Murtha's stance on Iraq has made him a hero among many grass-roots party activists, his positions against abortion and gun control have pushed many House liberals into Hoyer's camp, including the leader of the Out of Iraq Caucus, Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.).

Hoyer's camp counts 21 of the roughly 40 incoming freshman Democrats as committed supporters. Many freshmen believe the Democrats should stick with the team that brought them to the majority, said John Sarbanes, who was elected last week to represent central Maryland in the House.

Hoyer also has the strong support of many of the party's conservative "Blue Dog" Democrats, who worry about Murtha's involvement in the Abscam bribery sting in 1980 and what they see as his freewheeling style on the House Appropriations Committee, where he has openly advocated for the interests of his district and his political supporters.

Some of Hoyer's supporters put the best face on Pelosi's intervention, saying Murtha would not have asked for a public letter of support if his campaign were not in trouble.

"I don't think it's significant," said Rep. Dennis Cardoza (D-Calif.), a leading Blue Dog and Hoyer supporter. "Everyone already knew she was supporting Murtha. I don't think this will have much of an impact. Steny's going to win this fight."

But Murtha has garnered the support of some influential Californians close to Pelosi, including Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), a liberal firebrand who will chair the House Education and the Workforce Committee.

In a statement, Hoyer said he remains confident he has the votes.

"Nancy told me some time ago that she would personally support Jack. I respect her decisions as the two are very close," he wrote. "I am grateful for the support I have from my colleagues, and have the majority of the caucus supporting me. I look forward to working with Speaker Pelosi as Majority Leader."

Another potentially fractious vote in the House Democratic Caucus was settled late last week when Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the outgoing chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, decided against running for House majority whip. Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.), the only African American in the House Democratic leadership, had already announced his candidacy.

Emanuel instead will stand unopposed for the job Clyburn will vacate, House Democratic Caucus chairman. In his announcement, he appealed for party unity ahead of Thursday's leadership elections.

Supply Side Can Mike Pence Win? (WSJ)

By Stephen Moore

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- If Rep. Mike Pence, the fourth-term Republican from Indiana, wins his bid this Friday for House minority leader, he will become the second most influential conservative in Washington, behind President Bush. The leadership contest, of course, does not take place in a vacuum. The congressional Republicans are engaged in a desperate search for a new revolutionary, a Newt Gingrich figure to help them rediscover who they are and what they believe in. One story about Mr. Pence suggests that he might just be the man:

"The president said, 'Mike, I really need your vote for my prescription drug bill," Mr. Pence recalls of his first-ever meeting in the Oval Office. "And I responded, 'With all due respect, Mr. President, I didn't come to this town to create new entitlements, but to rein in the ones we already have.'" A few days later, this wet-behind-the-ears sophomore congressman captained a conservative revolt that fell one vote short of killing the hugely expensive legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0092595

That wasn't the first time this maverick bucked his party leadership and his president. His first spending vote in the House was against the No Child Left Behind education bill that the Bush White House still considers one of its crowning achievements. His reasoning: "Why are we federalizing schools and education?"

Neither of these incidents endeared Mr. Pence to Karl Rove or the Bush White House. But perhaps his principled stance is in need more than ever.

"My colleagues know that I have never hesitated to support this president when I thought that he was right even on difficult issues like the war," Mr. Pence told me in an interview last week. "But I have never hesitated to oppose vigorously and publicly when I thought that the policy of the Bush administration ran contrary to the principles of limited government." Translation: Expect some intraparty fireworks if Mr. Pence wins.

Mr. Pence believes that his party got trounced last week because of its embrace of what he derisively calls "big government Republicanism." He laments: "For the past four years there has been a growing sense among voters that Republicans, who had come to Washington, D.C. to shrink government, instead settled for an agenda of running government in a slightly less expensive way than the Democrats." (By the end, they weren't even doing that.) Returning Republicans to their Reagan roots is Mr. Pence's obsession. "I believe in my heart that the greatest scandal in Washington is runaway federal spending."

The silver-haired Mr. Pence is most known as a free-market conservative who fought to make the Bush tax cuts bigger and the Bush spending smaller, and he relishes the idea of taking on the trade protectionism of the Democrats. On immigration, he rejects as economically wrongheaded the Pat Buchanan isolationism of the party. He wants a border security bill that includes expanded legal immigration and a system to allow illegal workers to go back home and secure a green card for re-admittance if they have a willing employer who will hire them.

The closed-border Republicans have screamed "amnesty" -- a policy Mr. Pence says he's "dedicated to preventing." It says a lot about his likeability and conservative credentials that even his highest-profile opponent on the immigration issue, Tom Tancredo, is a Pence supporter in the leadership race.

One complication for Republican leaders is that over the next two years a legacy-minded Mr. Bush might work to make bipartisan deals with a Speaker Nancy Pelosi -- on questions like minimum wage, health care and entitlement reform. Mr. Pence sees the House Republicans' game plan for winning back the majority as pretty much the opposite: to oppose such deals whenever they deviate from Reagan principles.

"The duty of the Republican minority as I see it is to contest and where possible defeat the liberal agenda of the Democratic Party and Speaker Pelosi," he stresses. "But I think that we will only defeat the Democratic agenda by presenting positive, substantive reforms based on Republican values for every major legislative initiative of the Democratic majority -- whether the issue is the economy, security or values." There's a definite spirit of combativeness, not cooperation -- thank God.

Mr. Pence seems to have corralled most of the support from major conservative voices, ranging from Rush Limbaugh to Paul Weyrich. John Berthoud, the president of the National Taxpayers Union, gushes: "Mike Pence is one of the few Republicans of late we could always depend on to take the principled position, not the K Street position." He adds, "He's the obvious choice. When you've got a Roger Clemens, you put him on the mound."

Not everyone sees Mr. Pence in that all-star light. The complaint on Capitol Hill is that he can be a self-promoter and a media hound. In America's most secure redoubt of egomania, the U.S. Congress, that often foments envy. Some of Mr. Pence's critics charge that for all his self-righteous anti-big-government talk, he voted "aye" for the mega-spending farm bill of 2002 to benefit his Indiana farmers. Mr. Pence's response: "I'm 99% conservative and 1% collectivist" -- though he does say one of his goals this year is a genuinely free-market farm bill.

His opponent in the leadership race, John Boehner of Ohio, is a conservative himself, and well-liked. He was majority leader this past year, and did an admirable and thankless job of cleaning up the House stables in the aftermath of the Tom DeLay and Jack Abramoff scandals. Mr. Boehner is a far better fundraiser than Mr. Pence. But still, he's not the new face many Republicans are searching for.

Here, the betting odds are with Mr. Boehner. It's tough to topple the incumbent party powers, though the members may want to remember that the first step toward winning control of the House in 1994 was voting out the old regime and putting in visionary leaders like Newt Gingrich and Dick Armey.

DOJ_NMG_0092596

Can Mike Pence win? That depends on how many of his colleagues fully understand how much trouble they're in.

Mr. Moore is a member of the Journal's editorial board.

A GOP Unchanged (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

The depleted House Republican caucus, a minority in the next Congress, convenes in the Capitol at 8 a.m. Friday on the brink of committing an act of supreme irrationality. The House members blame their leadership for their tasting the bitter dregs of defeat. Yet the consensus so far is that, in secret ballot, they will reelect some or all of those leaders.

In private conversation, Republican members of Congress blame Majority Leader John Boehner and Majority Whip Roy Blunt in no small part for their midterm election debacle. Yet either Boehner, Blunt or both are expected to be returned to their leadership posts Friday. For good reason, the GOP often is called "the stupid party."

While an unpopular Iraq war and an unpopular George W. Bush were primary causes of last Tuesday's Republican rout, massive public disapproval of the Republican-controlled Congress significantly contributed. While abandoning conservative principles, the spendthrift House had become chained to special corporate interests represented by K Street lobbyists.

This malaise is embodied in the avuncular speaker, J. Dennis Hastert, whose consistent response to accusations of failed leadership has been 20-minute lectures to closed-door party conferences pleading for Republican unity. As expected, Hastert is leaving the leadership now that the party is in the minority. But his departure leaves the other leaders in place, with their colleagues reluctant to turn them out.

That reluctance is typified by Rep. Eric Cantor, a 43-year-old third-term congressman from Richmond who has been his party's chief deputy whip for four years since being appointed by Blunt after only two years in the House. His voting record is solidly conservative, and he belongs to the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC). At the same time, Cantor is well regarded in all sectors of the party, and members see him as the principled kind of rising politician that Republicans desperately need.

But Cantor is not seizing this post-election moment to seek an elected leadership position. On the contrary, he has been supporting Blunt for reelection as whip out of loyalty to his mentor and patron. Bright and able though he is, Cantor has drunk the Kool-Aid in viewing the Republican Party as a private club where personal loyalties must transcend all else.

Blunt, like Hastert, was handpicked for leadership by Tom DeLay, the dominant Republican in Congress until his politically inspired indictment in Texas last year. When DeLay resigned as majority leader, the party's lobbyist-connected establishment decision was to promote Blunt from whip to leader and make Cantor the whip. But with the feeling that some change was needed, Boehner defeated Blunt for the top job, and Blunt kept the second-ranking post. In fact, Boehner's ties to K Street are even stronger than Blunt's, and he seemed to lose interest in reform once he became majority leader.

Rep. Mike Pence, the chairman of the RSC and a leader of reform, is an underdog candidate opposing Boehner. Rep. John Shadegg, Pence's predecessor at the RSC, who finished third in the race for leader in February, is running uphill against Blunt for whip on a reform platform. The conventional wisdom on the Hill is that, at best, only one of them can win, because the Republicans would not dare elect two conservatives to the two top House leadership positions.

In fact, the voting records of Boehner and Blunt are nearly identical to those of Pence and Shadegg. The difference between them was demonstrated Thursday when Blunt went to the Heritage Foundation to campaign for his retention as whip. He delivered a defense of earmarking, echoing the House appropriators' claim that the elimination of earmarks would do "nothing but shift funding decisions from one side of Pennsylvania Avenue to the other."

That is the view that led Republicans to earmark a "Bridge to Nowhere" and hundreds of other projects in competitive districts, hoping it would save them on Election Day. The House has been a place where Rep. Don Young (a notorious Alaska porker) was setting national transportation policy, where the "cardinals" on the Appropriations Committee established earmarking records, where the pharmaceutical industry had a pipeline to party policy and where even Speaker Hastert was making personal profits on an earmark. Maybe that's what Republicans want to retain, even in the minority.

© 2006 Creators Syndicate Inc.

Post a Comment

Comments: (Limit 5,000 characters)

Comments that include profanity or personal attacks or other inappropriate comments or material will be removed from the site. Additionally, entries that are unsigned or contain "signatures" by someone other than the actual author will be removed. Finally, we will take steps to block users who violate any of our posting standards, terms of use or privacy policies or any other policies governing this site. Please review the full rules governing commentaries and discussions. You are fully responsible for the content that you post.

In New Senate, The Middle Rules (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 13, 2006

For Democrats, who swept back into power in both the House and Senate last week, the pledge to govern in a bipartisan way may not be postvictory rhetoric. At least in the Senate, it's a mandate of the math.

While an effective 51-49 majority allows Democrats to organize the Senate - Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernard Sanders of Vermont ran as independents - it is still nine votes short of the 60 votes now needed to advance controversial bills on issues ranging from taxes to the Iraq war.

"Nothing can be accomplished in this town unless it's on a bipartisan basis," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, after meeting with President Bush and Vice President Cheney at the White House on Friday.

"The only way the American people will know if President Bush is sincere, the Democratic Congress is sincere, is with results. And we're willing to give it a try," he added.

The terms of the Democrats' narrow victory make a politics of the center even more imperative. Most of the new Democrats in the Senate won by running as moderates or fiscal conservatives.

"They were carefully chosen not to reflect the liberal mainstream of the Democratic Party, but to reflect the more conservative mainstream of their states," says Rhodes Cook, a political analyst in Washington.

"It might be a return to the days when Democrats were technically a majority party, but when you put Republicans together with southern Democrats, they were the majority," he adds.

Then, there's Ben Nelson. Last year, the Nebraska Democrat voted against a majority of his party more than half the time, according to a survey by Congressional Quarterly. But so did Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R) of Rhode Island. The two men often canceled each other's vote.

However, this year, Chafee lost. If past is prelude, that means a 50-50 Senate on many votes, with Vice President Cheney, as Senate president, breaking ties. New coalitions

While Senate Democrats are expected to lock arms over issues such as the minimum wage, there may be a new centrist coalition on issues including immigration, national security, and privacy rights.

Incoming freshmen Amy Klobuchar in Minnesota, Jon Tester in Montana, and Bob Casey in Pennsylvania defined themselves as moderate, independent voices, often at odds with Democrats in Washington. A former Navy secretary in the Reagan administration, Jim Webb upset Sen. George Allen (R) of Virginia on a campaign that showcased independence.

Rep. Benjamin Cardin (D) of Maryland, who will succeed retiring Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D), was one of the few House Democrats willing to work with Republicans on issues such as pension reform.

Conservative activists say that the centrist base of the new freshman class will limit how far the national Democratic Party can advance a more radical agenda.

"If people ran as liberals, I would be afraid for my issue [cutting taxes]. But there are very few Democrats who won running as liberals against conservative Republicans," says Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform.

For six years of the Bush presidency, Democrats have focused on blocking GOP initiatives. The next two years will showcase that Democrats can also govern, say party leaders in both the House and the Senate. Democrats' legislative agenda

Democrats plan to advance a legislative program in the first 100 days of the 110th Congress that includes increasing the minimum wage, passing all the 9/11 Commission recommendations, cutting the cost of student loans, lifting the 2003 ban on negotiating lower drug prices for seniors through Medicare, and promoting energy independence. They're also gearing up for hard-hitting investigations on issues ranging from the Iraq war to the nation's energy policy. Beware of intraparty disputes

DOJ_NMG_0092598

If the party can deliver only gridlock in the next Congress, they will quickly lose those moderate and independent voters who delivered last week's victory, say activists with the Democratic Leadership Council (DLC), a centrist think tank.

"If Democrats are smart, they can make these new and 'returned' Democratic voters part of an expanded party and an enduring national majority," argues a DLC position paper, "What's next for Democrats?" released Nov. 10.

"That's why we should all be wary of intraparty arguments that Democrats did well simply by 'fighting' or maximizing partisan differentiation from the Republicans, or that they can paste together a majority by insisting on ideological unity and ignoring parts of the country or parts of the party - e.g., 'red states' - that call for a more diverse and inclusive message," the paper states.

"Make no mistake: Our joy today will vanish if we can't produce for the American people," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D) of New York, who, as chair of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, recruited and helped fund Democratic candidates in the 2006 election cycle.

"If we can keep our focus on the average American family, we will stay the majority for a generation," he added. Senate Democratic leader: Nimble on his feet

As a boxer in high school, Harry Reid - now in line to be majority leader of the US Senate in the 110th Congress - trained for the boxing ring by running up steep grades, with his coach following behind in his car.

"They knew that if they stumbled or fell and did not promptly get up and continue, there was a good chance they would be run over," says Senator Reid's coach and mentor, former Nevada Gov. Mike O'Callaghan.

It's good practice for his next job: leading what its members like to call the world's greatest deliberative body. Two former majority leaders describe the job as "herding cats."

"The election is over. It's time for a change. It's time for open government. It's time for transparency. It's time for results," Reid said after Republicans conceded the seat in Virginia, giving Democrats their majority last week.

It's a job he didn't expect. When it was clear that then-majority leader Tom Daschle had lost his reelection bid in 2004, Reid summoned the stunned caucus to regroup. "We've got to talk about the future of our caucus," he said to Deputy Democratic leader Richard Durbin of Illinois, who credits Reid with "patching up some rifts in our caucus that had been around for a long time."

Known for his grasp of highly complex Senate procedure, Reid has always functioned better behind the scenes than in front of a camera. It was Reid who led the secret negotiations with Vermont Sen. James Jeffords over his defection from the GOP, which flipped control of the Senate to the Democrats in June 2001.

As minority leader after the 2004 elections, he often set majority leader Bill Frist back on his heels with surprise parliamentary moves. He famously called the Senate into "secret" session in November 2005 to demand that the Senate intelligence committee complete its stalled probe into whether the intelligence on weapons of mass destruction in Iraq had been politically manipulated.

In the past two years, he has repeatedly derailed Republican initiatives, including holding Democrats in line to block a GOP bid to tie a permanent repeal of the estate tax to a bill raising the minimum wage.

He's also one of the few senators who still practices the art of the filibuster. On Nov. 19, 2003, Reid stunned Frist and Senate Republicans by holding the floor for nine straight hours in a bid to defend the right to filibuster judicial nominations. Sustained by judicious sips of water, he read from his book about his hometown, "Searchlight: The Camp That Didn't Fail."

Reid has also made some celebrated errors, such as publicly boasting that Democrats had "killed the Patriot Act."

While critics have tried to link Reid to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff - Reid accepted nearly $70,000 in contributions from Abramoff's tribal clients - so far, charges of wrongdoing haven't stuck. But a disclosure last month by the Associated Press that Reid had violated Senate rules by failing to report a 2001 land transfer that later netted him $700,000 prompted Reid to amend his financial disclosure statements.

Array Of Fresh Faces Set For 110th Senate (WT)

By Amy Fagan

DOJ_NMG_0092599

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

The Senate today will welcome 10 new faces soon to join its ranks -- eight Democrats, one independent and one Republican. They include a novelist and former Navy secretary, three soon-to-be former House members, a state treasurer and an organic farmer.

Much like new college freshmen, the group arrives this week for orientation -- but theirs is into the new Democrat-controlled 110th session of the Senate.

Six Democrats in the new group defeated Republican incumbents to help usher in that new majority.

Sen.-elect James H. Webb Jr. of Virginia defeated Sen. George Allen in an extremely tight race. Mr. Webb, a decorated Vietnam veteran, is a former Republican who was Navy secretary under President Reagan. The 60-year-old is a strong opponent of President Bush's invasion of Iraq and switched parties because of it. Mr. Webb also has written six novels.

Bob Casey Jr., Pennsylvania's treasurer and son of a popular former governor, ran as an anti-Bush agent of change, defeating conservative Rick Santorum, the Senate's third-ranking Republican. But the 46-year-old Mr. Casey, a two-term state auditor, is more conservative than his party on some issues, including abortion.

Republicans lost their most liberal senator when Rhode Island's Lincoln Chafee was defeated by former Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse, a 51-year-old staunch Democrat. Mr. Whitehouse, who also was a U.S. attorney under President Clinton, ran a stridently anti-Bush campaign, but because Mr. Chafee frequently bucked the president, some surmise the voting patterns of this Senate seat may change little.

From the "Big Sky country" of Montana comes Jon Tester, the president of the state Senate who also grows organic wheat, barley and hay on his family farm there. The 50-year-old from Big Sandy -- population 710 -- demands a plan to bring the troops home from Iraq, is pro-choice and supports embryonic stem-cell research. He is pro-gun and will likely be outspoken on agriculture issues.

Claire McCaskill, who won one of the nation's tightest Senate races this year, is the Missouri state auditor and defeated Republican Sen. Jim Talent. As auditor she sought to root out wasteful spending, and because her Senate race centered on the embryonic stem-cell research debate, the 53-year-old will likely continue to push that.

Rep. Sherrod Brown, a House member since 1992 and former Ohio secretary of state, defeated Republican Sen. Mike DeWine. Mr. Brown, a liberal who earned a 100 percent rating last year from the liberal Americans for Democratic Action, has sponsored bus trips to Canada to buy cheaper prescription drugs and opposes the North American Free Trade Agreement and the Central American Free Trade Agreement. The 54-year-old author of two political books is also an Eagle Scout.

The Senate also will welcome a few Democrats who are replacing retiring Democrats. Amy Klobuchar, 46, is the first woman elected to the U.S. Senate from Minnesota and replaces retiring Sen. Mark Dayton. The two are "both are staunch Democrats with a solid progressive record," said Minnesota Democratic Farm Labor Party Chairman Brian Melendez.

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, Maryland Democrat, leaves the House and enters the Senate after defeating Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in a race to replace retiring Democrat Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes. Mr. Cardin, 63, served on the House's tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, where he blasted Republicans' Medicare prescription-drug plan as "a raw deal for seniors" and fought against the Republican Party's Social Security plan.

Finally, Rep. Bernard Sanders, 65 and a self-described "democratic socialist," enters the Senate as the longest-serving independent in the history in the House of Representatives, having been first elected in 1991. Like his predecessor, independent Sen. James M. Jeffords, he will caucus with the Democrats.

The lone new Republican is Tennessee's Bob Corker, former mayor of Chattanooga who keeps the seat of retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist in Republican hands. Mr. Corker, a 54-year-old businessman, became the state finance commissioner in the mid-1990s and as mayor cracked down on overspending and instituted merit-based bonuses for teachers.

McConnell Had Hoped To Be Majority Chief (AP-Y)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092600

It may go without saying that the job of Senate minority leader isn't exactly what Sen. Mitch McConnell had envisioned for himself after the elections.

While the Kentucky Republican regrets Democrats' control of Congress denies him the chance to become the next Senate majority leader, he sees the GOP carving out a significant, albeit slightly different role.

"We'll be able block or shape legislation. My preference of course is to accomplish things," said McConnell, who is now running unopposed to be Senate Republican leader.

When the new Senate convenes in January, Democrats will control 51 seats to Republicans' 49. The close split means Republicans still will have significant power, because it often takes 60 votes to pass legislation.

"Forty-nine is a pretty robust minority. I've been there when we were at 42," said McConnell, who currently holds the No. 2 position of whip in the Senate GOP hierarchy and is expected to succeed retiring Tennessee Sen. Bill Frist as GOP leader.

Republican senators are to pick their leaders on Nov. 15. Utah Republican Sen. Robert Bennett said McConnell has been methodically planning for the top job, fending off potential challenges along the way.

"Brick by brick, he built a firewall," Bennett said, adding that McConnell also has "the best political instincts of any of the people on the leadership team."

McConnell is part of a Washington power couple, with his marriage to Labor Secretary Elaine Chao. He has considerably more political experience than Frist had when he was catapulted into the majority leader's job in 2002. McConnell headed the committee that sets Senate rules and oversaw the GOP's recruitment and financial backing of Senate candidates.

Even Frist acknowledges McConnell's experience gives him "a huge advantage" taking on the Senate's GOP leadership. McConnell, Frist said, has another big strength: His ability to keep a secret in a town known for loose lips. Democrats, too, call McConnell a trustworthy adversary.

"My dealings with McConnell have been very straightforward, and he's kept his word," Senate Democratic Whip Dick Durbin of Illinois.

McConnell was best known until recently for blocking new limits on campaign donations, an effort that gained him a reputation as Darth Vader to his rivals. That success ended in 2002 when Congress passed a campaign finance bill.

A skilled fundraiser, McConnell argues that limiting money in campaigns is akin to muzzling political speech. He doles out advice and staff. along with money, to help other Republican candidates. His critics accuse him of protecting horse racing, tobacco makers and other special interests that figure prominently in his state and are among his campaign donors, and of sometimes resorting to harsh tactics.

In 1984, when he first won his Senate seat defeating Democratic incumbent Walter Huddleston, McConnell ran ads showing bloodhounds searching for Huddleston to convey his opponent as being out of touch with the voters. McConnell helped fellow Kentucky Republican Sen. Jim Bunning turn back a challenge in 2004.

"He is a master of the negative campaign," said Kentucky state Sen. Daniel Mongiardo, who lost to Bunning in that election. "He knows how to win elections. He knows it takes money and he knows that with enough money you can make your opponent look as bad as you need to."

Study Health-Plan Options Carefully This Open Season (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

For the next four weeks, federal employees and retirees will select their health insurance coverage for 2007. Many will escape the sticker shock of past years, as federal officials say 63 percent of enrollees in the federal employee health insurance program will see no increase in their premiums next year.

But policy analyst Walton Francis , who tracks premium and benefit changes in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, cautions against falling into open-season complacency.

Without the jolt of the usual large premium increase, "the danger is that people won't pay attention," he said. "They are going to yawn and go about their business, and that's a mistake.

"There is a 'change' page in every plan brochure, and people ought to be looking at that page," Francis said.

DOJ_NMG_0092601

He added, "There are lots of decisions to be made by each individual subscriber, and there is often a better deal available right now."

Francis is the chief researcher and writer of the annual "Checkbook's Guide to Health Plans for Federal Employees," sponsored by the nonprofit group that publishes Washington Consumers' Checkbook magazine. The guide rates the more than 250 FEHBP plans, taking into account premiums, catastrophic limits and estimated out-of-pocket costs for most medical expenses. The guide also figures in tax savings that employees gain by paying their premiums through pretax payroll deductions.

The 2007 guide, Francis said, shows that:

Â· Some plans are good buys and can save hundreds or thousands of dollars.

A federal family of four, for example, should check out Blue Cross basic, the American Postal Workers Union consumer-driven plan, the Government Employees Hospital Association standard option, and the Aetna and Mail Handlers high-deductible health plans.

The guide also give high marks to some health maintenance organizations, such as the Kaiser Foundation Health Plan's mid-Atlantic standard and high options, the Aetna Open Access basic option and M.D.-IPA.

A retired federal couple enrolled in Medicare parts A and B should take a look at the annual costs and savings under GEHA standard, Mail Handlers high-deductible, Blue Cross basic and the APWU consumer option, according to the guide.

The retired couple also might reduce medical costs by enrolling in an HMO, such as Kaiser's standard option, Aetna basic and the Aetna Health Fund consumer-driven option.

Â· Some benefits are changing, and sometimes for the better.

The Mail Handlers standard and high options have dropped their prescription-drug deductible -- a change that helps enrollees regardless of how much or how little they use prescription medicines. (Co-payments continue at Mail Handlers, such as a $10 co-pay for generic medications from in-network retail pharmacies.)

Â· Enrollees hold down their medical costs when they stay in-network.

Double-check to make sure your doctor and dentist accept reimbursement from federal plans. Dental and vision benefits, in particular, are based on preferred providers.

Â· Attention to premiums is especially important when deciding whether to enroll in the dental and vision program, which starts for the first time Dec. 31.

Regular health insurance typically covers annual checkups and teeth cleaning, and almost all health insurance plans provide coverage for accidental dental or vision injuries.

The stand-alone dental plans can cost several hundred dollars a year in premiums, and Francis suggests that they may make the most sense for people who anticipate moderately high dental expenses, want some protection against unexpected bills and like the predictability of paying a regular premium.

The vision plans also should be seen as a way to prepay routine costs for eye exams, glasses, contact lens and related services. They are not true insurance plans, Francis said.

Employees who are uncertain about whether to enroll for dental-vision coverage have the option of setting up a flexible spending account. FSAs help limit out-of-pocket costs by providing what the Consumers' Checkbook guide estimates as one-third savings on health-care expenses because payments are made in pretax dollars.

Hiding From Oversight (NYT)

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

There have been many examples of the shambles that the Republican-controlled Congress made of its responsibility for oversight of the Bush administration. But none was so peremptory as the mass firing of 60 House appropriations investigators last month — virtually the entire hired staff responsible for tracking spending abuses in such money pits as the Iraq war, intelligence operations and the $62 billion Hurricane Katrina relief effort.

The dismissed investigators — former F.B.I. and C.I.A. agents and other professionals — did not have their contracts renewed because their work has “not been that good,” in the words of a Republican spokesman who offered no compelling evidence. An attempt was made to sell the purge as a bipartisan decision, but it turned out to be the unilateral order of the committee's Republican chairman, Jerry Lewis of California.

DOJ_NMG_0092602

The result is that, until the Democrats assume committee control in January, there's an investigatory vacuum on such matters as soldiers' body armor in Iraq and levee and dam spending along the Gulf Coast. A year ago, amid public outrage over the administration's bungling of Katrina relief, Mr. Lewis promised that a timely public report would be made. No such report has surfaced.

There had been a bipartisan tradition on the committee, with majority and minority leaders proposing and signing off on investigation assignments. But that degraded with the arrival of one-party rule as Republicans shirked their oversight duty. This was obvious three years ago when the ranking Democrat, David Obey of Wisconsin, was rebuffed in his proposal for an investigation of the freewheeling intelligence operation quietly constructed by the administration in the Pentagon.

Mr. Obey takes the committee gavel in January, and among his tasks will be restocking the investigation staff and setting the committee back on a productive, bipartisan course. This should not be a matter of party vengeance, as some Republicans fear. Rather, it's a necessity of the course set by the voters to end one-party rule and find out what the government is actually up to.

Truth About The Trade Deficit (NYT)

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

Just as the summer driving season was winding down, oil prices started to fall. The combination of less demand and lower prices was a potent mix, helping to narrow the United States' trade gap significantly in September, to $64.3 billion from $69 billion in August, according to the latest tally.

That's welcome news, illustrating yet another upside to curbing the nation's oil consumption. But it's also sobering. The decline in September's trade deficit was the largest in nearly two years. And yet, the United States remains squarely on track for a record trade imbalance in 2006: a projected $790 billion, compared with $717 billion last year.

The Bush administration has played down the dangers of bloated deficits. Acknowledging them would compel an effort to tame the borrow-and-spend ways of the past six years, including curbing the tax cuts that have been such a boon to the rich.

Far too many Congressional Democrats have blamed China's cheap currency for the trade deficit and sought a solution in protectionism. The currency complaint has a grain of truth, but it is overly simplistic and could be self-defeating if it led to global protectionism.

So, both camps are off point. With the deficit reaching new highs and Democrats now able to wield real power, it is crucial that each side back off its constituent-pleasing myths.

The Bush administration needs to tell the truth about the vulnerability that comes with large deficits. Thus far, the United States has had no problem attracting money from abroad to plug the gaps. But there is no guarantee that will continue indefinitely. If foreigners chose to invest elsewhere — like the strengthening economies of Europe or Japan — the result would be higher interest rates and higher prices in America, perhaps sharply higher.

The Democrats need to take a more pragmatic view of the lopsided trade situation. The surest way to make American businesses more competitive — and workers more secure — is to resolve the nation's health care mess. And the government needs to update and strengthen the safety net for workers who are hurt by global competition. As recently as a few years ago, economists warned that a nation was courting a financial crisis if the size of its trade deficit exceeded 3 percent of its economy. Today, the United States' deficit is approaching 7 percent. The best way to avoid the worst is to define the problem honestly, and craft the remedies accordingly.

OTHER NEWS:

Karl Rove: The Architect's Faulty Specs (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092603

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - President Bush knew he was in for a rough night. As he settled down in front of the TV in the White House residence to watch the election results, the numbers were already grim. By 8 p.m., long before the polls closed out west, Bush realized it was over. "It looks like this is going to be a rout," he lamented to a handful of aides.

Downstairs in the West Wing, Karl Rove wasn't ready to concede anything. The president's political architect believed the GOP could hold on to slender majorities in the House and the Senate. He had history on his side: in 2004 he refused to believe the early exit polls while everyone else was resigned to defeat. This time he was convinced his numbers would come through again. But even Rove's optimism finally cracked when he took a gloomy call from an old friend working for Rep. Clay Shaw in Florida. Shaw won re-election two years ago by a 28-point margin; last week he was heading to a four-point defeat. At 11:01 p.m., Rove made the long walk to the residence. "We're losing the House," he told Bush. The president let out a long sigh and went to bed.

How did the man they call Bush's brain get it so wrong?

Rove's miscalculations began well before election night. The polls and pundits pointed to a Democratic sweep, but Rove dismissed them all. In public, he predicted outright victory, flashing the V sign to reporters flying on Air Force One. He wasn't just trying to psych out the media and the opposition. He believed his "metrics" were far superior to plain old polls. Two weeks before the elections, Rove showed NEWSWEEK his magic numbers: a series of graphs and bar charts that tallied early voting and voter outreach. Both were running far higher than in 2004. In fact, Rove thought the polls were obsolete because they relied on home telephones in an age of do-not-call lists and cell phones. Based on his models, he forecast a loss of 12 to 14 seats in the House—enough to hang on to the majority. Rove placed so much faith in his figures that, after the elections, he planned to convene a panel of Republican political scientists—to study just how wrong the polls were.

His confidence buoyed everyone inside the West Wing, especially the president. Ten days before the elections, House Majority Leader John Boehner visited Bush in the Oval Office with bad news. He told Bush that the party would lose Tom DeLay's old seat in Texas, where Bush was set to campaign. Bush brushed him off, Boehner recalls. "Get me Karl," the president told an aide. "Karl has the numbers."

The numbers looked a lot less rosy to the other architect of the campaign—RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman. It was Mehlman who built the much-vaunted turnout machine. But he feared that many inside the party were relying too much on technology, like voter databases, and had lost sight of the bigger picture: that voters were turning against them. "We've built a great new car, but the gasoline for the car isn't us; it's the candidates and the issues," Mehlman told NEWSWEEK. There was no bigger issue than the war, which Rove had pushed as a winning theme for the GOP. As he flew back to D.C. on a private jet two days before the elections, Mehlman scribbled his predictions on a card—not to be revealed until after the elections. His numbers were much closer than Rove's: the GOP would lose 23 in the House (5 short of the final tally), 5 in the Senate (1 shy) and 6 governors (spot on). Last week Mehlman announced he would step down and pursue opportunities in the private sector.

Rove blames complacent candidates for much of the GOP's defeat. He says even some scandal-tainted members won when they followed what he calls "the program" of voter contacts and early voting. "Where some people came up short was where they didn't have a program," he told NEWSWEEK. But even Rove concedes that there were several hardworking incumbents, like Mike Fitzpatrick in Pennsylvania's Eighth District, who simply couldn't overcome the odds. In an election overwhelmed by war and scandal, the program was no match for their party's problems.

"A Passing Thing" (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time, November 13, 2006

At 5:15 on election night, Karl Rove sounded jovial, assuring Sean Hannity's radio audience that Republicans would defy the polls and hang on to both the House and Senate. Less than three hours later, President George W. Bush was watching returns on TV in his private study with the First Lady and a few friends and aides. He leaned over as a blue riptide swamped Republican after Republican. "Looks like a rout!" he said.

The architect--as Bush famously called Rove--of the 2000, 2002 and 2004 G.O.P. wins now downplays his forecast. "My job is not to be a prognosticator," he told TIME in an interview in his West Wing office. "I told the President, 'I don't know where this is going to end up. But I see our way clear to Republican control.' My job is not to go out there and wring my hands and say, 'We're going to lose.'"

DOJ_NMG_0092604

Rove chalks up the loss to corruption, incumbent overconfidence and conservative dissatisfaction with spending. He does not read the outcome as exclusively a judgment on either Iraq or Bush. "Iraq mattered," Rove says. "But it was more frustration than it was an explicit call for withdrawal." Which is not to say the White House didn't see trouble coming. To keep the Republican National Committee from having to take out a loan, according to Republican officials, Bush chipped in $12 million of his campaign funds that otherwise would have gone to his presidential library. Looking ahead, friends say Rove has already identified four voter groups to watch in 2008: Catholics, Hispanics, suburban moderates and people with less than a college education. All four groups swung away from Republicans in this election.

Rove has not given up on his dream of a durable Republican majority, calling last week's loss a "transient, passing thing."

"The Republican Party remains at its core a small-government, low-tax, limit-spending, traditional-values, strong-defense party," he says. "I see the power of the ideas, even in a tough year." Friends say Rove plans to lie low in the '08 race until a nominee is clear. Then, whether in or out of government, he will be the connection between the White House and the campaign, refereeing the candidate's needs and Bush's own.

Will: Retreat From Exuberance (NSWK)

By George F. Will

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - In his graceful concession speech after President Jimmy Carter and he lost the 1980 election to Ronald Reagan in a landslide, Vice President Walter Mondale said voters had "quietly wielded their staggering power." They did so again last week. The Constitution designed the House to be the federal institution most responsive to gusts of opinion, and this year, with a gale blowing against the Iraq war, the House functioned as the Constitution's framers expected it to.

So with Democrats soon to be rampant on Capitol Hill, in the House and the Senate, is the Antibullying Campaign Act an idea whose time has come? No. That legislation would federalize, by throwing money at, the problem of children being beastly to each other in and around schools. Some House Democrats, unfazed by the suspicion that their party lacks a sense of the ridiculous, have actually proposed this. Two of its sponsors will be committee chairmen in the coming Congress.

Now, however, Democrats have bigger fish to fry. More than any congressional elections in history, last week's turned on a single burning national issue. Control of Congress has changed because of deep discontent about Iraq. But Congress can, realistically, have little control over what we make of the mess we have made.

Democrats could have demanded the departure of Donald Rumsfeld, but they have been pre-empted. They could cut off funding for the war, but that weapon is too blunt to be used. Besides, both parties know that, for all the arguments about whether there should be a deadline for disengagement from Iraq, the Constitution, in effect, sets a deadline for setting a deadline.

There will be—the Constitution is persnickety about this—a presidential election in 24 months. Republicans do not want to run in 2008 with 150,000 U.S. forces still caught in the crossfire of Iraq's sectarian strife. Democrats know that if Iraq is still aboil and the U.S. presence essentially unchanged, their 2008 presidential candidate will have to offer what their 2006 congressional candidates were not required to offer—an actual plan for dealing with the problem. And each party's nominee would dread the possibility that his or her presidency would be instantly entangled in an inherited war.

There is another, if perhaps slight, reason to hope for, if not congeniality, at least some convergence of interests between the executive and legislative branches. It is that the election that has elevated Nancy Pelosi to the speakership has produced a more conservative House.

The Democratic contingent in the House that will convene in January, enlarged to majority status by the addition of moderates from Republican-leaning districts, will be more conservative than it was in the last Congress. And the defeat of numerous Republican moderates means that the Republican contingent in the House will be even more ideologically monochrome than it was.

House Democrats have their leader, and she has an agenda for the next Congress's first 100 hours. Yes, hours. Her aim, perhaps, is to make FDR's hyperkinetic "100 days" look lethargic. House Republicans once again need a leader. In November

DOJ_NMG_0092605

1998, House Republicans were disoriented first by the resignation of Speaker Newt Gingrich (because of disappointing election results) and a month later by the announcement that his designated successor, Bob Livingston, would also resign (because of revelations about his private life). Seeking tranquillity, House Republicans chose Denny Hastert as leader.

By choosing him, an amiable master of the legislative process but not a man of ideas, they chose not to be led by California Rep. Chris Cox, a man less collegial but more cerebral. (He now is chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.) The result was the rise of a theory: "Earmarks"—targeted spending by members for their districts—could secure a permanent majority. That theory has been slain by a fact—last week's election. With Hastert's announcement that he will not seek a leadership position in the new Congress, House Republicans will have no choice but to reconsider how their behavior in recent years—particularly their ravenous appetite for pork—is related to having had leadership that was light on the ballast of ideas. The person Republicans choose as minority leader—John Boehner? Mike Pence? someone else?—will reveal what they think are the lessons of the election that deprived them of majority status.

For now, for the rest of the nation, "silence like a poultice comes to heal the blows of sound." (So wrote Oliver Wendell Holmes, father of the jurist.) Americans grateful for the end of the election cacophony and longing for lost civilities might remember what a former congressman said, late in life, as he fondly remembering the hotly contested 1800 election: "It was a pleasure to live in the good old days, when a Federalist could knock a Republican down in the streets and not be questioned about it."

Reaching For The Center (TIME)

By Joe Klein

Time, November 13, 2006

This was a big deal. Certainly, it was the endÂ of George W. Bush's radical experiment in partisan governance. It might have been even bigger than that: the end of the conservative pendulum swing that began with Ronald Reagan's revolution. Not only did the Democrats lay a robust whupping on the Republicans in the midterm elections, but--far worse--the President was forced into a tacit acknowledgment that the defining policy of his Administration, the war in Iraq, was failing. In 1994, when Bill Clinton lost both houses of Congress, he merely replaced his consultants and, liberated from the liberal wing of his party, sailed into the enforced moderation of divided government. Last week George W. Bush replaced Donald Rumsfeld, the blustery symbol of American arrogance overseas--and, after six years of near total control at home, had to adjust to a situation in which his vision had been rejected by the voters and his power seriously truncated. Rumsfeld was replaced by Robert Gates, who had been a junior associate on the foreign policy team of President George H.W. Bush and was well schooled in the cautious "realism" that marked the reign of Bush the Elder.

In fact, if there was a common strand in last week's Democratic victories and Republican defeats, it was the ascendancy of realists. The architects of the Democratic victory, Senator Charles Schumer and Congressman Rahm Emanuel, had calculated with cold-eyed efficiency which candidates the party would support, regardless of the extent of their orthodoxy. On the Republican side, realists seemed to be taking over the national security apparatus--even if was not yet clear that the President would follow their advice.

Bush's decision to delay the sacking of Rumsfeld until after the election will undoubtedly stand as one of the greatest mistakes of his presidency. It was a purely political decision, straight from the Karl Rove playbook: show no sign of weakness or indecision in the midst of a campaign--or, as Bill Clinton neatly summarized it, Strong and wrong beats weak and right. Not this time. "Strong and wrong" may have cost Bush the election. It may also have cost him whatever chance he had for a dignified exit from Iraq. His refusal to change his team and his strategy prevented an effective response to the centrifugal disintegration of Iraq over the past few months. The exit polls indicate that the war was not the main issue in the 2006 election: the general odor of corruption and incompetence emanating from Washington seemed to be the real motivator. But the Administration's stubbornness on Iraq, neatly symbolized by Rumsfeld's detachment from reality, certainly didn't help the G.O.P. cause.

While the U.S. was holding an election, Iraq's democratically elected government was proving itself a failure. "It's become clear that the Maliki government has made things worse across the board," a senior Administration official told me. The biggest winner has been the radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who is the most popular and probably the most powerful leader among the dominant Iraqi Shi'ites. In the past year, according to U.S. military and intelligence sources, the Iranians have placed their bets on al-Sadr, "doubling down" on their support for his militia, the Mahdi Army. As a result, leaders of both the U.S. military and the intelligence community have come to the conclusion that a major change of policy, an effort to prevent al-Sadr from eventually taking power, is in order. The mind-numbing difficulty of the situation had some very serious people grasping at straws, cracking jokes. "It's a Mick Jagger moment," the senior Administration official told me. "You can't always get what you want. The question is, Can we get what we need?"

DOJ_NMG_0092606

What we wanted was democracy; what we need is stability. No fewer than three efforts are under way to figure out how to achieve that goal--the Iraq Study Group, chaired by James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton; a new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq; and the Joint Chiefs' study group in the Pentagon. Up until last week, the biggest question was whether the President understood he was facing a Mick Jagger moment. But his selection of Gates and his constant references to the Baker commission may indicate that Bush now recognizes the futility of the neoconservative fantasy of an Iraqi democracy imposed by an American invasion--or it may have just been palliative spin, in a week when it was wise to seem humble. Either way, the dramatic turn for the worse in Iraq means that the President's previous policy--hang on with the current troop levels and hope for the best--cannot be sustained. And the dramatic turn toward the Democrats in Washington means that Bush's new Iraq policy will require bipartisan support. Last week the incoming Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, was asked if the Senate might legislate troop withdrawals if the President didn't figure out a way to begin them. "It may come to that," he said.

Of course, it is assumed by most people in Washington that bipartisan efforts on even the smallest matters, much less the war in Iraq, will be near impossible. You've heard the arguments: the House of Representatives will be controlled by ancient liberals of Vietnam vintage, just itching to investigate and indict; Bush has shown precious little inclination toward compromise in his various moral crusades--tax cuts, Social Security reform, the war--and Dick Cheney has shown even less. The standard postelection gestures toward peace and bipartisanship certainly seemed more starchy than genuine. The President opened his press conference with an ironic shot at the media: "Why all the glum faces?" If Jane Austen were writing a novel about Bush's public aspect, the title would be Pride and Petulance. But for the sake of argument and in the hope that sanity will prevail, let me make a mild case for optimism.

First, there is the muscular realism of the Democrats who ran the election campaigns, Schumer and Emanuel. They chose their candidates on pragmatism, not principle. Yes, many of the winners tended to be moderates, but that's because this was an election, especially on the House side, waged in moderate districts. In some cases, realism meant supporting the more liberal candidate. In Ohio, Reid and Schumer made a stark decision to force the attractive if inexperienced Iraq war veteran Paul Hackett out of the race and to support Congressman Sherrod Brown, a feisty paleoliberal whose vehement protectionism matched well with Ohio's economic desperation. In Pennsylvania, Reid and Schumer went with a pro-life candidate, Bob Casey Jr., despite shrieks from the party's pro-choice base. The common denominator wasn't liberalism or moderation but the ability to win. The question now is whether "winning" means blocking the President or demonstrating the ability to govern. It probably means a little of both, but I suspect the Democrats will be better served by proving they have the maturity to do the latter.

Why? Because the American public proved that it had the maturity to ignore, and in many cases rebel against, the sludge tide of negative ads that was splashed onto the public airwaves, primarily by Republicans. (A notable exception: Tennessee's Harold Ford Jr. was taken down by sleazy sexual innuendo.) Americans tossed aside candidates who had associated themselves with the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and those who had been involved in sex scandals, and those whose position on immigration slouched toward anti-Hispanic racism, especially in the Rocky Mountain gubernatorial contests and several congressional districts in the Southwest. They chose candidates who, in the felicitous words of Colorado Congressman John Salazar, "have manure on the outside of their boots rather than on the inside." Nowhere was this more literally true than in Virginia, where the operative metaphor actually was footwear. The Democratic challenger, Jim Webb, wore his son's combat boots and the Republican incumbent, George Allen, wore cowboy boots that were unstained (on the outside, at least). Webb's successful antiwar campaign was about the fate of his son, a Marine lance corporal serving in Anbar province; Allen's campaign was a dreadful series of gaffes followed by a despicable effort to smear the Democrat by quoting sexually explicit passages from Webb's critically acclaimed war novels. This election was not only about a disastrous war and the stench of corruption, it was also about a style of politics--the slashing negative politics practiced by a generation of media consultants in both parties. It was a message to politicians: stop slinging the manure, and start getting serious about the nation's problems.

DOJ_NMG_0092607

Which may be the most compelling case for a bit of optimism in a difficult time. In a meeting with political columnists, Reid said, "It's not a time to get even with the Republicans; it's a time to treat them the way they didn't treat us." And then he announced that he and Nancy Pelosi, who will be Speaker of the House, had decided to open the House-Senate conference committees to the press. This may seem a small point, but it has great symbolic relevance. The conferences are where the most important legislative action takes place, where compromises are worked out between House and Senate versions of legislation and where, in the recent past, all sorts of nefarious special deals for lobbyists and pork for legislators have been inserted without public scrutiny. In the old days, the conferences were public. They've been closed for at least the past 10 years, and during that time, pork-barrel earmarks have increased tenfold. It's not impossible that this arcane little adjustment will restore bipartisan compromise to its honored place as the essential act in a working democracy, and restore pork to its sordid, if greasily necessary, corner of the legislative dance. "We may actually have to work on Saturdays," Reid said, in a reference to the bankers' hours kept by the Republican Congress. "And I want to be clear, bipartisanship doesn't mean hugs and kisses. It's not going to be touch football; it's going to be a free-for-all. We're going to come out of that chamber covered in mud and with plenty of bruises, but that's the only way to get anything accomplished."

After a dark congressional session dominated by such pressing topics as the fate of Terri Schiavo, flag-burning and gay-marriage amendments--and the refusal to seriously address health care, energy independence, immigration or the war in Iraq--Reid's modest promise that his Senators will have some mud on the outside of their boots is realistic ... and also kind of exhilarating.

What Voters Really Want (USNEWS)

By Mortimer B. Zuckerman

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

It was, as President Bush put it, a "thumpin'" defeat. The verdict of the American people may be neatly summarized in Oliver Cromwell's lordly dismissal of the rump Parliament: "Depart, and let us have done with you!" Or in the blunt vernacular of the bleacher faithful: "Throw the bums out!"

The votes and the polls reflect an abiding disquiet. Roughly two thirds of Americans feel the country is on the wrong track, only about 35 percent approve of the president's performance, and an anemic 16 percent approve of the performance of Congress. And they're being charitable! It isn't that the rout of the Republicans represents strong support for the Democratic Party. Most Americans would probably describe the choice between the two parties as "the evil of two lessers." Congress failed in its duty to oversee the conduct of the war; it failed in its oversight of government spending; it failed to create an energy policy; its ethics scandals were outrageous. And the Republicans failed their own principles of financial integrity, turning a fiscal surplus of over $230 billion, which George Bush inherited, into a huge deficit albatross.

And let's not forget what some of this excessive spending was all about-political pork. The Washington term for this disgrace is "earmarks"—a better expression might be "pawmarks," for the device that allows politicians to lay their paws on taxpayers' money and spend it on back-home projects like bridges and bicycle paths without going through the normal vetting process. Remember Alaska's infamous $223 million "bridge to nowhere"? The number of "pawmarks" has shot up 10-fold since the Republicans took control of the House in 1994, ballooning from 1,439 to over 14,000 last year.

Lightning rod. All legal, no doubt, but then we have endured illegal sleaze, too: corruption symbolized by Jack Abramoff, the disgraced Republican lobbyist, and Randy "Duke" Cunningham, the California congressman now doing federal time after drawing up a menu of bribes for Pentagon contracts approved by his committee. On top of this pile of manure, we have also had a conga line of Republican members of Congress pushing laws favorable to specific corporations and industries, then becoming high-priced lobbyists for their paymasters.

Revolting as it all was, nothing hurt the Republicans more than the mess in Iraq. The possibility of success there was allowed to slip away through a fatal combination of arrogance and incompetence. Iraq, with its tortured history, was never going to be easy, but after 3 ½ years, with dozens of our troops dying each month and the nightly images of utter chaos on the evening news, is it any wonder voters are fed up? The resignation of Donald Rumsfeld was thus inescapable. He had become a lightning rod, despite the fact that he had a lengthy record as a brilliant manager. Somehow or other, he got Iraq wrong and had to pay the price.

DOJ_NMG_0092608

Competence has long been a Republican virtue. But it is downright incompetence that so staggered the public - incompetence and cronyism revealed by Hurricane Katrina, the nomination of Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court, the half-measures on immigration reform, the scramble to undo the handover of a half-dozen U.S. ports to an Arab-owned company. Perhaps all this might be explained by an administration so wedded to its neoconservative agenda that it treated deviation as heresy and was thus unable to adjust to the changing realities in Iraq. The Republican majority in Congress decided to govern from its base and conducted itself in the most shamelessly partisan way—just at a time when most Americans were seeking bipartisanship and pragmatism. Even now, such behavior may be unlikely, given that we are already in the first week of the next presidential campaign and congressional election.

How The West Is Being Won (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - Jon Tester's farm isn't in the duded-up part of Montana, where hedge-fund managers go fly-fishing. It's in a north-central plain, where his Swedish ancestors settled in 1916. Until seven years ago, Tester's bio read: organic dryland farmer, custom butcher and music teacher. Then the power company was deregulated, prices skyrocketed, and he ran for the legislature as a Democrat. Last week he ousted Republican Conrad Burns from the U.S. Senate in a contest that cost $20 million—a number that would impress even a fly-fishing hedge-fund manager. "The West is growing," Tester told me. "It's where the action is."

American politics has always been defined (or imprisoned) by Mason and Dixon, by regional rifts engendered by slavery, the Civil War and the Bible Belt. But now the relevant names are Lewis and Clark. The land west of the Mississippi, especially west of the 100th meridian, is the new swing region—and the place where Democrats hope to win the White House. "It's our 21st-century-majority strategy," said Simon Rosenberg of the New Democratic Network.

The 2006 election highlighted the old paradigm—and the new. The Northeast turned a deeper blue. GOP moderates there are all but extinct; Democratic governors were elected by vast margins. The Republicans' Fortress South, up-armored with evangelicals by George W. Bush and Karl Rove, cracked at the perimeter but largely held. The "intermountain" West, meanwhile, was up for grabs. Democrats won the governorship in Colorado (and now have won five of the region's eight statehouses since 2002). The GOP hung onto the governorship in Nevada and a key Senate seat in Arizona.

The westward trend is clear. For the first time, leaders of the House and Senate are from the Far West. Democrats put Nevada in a crucial early spot in the presidential-selection process, and will hold their convention in Denver. Republican front runners have Western roots (Sen. John McCain from Arizona, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a leader of the Utah-based Mormons). Spanish-speaking Democrats (Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut) can go native.

As Hispanics grow in clout, so does the West, where most of the nation's 43 million Latinos live. In 2004, 44 percent of their voters supported Bush; in 2006, only 30 percent did—driven away by the party's get-tough rhetoric on immigration. The key presidential swing states now: the cluster of Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado and Nevada. The new map means politics could be less party-oriented, says Thomas F. Schaller, author of "Whistling Past Dixie." Westerners aren't "socialized to partisanship," he says. And they are "libertarian" by nature, says Tester. The GOP must hold the faith-based while appealing to the less socially judgmental West; Democrats must avoid the big-government label, anathema to Westerners' self-image. "We have an individualistic attitude," Tester says. "It's 'Leave me alone and let me farm'." That won't be possible for Tester, however. He's heading East, and turning over the farm to his daughter and son-in-law.

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092609

Turns out that the Gang of Three who've held the top job in the Pentagon communications office since President Bush took office have more in common than explaining the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and, at least until last week's surprise flameout, defending Donald Rumsfeld. They cook. Or more specifically, they are Thanksgiving turkey fryers. "It's fun," says Bush's first Pentagon spokeswoman, Torie Clarke. "There must be something about the office," joshes fryer newcomer Dorrance Smith, who succeeded weekend outdoor chef Lawrence Di Rita. Smith tells us he just purchased a deep fryer, picking one from the national Barbeques Galore chain, then E-mailing Di Rita and Clarke for helpful tips on getting started.

Clarke, a self-described "fryer queen," had lots of them, including (1) Wear goggles. "That stuff could splatter; it could blind you." (2) Fry two smaller birds: It's fast and easier to serve. (3) Demand peanut oil—it cooks better. "Don't go look at the price of peanut oil," Clarke E-mails Smith, "and have a heart attack, and go with something else." And don't coat the bird with seasoning, she says. Smith's done a dry run with a chicken, and all went well, or certainly better than a recent fry at the Clarke home. "One time, we forgot we put the second turkey in," she confesses. On finding it the next day, "it looked like one of those petrified fossils. It looked like it was 10,000 years old."

A Speaker and Her Smack-Down Roots

Outgoing House Speaker Dennis Hastert, the former high school wrestling coach, isn't the only fan of the sport in the House. We hear that incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is a buff, though of the more flamboyant TV wrestling. In wooing the youthful World Wrestling Entertainment crowd, she declared herself right before the election to be a huge fan of the first smack-down great, Gorgeous George. See, she was a girl when George Wagner brought showmanship to the sport. And his flair, which was said to influence Liberace and Muhammad Ali, made her a TV fan forever.

Political Ads: From Bad to Worse

Sorry if you hated all those candidate calls at dinnertime during the last two weeks of the midterm elections, but it's only going to get worse in 2008. Both parties plan to invade your computer with instant messages and pop-up ads, and your cellphone and BlackBerry will get zapped with text advertisements. But there is good news. They plan to cut back on TV advertising because it just isn't as effective as the Internet.

The Chairman's Weatherman Trick

One of the big surprises for the Democrats in the elections was winning up to 33 percent of the white Christian evangelical vote. And here's how they did it: Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean says he simply bought every advertising minute available on Christian radio, effectively blocking out the GOP. Ads touted Democratic values. The real secret: "We had the weatherman doing the ads. Why? Because he's a local person who could be trusted."

Where The Republicans Went Astray (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - This is how a revolution ends. Not with a bang, or a "thumping," as President George W. Bush called the 2006 Republican defeat at the polls, but with a misdirected phone call and a certain sinking feeling that even the most well-intentioned politicians can grow weary of rectitude and sell out their principles for the right price.

The scene happened almost 10 years ago, when the GOP revolution in the House of Representatives was still fresh, less than three years after Newt Gingrich and his promise of a Republican "Contract With America" had swept aside four decades of Democratic rule in the House. The House in that summer of 1997 was considering passage of its annual transportation bill, routinely a fat pork sausage of legislation, larded with goodies—bridges, tunnels, exit ramps, highway extensions—for individual congressmen to take home to their districts. A band of a dozen true believers from the Class of '94, the congressmen first elected under the Gingrich banner of reform, was meeting in a small room off the floor of the House. They were trying to plot some way to slow down or stop the pork-stuffed bill—to show that the GOP was still true to its campaign promises to cut profligate government spending.

The phone rang. According to one of the congressmen in the room, Joe Scarborough, another congressman—Steve Largent, a former NFL wide receiver and one of the leaders of the group—picked up the receiver and absentmindedly mumbled, "Yeah." At the other end of the line, Largent heard the voice of Elmer G. (Bud) Shuster, the all-powerful, all-beneficent chairman of the House Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure. Shuster, an unabashed practitioner of old-style politics, was notorious in the House for rounding up votes by dispensing highway projects to pliable congressman. Shuster apparently did not recognize Largent's voice over the phone. The chairman thought he had instead reached a different congressman—who shall remain nameless in this retelling, but who was well known at the time, a stalwart figure who often spoke of "standing up against the Man." Dictating quickly at the other end of the line, Bud Shuster was in a hurry—like Santa Claus on Christmas Eve, he had a lot of deliveries to make. Without pausing for pleasantries, he ticked off five highway projects worth $70 million, the reward to the supposedly high-minded congressman for swallowing his scruples—just this once!—and voting for the 1997 transportation bill. Package delivered, Shuster hung up.

DOJ_NMG_0092610

Largent, the ringleader of the plotters, put down the phone and tried not to show his disappointment that one of their fellow do-gooders had apparently given in to temptation. Instead, as Scarborough recalls the story, Largent sardonically announced, "Well, I don't think [Congressman X] is going to be with us this time." The others in the room dryly laughed, but it was a demoralizing moment, recalls Scarborough. "You get beaten down," says the MSNBC talk-show host. (Contacted by NEWSWEEK, Largent, who suffered a stroke this year, said he could not recall the phone call; Shuster could not be reached for comment.) Scarborough told NEWSWEEK that it became a "running joke" for members of the Class of '94 to say to each other, "Well, there goes the revolution," every time one of their Contract With America reforms—like imposing term limits on members of Congress—was abandoned by lawmakers intoxicated with power.

Was the fall of the Republican revolution as predictable as the fall of man? Did the GOP revolutionaries, like so many revolutionaries before them, have to become the very thing they had once vowed to change? Gingrich, the former House Speaker, who stepped down in late 1998 before he could be pushed out, blames his successors for taking the low road to disaster. With his fondness for alliterative lists, Gingrich cites four areas where the Republicans fell short or went astray: "Candor, competence, corruption and consultants." He specifically blames former majority leader Tom DeLay, who effectively replaced Gingrich as the GOP leader in the House from 1999 through 2005. In Gingrich's judgment, DeLay, as well as other Republican leaders, threw away the power of ideas in their narrow focus on self-preservation. "When an institution develops 'the Hammer' as a model, that's not the most intellectual form of leadership," says Gingrich, alluding to DeLay's nickname, earned for his skill at enforcing party loyalty in the handing out of favors to lobbyists and influence peddlers. (DeLay did not respond to NEWSWEEK's requests for comment.)

But Gingrich deserves some of the blame himself for providing a grandiose and ultimately weak model of leadership. The story of the rise and fall of the Republican revolution in the Houseof Representatives is a timeless story of vanity and hubris—and a cautionary tale for incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi and the new Democratic leaders, who would like to inaugurate another long periodof their party's rule.

The Republican revolution hardly started with Gingrich. The seeds were planted by the GOP's failed but visionary 1964 presidential candidate, Barry Goldwater, and conservative prophet William F. Buckley; the Reagan landslide of 1980 brought the movement to power in the White House and the Senate, which the GOP held until 1986.

The House, however, long seemed a lost cause; it had not been in GOP hands since the first two years of Eisenhower's presidency. It was Gingrich who first saw a way to exploit growing public dissatisfaction with the old Democratic barons of big government in the House, Speaker Thomas P. (Tip) O'Neill of Massachusetts and his successor, Jim Wright of Texas. Gingrich, then an obscure Republican backbencher (O'Neill referred to him as a "stooge," as in the Three Stooges), used a new forum—C-Span—to rail against Democratic corruption. In 1989, somewhat surprisingly, he succeeded in forcing the resignation of Speaker Wright, who was implicated in a scheme to profit off book sales in violation of House rules.

Gingrich had been a bit of a joke even in his own party. The son of a military officer, he seemed to some lawmakers to be a Walter Mitty, a soldier wanna-be who had missed Vietnam (student and family deferments). Gingrich spouted a kind of utopian futurism about the "opportunity society" and handed out tapes so other congressmen could learn, as the accompanying instructions put it, to "talk like Newt." Some congressmen made fun of the tapes. But others listened—and learned. The 1994 congressional campaign was a referendum on big government—Hillary Clinton had launched a massive health-care reform plan that wound up strangled by its own red tape. Gingrich mounted an attack on the "bureaucratic welfare state" that caught the public mood—and shocked the pundits and prognosticators by returning the Republicans with a 26-seat majority in the House.

DOJ_NMG_0092611

Suddenly it was Speaker Gingrich. Irrepressible, he launched biting personal attacks on the First Lady, chortling, "We are a happy band of Vikings, who don't mind a fight!" More seriously, he led a campaign that summer to cut federal spending and succeeded in squeezing $50 billion out of the budget before he attacked the hardest nut: Medicare. Gingrich's attempt to trim spending on medical care for the elderly does not seem that extreme—he wanted to restrain the rate of growth from 10 percent a year to 7 percent over seven years. But he immediately ran into a political buzz saw.

Gingrich compared his leadership style to that of Charles de Gaulle, Thomas Edison and Winston Churchill; he likened his legislative gambits to the battle strategies of the Duke of Wellington and Ulysses S. Grant. "Newt couldn't help himself," recalled Dick Armey, then Gingrich's House majority leader. "He was always just as grand as he could be." At first, President Bill Clinton seemed so diminished by the midterm humiliation that he had to argue that he was "still relevant" at a press conference in the spring of 1995. But by summer, after handling the tragic terror attack on the Murrah Building in Oklahoma City with grace, the president was secretly conferring with an old political consultant, Dick Morris, who was reminding his boss that governing was really a "permanent campaign." At Morris's urging, Clinton launched a demagogic but extremely effective advertising campaign accusing the Republicans of trying to "eliminate" Medicare.

In October '95, Clinton held a press conference at which he charged that the Republicans were cutting health care by $200 billion so that they could give the same amount of money back to the wealthy as tax breaks. Joe Scarborough was watching with some fellow freshman from the Class of '94. "I remember we broke out laughing, saying, 'That poor fool'," Scarborough recalled. The joke was on the Republicans. As the budget battle turned into a stalemate later that fall, the government shut down. Clinton blamed the Republicans, darkly warning that Social Security checks would no longer be mailed out. The president repeatedly outfoxed Gingrich. When Gingrich flew on Air Force One to the funeral of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Clinton declined to find and negotiate a budget solution (preferring, instead, to play hearts up front with business tycoon Mort Zuckerman). Gingrich threw a tantrum on their return—and the New York Daily News (owned by Zuckerman) ran a front-page cartoon of Gingrich in diapers (which the Democrats made into a poster and, in a mischievous violation of House rules, stuck on the Speaker's chair). Gingrich ultimately caved in and had to plead with his own hard-liners to reopen the government.

Clinton continued to outflank Gingrich, effectively stealing much of the Republican platform by being tough on crime and welfare and declaring that the era of big government was over. Worn down, Gingrich privately confessed, "I'm not a natural leader. I'm a natural intellectual gadfly." Even after Clinton was consumed by the Monica Lewinsky scandal in 1998, Gingrich was unable to lead; his own troops were already plotting to purge him.

Gingrich's resignation after the 1998 election (the Republicans lost five seats) brought on an interlude that could only be described as comic opera. At the height of the Clinton impeachment proceedings, the new House Speaker-designate, Rep. Robert Livingston of Louisiana, resigned after the publisher of Hustler magazine, Larry Flynt, placed an ad in The Washington Post offering up to a million dollars for information about sexual indiscretions by D.C. officials. After a story broke in the press, Livingston admitted to extramarital affairs in a dramatic speech on the floor of the House. Livingston did not run for Speaker and resigned his seat.

Stunned Republicans chose a blandly amiable former high-school wrestling coach, Dennis Hastert, as their next Speaker. But the real power belonged to DeLay, who rose from whip to majority leader in 2003. A former Houston pest exterminator and archfoe of the Environmental Protection Agency, DeLay gave off a cold, hard look that was the polar opposite of sunny Reaganism. He delighted in his "Hammer" nickname. From the beginning of Gingrich's tenure, the GOP's K Street offensive had warned lobbying firms along Washington's K Street corridor that they would be wise to hire Republicans if they wanted access. There was nothing especially new about such a partisan approach to the influence-peddling business. The Republicans had only to look across the aisle to study a past master at shaking the corporate tree—former representative Tony Coelho, the onetime chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. But DeLay brought a new brazenness to the game. Before long, lobbyists could be seen in committee rooms writing legislation. With corporate coziness came the abandonment of fiscal restraint. Committee chairmen now routinely handed out "earmarks," special provisions authorizing spending for members' pet projects. In 1987, President Ronald Reagan vetoed a highway bill because it had 152 earmarks. In 2005, President Bush signed a transportation bill with 6,371 earmarks.

DOJ_NMG_0092612

The nadir of the delay era may have come in the early-morning hours of Nov. 23, 2003. The Republicans, who had once tried to cut back entitlement programs, were now voting to create a whole new one—a bill to provide prescription-drug benefits for the elderly. Normally, House members have 15 minutes to cast their votes. Instead, DeLay & Co. kept the voting open for three hours—until 6 a.m.—while they persuaded old-fashioned fiscal conservatives to abandon their scruples. The exact nature of the inducements has never been clear, but Rep. Nick Smith charged that "bribes and special deals were offered to convince members to vote yes." (For Smith's vote, the leaders allegedly offered financial and political support for the congressional race of Smith's son.) The House ethics committee, effectively neutered in recent years, gave DeLay a wrist-slap reprimand. DeLay accepted the committee's "guidance," adding that he "would never knowingly violate the rules."

The House took on a Darwinian feel. It was every man for himself as staffers and even lawmakers cashed in to become lobbyists. The number of registered lobbyists in Washington nearly doubled, to 37,000, between 2000 and 2006. About half of the 200-odd congressmen who left their seats after 1998 stayed in Washington to become lobbyists or consultants. They would use their privileges as retired congressmen to lobby in the House gym and even on the House floor.

It was perhaps inevitable that the culture of sleaze on Capitol Hill would produce a Jack Abramoff. With his two downtown restaurants and his skybox at the sports arena, Abramoff was a popular host to congressmen and staffers. He was positively gleeful about bilking his clients, ultimately liberating several Indian tribes of $82 million in fees. "I wish those moronic Tiguas were smarter in their political contributions," Abramoff e-mailed Ralph Reed, his friend and the former head of the Christian Coalition. "I'd love us to get our mitts on that moolah!" When Abramoff finally pleaded guilty to fraud, he effectively took DeLay down with him. Several of DeLay's former staffers were caught up in the Abramoff scandal. DeLay was not charged with any wrongdoing, but he was embarrassed by an all-expenses-paid golfing trip to Scotland with Abramoff. Under indictment for campaign-money laundering in Texas in a weak but nagging case brought by a local prosecutor, DeLay gave up his seat in June. (He has pleaded not guilty; the case has not gone to trial.)

Hastert was never able to exercise the same iron control as DeLay. Nor was DeLay's successor as majority leader, John Boehner, able to bring real discipline to fractious House members who looked out primarily for their own political interests. The religious evangelicals became more demanding of the Republican leadership on Capitol Hill, leading to the deeply unpopular spectacle of the Terri Schiavo case. Last year Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, eager to court religious conservatives for a possible presidential run, and the House leadership, sensitive to the religious right, intervened to try to keep the patient alive on a feeding tube, a questionable use of federal power, especially for a party that once stood for less government interference.

The GOP's evangelical base was shocked and demoralized this fall when Rep. Mark Foley of Florida was exposed for having sent salacious messages to congressional pages. House leaders blamed each other for not responding to warnings that Foley was a possible sexual predator. In early October, when Hastert was compelled to hold a press conference to announce that he would not step down as Speaker, it was clear that the GOP revolution was in its late Jacobin phase.

Even so, the Republicans might have kept control of Congress had it not been for GOP overreaching on a different front—Iraq. In some ways, the hubris of Gingrich and DeLay was minor compared with the willful risk-taking of President Bush, backed by Vice President Dick Cheney, a former congressman from Wyoming.

History is full of accidents and what-ifs. Cheney was the second-ranking House Republican when he got the call to become secretary of Defense in 1989, at the beginning of the George H.W. Bush administration. (Bush's original nominee to become SecDef, former senator John Tower of Texas, was disqualified by allegations that he was a tippling womanizer.) Had Tower not been blocked from taking office, and Cheney not chosen as his Pentagon replacement, Cheney probably would have stayed in the House—and become Speaker when the Republicans won in 1994. "If Cheney had stayed I never would have gone in the leadership," Gingrich told NEWSWEEK last week. Gingrich rated Cheney as a perhaps less imaginative but more politically shrewd lawmaker than himself. Had Cheney stayed in the House and not become a war-hawk adviser to both Presidents Bush, history might well have taken a different course. We will never know. But we do know this: Democrats who, in the glow of victory, now say that none of this could happen to them ignore the story of the last dozen years at their peril.

Alter: The End Of The Road For U.S. Conservatism (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

DOJ_NMG_0092613

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - The Category 4 political hurricane of 2006 was more than a referendum on an unpopular war and president: it signals the end of the conservative tide that began rising 40 years ago; it's the end of a pernicious six-year experiment in "governing for the base," and in many ways it's a blessing in disguise for George W. Bush, who now has the opportunity to salvage something of his presidency.

Pat Buchanan and I rarely agree, but he rightly points out that the election marked the exhaustion of the movement that Barry Goldwater launched with his 1964 campaign. The intellectual vitality and coherence that once characterized modern conservatism have been shattered. Karl Rove is still arguing that the hot issues of this election—Iraq, corruption, sexual hypocrisy—are only "transitory." He's ignoring deep fissures in his party. Neocons have been discredited and theocons dispirited. Libertarians feel betrayed by big spenders, incompetent interventionists and moralizing busybodies. In the Schiavo case, in which 70 percent of voters thought Washington should have butted out, Republicans drove a wedge through their own ranks. Same with immigration, which pits the free-trade business wing against nativist Lou Dobbsians. Most important, the stitching that was meant to hold the GOP's big tent together contained none of the hope and optimism essential to success in American politics. Fear failed.

It failed among the young (18 to 29), who were evenly divided four years ago, but this time gave the Democrats a 20-point edge. It failed among Hispanics, who favored Democrats by 69 to 30 percent. And it even failed among white soccer moms and office-park dads, who turned the American suburbs an unrecognizable shade of blue. The 49-state GOP landslides of 1972 and 1984 are now distant memories, as onetime bellwether states like California, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and even Ohio trend heavily toward the Democrats. Texas and the Old Confederacy are no competition.

To recover, conservatives plan to return to what they call the "core principles" of small government and lower taxes. But there's a reason they abandoned budget balancing: it's a loser politically. There just aren't many votes in it, and that's why Republicans didn't cut spending. People want the government to deliver for them. Without earmarks—which will now flow to pork-hungry Democrats—and the protection-racket money they got from selling out to lobbyists, Republicans might have lost an additional 20 seats. More than two dozen GOP incumbents won by six points or less and are vulnerable next time.

Their peril has its origins in Bush's highly divisive effort to intensify the conservative movement instead of governing from the center. After the razor-thin 2000 election, he listened to shortsighted advice from pollster Matthew Dowd that "swing" voters were extinct and success lay in turning out "the base." But more than one third of American voters identify themselves as independents, which is a higher percentage than claim a party ID. Smart politicians have always known that the G spot of the American body politic is in the middle.

So the Conservative Era is over, a cautionary tale for Democrats who might be tempted to impose a liberal one. Bush, who worked well with a Democratic legislature in Texas, must now admit that America is not Dittohead Nation. He is free of the one-party rule that kept him from being pragmatic—the not-so-secret ingredient in every successful presidency. Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neill (taxes and Social Security), George H.W. Bush and George Mitchell (the budget) and Bill Clinton and Newt Gingrich (welfare reform) all showed how presidential concessions in a divided government can burnish a president's legacy, and even lead to new wings in his library.

For Bush, there are opportunities for consensus not just on Iraq but on immigration, Social Security reform, energy—and even on tax cuts, which he could shift from the wealthy to the middle class. The near wipeout of moderate Republicans makes it tougher. But the interest of the president in his legacy and the Democratic Congress in putting points on the board are aligned. After all the predictable vetoes and subpoenas and finger-pointing, this alignment has the potential to give Bush new political life—and his party a chance to avoid the grim fate of all extremists in American political history.

Quinn: The Economic Perception Gap (NSWK)

By Jane Bryant Quinn

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - Talk about being in denial. President Bush thought that voters should credit him for a great economy, even if they opposed the war. Just look at the numbers: low unemployment, low inflation, record profits, taxes down, stocks up.

DOJ_NMG_0092614

But in exit polls, half the voters called the economy "not good" or "poor." Only 31 percent said they were "getting ahead" financially. Someone's not in the loop. Is it the public or the prez?

I'll give you a hint: the answer lies in the election returns. The public declared that they're changing the terms of the debate. True, this country is richer than ever, with people spending more at all income levels. But too many unaddressed problems have been piling up—the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, retirement insecurity, oil dependence, political and corporate corruption, budget deficits, health-care costs and hot issues such as stem-cell research. Nobody seems to know what to do.

Creeping doubt can turn into a seismic shift in political thinking, says Allen Sinai, chief global economist for Decision Economics. For example, take the perceived failures of the Carter years. They ushered in Ronald Reagan, whose antigovernment rhetoric has dominated our choices for the past 25 years. But answers don't seem to lie in that direction anymore. "Another great political wave may be building up, and once it rolls out it doesn't quickly get reversed," Sinai says.

The new wave—the one the public sees but Bush does not—is a pervasive feeling of permanent insecurity, says Yale political scientist Jacob Hacker, author of the new book "The Great Risk Shift." By "risk shift," he means that employers and governments have left us more on our own, to fund our health care and retirement plan. Bush's ownership society doesn't look good if you're on the street at 61 and need a Starbucks job for health insurance.

At the top, the "working rich" are doing stupendously well. In 2004, the wealthiest 1 percent of households (with incomes higher than $315,000) copped 53 percent of all the year's income gains. Americans usually don't care how much other people get as long as they're doing OK themselves. But lately, they haven't been. Median incomes for households with people of working age (65 or less) fell last year for the fifth year in a row. Adjusted for inflation, these families are bringing in $3,000 less, the Economic Policy Institute reports. When the president tells them they're fine, he sounds out of touch.

One statistic, however—the slowdown in job growth—may not be as bad as it sounds. The reason could be partly demographic rather than a sign of economic weakness. Baby boomers will be leaving the work force in rising numbers. The working-age generation behind them is comparatively small. Teenagers are staying longer in school. So collectively, there's less growth in the number of people to employ, according to a study by the Federal Reserve System. That should be good for earnings, over time. Employers will have to pay scarce workers more, and the work force will have higher levels of bankable education.

In Washington, the political parties will be sharpening their agendas for the wide-open '08 presidential race. The Republicans have one last chance to show they can fix things, after all. Otherwise, voters will bring in new top management. If there's indeed a longer-term shift in public-policy thinking, here's how the economic priorities will shake out:

The minimum wage. It's expected to rise from $5.15 an hour to $7.25—not a stretch, for the country as a whole. In 22 states and the District of Columbia, the wage is already higher than that; six more states authorized increases at the ballot box this year. That fits with similar data developed by Princeton political scientist Larry Bartels. He's shown that income growth, for the middle class and poor, rises substantially more under Dem presidents than under Republicans (the rich fare about the same, either way).

Taxes. The superrich lost their chance to abolish the estate tax on money left to heirs. Dems will almost certainly want to renew Bush's middle-class tax breaks, such as tuition credits. But the wealthy will find themselves in the cross hairs.

Social issues. Universal health insurance will be back on the table. Congress will target the high cost of prescription drugs. You'll see tax-favored savings programs for the average guy, not just for the person who can afford to put large sums away. Social Security has to be fixed. Money will be shaken out of the Pentagon's budget, assuming a pullback in Iraq.

The new regime won't be cooking anyone a free lunch. But in concept, it believes that government can help. Dems lean toward economic security, not go-it-alone. Can they do it? We're going to see.

Steele Interested In Heading RNC (AP-Y)

By Brian Witte, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 13, 2006

Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, who lost his race for a Senate seat, expressed interest Sunday in becoming chairman of the Republican National Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0092615

"I have not had any conversations directly with the White House yet on this," Steele told C-SPAN.

Ken Mehlman, the current chairman, is stepping down when his two-year term ends in January. Mehlman made a point of emphasizing outreach to black voters and helped recruit Steele for the Maryland race.

Steele, who lost to Democratic Rep. Benjamin Cardin by a margin of 55 percent to 44 percent of the vote, said he believed it was time for the GOP to rethink its views in wake of losing both chambers of Congress in last week's midterm elections, which he described as a "tsunami." Steele said the electorate "was very clear."

"They expected the administration and the party to step up and speak to particular issues and, failing that, there would be heck to pay — and we paid," Steele said.

Steele said he wasn't sure when an announcement would be made on who will be the new committee chair.

Steele was head of the Maryland Republican Party before being elected lieutenant governor in 2002 as the first black candidate elected statewide in Maryland. His term as lieutenant governor will end in January.

Steele also explained why he largely avoided mentioning his party affiliation while campaigning. In a state where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans 2-1, Steele said it was obvious what party he belonged to and there was no need to "rub it in your face."

"In a state like Maryland, there was an opportunity to move away from the labels and really try to dig beyond, you know, being a Republican or Democrat, red state or blue state," Steele said. "In fact, that's what people are sick of. I think we saw the results on Tuesday just how sick they are."

Two Democrats Struggle As Georgia Bucks A Trend (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

MACON, Ga., Nov. 10 — Politically speaking, Georgia proved to be a mirror image of the rest of the country in the midterm elections. Republicans swept nearly every statewide office, and turnout among Democrats was low, thanks to a lackluster candidate for governor.

But two Democratic congressmen in highly competitive races in the state seem to have successfully fought those odds, though they are hanging on by the slenderest of margins and are still waiting for their opponents to concede.

The two Democrats, Jim Marshall of Macon, in the Eighth Congressional District, and John Barrow of Savannah, in the 12th District, were on the Republican Party's short list of beatable incumbents. Their adjoining districts, which encompass large rural areas, were redrawn by a Republican legislature, their opponents were former congressmen, and the National Republican Congressional Committee poured hundreds of thousands of dollars into the races. President Bush campaigned in each district twice.

"It is a year that if you look at Georgia compared to the rest of the nation, there's a real counterprevailing trend," said J. Christopher Grant, a political science professor at Mercer University in Macon, "and it is actually amazing that these folks were able to hang on." Mr. Marshall squeaked by with a lead of 2,040 votes in a district on the home turf of two of Georgia's most prominent Republicans, Gov. Sonny Perdue and Senator Saxby Chambliss.

Mr. Barrow, whose race was so close it is one of eight in the House that have not been called by The Associated Press, led by 963 votes. (The other seven races involve Republican incumbents.) The results have not been certified, and a spokesman for Mr. Barrow's opponent, Max Burns, said enough ballots remained uncounted that he could pull ahead. If Mr. Barrow should lose, he would be the only Congressional Democrat ousted by a Republican this year.

As the state's only white Democrats in Congress, both men relied on incumbency and their relatively conservative records, while also focusing on getting voters, especially blacks, to the polls. Mr. Marshall doubled the amount of money he planned to spend, to nearly $2 million. Mr. Barrow's campaign emphasized his independence, portraying him as willing to break with the Democratic party line.

Erick Erickson, a Republican political consultant, lawyer and blogger in Macon, said Mr. Barrow had been more vulnerable than Mr. Marshall. Mr. Barrow is a freshman whose liberal base in Athens was shifted away in the redistricting. Mr. Marshall, a former mayor of Macon, is in his second term and was familiar to his new constituents because they were in the Macon media market and therefore had frequently seen him on television. While the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spent more than $500,000 to help retain Mr. Barrow's seat, it spent less than $100,000 in Mr. Marshall's race.

DOJ_NMG_0092616

While an outsider looking at raw numbers would probably assume that Mr. Marshall could be picked off, said Mr. Erickson, the chief executive of the Redstate blog, "if you actually know something about the district, you come to the conclusion that he would be hard to beat."

Mr. Marshall is popular and moderate, and several voters interviewed mentioned his constituent services and accessibility. He is a Vietnam veteran who has repeatedly visited the troops in Iraq and courted the large military presence in the district, and, Mr. Grant said, votes the way his constituents would want him to even if his personal views are more liberal.

But the Marshall race turned out to be no less competitive. "When Bush came back the second time, that was a signal to me that they had tracking numbers that were showing the gap closing," said State Senator Robert Brown, a Macon Democrat who led a get-out-the-vote drive that focused on blacks who voted infrequently.

In both districts, Republicans tried to link the incumbents with controversial figures like Representative Cynthia A. McKinney, a Democrat who lost in the August primary, and paint them as likely to raise taxes and grant amnesty to illegal immigrants. At the same time, the incumbents were hamstrung, unable to bring in Democrats with national name recognition because of their unpopularity in a part of the country where President Bush is well liked.

The National Republican Congressional Committee spent more than a half-million dollars in each race, and the Economic Freedom Fund, an independent group financed by Bob J. Perry, the Texas homebuilder who bankrolled the Swift boat veterans' attacks against Senator John Kerry in the 2004 presidential campaign, bought advertising as well. Mr. Marshall's campaign estimated that he was the target of more negative advertisements than any other candidate in the country.

"The principal thing is that voters in middle Georgia and south Georgia have a pretty clear perception of who I am and what I stand for," Mr. Marshall said over breakfast at Nu-Way Wieners in Macon on Friday. "And that perception wasn't undone, at least not altogether undone, by the campaign of my opponents."

But, he said, his Republican challenger, Mac Collins, "had a staff that was willing to say virtually anything, utterly untroubled by fact and truth, a total end-justifies-the-means mentality."

A spokesman for Mr. Collins, Bill Hagan, said the campaign would not comment until the results were certified.

At Jeneane's Cafe in Macon, two Republican women neatly illustrated the nuances voters sifted through on their way to the polls.

One, Sally McLemore, ticked off a list of Mr. Marshall's good deeds: support for Robins Air Force Base, farmers and rural health care. But, Ms. McLemore said, she voted for Mr. Collins.

"I was thinking national level, and we're clearly in a crisis and we need to stick with the Republicans," she said. "I don't want to see Nancy Pelosi as speaker of the House; I think it's dangerous."

She added that she was happy Mr. Marshall was a conservative Democrat. "Now that it's all over and done with, I'm delighted he's there because I think he's a voice of wisdom."

The reasoning of Ms. McLemore's friend, Peggy Steele, ran the other direction. She voted for Mr. Marshall. "I was counting on the other Republicans to worry about the national," Ms. Steele said, "and I was worrying about the local."

But other voters said the national climate had worked in Mr. Marshall's favor. At the Fresh Air Bar-B-Que in Butts County, in the new part of the Eighth District, the owner, George Barber, supported Mr. Collins, who grew up down the road.

"Politics is certainly a fickle thing," said Mr. Barber, who owns the business with his brother. "Had it been two weeks earlier or two weeks later, it might have had a different outcome."

Fresh Off The Farm In Montana, A Senator-to-Be (NYT)

By Timothy Egan

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

GREAT FALLS, Mont., Nov. 9 — When he joins the United States Senate in January, big Jon Tester — who is just under 300 pounds in his boots — will most likely be the only person in the world's most exclusive club who knows how to butcher a cow or grease a combine.

DOJ_NMG_0092617

All his life, Mr. Tester, 50, has lived no more than two hours from his farm, an infinity of flat on the windswept expanse of north-central Montana, hard by the Rocky Boy's Indian Reservation.

For all the talk about the new Democrats swept into office on Tuesday, the senator-elect from Montana truly is your grandfather's Democrat — a pro-gun, anti-big-business prairie pragmatist whose life is defined by the treeless patch of hard Montana dirt that has been in the family since 1916.

It is a place with 105-degree summer days and winter chills of 30 below zero, where his grandparents are buried, where his two children learned to grow crops in a dry land entirely dependent on rainfall, and where, he says, he earned barely $20,000 a year farming over the last decade.

"It's always been tight, trying to make a living on that farm," said Mr. Tester, still looking dazed and bloodshot-eyed after defeating Senator Conrad Burns, a three-term incumbent, by fewer than 3,000 votes.

Chouteau County, where Mr. Tester lives on a homestead of 1,800 acres, lost 8.5 percent of its population in the last five years — typical of much of rural America that has been in decline since the Dust Bowl.

To make extra money, Mr. Tester taught music to schoolchildren, and still plays a decent trumpet despite having only seven fingers (he lost the rest to a meat grinder as a child). He got into politics just eight years ago in a sustained rage over what utility deregulation had done to small farmers and businesses in Montana.

"You think of the Senate as a millionaire's club — well, Jon is going to be the blue-collar guy who brings an old-fashioned, Jeffersonian ideal about being tied to the land," said Steve Doherty, a friend of Mr. Tester's for 20 years. "He's a small farmer from the homestead. That's absolutely who he is. That place defines him."

Mr. Tester used to ride his motorcycle down from the farm to Great Falls to play softball with Mr. Doherty. He played third base, not an easy position for a man with a shortage of digits. They were colleagues later in the State Senate, of which Mr. Tester was the president this year. It is a part-time job, with the Legislature holding regular sessions of 90 days only every other year.

Congress has done little to improve the lives of people living in the dying towns across rural America, Mr. Doherty said.

"When Jon talks about the cafe that's trying to hold on, the hardware store that just closed, the third generation that can't make a living on the farm, he is living that life," Mr. Doherty said.

Still, there was never a master plan, Mr. Tester said, for the arc that took him from soil conservation district leader to state senator to one of the victors who gave Democrats control of the Senate.

"I'm kind of a fatalist," he said, breaking into a smile. "The good Lord gives you opportunities."

And Mr. Tester learned quickly how to exploit those opportunities, running a bare-knuckle campaign against Mr. Burns, with a barrage of name-calling and negative advertisements making hay of the senator's ties to Jack Abramoff, the disgraced former Washington lobbyist.

Republicans complained that Mr. Tester's campaign was relentless and went overboard. Montana is a big state with a small population, where politicians are known on a first-name basis. The ferocity of such attacks seemed out of place, some here said.

Also, they said Mr. Tester favored measures while in the State Senate that had the effect of raising taxes on many of the small businesses that he promotes. They called him "Taxer Tester" for much of election year.

But with his trademark flattop — refreshed every three weeks for $8 at the Riverview barber shop here in Great Falls — Mr. Tester was a tough target for Republicans to stereotype as "just another Washington insider," as one radio attack ad put it.

Republicans have kept their hold on the intermountain West in part by promoting issues known as the three G's: gays, guns and God.

On gays, Mr. Tester says the "sacred document" of the Constitution should not be amended to outlaw same-sex marriage, though he favored a state ban that voters passed in 2004. On guns, Mr. Tester is quite proficient in their use, and says anyone — Republican or Democrat — who tries to take his away will run into trouble. On God, Mr. Tester says simply that he is a churchgoer, and notes that he met his wife when he spotted her in a pew.

"The fact is, I'm just a regular Montanan," he said. "Those issues are important, but what I heard from people is concern about health care, fiscal responsibility and how we're throwing so much money into a war."

DOJ_NMG_0092618

Mr. Tester and his wife of 28 years, Sharla, grow organic lentils, barley, peas and gluten-free grain in a county with 1.5 people per square mile. It is all earth and sky on the Tester family ground. A hundred years ago, a region with so few people was considered frontier.

Mr. Tester is very much in the mode of his longtime friend Gov. Brian Schweitzer, a Democrat who can be more prickly than Mr. Tester. The governor recalled a favorite moment with Mr. Tester from the last legislative session.

"We're sitting there in this room where governors and powerful people used to drink whiskey and smoke cigars, me and Jon, and both of us had a bag of sunflower seeds — Russian peanuts we call them — trying to spit the shells into a cup," Mr. Schweitzer said. "We looked at each other and laughed, like, What are we doing here?"

Republicans said that Mr. Tester was a favorite of "extreme liberal bloggers" and that the down-home persona masked an agenda out of step with much of America.

And indeed, the liberal Web site Daily Kos took up Mr. Tester's cause early. When he announced he was running for the Senate, he was an underdog to a better-financed and better-known Democrat who was being promoted by the party establishment.

After Mr. Tester won the primary by a huge margin, Daily Kos posted a picture of him on its site, with the caption, "Say hello to the next senator from the great state of Montana."

Mr. Tester is also a favorite of the band Pearl Jam, which promotes many liberal causes. But his tie is personal. The area around the town of Big Sandy, population 658 and falling, produced not only Mr. Tester, but also Jeff Ament, the bassist for Pearl Jam. The band did a concert in Missoula this year for Mr. Tester.

On the campaign trail, Mr. Tester spoke often of how "regular folks" just "haven't been given much of a shake." He is distrustful of global trade agreements that have hurt farmers, and big drug companies and health maintenance organizations that he says have put medical costs out of reach for many people.

Asked why he became a Democrat in a region that has been overwhelmingly Republican for the last generation, Mr. Tester said: "It started with my parents, who always said the Democrats work for the middle class. And in agriculture, Franklin Roosevelt did a lot of good things."

Friends say not to worry about Mr. Tester going native in Washington. He said he planned to return home to the farm several times a month. He promised his barber, Bill Graves, that he would continue to come back to get his hair cut in the same wheat-field bristle.

"I haven't noticed a change yet," Mr. Graves said. "He's the same man. Got a real dry sense of humor. We talk about everything. And then he says, 'See you next time.' "

How Many Wins Make Up A 'Wave'? (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

There is no doubt that Democrats did well on Tuesday, capturing almost 30 seats in the House, six seats in the Senate and control of both chambers. But was it the Democratic "wave" that so many had believed was about to sweep the country?

Republican leaders said it was not. Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), who led the GOP's House campaign committee, said it was simply "a matter of history repeating itself." On the day of the elections, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman warned of a "six-year itch."

By some measures, the Republicans are right. Since World War II, the party in the White House has tended to lose seats in Congress in the sixth year of an administration, and the average losses matched this year's -- 29 seats in the House and six in the Senate. When there was an unpopular war, the losses were greater.

But political scientists say that assessment of Tuesday's results ignores an important change in recent years. They say Republicans have re-engineered the political map, stuffing congressional districts with supporters to make the districts reliably pro-GOP. The financial and electoral advantages of incumbency, moreover, have reached new heights.

DOJ_NMG_0092619

The election results are "actually huge because of the structural advantage Republicans had going into the election. Democrats had very little low-hanging fruit," said Gary C. Jacobson, a scholar of congressional elections at the University of California at San Diego.

Although Democratic gains were substantial, they might not have been the "historic election" of which incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) boasted last week. "It's more than the Republicans claim it is, but it's much too early to say it's equivalent to the huge upheavals we've had in the past," said Walter Dean Burnham, a professor emeritus at the University of Texas.

In five midterm elections since World War II -- in 1946, 1958, 1966, 1974 and 1994 -- the president's party lost more seats in the House than the GOP did this year. The losses in two midterm years were comparable to this year's, while in eight they were smaller. On the Senate side, the president's party lost more seats four times, the same number once and fewer seats 10 times.

The most common comparison to 2006 is 1994, the year of the last "wave" election, when the GOP picked up 55 House seats, nine Senate seats and control of both houses. But political scientists are divided on whether 2006 stacks up to 1994.

Judging by the number of seats gained, 2006 clearly does not, but other figures suggest it does. The average vote received by the Democratic candidate in the nation's 435 congressional districts was 55 percent this year, compared with 51.6 percent for Republicans in 1994, according to Andrew Gelman, a professor at Columbia University.

What's more, many GOP gains in 1994 came in districts that had been trending Republican for years, especially in the South. In contrast, the Democratic wins last week largely came in districts that had voted for President Bush in 2004. "Democrats had a lot fewer targets than the Republicans [in 1994], but they took a larger share of their victories from the tough districts," Jacobson said.

But John Coleman, a professor at the University of Wisconsin, argues that in influencing the political views of the electorate, the Republicans' victory in 1994 was more dramatic. That year, he said, voters endorsed a clearly defined conservative philosophy embodied in the GOP's "Contract With America."

"That campaign was overtly more ideological in direction," Coleman said. "The Democratic Party didn't really need to make much of an ideological case in 2006. You don't have that sense, going in, of a strong push in some other ideological direction."

Nonpartisan analysts in Washington invoked wave metaphors throughout the campaign. Stuart Rothenberg, author of a political newsletter, predicted a Democratic "wave," and after the election, said, "Of course we had a wave." Amy Walter of the Cook Political Report wrote in her column, "Instead of a wave that wiped out everything in its path, this political storm zig zagged its way across the country."

Lawrence Jacobs, a professor at the University of Minnesota, said Tuesday's outcome offered a new twist on "wave" elections: More than 90 percent of incumbents were reelected, but the election is viewed as a mandate for change.

Asked Jacobs: "How do you talk about an election where there was clearly an important change in who controls the majority and it was a setback for the Republican project, but we see so much continuity from one Congress to the next?"

Midterm Election Leaves Political Landscape Blurry (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Rarely has an election result been delivered with such force and clarity, and still left so many unanswered questions in its wake, as that of the 2006 midterm campaign. What happened is unmistakable. What it may portend is far less obvious, making the 2008 election, which already has begun, potentially the most important in a generation or more in shaping the nation's politics.

Democrats have been quick to claim that 2006 will be remembered as the end of a conservative era. No one doubts that the midterm election was a rejection of President Bush's policies in Iraq and of the Republicans' style of governance. But was it really a rejection of conservatism itself? It will take future elections to prove the Democrats' claim.

What the election was not, in the view of strategists in both parties, was a powerful affirmation of the Democratic Party, despite its takeover of the House and Senate. One post-election survey, conducted for the liberal groups Democracy Corps and the Campaign for America's Future, found that both Republicans and Democrats emerged from the contest with negative images.

DOJ_NMG_0092620

"This is not an election where one party went down and the other party went up," said Stan Greenberg, whose firm conducted the survey on election night and the night after. "The story still has to be written on how this period becomes a period for Democratic dominance."

Tuesday's election left American politics in a remarkably fluid state. In just six years, the political discussion has moved from analyzing the reasons for the nation's 50-50 divide, to predictions that the Republicans were close to establishing a durable majority, to questions about whether Tuesday marked a pendulum swing back toward the Democrats.

After years of politics aimed at mobilizing and energizing the bases of their respective parties, Democrats and Republicans are again focused on the electorate's shifting center and its potential to change the balance of power in the country. On Tuesday, Republicans decisively lost independents and moderates, but it is not yet a given that those voters will stay with the Democrats. Which party claims that constituency in the future will depend on the answers to a series of questions that will shape the politics of the next two years.

Foremost among them is which party can gain the public's trust to keep Americans safe in a world of terrorism and rogue-state threats. Exit polls suggest Democrats made significant headway this year in reducing what has been a historic Republican advantage. Whether that is permanent or transitory is of central importance.

Equally important is the question of which party can adequately address the twin problems of keeping the United States competitive in a global economy and restoring the social contract that has helped provide economic security to workers and that has been shattered as a result of the corporate restructuring that globalization has brought about.

A third is which party can best navigate the thicket of social and cultural issues in a way that both preserves a sense of American values and accommodates the need for greater tolerance in a society that has become increasingly diverse.

Tuesday's election also suggests that the 2008 campaign will be fought on different geographic terrain. Throughout the decade, the political map of America has been relatively fixed, with Democratic blue states along the coasts and in parts of the upper Midwest, and most of the rest of the country a giant swath of Republican red.

That map now may be, if not obsolete, at least open to revision. Traditionally Republican Virginia increasingly looks like a state turning purple -- neither red or blue on election strategy maps. With former governor Mark R. Warner; his successor, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine; and James Webb's surprise victory over Sen. George Allen (R) last week, Democrats have demonstrated that Republicans no longer can take the state for granted.

As significant as the changes in Virginia is the transition underway in Colorado. Democrats scored important gains there on Tuesday, winning the governorship and a House seat and expanding their state legislative majorities. For all the focus on Ohio as the decisive presidential battleground over the last few years, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) would be president today if he had won both Virginia and Colorado.

The electoral map that has emerged from this election shows Republicans in control of the South, Democrats the Northeast. Democrats gained ground in the Midwest, but it remains a vitally important battleground.

Farther west, Rocky Mountain states are becoming the newest areas for competition between the parties. Democrats now control the governors' offices in Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, Wyoming and Montana, and they have pushed Nevada to the front of their caucus-primary calendar in 2008 in the hope of spurring a shift in their direction there as well.

The Pacific Coast still looks like a Democratic bastion, although California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) has shown that a less doctrinaire brand of Republican -- Sen. John McCain or Rudolph W. Giuliani, for example -- could put the nation's most populous state in play.

Republicans reject Democratic claims that Tuesday's results stopped conservatism's rise in its tracks. "This election was a rejection of Republicans," said Whit Ayres, a Republican pollster. "It wasn't an acceptance of Democrats, especially since they provided no recognizable alternative agenda."

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said the party -- as distinct from its core philosophy -- took a beating, but he called it a setback from which the party could emerge much healthier. "Since the ascendancy began, there have been a number of years when we've had setback elections: 1976, 1986, 1992," he said, referring to the rise of conservatism. "We have been stronger in the end because we learned from them."

DOJ_NMG_0092621

That was a way of warning Republicans not to dismiss last week's results as an aberration. "If we dismiss this, we give Democrats a huge opportunity," he said. "We need to learn from this and do better."

Simon Rosenberg, who heads the Democratic group NDN, saw the election in fundamentally different terms -- as a marker in which the public rejected conservatism as an alternative governing philosophy to what Democrats had offered in the past. Still, he was not prepared to call it the arrival of a new era of Democratic dominance.

"We're now back at a much more even playing field," he said at a post-election review of the results. "We're entering a whole new period in American history, where neither party or ideology has an advantage."

The midterms will be remembered as a referendum on the Iraq election, and the voters' verdict will push the White House and the Democrats toward agreement on potentially significant changes. Both parties now have an incentive to resolve their differences -- Republicans to remove the single biggest reason for their losses on Tuesday, Democrats to avoid what happened to them during the Vietnam era, when they bore the blame for the unsatisfying way an unpopular war was ended.

The competition for the center of the electorate ultimately will be fought and won in the general election in 2008. But before either party gets to that, they will have to resolve internal differences on Iraq, terrorism, health care, entitlement reform , taxes, trade and a cluster of social issues.

Both the legislative priorities set out by the president and leaders in the 110th Congress and the upcoming presidential primaries will serve as forums for settling some of these questions. That makes the 2008 election more than a contest of big personalities, even though a possible race between Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and McCain (R-Ariz.) already has the cable talk shows in a lather.

Democrats face internal debates over just how populist the party's economic message should be, and on the war in Iraq. Many elected officials favor a reduction in troops but no fixed timeline. But Eli Pariser, who heads the MoveOn.org political action committee, said many Democratic voters want an explicit timeline. "People weren't just vaguely wanting a change on Iraq," he told a post-election conference. "They wanted something specific."

William A. Galston of the Brookings Institution, who served as domestic policy adviser to President Bill Clinton, said Democrats were brought back to power because of protest against Republicans, and now they must show they can govern. "The American people are prepared to watch and listen," he said. "But I think they will be evaluating the performance of the new Democratic majority very carefully."

Republicans must resolve their own questions: Can they reconstitute conservatism to make it attractive once again beyond the party's base? GOP strategist Mary Matalin said the Reaganite model of low taxes, smaller government and strong defense can again serve the party well, if it is updated. "It needs to put some Britney Spears clothes on it," she said.

Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.) said the party should ignore moderates' calls to spend money to attract new groups of voters. But the GOP has seen erosion among one group that it has spent years wooing -- Hispanics, who defected apparently over the party's tough stand on illegal immigration, which included passage of legislation for a fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

"I am concerned about where we stand with Hispanic voters," Mehlman said. "The day we become just the party of the wall, not only won't we secure the borders, but we will substantially limit the growth of the party."

The Democrats' victories last week ended a dozen years of Republican rule in Congress and dealt a significant blow to Bush's presidency. The next two years will answer which party best learned the lessons of what the voters were saying.

The Media's Dark Role (WT)

By Douglas Mackinnon

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

Nov. 7, 2006, will be remembered as the day the Democratic Party took back control of Congress for three distinct and critically important reasons.

DOJ_NMG_0092622

First and foremost was the series of Republican missteps -- such as corruption, the leadership turning a blind eye to the corruption, budget-busting earmarks and a lack of real action on illegal immigration. These actions not only suppressed the vote for the Republican Party, but actually energized a number of Democratic voters.

Second was the number of incredibly well-run Democratic campaigns and their own very impressive get-out-the-vote machine. This was great stuff by any honest assessment.

Third, Nov. 7 needs to be remembered for something even Republicans don't have the stomach to address at the moment: that the remnants of objectivity in the mainstream media were all but exterminated by some on the left. A chilling and ominous development that played some role in the Democratic wave that is still splashing around the red states.

Make no mistake. Along with the multitude of Republican gaffes, and the hard work of the Democrats, there can be no doubt that the left-of-center mainstream media helped to manufacture this election victory for the Democratic Party. For parts of the last two years, many in the media have worked in concert with the Democratic spin doctors to indoctrinate the American voter into believing this election had to be a referendum on President Bush and the "failed" war in Iraq.

Horrified by Mr. Bush's re-election in 2004, as well as the historic Republican gains in the House and the Senate that year, some liberals in the media were determined to do everything in their power to ensure that there was no GOP celebration in 2006, even if that meant confirming to the world that they proudly abandon professionalism and ethics in the name of partisanship and ideology.

To make the election of 2006 a referendum on Mr. Bush and "his" war, the media knew full well they had to present that conflict in the worst possible light for as long as possible on their nightly newscasts, cable programs and front pages. Then, after force-feeding the American people a steady diet of this carnage for weeks at a time, the same media outlets would then "poll" the voters to get their impressions of Iraq and Mr. Bush.

Amazingly, against the protests of soldiers fighting and dying in Iraq, the mainstream media stuck with this partisan plan to only showcase the negative, the misery and the gore. They ignored the pleas of these soldiers to show that not only did they liberate a nation from a genocidal tyrant, but with compassion and great decency (often at the cost of their own lives), they helped to rebuild the country and connect with its people on a much-needed human level. The good far out-numbers the bad in Iraq, but the good was the enemy of a Democratic victory on Nov. 7.

Worse than becoming a public-relations arm for the Democrats, did some in the media actually aid and abet al Qaeda with their biased coverage? It has been fully documented that al Qaeda and the insurgents believe that if you kill enough American soldiers and have those deaths played on a loop by the American media, then the American people and their politicians will grow weak in the knee and call for a withdrawal.

Knowing that to be a stated goal of al Qaeda, and just before the election, CNN still decided to take a horrific video given to them by the insurgents, and put it on the air for the world to see. And just what was on this video? Only heroic American soldiers being murdered in cold blood by al Qaeda snipers. Other than to damage the administration or advance a partisan agenda, why would CNN air such disgusting footage?

Next, to all but ensure the desired outcome, a number of left-of-center "journalists" decided it was necessary to prematurely crown the Democrats the victors. Their thinking was that if you tell a lie or predetermine the results often enough, it becomes fact. So, months before the election, on the front page of the top one hundred left-of-center newspapers in the United States -- with a readership well north of 70 million people -- banner headlines proclaimed that the Democrats were all but certain to take both houses of Congress. Day after day, week after week, these liberal papers foretold a future beneficial to the Democrats.

This is a future that has now come true. To be sure, the majority of the blame rests with the Republican Party and its lemming-like march to become what it defeated in 1994. That said, it is not partisan, nor out of line, to ask if some in the media carried water for the Democrats in this election.

While it is certainly true that left-of-center media outlets continue to hemorrhage readers and viewers in search of fairness and balance, for the moment they don't seem to care. Because of the unethical actions of some within their industry, they helped determine an election.

The Democrats won, but democracy has paid a price. Who in the media is willing to address that?

Douglas MacKinnon was press secretary to former Sen. Bob Dole. He is also a former White House and Pentagon official.

DOJ_NMG_0092623

For Democrats, How Long A Honeymoon? (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

The media kept saying the war was going badly. The Bush administration said progress in Iraq was being obscured by relentlessly negative coverage.

The media kept saying the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina was badly botched. President Bush initially said his administration was doing a heckuva job.

The media kept saying the Democrats were heading for a big win on Election Day. Karl Rove, when told by National Public Radio's Robert Siegel that he was reading the same campaign polls as the White House strategist, declared: "No, you're not. No, you're not. No, you're not. I'm looking at 68 polls a week . . . and I add up to a Republican Senate and Republican House."

The GOP lost control of Capitol Hill last week for a number of reasons, particularly the war (the televised pictures of growing casualties were hard to shake off) and the scandals involving Jack Abramoff, Tom DeLay, Duke Cunningham and Mark Foley (all of which were broken by news organizations). At times it seemed journalists and administration officials were offering two different versions of reality. But in the end the polls accurately forecast the thumping to come.

Now the question is whether a press corps that has been openly at odds with the president will hold the newly empowered Democrats to the same tough standards.

As with any new regime, Sen. Harry Reid and Rep. Nancy Pelosi are enjoying a media honeymoon for the moment -- especially Pelosi, because of her status as the first woman in line to become House speaker and her grandmother-of-five persona. That may not last long. But where will journalists set the performance bar?

If the Democrats don't pass much legislation, or if they craft bills that Bush vetoes, will the press blame them for gridlock? If they start rejecting one Bush nominee after another, will the press say they are obstructionist? If, after railing against Republican corruption, they pass only cosmetic ethics reform, will the press say they were all talk and no action?

When Democratic committee chairmen issue subpoenas and conduct oversight hearings, will news accounts portray them as harassing the White House? Or will journalists recognize that aggressive congressional inquiries were a normal practice until the GOP Congress, which loved to investigate the Clinton White House, essentially stopped scrutinizing the Bush administration? And if Senate Republicans who denounced Democratic filibusters start trying to talk things to death, will journalists call them on the double standard?

While Bush retains the biggest megaphone, Democratic leaders will be getting more television time now that they control the House and Senate. In a media-drenched culture, the sound-bite warfare may prove as important as the legislative maneuvering.

The biggest change may be in store for liberal commentators, radio hosts and bloggers, some of whom enjoyed a good long gloat last week. For years now, they have been on offense against the administration and the war, and taking potshots is plenty of fun, as conservative pundits learned during the height of the Clinton scandals. But now the lefties will have to spend time defending the Democratic leadership for any missteps and failures. And if Reid and Pelosi compromise with their more moderate colleagues, will hard-driving liberal bloggers turn on them?

For much of his tenure, Bush has used the media as a foil, limiting access, criticizing news organizations for disclosing national security secrets, and mocking the "prognosticators" who said the Republicans were headed for defeat. But as his popularity has declined, he has held more news conferences and invited more journalists over for White House chats. If the president can mend fences with his Democratic antagonists, maybe peace with the Fourth Estate is also at hand.Cutting the Chatter

Free speech is getting less frequent on the "CBS Evening News."

A daily commentary segment that was launched when Katie Couric took over the newscast, "Free Speech" has opened up the program to outside voices but also drawn strong criticism from some network staffers.

Now Couric and her executive producer, Rome Hartman, have decided to cut back the feature to somewhere between one and three times a week, in part to make room for more news.

DOJ_NMG_0092624

"We had to figure out how it would work and how it wouldn't work, to see what soared and what splatted," Hartman says. "We've learned that timeliness is important," and that it's better to have the commentaries "feel like they're part of the news rather than out of left field."

Among the network's correspondents, he says, "some people felt it was taking up air time that might otherwise go to them, which is understandable. And some people just didn't like the idea of opinion. But a significant number of people felt the other way."

"Free Speech," which has also provided the umbrella for Bob Schieffer's weekly commentary -- the status of which is now unclear -- did not air at all last week.

The segment has provided a precious 90 seconds of the newscast, for example, to a protesting Gallaudet University student and an illegal immigrant identified only as Carlos. When an 89-year-old driver was convicted of killing 10 people in Santa Monica, Calif., CBS gave air time to a physician who was hospitalized for three months after being hit by an elderly driver.

But the segment has also given a forum to those who already have pretty big platforms: Rush Limbaugh, Sean Hannity, Arianna Huffington, National Public Radio's Juan Williams and Katrina vanden Heuvel, editor of the Nation, along with such prominent politicians as Rudy Giuliani and Sen. Barack Obama.

Hartman says he and Couric are now leaning more toward "regular folks" over "the I'm-famous-and-I-have-something-to-say model."Parting Words

In another change for "CBS Evening News," the program now has to get along without Jim Stewart, who is retiring to Florida.

During his 17 years as a correspondent, it became increasingly difficult to stick to his mission of covering the FBI, CIA and terrorism, Stewart says.

"More and more of my time was spent answering to the whim of the moment, even if it wasn't going to be put on the air, and less time covering my beat," he says. "It was to answer the question in the mind of an executive in a nanosecond about something they saw on a cable channel. Literally 15 times a week, I would get what are called check-it-outs. It would be breaking news on MSNBC that white powder was found on a subway in Chicago, or something like that."

Stewart, 60, is admired in the business for his aggressive style. He says the networks have been hurt by the shrinking number of Washington correspondents and the loss of those specializing in such beats as the State Department, aviation or the environment.

"When you lose beat reporters, you lose depth," he says. "You lose a sense of what you're talking about." With the exception of ABC's disclosure of Rep. Mark Foley's e-mails to congressional pages, he says, "I don't remember a time lately when the networks really broke big news. Certainly there's less expertise available to the networks. We've become generalists, to our detriment."

Stewart had considered retiring earlier, but "the money in broadcast journalism can be very intoxicating and make you almost addicted to sticking around for that one more contract."

Stewart says Katie Couric was indirectly responsible for his 1990 hiring. CBS decided it needed a second reporter at the Pentagon, he says, after NBC tapped Couric as the No. 2 correspondent there.

But he struggled to make the transition from his previous job at Cox Newspapers. "For the first six months I was lost," Stewart says. But he says he became more valuable to the network after Iraq invaded Kuwait, triggering the Persian Gulf War.

"Saddam saved my job," says Stewart.Howzat?

"Poll: Afghans Express Confidence in Country's Direction, Security" -- Thursday's USA Today

"Afghans Losing Faith in Nation's Path, Poll Shows" -- Thursday's New York Times.

McCain Edges Toward '08 Presidential Run (AP-Y)

By Hope Yen

AP, November 13, 2006

Republican Sen. John McCain said Sunday he is taking the initial steps for a White House bid in 2008, setting up a committee that allows a potential candidate to raise money and travel the country to gauge support.

DOJ_NMG_0092625

Democratic Sen. Joe Biden reaffirmed his intention to seek his party's nomination, though an announcement about establishing an exploratory committee probably will not come until early next year.

The anticipated wide-open campaign — for the first time since the 1928 race, the field will not include a sitting president or vice president — lost one possible participant when Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., decided against a long-shot run.

McCain, R-Ariz., said he is moving toward a 2008 bid by "doing things organizationally and legally" but will not make a final decision until early next year.

McCain, considered the front-runner for his party's presidential nomination, said he could create an exploratory committee as early as this week.

"Are we doing the things organizationally and legally that need to be done? Yes," he said. "There are certain things legally you have to comply with in order to continue to raise money and set up an organization."

"The important thing is we will not make a decision until I sit down with my family, but we will be prepared," McCain said.

GOP officials last week said McCain would set up an exploratory committee and has opened a bank account for the committee.

On Sunday, McCain characterized the moves as preliminary until he decides over the holidays about a possible bid. He unsuccessfully sought his party's nomination for president in 2000.

If McCain were to run, he would turn 72 on Aug. 29, 2008, at the height of the campaign. Only Ronald Reagan was older — 73 at the start of his second term. McCain's health also could be an issue because he has had several cancerous lesions removed from his skin.

McCain is a former Navy pilot who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam. He was elected to the Senate in 1986, and served in the House for four years before that.

During the 2006 election cycle, McCain attended 346 events and raising more than $10.5 million on behalf of Republican candidates. He also donated nearly $1.5 million to federal, state and county parties.

The 63-year-old Biden, who is line to take over as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, also ran for president before, dropping from the 1988 race after it became known he had lifted a portion of a speech from a British politician without attribution.

Biden, first elected to the Senate in 1972, said Sunday he would address the issue of an exploratory committee early in 2007. "I still plan on running. I haven't, quite frankly, thought through all of the ... mechanics of it at this point in terms of when to announce setting up an exploratory committee, but I plan on doing that," he said.

One potential challenger he will not have to contend with is Feingold, who said he wanted to focus on his work in the Senate. Feingold, 53, is an outspoken opponent of the Iraq war, the Patriot Act and other Bush administration policies.

"I never got to the point where I felt strongly I wanted to run," Feingold told The Associated Press. "Then I saw the result Tuesday and thought what a great opportunity to do my work in the Senate."

Last week Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack announced his candidacy. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York is widely considered the front-runner. Others mentioned include Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 nominee; former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the vice presidential nominee two years ago; Sens. Barack Obama of Illinois, Evan Bayh of Indiana and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut; and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

Republicans talked about for 2008 are Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney; Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee; Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

GOP Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said last month he is forming an exploratory committee.

McCain To Form Committee To Explore White House Bid (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Sen. John McCain of Arizona said he will form an exploratory committee as the first step toward a possible run for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0092626

The action had been widely expected from McCain, who lost a primary bid in 2000 to George W. Bush and who is the most popular prospective candidate for the nomination in 2008.

McCain, appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press" yesterday, said that while he won't make a decision until talking with his family over the holidays, "Are we doing the things organizationally and legally that need to be done to prepare for it? Yes." McCain indicated that the formation of an exploratory committee is imminent.

Just five days after midterm elections that returned control of the House and Senate to Democrats, prospective presidential candidates in both parties put down markers about their intentions for 2008. Accelerated primary schedules and fundraising requirements will make it necessary for candidates to start their campaigns in the next few months.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said on ABC News's "This Week" that "I still plan on running."

Another prospective candidate, Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), said he will not run, citing the Democrats' midterm wins. He told supporters in an e-mail that he will decline the "great adventure" of a presidential run because his three-term seniority in the Senate will allow him to "best advance" liberal causes.

The 2008 race is expected to be particularly active because it will be the first time in decades that neither party has an incumbent president or vice president in the race.

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack last week became the first to announce his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination. Others who have expressed interest are Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who leads in opinion polls; Barack Obama (Ill.); Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.); Evan Bayh (Ind.) and John F. Kerry (Mass); former senator John Edwards (N.C.) and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson. Another contender, former Virginia governor Mark Warner, announced before the midterm elections that he wouldn't run.

In addition to McCain, prospective Republican candidates include Govs. Mitt Romney (Mass.) and Mike Huckabee (Ark.), Sens. Bill Frist (Tenn.) and Sam Brownback (Kan.), and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. Two other possible candidates, Sens. George Allen (Va.) and Rick Santorum (Pa.), lost reelection bids last week.

McCain positioned himself yesterday as a candidate who would restore Republican principles. He said voters decided last week "that we Republicans have lost our way, that we came to Washington to change government, and government changed us: the spending, the ethics, the massive programs such as Medicare prescription drug program, our failure to address their priorities as opposed to our own."

The NBC interviewer, Tim Russert, noted that McCain did 346 campaign events for 2006 Republican candidates. "Did a lot of good, didn't it?" the senator said.

McCain Takes Step Toward 2008 Race (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

Sen. John McCain yesterday announced that he will create a presidential exploratory committee, the usual prelude to a formal entrance into the race, and said he would decide during the Christmas holidays whether to officially enter the 2008 White House race.

"I always said I would decide early next year, and I'll sit down over the holidays with my family and make that decision," the Arizona Republican said during an appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press." "Are we doing the things organizationally and legally that need to be done to prepare for it? Yes."

When asked whether he would form an exploratory committee, Mr. McCain said, "I think so."

Mr. McCain also sought to secure his conservative credentials during the appearance, saying he considers himself a conservative in the mold of President Reagan. He also said he thinks Republican losses last week will prove a temporary setback for his party.

"I believe America is still a conservative right-of-center nation, and our message, our Republican message, is best."

Although Mr. McCain is not the favorite prospective candidate of some grass-roots conservatives, some observers think his prospects for securing the Republican presidential nomination have improved since last Tuesday's elections.

DOJ_NMG_0092627

Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania were previously considered as contenders for the nomination, but both Republicans lost their re-election campaigns this year. Neither men have officially ruled out a 2008 campaign, but most observers agree that would be difficult to do so coming off the heels of a recent electoral defeat.

The field of prospective 2008 Democrat candidates also continues to shift. Yesterday, Sen. Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat, posted a letter to supporters on his campaign Web site announcing that he will not pursue his party's nomination.

"I'm sure a campaign for president would have been a great adventure and helpful in advancing a progressive agenda," Mr. Feingold wrote. "At this time, however, I believe I can best advance that progressive agenda as a senator with significant seniority in the new Senate serving on the Foreign Relations, Intelligence, Judiciary and Budget committees."

Mr. Feingold's decision not to run comes on the heels of popular former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner also deciding to pass on seeking the Democrat's nomination.

As is widely expected, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, said he is still planning to run for president.

"I'm going to address that after the first of the year," he said during an appearance yesterday on ABC's "This Week." "I still plan on running. I haven't, quite frankly, thought through all of the, you know, the mechanics of it at this point in terms of when to announce setting up an exploratory committee, but I plan on doing that."

Mr. Biden last made a run for the White House in 1988 and is considered by many to be one of his party's leading authorities on foreign-policy matters.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, is considered the front-runner for her party's nomination. However, a number of Democrats say they are open to an alternative to Mrs. Clinton because while many polls show her winning the Democrat's nomination, most of those same polls show her trailing against her potential Republican rivals in a general election.

Much speculation lately has focused on first-term Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat. Mr. Obama recently announced that he is considering a White House run.

A recent poll by Rasmussen Reports shows 22 percent of Democrats supporting Mr. Obama in 2008, compared with 29 percent supporting Mrs. Clinton.

"Look, Barack has done an enormous amount for the party," said Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean during an appearance yesterday on "Fox News Sunday."

However, Mr. Dean added, "I don't comment on 2008, because I really do have to be the referee and have to be entirely neutral, and I'm going to continue to be entirely neutral."

And They're Off! (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

CHARLESTON, W.VA.—John McCain gazed longingly at his plate of baked chicken and penne pasta in white sauce but managed to devour only a few morsels before the first stranger arrived. One by one or in small groups, the well-wishers interrupted McCain's lunch with requests to shake his hand or share a snapshot. The silver-haired senator didn't mind. He remains accessible and loquacious, just as he was in his 2000 presidential campaign, in contrast to other candidates at his level, who are walled off by aides and bodyguards. He parlays all this-the likability factor-for all it's worth.

And it's worth quite a lot. "John McCain has made his reputation as a man who is outside the system, a guy who does things differently, who reaches across the aisle to the opposition, and people like that," says a senior Republican strategist. "People like his frankness. They know where he stands. And they think he would be a good guy to have a beer with." And that, in a nutshell, is why McCain is the early leader for the Republican nomination in 2008.

Blunt. The senator from Arizona wasn't hoisting any beers last week after the midterm elections. But he was typically blunt in assessing the Republican disaster. GOP leaders, he said, had departed from core party principles such as less government, lower spending, solid stewardship, and fighting corruption. The Bush administration, he added, had failed to send enough troops to Iraq to begin with and had falsely raised American expectations for a quick victory. Now McCain favors dispatching more troops in the "short term" to help Baghdad's government put down sectarian violence and stabilize the country. And he opposes setting a firm date for U.S. withdrawal, because, he says, that would only cause "chaos in the region" and embolden the terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0092628

Those views on Iraq seem to run counter to the nation's antiwar mood, but McCain has stayed true to his hawkish beliefs. And he has emerged from the midterms in good shape as the GOP front-runner for '08, in the view of many party professionals. For one thing, voters seem more and more attracted to the kind of independence and get-it-done bipartisanship that have been McCain's hallmarks in the Senate. For another, independents turned out in droves last week, and that's a good sign for a man who has always done well with swing voters and the unaffiliated.

"McCain is a formidable candidate," says Joe Lockhart, a Democratic strategist and former White House press secretary for President Bill Clinton. "He's the one guy out there who people don't see as a politician."

Yet McCain has also tried to demonstrate that he is a loyal party man. He attended 346 events and raised $10.5 million for the GOP and the party's candidates for the 2006 midterm cycle. On the eve of the election, in fact, Florida's Republican gubernatorial candidate, Charlie Crist, skipped a scheduled joint appearance with President Bush in Pensacola in favor of appearing with McCain in Jacksonville.

McCain, 70, knows that when there's no incumbent seeking re-election, Republican front-runners have a good chance to win their party's endorsement. Among the early front-runners to win the nomination were George W. Bush in 2000, Bob Dole in 1996, Ronald Reagan in 1980, and Richard Nixon in 1968.

Shaken And Stirred (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, November 12, 2006

Last week's election didn't just change the lineup in Congress; it also winnowed the Republican presidential field. The big casualties were Sens. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania and George Allen of Virginia, two conservatives who lost their bids for re-election-and probably any hope for the White House.

That still leaves plenty of presidential wannabes for '08, led by Arizona Sen. John McCain. But two other men are generating buzz as they jockey for position as the main alternative to the front-runner. First on the list is former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who leads some public-opinion polls. In a recent Gallup survey, 29 percent of Republicans supported him, compared with 24 percent for McCain (everyone else was in single digits). But Giuliani's position is based largely on name recognition and his reputation as a dynamic leader in the aftermath of 9/11. "He is the gold standard for leadership in the war on terrorism," says a key GOP strategist. As such, Giuliani has been a big draw as a fundraiser for GOP candidates.

The former mayor says he is considering a run, but political pros say his popularity could melt away once GOP voters understand his liberal views on issues like gay unions, abortion, and gun control. His abrasive manner can also be a turnoff. "Rudy plays well in the boroughs of New York but not in the Republican heartland," says a GOP critic.

Perhaps the most aggressive behind-the-scenes campaign is being waged by outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a strong conservative with movie-star looks and big-time charisma. Romney is modeling his approach on George W. Bush's pattern from 1999, when Bush, then governor of Texas, invited party leaders to Austin for persuasive get-acquainted sessions. Romney is doing the same thing in Boston and is apparently making a good impression as a fresh-faced Washington outsider who radiates competence and optimism while advocating smaller government. He is also a good listener, which impresses many of his guests, and in the past has appealed to independent voters and some Democrats in Massachusetts.

Drawbacks. Romney's Mormon faith, however, is greeted with suspicion by many evangelical Christians, while his lack of national-security experience could drag him down if the war on terrorism and the conflict in Iraq remain top concerns. Just as important, his popularity back home in Massachusetts has declined, which isn't a good sign.

Among the others who have expressed an interest in running are Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee and Gov. George Pataki of New York (both of whom are leaving office), Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Sam Brownback of Kansas, and Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas.

One of the longest of long shots is Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, the gruff chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. Hunter has little national following; in fact, few have heard of him outside Washington and his home district in San Diego. That hasn't stopped him from declaring his candidacy as he attempts to find a niche as a hard-liner on national security and illegal immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0092629

In a blast from the past, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich is impressing the GOP faithful as he talks of a need to return to Republican ideals of smaller government, a strong national defense, and tough-minded realism in foreign policy.

But Gingrich was a polarizing figure in Congress, and voters may be more interested in a less divisive style of leadership for 2008. "People are fed up with politics as usual," says a prominent Republican who advises the White House. "They want to see politicians work together. That's one lesson we learned from last week's election."

Time In Senate May Be Irrelevant If Obama Runs (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) might be well advised to stay in the Senate several more years before running for president, as many strategists have suggested. But there are at least 40 reasons to challenge that advice.

That is the number of senators who have tried, and failed, to reach the White House since Sen. John F. Kennedy (D-Mass.) accomplished the feat in 1960. Nearly all of them had more Senate experience than Obama, underscoring the light regard that American voters show for senatorial longevity and expertise in presidential elections.

If Obama's aim is to become a more respected and knowledgeable senator -- in the mold of, say, Robert J. Dole (18 years in the Senate before his 1996 presidential race), Henry "Scoop" Jackson (20 Senate years before his 1972 bid) or Richard G. Lugar (20 Senate years before his 1996 try) -- it may be a laudable goal. But it's a highly questionable presidential strategy.

"The Senate historically has not been a great place from which to run for president," said former senator Bob Graham (D-Fla.), who personally learned the lesson in 2004. "Senator Obama might feel he would be better off to run while he has not been tainted by an excessive period in the Senate."

In the nation's history, only Kennedy and Warren G. Harding have been elected directly from the Senate to the presidency. But the dismal statistics have not dissuaded dozens of senators from trying, including big names (John Glenn, Edward M. Kennedy), largely forgotten names (Larry Pressler, Carol Moseley Braun) and plenty in between.

U.S. voters repeatedly have shown a preference for governors, especially during the 52-year stretch from Grover Cleveland's first election through Franklin D. Roosevelt's fourth, and again in recent years, when seven of the past eight presidential campaigns have been won by former governors. The 2008 presidential race seems certain to focus special scrutiny on why senators with impressive rÃ©sumÃ©s have fared so poorly in White House bids.

Not only did Obama cause a sensation last month by simply saying he would consider a 2008 campaign, but the early front-runners in both parties are senators: Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.).

Perhaps no governor will emerge from the pack, as Bill Clinton and George W. Bush did, and 2008 will prove the exception to the rule. But scholars of presidential campaigns have their doubts.

"I'm skeptical that a senator can make it," said Barry C. Burden, a political scientist at the University of Wisconsin at Madison who has written on the subject. "Just looking at the historical record, the odds are not very good."

Burden said voters generally like the executive experience of governors. Additionally, governors, more than senators, are much more able to set their own agendas, make bold decisions, and avoid complicated legislative debates and votes that opponents can exploit.

"The skills that make a person a good legislator are not the skills that make a person a good presidential candidate," Burden said. "The kind of compromises that make you successful in Congress don't make you successful in a presidential campaign."

Analysts say veteran lawmakers often are prone to legislative jargon and explanations that baffle voters. Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) damaged his 2004 presidential campaign when he said of a spending package for the Afghanistan and Iraq wars: "I actually did vote for the $87 billion before I voted against it." Republicans ridiculed the remark, but many people on Capitol Hill understood that Kerry supported the package when it was linked to repeals of tax cuts for the wealthy and that he opposed it when the link was dropped.

As a veteran lawmaker, "you have lots of votes under your belt, which the opposition-research guys can use to twist you into a pretzel," said Scott Reed, Dole's campaign manager for his 1996 bid.

DOJ_NMG_0092630

Obama, who is 45 and just two years removed from the Illinois legislature, has a third option that is less viable for McCain and Clinton. He could angle for the vice presidency, a route to the Oval Office for former senators Harry S. Truman, Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard M. Nixon -- but not for Hubert H. Humphrey, Walter F. Mondale, Dan Quayle and Al Gore.

First, however, Obama must sift through the bountiful and conflicting advice of whether to seek the big prize now. Graham, who was Florida's governor before joining the Senate, said: "My advice would be to lay out a plan of action to have him fully ready to be president in 2013. That schedule would just about coincide with what President Kennedy did" -- that is, becoming president after eight years in the Senate.

But Reed thinks 2008 may be the year to break the senatorial jinx, in part because the primary season will be shorter. That should help front-runners such as McCain and Clinton, he said, or perhaps a shooting star such as Obama.

"The old axiom may go out the window this year," Reed said of 2008. "I'd advise Obama that if he has any interest in serving [as president], to take the race. You can't go back in this business and recapture what you had."

Hillary's Dilemma (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

ROCHESTER, N.Y.—If Hillary Rodham Clinton wins the White House, it will be thanks to voters like Barbara Paris. A conservative Democrat who has nonetheless supported Republicans as far back as Ronald Reagan, Paris hated Clinton when she first ran for U.S. Senate from New York in 2000. The 58-year-old tax adviser considered the first lady to be a carpetbagger, and, worse, a political opportunist for sticking with her husband after the Monica Lewinsky affair. So she supported Clinton's Republican opponent.

Last week, though, Paris was one of the New Yorkers who sent Clinton back to Washington with 67 percent of the vote. "It was a long shot, but she's proven herself," Paris said while attending a Clinton speech here just before Election Day. "She's spent lots of time in Rochester." Paris has become such a fan that she begged her daughter to let her take her granddaughter out of school to see Clinton, whom Paris now calls a role model.

Across the Empire State, voter after voter tells a similar story, of deep skepticism toward the former first lady giving way to admiration during her first term. They cite her forays to all corners of the state and her focus on local issues, including staving off closure of the Niagara Falls Air Reserve Station and securing $20 billion after 9/11. But with Clinton now having to decide whether to seek the White House in '08, she faces a familiar dilemma: Can she overcome the nation's entrenched views of her—and her husband—in a presidential campaign? For the presumed Democratic front-runner, the answer is unclear. A Gallup Poll this year found that 17 percent of Americans would definitely back her and that 49 percent would definitely not, but that less than 1 percent had no opinion.

Converts. To be sure, Clinton has converted plenty of skeptics in the Senate. "Older members had this 'We're going to put her in her place' attitude," says Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. "But she has the power to change minds. Those who stereotype her don't know what they're talking about."

So far, though, Clinton has changed minds by countering that stereotype in person, with audiences much smaller than the national electorate. Having difficulty winning support from women in New York in 2000, she organized informal meetings with groups of a few dozen women, then let the positive reviews spread by word of mouth. Replicating that operation even in the four early primary states—Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire, and South Carolina—would be daunting. And unlike her husband, former President Bill Clinton, Senator Clinton has had trouble winning converts through TV ads and interviews.

Of course, Clinton also has major assets. "She's got a huge fundraising base, a campaign team of die-hard Hillary lovers, and has rock-star status," says a Democratic strategist. "Plus, she's very smart and has been down this [presidential] track a few times." Clinton's money machine, which raked in $38 million for last week's election, has other candidates asking donors to consider them as backups, should Clinton decide not to run.

Flank Stakes (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092631

The returns had just begun to trickle in Tuesday night when former Sen. John Edwards joined a conference call with liberals at MoveOn.org to talk up the prospect of Democrats taking back the White House. "This tsunami starts today and goes through the 2008 election," the 2004 vice presidential nominee said. "We're going to get away from being the country of Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo."

As Edwards was thanking the Democratic base for fueling the congressional takeover, other Democrats with White House ambitions took a different view. "Independent and moderate voters gave us a chance last night, and those are the voters we need in 2008," Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh told U.S. News , noting that three of the Democrats' House pickups had come from his conservative Hoosier State. "I hope our party doesn't get the impression that the country has fallen in love with strident partisan Democrats." As nearly a dozen Democrats start carving their niches for the '08 presidential contests, Edwards and Bayh reflect the two broad flanks now emerging: one to the left of Hillary Rodham Clinton and another in line with her more centrist positioning-but without the baggage she brings.

At this stage, Edwards has some advantages among the liberals. He placed second to John Kerry in the all-important Iowa caucuses in 2004 and still has a loyal network of volunteers there. Edwards may also benefit from the addition of two states to the early primary lineup-his native South Carolina and Nevada, where he has strong ties to unionized hotel and restaurant workers. With last month's news that former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner will sit '08 out, Edwards is the lone southerner in the Democratic field, unless former NATO Commander Wesley Clark runs again. That gives Edwards an air of electability that eludes other liberals.

Kerry, meanwhile, may look more unelectable than ever after his botched Iraq war joke. But he has an unmatched E-mail list of 3 million backers from '04 and has earned loyalty by doling out $14 million to 260 candidates during the midterms. And with the Iraq war likely to be an issue even as 2008's primaries get underway 14 months from now, Kerry could be a hit with liberal primary voters. "The midterms were a referendum on the president's policies in Iraq," says a top Kerry adviser. "It both mobilized the base and brought independents to vote for change."

Money. Wisconsin Sen. Russ Feingold, who voted against the Iraq war and the Patriot Act, is reminding audiences in Iowa and New Hampshire that both measures passed Congress with Democratic support. "Too many times, Democrats have folded," says Trevor Miller, spokesman for Feingold's political action committee. Unlike the independently wealthy Edwards or Kerry, who can rely on some '04 donors, Feingold is one of the candidates who need a fundraising base, possibly to be found in the liberal online "netroots." Joe Trippi, who managed Howard Dean's '04 campaign and raised $59 million online, predicts that the right candidate can collect almost 10 times that much in '08. "How many people you sign up online and how many small donors you have," he says, "will be a new measure" of viability. Serious contenders will very likely need $40 million by the time of the Iowa caucuses.

Of course, Democratic stars like Al Gore and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama could become the anti-Clinton darlings of the netroots, making them the two biggest x factors. "If you are a possible front-runner, you get in as late as you can because you don't want eight other banshees trying to take you down," says Trippi. "If you're the little-known insurgent, you don't want to wait too long." Gore says he won't run, but Obama says he might. With his bestselling book The Audacity of Hope, Obama is the second-most popular U.S. politician after Rudolph Giuliani, according to a poll last summer. But he has no foreign policy experience in times that demand it, and a short Washington résumé; he's not yet finished the second year of this term.

Experience is not a problem for long-shot centrists like Delaware Sen. Joe Biden, Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd, or New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson. Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, another long shot, declared his candidacy last week. And the field is likely to grow before it starts shrinking.

Bill, George Show Keeps Laughs Coming (AP-Y)

By Mary Foster, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 13, 2006

They're separated by more than 20 years, they come from opposing political parties, and one evicted the other from the White House. But Bill Clinton and George Bush act like a team, a pair of touring comedians with a well-honed act.

DOJ_NMG_0092632

The two former presidents even have their entrance down pat, striding in with arms aloft, music pounding, lights flashing, the crowd standing and going wild.

The pair addressed more than 25,000 people attending the National Association of Realtors convention on Saturday, drawing at least six standing ovations and almost continuous applause.

Bush and Clinton thanked the real estate agents for holding their convention in New Orleans. It's the biggest convention to come to the city since Hurricane Katrina hit Aug. 29, 2005, and the pair has raised $130 million to aid New Orleans and the Gulf Coast in recovering from the storm.

Retirement has been good, Bush said, although he misses some of the perks of the presidency.

One problem with retirement, Bush said, is that memories do not fail on certain topics.

"After 14 years no one forgets if you throw up on the Japanese premier," he said.

However, he said, years of being badgered by the news media have left him with a simple philosophy: "Now if I don't like your questions, the heck with it, then I'm not going to answer them."

Clinton played second banana after Bush's round of jokes.

"You've just witnessed George Bush's revenge for the 1992 campaign," Clinton said of the year he defeated Bush for the presidency. "I'm condemned for the rest of my life to be his straight man."

Bush can get away with some things more easily, said Clinton, whose presidency was marked by the Monica Lewinsky scandal, noting that if he were to repeat one off-color joke that Bush told, "the New York papers would kill me."

What's more, the 60-year-old Clinton told the crowd, Bush, at 82, is in better shape.

"Make no mistake about it," said Clinton, who has undergone quadruple bypass surgery. "George Bush will speak at my funeral."

As for the recent election, both said they had to deal with congresses controlled for most or all of their presidencies by the other party. They said some of the best legislation during that time were made through compromises.

Clinton said he did not think his wife, Sen. Hillary Clinton, had decided yet whether she would run for the presidency.

"If she were to be elected I think she would do a good job," Clinton said.

"Yeah," Bush interjected, "but I'm having a little difficulty picturing this fellow walking behind her like Prince Philip behind the queen."

YESTERDAY (WP)

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Ford, who turned 93 on July 14, became the oldest president by living to 93 years and 121 days.

"The length of one's days matters less than the love of one's family and friends," Ford said in a statement last week from the Rancho Mirage compound he shares with his wife, Betty Ford, 88.

Ford was president from Aug. 9, 1974, when Richard M. Nixon resigned, until January 1977. He has suffered a variety of health problems in recent years and underwent heart procedures at the Mayo Clinic in August.

"He's doing very well. He's still recuperating," said Ford's chief of staff, Penny Circle.

In the statement released by Circle, the former president said: "I thank God for the gift of every sunrise and, even more, for all the years he has blessed me with Betty and the children, with our extended family and the friends of a lifetime."

The calculation of the milestone was done by Ford's staff and was based on full days.

Ford, a longtime Michigan congressman, was House minority leader when Nixon chose him as vice president to replace Spiro Agnew in 1973. Ford became president the following year when Nixon resigned amid the Watergate scandal. Ford, a Republican, is the only president in U.S. history never elected as either president or vice president. He served as president nearly 2 1/2 years, losing to Democrat Jimmy Carter in 1976.

Reagan, born Feb. 6, 1911, was 93 years 120 days old when he died, on June 5, 2004. He surpassed the longevity milestone of John Adams, the nation's second president, in 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0092633

Duke Blackwood, director of the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, Calif., said, "We all send our best to President Ford for reaching this milestone." And he added: "If President Reagan were alive, he'd probably say, 'Finally, somebody's talking about another president's age.' "

The oldest living former first lady is Lady Bird Johnson, who turns 94 next month. Bess Truman, who died in 1982 at age 97, was the longest-living first lady.

A Charity With An Unusual Interest In The Bottom Line (NYT)

By Jennifer 8. Lee

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

THE idea befuddled donors and Internal Revenue Service lawyers alike when Jacqueline Novogratz approached them six years ago. A philanthropic venture capital fund?

On one hand, the Acumen Fund would be a nonprofit charity. On the other, it would invest in companies and groups that tackled global poverty.

It was an unusual idea to pitch to philanthropists, said Ms. Novogratz. "They had never seen an organization like us: raising charitable money but wanting the flexibility of grants, loans and equity investments in for-profit and nonprofit organizations."

Ms. Novogratz, who has an M.B.A., has backgrounds in both in finance and philanthropy and worked as a banker at Chase Manhattan and as a manager of special projects at the Rockefeller Foundation before starting Acumen. She established a foothold in international philanthropy in 1986 when she went to Rwanda and worked on microfinance projects, long before the words "microfinance" or "Rwanda" entered the social lexicon.

She may have been ahead of her time. But two key people intuitively grasped the Acumen Fund's mission: Larry Page and Sergey Brin, the co-founders of Google, whom Ms. Novogratz first met at a Technology Entertainment and Design conference two years ago. During the period when Google's new charitable foundation, Google.org, was defining itself, the company's founders knew they shared a vision with Ms. Novogratz — a desire to reinvent philanthropy and push the boundaries of how people who had done well could also do good.

"We were looking at different models of philanthropy," said Sheryl Sandberg, a vice president at Google and a Google.org board member. "We are looking at the most efficient and effective ways to solve the world's largest problems."

They saw a lot of potential in the Acumen Fund, which has invested in projects meant to help people on the lowest rungs of the socioeconomic ladder: drip irrigation systems in India, rural health clinics in Kenya and a low-cost mortgage program in Pakistan.

Acumen models itself after a venture capital fund and brings in management and entrepreneurial expertise to help build the companies' financial independence. To that end, Acumen has a mantra on business fundamentals on how to design, price, distribute and market goods and services. But the audience it is focusing on are people who live on less than $4 a day, and Acumen's goal is to provide them affordable, critical goods and services that have otherwise been neglected by the marketplace. So when Google.org was little more than a Web page promising information to come, the Acumen Fund appeared as its first partner. To date, the Acumen Fund has been the recipient of Google.org's largest-single grant: $5 million to strengthen Acumen's operations. "It was a really progressive and thoughtful contribution," Ms. Novogratz said. "It was about building the institution."

To further cement the ties, Google announced in September that the Acumen Fund would be moving from its offices overlooking Trinity Church in the financial district of Manhattan to Google's corporate offices in the Chelsea neighborhood uptown. "We believe that our model and Jackie's model and Acumen's model is the next wave of philanthropy," Ms. Sandberg said. "It's addressing the critical needs of the world's poor, but in much more of a venture capital mode: to use seed capital to address the world's problems and to do so in a sustainable way."

Among Acumen's most notable projects is an investment in International Development Enterprises in India, a nonprofit group that manufacturers a drip irrigation system that it sells to poor farmers for under $30, a fraction of the price of traditional irrigation systems. Because the cost is so modest, the increased land productivity helps the system pay for itself in a short time, Ms. Novogratz said. "Their lives change almost overnight if they make that investment," she said. "They see their income double or triple — that allows them enough income to buy a second system. That is how they accumulate wealth." So far, more than 30,000 units have been sold.

DOJ_NMG_0092634

In the twin worlds of philanthropy and venture capital, where billion is a commonly used measure, the Acumen Fund can seem modest. It has about 29 full-time staff members and seven fellows in offices in New York, India, Pakistan and, soon, Kenya. Of the $40 million dollars it has raised since it formally began in 2001, it has distributed only around $20 million — a small amount by traditional philanthropic standards. Yet Ms. Novogratz explained that the firm's approach was expensive. "The business acumen costs money," she said. "We are highly labor intensive." Many of the managers hold M.B.A's and have résumés studded with stints at Goldman Sachs, Credit Suisse First Boston, McKinsey.

Rather than simply focusing on potential profitability, Acumen evaluates projects for social impact, financial sustainability, replicability and what Ms. Novogratz calls "breakthrough insights" — knowledge that can be applied elsewhere.

For example, they have spent a lot of time understanding when the poor act like mainstream customers and when they don't. Another insight prompted them to eliminate grants, and limit Acumen to loans and equity investments. "Grants do not provide the same amount of clarity of expectations or financial discipline, or the same power as a conduit into more traditional financial markets," Ms. Novogratz said.

"What we need in this sector is these kinds of ideas and models to get others to think frankly of doing their business in a similar way," said Allen S. Grossman, a professor at Harvard Business School who studies entrepreneurship in the social sector.

Those insights are critical to charting new territory, said Dr. Grossman, who also advises Acumen. "You can't take business practices and superimpose them when it comes to social issues," he said. "What they do is a very effective social adaptation so that there is not a conflict between good business practices and achievement of a social mission."

But often local entrepreneurs do feel tension between business and philanthropy, said Yasmina Zaidman, who manages water projects for Acumen. They are caught because nonprofits tell them to "stop making money off the poor" while business executives say, "If you want to make money, get serious, stop messing around in the rural areas," Ms. Zaidman added. "They haven't been supported or acknowledged."

Like any investment fund, Acumen has its disappointments. Of 21 projects, 15 are still active. Last year, for example, Acumen pulled out of a fluoride filtration company in India when the company changed its strategy and started pursuing subsidized government contracts. "It was frustrating, but that lesson has influenced us so much since then," Ms. Zaidman said.

An earlier project, centered around a $42 hearing aid, failed to take off in India despite the product's relatively low cost. "We were jumping up and down thinking we hit the ball out of the park," Ms. Novogratz said. Acumen helped distribute 10,000 of the hearing aids, but low demand and a poor distribution network prevented it from becoming an independent business. "We learned that technology alone does not solve problems," she said, "and that what is as important — or more important — than the technology is the business model for bringing services to poor people."

While Ms. Novogratz was in Rwanda, she helped women there set up a bakery called Duterimbere, which means "to go work with enthusiasm" in the local Rwandan language. "We cornered the snack food market," she said.

Her farewell present from the women was a tapestry depicting scenes from the bakery, the town and a local school. It blends into the Acumen office décor — a mix of the dot-com aesthetic of Aeron chairs and ethnic handicrafts from Ms. Novogratz's travels. Glancing at the Rwandan tapestry, Ms. Novogratz said, "Unfortunately, all the women created it were killed in the genocide, so it's even more important." She added, "Acumen Fund is my prayer in response to genocide and what happened in Rwanda."

Confessions Of A Values Voter (USAT)

By Tom Krattenmaker

USA Today, November 13, 2006

I am a values voter.

Given my progressive political and religious beliefs, some might find this a dubious claim — especially members of the Christian right, who with their rhetoric about "values voters" suggest that only those who share their positions on abortion and same-sex couples possess something deserving of the term "values."

DOJ_NMG_0092635

Social conservatives' skewed deployment of the "v-word" floods the public square these days. (Though it didn't help Republicans this time as it did in 2004.) President Bush, on the campaign trail, called on voters to support candidates who defend "traditional values."

Consider two events organized this past year by leading religious right figures — the "Values Voters Summit," held earlier this fall with a lineup of speakers that included the flame-throwing Ann Coulter, and the high-profile "War on Christians and the Values Voter" conference in March. Consider the ValuesVoters.com website operated by the conservative American Family Association, and the declaration by leading social conservative Gary Bauer that 2004 was the "year of the values voter."

Apparently, those of us who hold different positions on the hot-button issues as framed by social conservatives — those of us who turn our attention and hearts to other imperatives such as peace-making, poverty relief, environmental preservation and tolerance — have no values. According to the rhetoric of social conservatives, progressives are the "anything goes" lot. Secularists, liberal Christians and followers of other faiths — we're the ones tearing America down with our moral weakness and hostility to the conservative Christian worldview.

Let's move past this hubris and damn-the-opponents rhetoric. We all have values. Let the majority of us who are not members of the "values voters" club continue to take back the v-word and proclaim the values that we've always acted — and voted — upon.

Does opposition to the war in Iraq represent an absence of values? Anything but. What is it if not deeply rooted principles and ideals — values, in other words — that moves so many Americans to oppose the war? We insist on truth-telling by our political leaders. We respect human life, which is why it saddens and outrages us to contemplate the deaths of American soldiers and of many tens of thousands of Iraqis. We hope and pray for a peaceful world in which war, if it must come, is a last resort, not a favored option.

Dwight Moody, a Baptist minister and writer on religion and culture, had this to say about values in a recent e-mail exchange with me: "Progressives, moderates and liberals are also undergirded by deeply held moral convictions, much of it driven by a religious and Christian view of the world: the value of creation, the dignity of the human person, the need for equity and justice, the cause of the poor and the dispossessed. These are values rarely articulated by the religious right, but they run deep and wide in the Bible."

Granted, liberals have been too shy about framing their political positions in moral terms, and too reluctant to use words such as "evil" to describe the acts of terrorists. The sexual adventures of high-profile Democrats such as Bill Clinton and the revolving-door domestic arrangements of Hollywood stars have lent fodder to conservatives who would blast their opponents as godless hedonists. Liberals have paid at the ballot box.

Thankfully, change is coming. Everywhere I look, I see progressives beginning to invoke values in ways that might startle religious conservatives, and in ways that probably helped Democrats win last week.

In Oregon, a recently formed ecumenical group proclaims the v-word in its name: the Oregon Center for Christian Values. These are "Christian values" rooted in human rights, economic justice for the disadvantaged and care for the environment. "Our commitment to Christ," the organization declares in its literature, "compels us to reach beyond the traditional 'moral values' issues often discussed in American politics today. Our goal is to call Christians to reclaim the radical, transformational vision for culture and society that reverberates in the teachings of Jesus."

A group called Red Letter Christians — a reference to the use of red letters in some Bibles to mark the words of Jesus — urged Bible-believers in the run-up to the elections to "vote their values" by treating the environment, poverty and the Iraq war as religious issues. William Sinkford, president of the Unitarian Universalist Association, invokes values in describing the approach to sexuality education adopted by the theologically liberal Unitarians — an approach that directly acknowledges that people will have sex outside of the opposite-sex, husband-and-wife contexts. "Sexuality education is about much more than just biology and rules," Sinkford wrote recently. "It is about values, including self-worth, sexual health, responsibility, justice and inclusivity and communication."

In the analyses and proclamations following last Tuesday's vote, "values" have been popping up in upside-down new ways. The prime example may be the Democrat who won the seat of disgraced Republican congressman Mark Foley and promptly pledged to take immediate action to make sure "our values and morals are represented" in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0092636

As progressives wield language that once belonged solely to conservatives, may we do so fairly, in a way that acknowledges that the other side of the debate also has values. In so doing, we'll model other core values of ours: inclusiveness and respect for differing viewpoints.

The truth about values is that we all have them, but that in our diverse, religiously pluralistic society, we don't share the same ones. What some of us consider a core value can offend others. Tolerance, for example, is a central value to progressives; to some conservatives, it's the root of our problems. Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, has unfairly blamed homosexuality, and our liberal society's tolerance thereof, for Foley's improprieties with pages and for the slow speed with which Capitol Hill Republicans responded to reports of Foley's misdeeds.

Perkins was hitting hard on the "values voters" theme in the weeks leading up to the elections. Responding to reports of evangelical disenchantment with Bush and the Republicans and forecasts of lower turnout by the bloc credited with winning the president's re-election in 2004, Perkins urged social conservatives to rediscover their zest for voting. "Values voters across the nation," Perkins wrote in September in his daily e-mail report, "are beginning to see … what will happen if they sit idly by and allow the rudderless liberals to set a course for our nation." Closer to the elections, Perkins admitted that religious conservative enthusiasm was not what it was in 2004. "If you are tempted to sit this election out, I encourage you not to," he wrote. "Vote your values."

Vote your values. That's certainly what I did. That's what we all did.

Tom Krattenmaker, who lives in Portland, Ore., specializes in religion in public life and is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors. He is working on a book about the Christianization of professional sports.

Tax Epiphany (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

A bright light descended from the sky last week and shone upon the world's economic planners. It came courtesy of the World Bank, of all unlikely places; its toiling economists have discovered that simplified tax systems promote economic growth.

In a report titled "Paying Taxes -- The Global Picture," the World Bank and its co-authors at PricewaterhouseCoopers make the case for simplifying business taxes. Burdensome rules and multiple levies, they argue, promote tax evasion even when individual corporate tax rates are low. Make the system transparent and simple, and the private sector will pony up. It's an argument that could be made for personal income taxes, too.

Released as an elaboration of the Bank's broader and valuable "Doing Business Report," the survey examines the tax regimes of 175 countries between April and July this year. It looks at the administrative tax burden that a hypothetical, limited liability company with 60 employees would face.

The Bank's findings echo that of the flat-tax camp; namely, simple tax regimes promote compliance and efficiency. By "simple," the Bank doesn't just mean unifying rates; it includes making the forms easy to read, understand and file. World-wide it takes an average of 332 hours a year for businesses to comply with tax requirements, ranging from 2,600 hours in Brazil to 325 in the U.S. to 68 in Switzerland. There's no reason a tax form can't fit on a few pages, as in Hong Kong, or be filed over the Internet, as in Singapore.

Tax simplification also means trimming the tax regime itself. The Bank found that corporate income taxes compose only 36%, on average, of businesses' annual tax burden. Property, dividend, capital gains, municipal, and social security taxes, among others, make up the rest -- not to mention the various loopholes carved out for certain industries. Countries such as Egypt, which unified its corporate tax rates and eliminated about 3,000 corporate exemptions and tax holidays last year, saw tax filings double. Russia implemented a flat tax in 2004 and saw tax revenues soar.

The Bank pulls no punches for its main clientele: poor countries that have trouble raising funds. Many make the mistake of setting high tax rates. By doing so, they tacitly encourage tax evasion and create opportunities for corruption. Little wonder that the bottom 30 countries in the "Doing Business" survey "are twice as likely as those in the top 30 to report that bribery is a problem."

If only the high-tax prophets at the International Monetary Fund were paying attention. In a recent working paper, three Fund economists -- writing in a "personal" capacity -- put out an anti-flat tax screed. We don't have the space to dissect the entire paper here, but in essence they wave away the experience of Hong Kong and Russia and argue that the pro-market signals flat taxes send won't do any good for developed nations.

DOJ_NMG_0092637

We never thought we'd say this, but perhaps the World Bank can lend the Fund a few economists for some re-education assistance. The IMF bias has long been to elevate balanced budgets as the highest fiscal priority, with tax levels and tax incidence as secondary matters. The Bank business tax survey implicitly exposes the error of the Fund's ways. Combined with President Paul Wolfowitz's long-needed campaign against corruption, the tax report also marks a welcome turn at the Bank in a pro-growth direction.

The Bank's report should also inspire a more thoughtful debate over the virtue of value-added taxes, or VATs. More than 130 countries have adopted VATs, with the IMF pushing hard for its implementation in places like Hong Kong. The VAT is a highly efficient tax and in that way has an advantage over a corporate income tax regime with high rates but many loopholes. But that very efficiency also makes a VAT dangerous as an engine of bigger government because its incidence tends to be hidden and politicians are tempted to raise the rate whenever they want a little more revenue. Some built-in restraint on that political impulse is needed.

The overriding goal of any tax system should be to raise the revenue that governments need for public purposes with the least amount of economic distortion and evasion. The lesson of the World Bank report is that the more transparent and simple a tax scheme, the more it will achieve that purpose.

As Vietnam Trip Nears, Bush Rejects Iraq Link (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush travels this week to the site of an old military conflict casting a shadow over the United States and Iraq: Vietnam.

Bush's trip, including stops in Singapore and Indonesia, is mainly to promote trade at a conference in Hanoi and discuss ways to combat terrorism in the region. But the eight-day journey also includes reminders of how the Vietnam War roiled U.S. politics and society and raises questions about whether the same thing is happening with Iraq.

“The few similarities dwarf all the differences,” said historian Robert Brigham, author of the book Is Iraq Another Vietnam?

Among them, Brigham said: an inability to transform military strength into political influence in the region, a steady drain of public support for the war, and harsh lessons about the limits of U.S. power.

Bush stressed what he said were the differences with reporters last week. He said Iraqis overthrew Saddam Hussein with U.S. help, approved a new constitution and formed a government that is trying to move forward despite sectarian violence.

Vietnam endured a civil war in which the communist North, backed by China and the Soviet Union, defeated a U.S.-supported government in the South.

The Iraq war is also being fought with a volunteer army, Bush said, without the compulsory draft that inspired protests in the 1960s and early '70s. The president also said U.S. troops in Iraq are receiving more support from the American people than those in Vietnam did.

“I see the differences,” he said, “I really do.”

Bush leaves Tuesday for Singapore, where he will deliver a speech on U.S.-Asian relations, the prospects for trade and North Korea's nuclear ambitions. Then he goes to Vietnam and Indonesia, and makes a quick stop in Hawaii before returning to Washington.

The Asia trip comes a week after Republicans lost control of Congress in an election in which, Bush said, voters expressed “displeasure” with the Iraq war. Some members of the new Democratic majority in Congress want U.S. troops out of Iraq, and some, such as Ohio Sen.-elect Sherrod Brown, campaigned against free trade as a threat to Americans' jobs.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley said that unlike in Vietnam, a loss in Iraq would pose a direct threat to the United States because Iraq would become a “safe haven for terrorists.” He said another key difference is that U.S. servicemembers support the mission in Iraq and the war on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0092638

Historian Robert Dallek, who chronicled the Vietnam War in biographies of Presidents Lyndon Johnson and John Kennedy, said a loss in Iraq would not be fatal to the United States.

"We lost in Vietnam, and we won the larger Cold War," he pointed out.

Among other differences: The opposition in Iraq lacks a single, charismatic leader in the mold of Ho Chi Minh, former president of North Vietnam. Brigham pointed out that the Vietnam conflict began as an insurgency and ended as a conventional war; the opposite happened in Iraq.

More than 2,800 U.S. troops have lost their lives in Iraq, compared with more than 58,000 in Vietnam.

The Vietnam conflict continues to exert a powerful hold on U.S. politics. Bill Clinton and Bush, who served in the Texas Air National Guard, each spent part of their presidential campaigns explaining how they avoided being sent to the war zone. The attacks on 2004 Democratic nominee John Kerry by fellow swift boat veterans revived the ghosts of the Vietnam War.

Historian Douglas Brinkley, who wrote a book about Kerry and Vietnam, said that the war occurred at a tumultuous time in American history, amid the civil rights and women's movements, the emergence of the counterculture, and the assassinations of political leaders such as President Kennedy, his brother Robert and Martin Luther King Jr.

Today, life in the USA isn't as tumultuous, though similar political divisions are emerging over Iraq, Brinkley said. Because there is no military draft, few Americans are touched directly by the Iraq war unless family or friends are serving there, he said.

For that reason, Brinkley called Iraq more of a "low-grade" Vietnam. "Even today," he said, "you say the word Vietnam and it brings out polar reactions."

After the Persian Gulf War, the first President Bush said, "By God, we've kicked the Vietnam syndrome once and for all."

Historians such as Stanley Karnow said that statement is questionable because of Iraq. Karnow, author of a history of Vietnam, said the USA can't escape the shadow of Vietnam any more than the Civil War or any other "seminal experience."

"People will go on talking about it and debating it forever," he said.

In Vietnam, Old Foes Take Aim At War's Toxic Legacy (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

DA NANG, Vietnam -- For a stark reminder of the Vietnam War, people living near the airport in this central industrial city can still stroll along the old stone walls that once surrounded a U.S. military base. But Luu Thi Nguyen, a 31-year-old homemaker, needs only to look into the face of her young daughter.

Van, 5, spends her days at home, playing by herself on the concrete floor because local school officials say her appearance frightens other children. She has an oversize head and a severely deformed mouth, and her upper body is covered in a rash so severe her skin appears to have been boiled. According to Vietnamese medical authorities, she is part of a new generation of Agent Orange victims, forever scarred by the U.S.-made herbicide containing dioxin, one of the world's most toxic pollutants.

For decades, the United States and Vietnam have wrangled over the question of responsibility for the U.S. military's deployment of Agent Orange. But officials say they are now moving to jointly address at least one important aspect of the spraying's aftermath -- environmental damage at Vietnamese "hot spots" such as Nguyen's city, Da Nang -- that are still contaminated with dioxin 31 years after the fall of Saigon.

Though neither Nguyen nor her husband was exposed to the Agent Orange sprayed by U.S. forces from 1962 to 1971, officials here say they believe the couple genetically passed on dioxin's side effects after eating fish from contaminated canals. "I am not interested in blaming anyone at this point," the soft-spoken Nguyen said on a recent day, stroking her daughter's face. "But the contamination should not keep doing this to our children. It must be cleaned up."

Vietnamese and U.S. officials last year conducted their first joint scientific research project related to Agent Orange. Testing of the soil near Da Nang's airport, where farmers say they have been unable to grow rice or fruit trees for decades, showed dioxin levels there as much as 100 times above acceptable international standards.

DOJ_NMG_0092639

Now the United States is planning to co-fund a project to remove massive amounts of the chemical from the soil. A senior U.S. official involved in Vietnam policy said the plan is evidence that the two countries, having embarked on a new era of economic cooperation, are finally collaborating to address the problem.

"The need to deal with environmental cleanup is increasingly clear, and we're moving forward from talking to taking concrete actions to respond to the issue," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the project has not yet been publicly announced.

The more politically sensitive issues of responsibility and direct compensation for victims remain unresolved. Although medical authorities here estimate that there are more than 4 million suspected dioxin victims in Vietnam, the United States maintains that there are no conclusive scientific links between Agent Orange and the severe health problems and birth defects that the Vietnamese attribute to dioxin.

Still, with a much-changed Vietnam now among Asia's most dynamic economies -- the French luxury house Louis Vuitton has opened a branch in Hanoi, and the hottest nightspot in the capital is a glitzy disco called Apocalypse Now -- both sides appear more willing to seek common ground. Ahead of President Bush's first official visit to Vietnam this week, some also express hope that they are taking the first steps toward a reconciliation on their most divisive wartime issue.Coming Together

During the war, American forces sprayed about 12 million gallons of Agent Orange over the jungle canopies and jade-green highlands of Vietnam. The most toxic of the herbicides used for military purposes, it defoliated countless trees in areas where the communist North Vietnamese troops hid supply lines and conducted guerrilla warfare.

Because Vietnam lacked the resources to conduct its own environmental cleanup, dioxin-related birth defects have been diagnosed in thousands of children whose parents were not exposed during the war. In many cases, families such as the Nguyens were not warned of the hazard until it was too late.

After doctors told them their daughter, Van, was a dioxin victim, the Nguyens cemented over the small garden in their front yard and stopped eating fish from nearby canals. Even now, however, many of their neighbors remain unaware of the danger.

"What could any of us do, anyway?" asked Luu Thi Nguyen, whose family survives on the $1.50 a day her husband makes as a day laborer. "None of us can afford to move. Now I know the soil is contaminated. My daughter has already suffered from this, and I worry about what this soil might still be doing to all of us."

Vietnamese officials estimate the cost of cleaning up the country's three worst hot spots -- including the area near the old U.S. military base in Da Nang that is now the city's main airport -- will be as much as $60 million. Before year's end, they hope to launch the first phase, the development of a plan for cleanup and land use in the city, with an initial contribution of about $300,000 from the U.S. government.

That kind of cooperation has appeared to give new momentum to the issue on other fronts. On Thursday, the Ford Foundation announced that it is putting $2.2 million toward environmental restoration, contamination education and victim relief projects related to Agent Orange. The United Nations Development Program is also set to piggyback with a major grant in coming weeks that would provide additional research funding for the cleanup effort, which Vietnamese officials hope to complete by 2010.

"Vietnam is developing economically very rapidly, and I think the passage of time has played a role in both sides coming together," said Charles R. Bailey, the Vietnam director of the Ford Foundation, which has also funded key studies used to identify the country's most contaminated areas. "There is a sense that this is the last piece of unfinished business between the two countries. It is finally starting to be bridged."

But many here stress that the United States still needs to do far more to right past wrongs, and some are anticipating that Bush will offer a measure of apology for Agent Orange's wartime use when he visits.

"There are new signs that we are moving forward on cooperation with the U.S. on technical issues," said Le Ke Son, Vietnam's top official on Agent Orange. "It is very important to close the past, to close the war between Vietnam and the United States. But for that to happen, the U.S. must agree to cooperate with us in a bigger way."Push for Compensation

What many Vietnamese are waiting for is direct compensation for victims of Agent Orange as well as an unambiguous admission of responsibility from the U.S. government.

DOJ_NMG_0092640

In 1991, Congress authorized assistance for American veterans believed to be suffering from dioxin side effects, but at the same time, the legislation noted that conclusive links between illnesses and the herbicide remained "presumptive." That allowed U.S. officials to effectively sidestep a de facto admission of guilt in Vietnam and avoid offering compensation to Vietnamese victims.

At least one group of victims has already made a formal push for compensation, filing a lawsuit in New York against the chemical companies that produced Agent Orange, including Dow Chemical and Monsanto. In the late 1970s, U.S. veterans filed a similar case and settled out of court in 1984 for a $180 million payment. The Vietnamese case was dismissed last year, but an appeal hearing is expected next month.

The recent advances toward cleaning up the environment are of little solace to these Vietnamese. In a country where birth defects are considered by some an embarrassing reflection of the ill deeds of ancestors, many of the children born with the most severe defects end up abandoned or living in squalid conditions with families too poor to pay for adequate care.

The lucky ones end up in the Peace Village ward for Agent Orange victims at a hospital in Ho Chi Minh City, formerly Saigon. In rooms filled with stricken children, nurses tend to patients including a 2-year-old boy born without eyes and a 14-year-old girl whose head has grown bigger than her torso. Many of the 60 young patients have severely limited mental faculties, but existence appears tougher for those who are still alert.

U.S. officials have argued that Vietnam has exaggerated the extent of Agent Orange's effect, blaming the herbicide for birth defects that may have other genetic or environmental roots. But it's the kind of argument that infuriates people such as Duc Nguyen, 25, who began life as a conjoined twin.

Nguyen, born in the south-central town of Sathay, an area heavily sprayed by Agent Orange during the war, was separated from his brother, Viet Nguyen, at age 7. Doctors here say that soon after their birth, their mother's tissues were found to contain high levels of dioxin. These days, Duc Nguyen, who has one leg and severe bone distortions, works as Peace Village's information technology specialist. He spends his days in an office one floor below his noncognitive brother, who is kept tied to a bed most of the time, unable to move his stump-like body and reflexively gargling on his own saliva.

A 2004 study by the Vietnamese government indicated that birth defects in Sathay were 10 to 20 times more common than the national average. Duc Nguyen is engaged to be married next month to a beautiful young woman he met through his work at the hospital. But he is still far from finding peace.

"I find it ironic that on one hand you put [Saddam Hussein] on trial for using biological warfare, but in another country where you sprayed chemicals for warfare, you neglect your responsibility," said Duc Nguyen, who is not related to Luu Thi Nguyen in Da Nang.

"The United States must admit it's responsible and compensate the Agent Orange victims in Vietnam," he said. "It is your moral obligation. Sooner or later, it has to be done."

Vietnam Frees U.S. Citizen Convicted Of Terrorism (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

A U.S. citizen convicted of terrorism in a Vietnamese court has been released and will arrive today in the United States, her daughter said yesterday.

The case of Orlando resident Thuong Nguyen "Cuc" Foshee had complicated efforts by the Bush administration to pass a major trade bill with Vietnam. The House was due to take up the legislation today. Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) had blocked the trade bill from coming to the floor of the Senate, and on Friday he indicated he would continue to thwart the bill's passage until Foshee arrived home.

A judge at the Ho Chi Minh City People's Court on Friday sentenced Foshee and six other defendants to 15 months in prison, with credit for time served while awaiting trial, which would have meant she would not be deported until next month. The defendants admitted that they had broken Vietnamese law but denied any link to terrorism.

Foshee's daughter, Elizabeth McCausland, said in an interview yesterday that she was told her mother had been released early for "humanitarian reasons."

DOJ_NMG_0092641

President Bush will arrive in Hanoi on Friday for an Asian economic summit and has pressed for the trade bill's passage before he leaves Washington.

Vietnam, the fastest-growing market for U.S. products in Asia, was recently accepted as the 150th member of the World Trade Organization. A bill granting Vietnam permanent normal trade relations is necessary for U.S. firms to benefit from the low tariffs that Vietnam will introduce as a WTO member.

Foshee was born in Vietnam and came to the United States after marrying a U.S. Army Special Forces master sergeant. She was active in protests in the United States against the communist government of Vietnam.

Foshee and the other defendants, including two other U.S. citizens, were accused of plotting to broadcast anti-communist radio messages under the direction of an anti-government group based in California. Vietnam considers the group, called the Government of Free Vietnam, to be a terrorist organization.

One member, Vietnamese-born U.S. resident Nguyen Huu Chanh, has been suspected of planning bomb attacks on Vietnamese embassies. Chanh is detained in South Korea, but a Seoul court has refused to extradite him to Vietnam.

Bush, Putin To Bask In Trade Deal (AFP)

By Stephen Collinson

AFP, November 13, 2006

President George W. Bush Wednesday holds the first of two meetings with Russian leader Vladimir Putin within five days, bearing the prize of a long sought-after pact on Moscow's entry into the WTO.

While the deal announced Friday is a landmark between two former Cold War foes, it will also throw a harsh spotlight on growing strains in US-Russian relations, as it is expected to face harsh scrutiny in Congress.

The two meetings, one in Moscow on Wednesday and one in Vietnam next Sunday, come as expectations mount of an increasingly testy relationship between Congress, captured by Democrats in Tuesday's elections, and the Kremlin.

Concern is mounting among US legislators on a list of US-Russia disagreements, spanning Moscow's reluctance to impose sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program, geopolitical concerns like Georgia and post-Soviet states, human rights, and trade spats.

There is also disquiet over how the emerging energy superpower hands out oil and gas contracts, its arms sales to US foe Venezuela and the murder of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya.

Some Republican and Democrats also believe Bush's vaunted friendship with Putin has failed to deliver much for the United States.

The two leaders will first meet when Air Force One makes a refuelling stop in Moscow en route for Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia.

Though the meeting is being styled as an informal chat while the presidential jet replenishes its tanks, the symbolism of a stop in Russia is clear.

"We contacted the Russians and said, would you mind if we put down and refuelled ... we said no ceremony, no meetings required," said Bush's national security advisor Stephen Hadley.

"Word came back .. President Putin and Mrs Putina would like to pay a social call on the president for the 45 minutes or so that we're sitting on the tarmac to get refuelled," he said.

The more substantive meeting between the two leaders will come on Sunday November 19, after the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum in Vietnam.

"Obviously we have a lot of issues to talk about with Russia, not the least of which being Iran," said Hadley.

Analysts said Russian leaders are also wary of the incoming Democratic majority in Congress produced by Tuesday's elections.

"Historically, Democrats have always been more complicated for us than Republicans," Kremlin-connected analyst Vyacheslav Nikonov told AFP in Moscow on Thursday.

The trade deal between Russia and the United States, over a decade in the making, lifts one of the final obstacles standing in the way of Russian accession to the World Trade Organisation.

DOJ_NMG_0092642

US Chamber of Commerce senior vice president Daniel Christman called on Congress to move swiftly on granting Russia "Permanent Normal Trade Relations" (PNTR) status and so abolish commercial limits imposed on the former communist country.

Without PNTR, US and Russian businesses will still not enjoy full access to each other's markets even after Moscow joins the WTO.

Some analysts say the Democrats are going to order tougher scrutiny of trade agreements once they take control of Congress in January.

Democrat Max Baucus, who is in line to chair the US Senate's powerful finance committee with responsibility for trade matters, welcomed the deal.

"At the same time, Russia must take additional steps to earn a welcome into the WTO," he stressed, highlighting "unacceptable levels of piracy and counterfeiting" and an "unscientific" Russian ban on US beef.

SKorea Balks At Measures To Sanction North (AP)

By Jae-soon Chang

AP, November 13, 2006

South Korea balked Monday at participating in a U.S.-led plan that foresees intercepting North Korean ships suspected of carrying supplies for the regime's nuclear and missile weapons programs.

Seoul, worried that stopping and searching ships could lead to armed clashes with the North, also insisted it is already doing enough to prevent weapons proliferation by Pyongyang, which detonated a nuclear weapon on Oct. 9.

South Korea is finalizing a report on how it would carry out the U.N. sanctions slapped on North Korea in response to the nuclear test.

Park In-kook, a deputy foreign minister, said Seoul already participated in various regimes to control weapons of mass destruction, and wouldn't formally join the U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, a campaign aimed largely at stopping North Korean weapons traffic by sea.

However, the South will continue a hold on regular humanitarian aid to the North, said Lee Kwan-se, a Unification Ministry official. Seoul suspended the aid in July after North Korea test-launched a series of missiles over international objections.

Lee also said South Korea will suspend its subsidies for a tourism program at the North's Diamond Mountain resort. Those subsidies are believed to be relatively small and intended simply to fund trips by those — mainly students — who can't afford the expensive, multi-day tours.

South Korea's report to the U.N. sanctions committee on how it would carry out the resolution unanimously adopted after the North's nuclear test was expected to be submitted Monday.

The resolution bans the sale of major arms to North Korea and calls for inspection of cargo entering and leaving the country. It also calls for the freezing of assets of businesses supplying the North's nuclear and ballistic weapons programs, as well as restrictions on sales of luxury goods, and travel bans on Pyongyang officials.

Park said Monday that the South would ban travel by those North Korean officials named by the U.N. committee.

Seoul has participated in the U.S.-led ship interdiction program known as the Proliferation Security Initiative, or PSI, only as an observer.

The two Koreas are still technically at war, as the 1950-53 Korean War ended in a truce, not a peace treaty. But their relations have warmed since the first, and only, summit of their leaders in 2000, with Seoul pursuing engagement rather than confrontation under the so-called sunshine policy.

Early December Proposed For NKorea Talks: Russia (AFP)

AFP, November 13, 2006

Six-nation talks on ending North Korea's nuclear weapons drive may be held at the beginning of December, a Russian envoy said.

The Russian ambassador to Japan, Alexander Losyukov, said dates early next month have been proposed among diplomats.

DOJ_NMG_0092643

"According to the exchanges of diplomatic documents, there is a possibility that it will be held in early December," he told reporters in Tokyo.

North Korea on October 9 tested an atom bomb but agreed later in the month to return to six-nation disarmament talks which it has boycotted for a year.

Diplomats from the countries involved have repeatedly said the talks are likely to be held in November or December.

The leaders of the five nations negotiating with North Korea -- China, Japan, Russia, South Korea and the United States -- are expected to discuss the resumption of six-way talks when they meet this weekend for a summit in Hanoi.

The United States and Japan have supported a tough line against the North after its nuclear test, while the other three countries have favored a more conciliatory approach.

North Korea had stayed away from talks since November last year to protest US financial sanctions against a bank accused of laundering and counterfeiting money for the regime.

Losyukov, who is a former negotiator in the six-party talks, said that the dialogue has "drastically changed" since its inception in 2003.

"North Korea once said it was a peaceful nation and that it would not go nuclear. Now it has declared the possession of nuclear weapons and its determination to protect itself with them," he said.

Losyukov, who will return to Russia this month but remain active in Moscow's Asian diplomacy, said that the "the process of the six-party talks has to speed up."

"Holding talks biannually, annually or biennially is not enough. If the six-party talks are to proceed only slowly at the current pace, the situation will only worsen and risks of conflicts will increase," he said.

Losyukov also said he believes Pyongyang "is trying to develop (nuclear) weapons because it fears its sovereignty will be infringed" through military attacks or political pressure.

The best way to solve the stalemate is "to assure North Korea that its sovereignty will be inviolable," he said, while adding that he does not know how to resolve the problem completely.

"The strategy of threatening North Korea by saying 'we will force you to abandon nuclear ambitions unless you voluntarily give them up' -- I don't think it works," he said.

Nuclear Deals Said To Be Thwarted (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

The Czech secret service disrupted three attempts last year by North Korea to purchase equipment needed for nuclear weapons production, Czech media reported.

"Last year our service halted three export deals headed for North Korea, in particular special machine tools, their components and spare parts," a secret service spokesman, Jan Subrt, told the CTK news agency.

North Korea is said to have been looking to buy special machine tools that would enable it to produce small nuclear weapons.

Pyongyang conducted its first nuclear test last month.

Olmert Tackles Iran On U.S. Visit (WT/AP)

By Amy Teibel

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert flew to Washington at the start of a five-day U.S. visit yesterday, armed with an agenda focusing on the Iranian nuclear threat and Israel's relations with the Palestinians.

On the flight, Mr. Olmert repeated his view that Iran will not scale back its nuclear ambitions unless it fears the consequences of its intransigence, spokeswoman Miri Eisin said.

The Iranians "have to be afraid of the consequences if there isn't a compromise," she quoted Mr. Olmert as having told journalists on the flight.

DOJ_NMG_0092644

Mr. Olmert, however, appeared to play down a senior official's suggestion that Israel is preparing for a military strike against Iran's nuclear program. Asked to comment on Deputy Defense Minister Ephraim Sneh's remarks, Mr. Olmert replied that on such matters, "we have to be very careful about what we say," Col. Eisin said.

Mr. Sneh's comments were part of a pattern of heightened Israeli rhetoric on the Iranian nuclear issue. The Iranian Foreign Ministry yesterday said Iran's military would hit back with a "swift, strong and crushing" response to any Israeli military action against it.

Mr. Olmert has said Iran's nuclear ambitions will be the main item on his agenda in Washington. Mr. Olmert had dinner with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice last night and is scheduled to meet with President Bush today.

Israel is worried about Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's repeated calls to destroy Israel and, like the United States, does not believe Tehran's claims that its nuclear program is intended solely to produce energy.

The United States has led international efforts to curb the Iranian nuclear program, but Israelis are concerned that U.S. policy might soften after the Democratic Party victory in congressional elections last week.

The fear is that with U.S. public opinion turning against the invasion of Iraq, Mr. Bush would be less likely to take decisive military or diplomatic action against Iran.

Some analysts also think the Bush administration might be willing to end its policy of isolating Iran because of Tehran's influence over armed groups in Iraq.

Mr. Olmert arrived in Washington with a gutted diplomatic agenda. He took office promising to pull Israel out of much of the West Bank, but shelved that plan after Israel's summer war against Lebanese guerrillas left Israelis with little enthusiasm for territorial concessions. A poll put his approval rating at about 20 percent.

Mr. Olmert has revived the notion of negotiating with the moderate Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, but the two men have not been able to agree on an agenda or even set a date to meet.

There are expectations that while in Washington, Mr. Olmert will make small-scale moves on the Palestinian front, including proposed humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people.

Mr. Olmert told reporters he did not expect major developments during the trip. "This isn't a dramatic visit," Col. Eisin quoted him as saying.

Olmert Arrives In US For Talks With Bush In New Political Climate (AFP)

By Ron Bousso

AFP, November 13, 2006

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert arrived in the United States for talks with President George W. Bush on Iraq, Iran and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the wake of a landmark US congressional election that may portend foreign policy shifts.

Olmert was to meet with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Sunday and have talks with Bush at the White House on Monday.

Monday's summit, which comes six months after Olmert's first meeting with Bush at the White House, has been described in Israel as "a down-to-business meeting" on Iran.

With Tehran continuing to reject international calls to halt its nuclear enrichment efforts, Israel has in recent months moved the Iranian threat to the top of its agenda.

But Israel could have reason for concern about the resignation of US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, a ferocious opponent of dialogue. His expected successor, Robert Gates, has signed onto a report calling for dialogue with Iran.

Backed by the United States, Israel has said sanctions are necessary following Tehran's failure to suspend uranium enrichment, a process which Israel, the United States and several European powers say hides a secret nuclear weapons programme -- despite Iranian insistence that it is for peaceful purposes.

Israel -- widely considered the Middle East's sole, if undeclared, nuclear weapons power -- considers Iran its chief enemy, pointing to calls from President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for the Jewish state to be wiped off the map.

In Los Angeles on Friday, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Tehran was merely buying time by negotiating with the international community, and warned of a regional arms race if Tehran obtained an atomic weapon.

DOJ_NMG_0092645

"The UN resolution said very clearly in July, stop the enrichment or face sanctions," Livni said. "And here we are in November, and still we are talking about the next resolution for 'soft sanctions'."

Olmert ratcheted up his anti-Iranian rhetoric calling Ahmadinejad "a man who is ready to commit crimes against humanity."

Israel, the premier said, is ready for a compromise, "but I don't believe that Iran will accept such a compromise unless they have good reason to fear the consequences ... In other words, Iran must start to fear."

An Iranian foreign ministry spokesman, Mohammad Ali Hosseini, said Sunday that Tehran would deliver a "destructive" response to any Israeli military attack on its atomic sites and that it would continue trying to boost its capacity for uranium enrichment.

Hosseini's comments came after a top Israeli official refused to rule out a strike on the Islamic republic to halt the progress of its atomic programme, with the United Nations still unable to agree on sanctions against Tehran.

Olmert has also weighed in on US policy in Iraq in the wake of the Democrats' election triumph.

Democrats, who wrested control of the US Congress from Republicans on Tuesday, have long called for a reassessment of the US strategy in Iraq, with many calling for redeployment of US forces from the country.

"If there is a premature pullout before Iraq has a robust government with a strong authority that can keep the country from collapsing into an internal civil war, America will have to think about the possible ramifications on neighboring Arab countries with moderate governments," Olmert told The Washington Post newspaper and Newsweek magazine in an interview published Sunday.

Under increasing pressure to change US policy in Iraq, Bush is awaiting conclusions of a study group that may recommend opening talks with Iran and Syria as a way of prodding them to help restore stability in neighboring Iraq.

Bush will speak to members of the Iraq Study Group on the same day he is to meet Olmert. The group is expected to deliver its final report by year-end.

Bush and Olmert will likely also talk about Lebanon, according to a senior administration official.

It will be the first Bush-Olmert meeting since Israel's war against Hezbollah in Lebanon, in which the United States lent its unfailing political support to its ally.

On Saturday, Washington vetoed an Arab-sponsored draft resolution in the UN Security Council that would have condemned an Israeli artillery barrage that killed 19 people in the Gaza Strip last week.

In New Middle East, Tests For An Old Friendship (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 12 — Even before the American elections, a certain wariness had crept into the intimate friendship between Israel and the United States. The summer war in Lebanon produced questions in Washington about the competence of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. In Jerusalem, there were worries about the American approach to Iran and the Palestinians.

In theory, the two countries share a vision for a modern Middle East in which a thriving Israel would be accepted by its neighbors. But the Israelis balk at President Bush's embrace of regional change through promotion of Arab democracy. They view his effort as naïve and counterproductive, because it brings Islamists and Iranian clients to power.

Although Israel was grateful to see Saddam Hussein overthrown, officials here have long focused on what they consider a much bigger concern: preventing Iran from gaining nuclear weapons. They say the American policies that have empowered Iranian-backed militias in Iraq have been counterproductive to Israel's interests.

That concern is bound to be the subtext when Mr. Olmert goes to the White House on Monday. And now the Democratic sweep has created fresh concerns that the administration, whose muscular approach to Islamist terrorism and Iran has brought comfort here, will turn more to accommodation and compromise. President Bush has chosen as his next secretary of defense Robert M. Gates, who in the past has been highly critical of the administration's refusal to engage in dialogue with Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0092646

The defeat for the party of Mr. Bush, "possibly the friendliest president we've ever had," said Zalman Shoval, a former Israeli ambassador to Washington, "raises question marks regarding the administration's ability to promote its diplomatic and security objectives."

In war or peace, most Israelis say they believe they have only one true ally in the world, the United States. The relationship is extraordinarily tight, especially since 9/11 and the beginning of the campaign against terrorism.

But Israel is haunted by the specter of a nuclear-armed Iran, despite Israel's own nuclear deterrent. Iran has called for Israel's destruction, flouted the United Nations by continuing to enrich uranium and has just announced that it has a new longer-range missile.

"Many Israelis feel that the free world under the leadership of the U.S. is facing a similar situation to Europe in the 1930s, when they watched the rearming of the Nazi Reich," said Yuval Steinitz, a senior member of Parliament's foreign and defense committee. "No one could predict the global catastrophe 10 years later, and Iran may be the same."

Mr. Bush says his stance on Iran is unchanged: he will never accept a nuclear-armed Iran. Yet Israelis have been increasingly anxious about the Bush approach, seeing recently a tendency to delay confrontation through further negotiations. They worry that because of Iran's ability to further inflame Iraq, Mr. Bush is hesitant to take any steps that could lead to confrontation. And Israelis are worried about what concessions an administration seeking to build an anti-Iran alliance in the Arab world might ask of them on the Palestinian question in order to bolster that alliance.

Both Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Palestinian territories are armed, radical, Iranian-backed Islamic groups sworn to Israel's destruction. And each has been empowered and legitimized by elections that Mr. Bush demanded, and Israel's summer war involved fighting both of them.

Lebanon: The Pressures of War

All these strains were heightened by the war against Hezbollah, set off by the capture of two Israeli soldiers, and the global criticism of Israeli tactics in Lebanon.

Halfway into the war, on July 30, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was in Jerusalem, telling the Israeli defense minister, Amir Peretz, of her concern about killing civilians. Mr. Peretz listened but did not reveal what he knew: eight hours earlier Israel had killed more than two dozen of them in the village of Qana.

When a senior aide told her of wrenching television coverage of the deaths, Ms. Rice cut the meeting short and accepted a Lebanese request that she not travel next to Beirut, as planned, with a draft cease-fire resolution. She got Israel to accept a 48-hour cessation of most airstrikes which, in her view, was broken within hours.

Still, it was two more weeks before Ms. Rice, President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney suggested to the Israelis that the war was starting to undermine Israel's long-term interests. Even then, Mr. Bush and his aides did not demand a cessation of hostilities, waiting instead for the Israelis to reach the same conclusion.

Asked in a recent interview with The New York Times whether the administration had to get the Israelis to stop their attacks, Ms. Rice said no. "I wasn't going to give the Israelis military advice," she said, adding that she "had a lot of sympathy for what the Israelis were dealing with."

It was another example of Washington's intimate relationship and patience with Israel.

The reluctance to confront is mutual, said Yossi Alpher, a former negotiator who runs a Web site promoting Israeli-Palestinian Internet dialogue, bitterlemons.com. "I'd love Israeli leaders to sit down with Bush for a mutual soul-searching, and say, 'We're concerned, dear Mr. President, that your plans are hurting us, that part of the audacity of the radical Islamists we fight comes from your decision to enfranchise them,' " he said. "But we don't dare to."

Israel, he noted, has been highly skeptical of the idea of pushing democracy among Arab nations where the only organized opposition parties are linked to militants. It is a lot safer from Israel's perspective to deal with stable, if autocratic, states like Jordan and Egypt.

When Ms. Rice "looked at the damage in Beirut and said these are 'the birth pangs of the new Middle East,' I cringed, because I thought the Bush people had learned their lesson after the election of Hamas," Mr. Alpher said. "For Israel to manage, we need more of the old Middle East, not the new Middle East."

DOJ_NMG_0092647

Those anxieties persist despite Mr. Bush's fidelity. As the Lebanon war showed, Mr. Bush has been reluctant to impose the kinds of restraints on Israel that his father employed, to press talks with the Palestinians in the style of Bill Clinton or even to push Israel to ease up on Palestinian travel.

That has pleased many of Israel's supporters, including those among an increasingly vocal, fiercely pro-Israel community of evangelicals, who visited the White House at least once during the Lebanon war to voice support for allowing the air attacks on Hezbollah to continue unabated.

As President Bush prepares to meet Prime Minister Olmert, the man the White House backed while privately coming to doubt his political and military judgment, there are questions in Israel and Washington about how the two will deal with potential disagreements over Iran and the Palestinians.

The Threat of a Nuclear Iran

Mr. Bush's aides say the fighting in Lebanon in July and August was more important than it appeared because of Hezbollah's relationship with Iran.

"We saw the conflict this summer as much more than just a border war between Israel and Hezbollah," said R. Nicholas Burns, under secretary of state for political affairs. "It was clear from the very beginning of this conflict that Iran was behind Hezbollah, providing the financing and the long-range rockets that held the Israelis hostage."

"Israel and the United States, as well as many of the Arab states, see the same threat we do," he continued, "an Iran that is expanding its influence and fundamentally trying to destabilize the Middle East through its proxies."

But Israelis worry that Mr. Bush may dither over Iran. "Our big worry is that they will wait too long to act, after it is too late to stop the Iranians from gaining the knowledge to build a bomb," said one senior Israeli official, who was not authorized to speak publicly, after long, recent discussions with top Bush administration officials. "Are they committed to keeping the Iranians from actually building a weapon? I think so. Are they committed to keeping them from putting together all the parts they need? I'm not sure."

The Israelis say Washington was disappointed in their performance against Hezbollah. They are right: inside the White House, said one senior official there, who agreed to speak about internal deliberations on condition of anonymity, "Bush and Cheney believed that this would be another Six-Day War, or on the outside, two weeks."

"They believed it because that's what the Israelis said," the official said.

For Israelis, this failure to deliver poses a risk that cannot be ignored, especially when Iran is on the table.

"Most people in Israel are not satisfied by our performance in Lebanon," said Moshe Arens, a former defense minister, foreign minister and ambassador to Washington. "So if Israel enjoys this preferred position as an ally of the U.S. and a valuable ally in the fight against terrorism and now is shown to be not that effective and maybe not even that valuable, and to some extent even disappointing, that could put something of a damper on what's happening. My guess is that's probably temporary, but I think we're going through the phase."

Itamar Rabinovich, a former Israeli ambassador to the United States who is president of Tel Aviv University, said that Israelis, no matter their appreciation for American support, could not hand over the problem of Iran to Washington. He said: "Can we rely on the United States alone and say we abdicate our responsibility for dealing with the matter, and let the United States do what it wants? No, by no means."

In an indication of Israel's concern, in late October Mr. Olmert brought a far-right party dominated by Russian immigrants into his weakened coalition, and picked its controversial leader, Avigdor Lieberman, as a deputy prime minister and strategic threats minister, with the task of "strategizing" on Iran.

Earlier in October, in Moscow, Mr. Olmert said that "Israel can never abide this type of situation" where "a country like Iran has nonconventional potential." He added, "When the head of a country says he wants to destroy us, it does not sound like an empty declaration, but something we must prepare to prevent through all acceptable and possible ways."

Diverging Interests?

Senior Israeli officials know that Mr. Bush has a lot on his plate: a nuclear North Korea, a Democratic Congress, a weak approval rating and the bleeding of American power in Iraq. To win sanctions against Iran, he needs the support of Europe, Russia and China, all very critical of Israeli policies toward the Palestinians.

DOJ_NMG_0092648

To enforce sanctions, particularly those blocking shipments of nuclear- or missile-related technology, he would need the cooperation of Iran's Arab neighbors. So Israel has another worry: that Mr. Bush will try to build an anti-Iran coalition by pressuring Israel to make concessions to the Palestinians.

In September, Israel was abuzz over a speech by an American official that got little coverage in the American news media. Philip D. Zelikow, counselor to Ms. Rice, had addressed the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, considered sympathetic to Israel's interests, on "Building Security in the Broader Middle East."

Mr. Zelikow, in the last of 10 points, suggested that to build a coalition to deal with Iran, the United States needed to make progress on solving the Arab-Israeli dispute.

"For the Arab moderates and for the Europeans, some sense of progress and momentum on the Arab-Israeli dispute is just a sine qua non for their ability to cooperate actively with the United States on a lot of other things that we care about," he said.

The message seemed perfectly clear to Israelis: the Bush administration would demand Israeli concessions on the Palestinian issue to hold together an American-led coalition on Iran. American officials were quick to insist that there was no change in American policy, and that Mr. Zelikow was speaking on his own.

But Mr. Zelikow's close ties to Ms. Rice are well known, and the furor over his comments was amplified because they appeared to some to echo criticisms published in March in The London Review of Books by two American scholars, John J. Mearsheimer of the University of Chicago and Stephen M. Walt of the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard.

They suggested that from the White House to Capitol Hill, Israel's interests have been confused with America's, that Israel is more of a security burden than an asset and that the "Israel lobby" in America, including Jewish policy makers, have an undue influence over American foreign policy. In late August, appearing in front of an Islamic group in Washington, Mr. Mearsheimer extended the argument to say that American support of the war in Lebanon had been another example of Israeli interests trumping American ones.

The essay argued that without the Israel lobby the United States would not have gone to war in Iraq and implied that the same forces could drag the United States into another military confrontation on Israel's behalf, with Iran. It urged more American pressure to solve the Palestinian question as the best cure for regional instability.

Some Israelis worried that the implicit charge of dual loyalty would be underlined by the trial of two former officials of the prominent pro-Israel lobbying group, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, on charges of receiving classified information about Iran and other issues from a Defense Department official and passing it on to a journalist and an Israeli diplomat. The trial is scheduled to begin early next year.

Mr. Walt, in an interview, argued that the first President Bush had worked to restrain Israel, and that Mr. Clinton worked to attain diplomatic concessions to achieve a peace. But when this Bush administration took office, "they first had no use for the Mideast, then took a more balanced position, calling for a two-state solution, and then were completely won over by Israel's argument that it is simply fighting terrorism."

Former Israeli ambassadors to Washington like Mr. Rabinovich, Mr. Arens and Mr. Shoval all scoff at the Walt-Mearsheimer thesis, which echoes criticisms of Jewish influence as far back as the presidency of Harry S. Truman.

But given the intensifying debate in Washington about Iran, Mr. Rabinovich said, the essay is "disturbing," as are the echoes of part of the argument in Mr. Zelikow's speech. Mr. Arens said that 9/11 created "an objective reality" of an antiterrorism coalition, led by President Bush, in which Israel is a crucial member. Mr. Bush is seen here as less interested in being an honest broker than in supporting Israel as a crucial strategic partner in the region.

The Iran confrontation, Mr. Arens said, will bolster that partnership. "The president said that he sees a clear and present danger with Iran arming itself with nuclear weapons and it's obvious that this is a clear and present danger for the state of Israel," he said. "Although a small country, we are not a minor party. When people talk about the possibility of a military option, what are they talking about? The U.S. or maybe Israel to take that move, not the U.S. or Germany or France."

He acknowledged, however, "That inevitably will lead people who are critical of the position of the president to be critical of Israel, because we are seen as a partner in this campaign, and it is not a very big step to say that Israel is leading the U.S., or misleading the U.S., by the nose in this thing."

The Post-Bush World

DOJ_NMG_0092649

No Israeli knows if the next American president will be as tough on Iran or as loyal to Israel as Mr. Bush. If Mr. Bush does not act, Israelis say, by the time the next president takes office, in January 2009, Iran will be well on its way to a bomb, and Washington may not back Israeli responses.

Gidi Grinstein, a former Israeli negotiator who runs an independent policy center, the Reut Institute, says Israel and the United States share a larger goal on Iran but have "tension among their different objectives," as indicated by Mr. Zelikow.

The Iran debate in Washington is serious but unfinished, Mr. Grinstein said, noting the divisions between those who argue that a nuclear-armed Iran can be contained and those who believe that Iran must not get the technology to build a bomb, much less the weapon itself.

Mr. Alpher, the former Israeli negotiator, is concerned that if Mr. Bush ultimately negotiates with Iran, "we need to ensure that the United States doesn't sell us down the river." It is fine for Israel to say that Iran is the world's problem, he said. "But if the world solves it diplomatically," he added, "will it be at our expense?"

The world looks different to nearly all Israelis across the political spectrum than it does to people in most other countries. "Unlike Bush, an Israeli leader looks at Iran through the prism of the Holocaust and his responsibility to the ongoing existence of the Jewish people," Mr. Alpher said. "It may sound pompous, but at the end of the day it matters, and so we may be willing to do the strangest things."

Gadi Baltiansky, a former Israeli diplomat in Washington and director of the Geneva Initiative, which promotes Israeli-Palestinian peace, argues that, given the stakes, Israel also pays a price for American policy, which can go against Israeli interests.

"The dilemma is that even this president, a true friend of Israel, after 9/11 divided the world into good guys and bad guys, and we're one of the good guys, so fine," he said. "Syria is a bad guy. But what serves Israel's interests? Talking to them may be bad for the U.S., but not necessarily bad for us. But whether it's Hamas participating in elections or Syria, it's hard for us to say no to the United States."

What matters most to Israel, officials here in Jerusalem say, is the level of support it receives from ordinary Americans, no matter their political party or religion. Despite the anxieties here over Lebanon, Iran and academic essays, opinion polls show that Americans are solidly in support of Israel, with new support coming from evangelical Christians.

Mr. Arens, the former defense minister, said of the Europeans: "They don't like us — what can we do? What else is new? We would like to be liked by everyone, of course, but it's the relationship with the United States that really matters."

How Bush And Olmert Could Help Each Other (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Today two bruised, weakened and defensive politicians, George W. Bush and Ehud Olmert, will sit down together at the White House for the first time in six months. Whether the tide of extremism now roaring across the Middle East -- from the Gaza Strip to Baghdad -- can be turned back could depend on whether they find a way to buck each other up.

The last time the Israeli prime minister was in Washington it looked like the two allies still commanded the regional agenda. Bush was overseeing the formation of Iraq's first permanent democratic government; Olmert was preparing a bold plan for a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank. Both men emerged from the Oval Office radiating confidence that Iran would not be permitted to acquire nuclear weapons.

Today Bush and Olmert will have to face the reality that Iran is winning -- not just in preserving its nuclear program but in a broader contest over the direction of the Middle East. Olmert's "disengagement" plan is dead, at least for now; so is Bush's hope that an Iraqi coalition government could stabilize the country. Meanwhile, Iran and its ally Syria are everywhere on the offensive. They are on the verge of reversing Lebanon's popular Cedar Revolution and handing political control over the country to the Hezbollah movement. They are blocking attempts by Palestinian moderates to form a new government in Gaza that could rebuild relations with Israel and the West. Their allies are smuggling more weapons, building more bunkers and preparing for the next round of what they call "resistance" -- a permanent war against Israel that they would use to transform the region.

DOJ_NMG_0092650

In the face of this onslaught, Bush and Olmert have had little to offer. Both are in deep domestic political trouble. The vaunted military forces of both countries are badly bogged down. The two leaders could, if they let themselves, spend their time reproaching each other. Senior Israeli officials have been privately grumbling for some time that Bush's diplomatic campaign to stop an Iranian bomb is going nowhere and that there appears to be no credible American Plan B. For their part, Bush administration officials have been frustrated by Olmert's slowness to embrace even modest steps to defuse tensions with Palestinians, such as a U.S. plan to increase the flow of goods and people between Israel and Gaza.

The alternative is for Bush and Olmert to dust themselves off, put their heads together and do what comes naturally to both of them -- that is, something bold. What's needed is a game-changing initiative that would break the momentum of Iran and its allies, and energize demoralized Arab moderates -- like Ariel Sharon's 2003 proposal to withdraw from Gaza or Bush's June 2002 endorsement of a Palestinian state.

What's possible? From the American point of view, the obvious answer is a major Israeli effort to encourage the formation of a responsible Palestinian government. Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, a moderate, has been negotiating with the militant Hamas movement for months about a "unity" coalition made up of technocrats. Israeli officials tend to dismiss the effort as doomed. But what if Olmert were to spell out an aggressive Israeli plan to work with such a government? The plan could start with restoring the Palestinian tax funds that Israel collects but has impounded, and move on quickly to the release of Palestinian prisoners and talks about a negotiated version of the West Bank withdrawal Olmert proposed.

Among some senior Israeli officials a different but even bolder idea is being quietly kicked around: the opening of a dialogue with Syria. The idea is to flip Syrian President Bashar al-Assad; to induce him to drop his alliance with Iran and join the moderate Sunni alliance that is quietly lining up against Tehran. The Bush administration is loath to talk to Assad, partly because previous efforts have failed and partly because of what he wants from the United States, which is acquiescence to renewed Syrian suzerainty over Lebanon.

Israel cares less about who rules Lebanon. And it has something Assad wants at least as much: the Golan Heights. The Syrian president has been saying for months that he is ready to open talks about a swap of the territory for peace, a deal that his father came within inches of closing 6 1/2 years ago. Until recently Israel had little incentive to make that bargain with Bashar Assad. But the rise of the Iranian threat in the past year has changed the calculus for at least some of Olmert's advisers.

Imagine Ehud Olmert emerging from the White House to announce that Israel is prepared to explore peace with Syria. It might not turn the ugly tide in the Middle East. But it would, at least, get Israel and the United States back in the fight.

Q&A: Israel's P.M. On Iran, Lebanon, Palestinian State (NSWK)

By Lally Weymouth

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - This week Ehud Olmert makes his second visit to see President Bush in Washington. After last summer's controversial war against Hizbullah and recent allegations of corruption, the Israeli prime minister has sunk even lower in the polls than Bush. Olmert came to office promising to pull out of most of the West Bank and consolidate some large settlement blocs. He put this plan on hold after the war, but last week, when he spoke in Jerusalem with NEWSWEEK's Lally Weymouth, he insisted he still stands by his plan for peace. Excerpts:

WEYMOUTH: Last year you told President Bush you had a vision—your convergence plan—which was to withdraw unilaterally from large parts of the West Bank. Do you have a new vision today?

OLMERT: The "convergence" plan was a vehicle to accomplish a vision shared by President Bush and myself—this is a two-state solution.

After the war in Lebanon, you said the "convergence" plan was on hold.

After the war, and the failure of the Palestinians to cope with continued terrorist actions, I had second thoughts about my ability to accomplish the two-state solution through realignment. One thing I can promise: under no circumstances am I going to withdraw from the need to engage in a serious dialogue with the Palestinians. The Palestinian issue is on the agenda. There is no way we can ignore it. We have to find the best partner—a lot depends on the Palestinian leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0092651

How do you feel about President Abu Mazen as a partner?

He has consistently shown his opposition to terror and his discomfort with Hamas. But it is incumbent upon him to do more than just say how uncomfortable he is with Hamas. He hasn't yet shown enough determination to put down this government of terrorists and to reduce the influence of Khalad Mashal, who controls the the Palestinian government from Damascus.

How would you feel if Abu Mazen entered into a unity government with Hamas?

If Hamas will formally accept Israel's right to exist, end all terror against Israel, and recognize the [prior] agreements between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, then I'll be ready to sit with such a government, even if it includes Hamas representatives.

Has the United States asked you to release Palestinian leader Marwan Barghouti from prison, and would you consider it?

I made it clear long ago that I am anxious to open up a new dialogue with Abu Mazen and for that purpose I'm ready to release many prisoners. Hamas' inflexible attitude prevents the prisoners from being released because they refuse to let us have our soldier [captured Cpl. Gilad Shalit]. Hamas is not really interested in the wellbeing of its prisoners. They want to topple Abu Mazen at any cost.

You brought the ultra right-wing Avigdor Lieberman into your coalition. Will that affect your negotiating position with the Palestinians?

I made it clear that the policies of this government are not going to be changed, and you can read my lips. I'm ready for territorial compromises, and I haven't changed my mind.

How do you see the threat posed by Iran?

President Ahmadinejad is a man who is ready to commit crimes against humanity, and he has to be stopped. My position is clear. If there can be a compromise that will stop Iran short of crossing the technological threshold that will lead them into nuclear capabilities, we will be for such a compromise. But I don't believe that Iran will accept such compromise unless they have good reason to fear the consequences of not reaching a compromise. In other words, Iran must start to fear.

Will you talk with Bush about Iran?

I think that Bush is the last person on earth who needs to be reminded of what should be done in order to stop Iran. If there is one person I can trust, it's him.

If the international community does not act, would Israel consider taking military action?

It is absolutely intolerable for Israel to accept the threat of a nuclear Iran. I prefer not to discuss the Israeli options. Israel has many options.

Do you feel the war against Hizullah decreased the group's military strength but built them up politically?

I think Israel had a strategic, military and political success. The presence of the Lebanese army in the south [of Lebanon] together with a robust international force is very significant. It is not ideal. There is a lot that ought to be done and will have to be done by the international force.

So looking back, you feel the war was worthwhile?

There were many mistakes committed but the overall picture is very significant. The main objective of Israel was to create the necessary conditions for the deployment of the Lebanese army in the south of Lebanon and to stop Hizbullah from threatening the northern part of Israel, and I think that we have achieved these objectives. We still have to work hard in order to bring back the two abducted Israeli soldiers.

Syrian President Bashar al-Assad has said that he would like to talk to Israel. Would you consider this?

I would be happy to negotiate with Bashar Assad if he stopped his support of terror and of Hizbullah. Bashar Assad doesn't show any sign that he's ready to do this.

Former secretary of State James Baker said, "You don't talk to your friends, you talk to your enemies." What's to lose by exploring whether there's anything there?

Bashar Assad has not reached the point where he can qualify as a legitimate partner. You can't say we will not negotiate with terrorists and negotiate with someone who is a great supporter of terrorists.

But you negotiated with Arafat when he was in Tunisia, and he was certainly a terrorist.

DOJ_NMG_0092652

We negotiated with Arafat, and I think we learnt something about negotiations of this kind from this experience. I don't expect my enemies to be wonderful guys. But I want them to come with clean hands when they come to negotiate with us.

Wouldn't it be worth trying to separate Syria and Iran?

I don't believe Assad wants to be separated from Iran. What he wants is to recover the Golan Heights, and I don't see any signs that he understands that he needs to pay for it.

If the United States gets out of Iraq, how would this affect the region?

If there will be a premature pullout before Iraq has a robust government with a strong authority that can keep the unity of the country from collapsing into an internal civil war, then America will have to think about the possible ramifications on the neighboring Arab countries with moderate governments.

Do your low poll numbers drive you crazy?

According to the polls, I was not supposed to be prime minister. So considering the polls I'm in a good position. I don't worry.

Syria A 'Dangerous' Country, Says Rice (AFP)

AFP, November 13, 2006

The United States believes Syria is a dangerous state whose territory is being used for the accelerated arming of Lebanon's Hezbollah militia, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in an interview with an Israeli daily.

"This is a dangerous state that is behaving in a dangerous manner," Rice told the country's second largest daily, Maariv.

"The United States is concerned and is following closely the use of Syrian territory as a way-station for the accelerated arming of Hezbollah," the Hebrew-language newspaper quoted her as saying.

Israel has long maintained that Hezbollah, with which it fought a 34-day war this summer, receives its weapons from Iran via Syria -- a charge both these countries deny.

But Rice repeated the allegation in the interview published on the day Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was due in Washington for talks with US President George W. Bush, herself and other top officials.

"Syria is a way-station for Iranian arms that cross the Middle East. It is not a state that contributes to stability in the Middle East," Rice said.

"This is obvious to everyone, and we are watching this situation closely. We are working with additional international agencies in order to tell Syria that it must change this behavior pattern."

"We clarified that Syria must change its behavior as soon as possible," she added.

Hamas Endorses Peace Conference (WT/AP)

By Salah Nasrawi

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

CAIRO -- The Hamas-led Palestinian government agreed yesterday to an international peace conference with Israel after the Arab League -- angered by Israel's military offensive in Gaza -- voted to end a financial blockade on the Palestinians.

Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar of Hamas endorsed a statement by Arab foreign ministers calling for the peace conference during a meeting in Cairo to respond to a U.S. veto of a U.N. Security Council resolution condemning the Gaza offensive.

Mr. Zahar said the Palestinians had asked for the peace conference "in order to reach just and comprehensive solutions." The acceptance marked the first time the Hamas-led government has indicated that it would consider making amends with the Jewish state.

The West cut off hundreds of millions of dollars in international aid and tax revenues to the Palestinians after Hamas took power in March in an effort to pressure the Islamic militant group to moderate its anti-Israel ideology. The United States, Europe and Israel are demanding that Hamas recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by existing agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

Mark Regev, a spokesman for Israel's Foreign Ministry, said he was not aware of the conference proposal. But he said Hamas could not be a party to talks with Israel unless it met the international community's stipulations.

DOJ_NMG_0092653

"A multilateral conference doesn't make Hamas legitimate," Mr. Regev said. "What makes Hamas legitimate is accepting the international benchmarks."

Hamas' decision came as Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert arrived in Washington ahead of a meeting with President Bush today.

The Arab League said ministers sought a conference to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict "according to international resolutions and the principal of 'land for peace.' " Arabs want Hamas to endorse a 2002 Arab initiative that calls for peace in exchange for land seized by Israel in the 1967 Six-Day War -- the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem.

Yesterday was the first time that Mr. Zahar has attended an Arab foreign ministers' meeting since Hamas became the ruling party. The Arab League had refused to let him join until Hamas accepted the peace initiative.

Arab ministers also decided yesterday to end a financial blockade on the Palestinians to show their anger over U.S. veto in the Security Council on Saturday.

The U.N. draft resolution would have condemned the Israeli offensive in Gaza that has killed more than 50 people recently and also demanded that Israeli troops pull out of the territory. John R. Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said the Arab-backed resolution was "biased against Israel and politically motivated."

It was the second U.S. veto of a draft resolution on Israeli military operations in Gaza this year.

"There will no longer be an international siege," said Bahrain's foreign minister, Sheik Khalid bin Ahmed Al Khalifa.

The economic sanctions have debilitated the Palestinians and have led to clashes between Hamas and the more moderate Fatah party led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who has been trying to form a more moderate government and renew the peace process with Israel.

Arab League Secretary-General Amr Moussa said the decision to break the Western-led financial blockade was a message to the United States.

"Our message is loud and clear to those who take unfriendly positions against Arabs," Mr. Moussa told reporters in Cairo.

In an immediate show of support, Kuwait's foreign minister said his country would send $30 million to the Palestinians, and Bahrain's foreign minister said the Arab countries would begin contacting international financial institutions to get the money transferred to the Palestinians.

As Hezbollah Seeks Power, Lebanon Is Feeling Edgy (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Nov. 11 — In the upscale center of Beirut, the normally somber atmosphere at the graveside of the assassinated former prime minister, Rafik Hariri, is increasingly tense. His former supporters, long the most powerful constituency in Lebanon, anxiously talk about the wave of Shiite political power washing over the country.

“After the first of the year, I am leaving to Qatar,” one woman, Myrtha Hadidi, said Sunday, after she bowed her head and crossed herself in front of the grave. “The situation is very, very dangerous now. I think there will be a war again.”

Across town, along the crowded streets of the poor Shiite neighborhood devastated by Israeli bombs during the summer war, there is despair over the destruction, but confidence in the growing power of Lebanon’s Shiites.

“I am very optimistic about the future,” said Ziad Kamaan, as he prepared to reopen his women’s accessory store for the first time since the war ended in September.

Lebanon is in the middle of a political crisis that is not just a matter of jockeying for power, but a fundamental realignment of authority here — and perhaps in the region. It is seen in the faces of those Sunnis and Christians who visit the Hariri memorial, nervous and drawn, and the confidence of those picking their way through the debris and destruction of the Shiite neighborhood, known as Dahiya.

“Hezbollah gave us dignity and pride; they made us feel like human beings again,” said Ali Berro, owner of a small grocery in the neighborhood. “It’s true that America and Israel devastated this country, but we will rebuild again, ourselves.”

DOJ_NMG_0092654

Long in the making, the 34-day war between Israel and Hezbollah — which was waged to crush the group's militia — seems to have accelerated the rise of Lebanon's Shiites, from their onetime status as the nation's unwanted stepchild to the cusp of political dominance.

As a political party, a militia and social welfare organization, Hezbollah has used the devastation of the war with Israel to help strengthen the allegiance of Shiites, giving out money and services that the government has so far failed to deliver. Though no one knows for sure the size of each group in Lebanon — there has not been a census since the 1930s — Shiites are believed to make up more than 30 percent of the population, and by some estimates have reached a plurality. But it would require a major leap for the Shiites to realize their political goal of dominance — and their efforts to reach it could threaten long-term instability, and perhaps bring armed conflict.

"This war has improved the Shiite identity and self-image," said Judith Palmer Harik, a professor at the American University in Beirut who has studied and written about Hezbollah. "They got something out of this war that was pretty uplifting."

On Saturday, Hezbollah and its main Shiite ally, Amal, provoked a political crisis when their five ministers resigned from the government after talks broke down about giving Hezbollah's alliance more authority.

The stage is now set for a showdown between Hezbollah and its allies, which are aligned with Syria and Iran, and the Sunni, Druse and Christian leaders who control the largest bloc in Parliament and side with the West.

Hezbollah has threatened to stage demonstrations as early as Monday, but Hezbollah officials said Sunday that they were waiting to see how their opposition responded and were considering all options.

The governing coalition is expected to make its counterstrike on Monday. The coalition, led by Saad Hariri, the son of the former prime minister, has tried to tar Hezbollah and Amal as tools of Syria and contends that their ministers resigned to block creation of a tribunal to hear charges in connection with the assassination of Mr. Hariri.

Syrian officials have been implicated in the United Nations investigations. The governing coalition has also charged that Hezbollah wants to control or block the government to prevent it from carrying out the provisions of Security Council Resolution 1701, which ended the war with Israel.

The United Nations sent a proposed framework for the court to Lebanon last week, and Prime Minister Fouad Siniora has called a cabinet meeting for Monday to take up the proposal. If Lebanon does not adopt the proposal, the court could still be created by the Security Council, but it would be viewed here as having less legitimacy because it was imposed on the country.

"The hidden plot has been revealed," the governing coalition said in a statement issued Sunday. "It's a Syrian-Iranian plot to launch a coup against the legitimacy, stop the establishment of an international tribunal and foil Resolution 1701."

Mr. Siniora and his allies have said that even without the Shiite members of the cabinet, they could adopt the proposal and have it pass in Parliament. It would, however, probably be rejected by the pro-Syrian president, Émile Lahoud, who issued his own statement on Sunday saying the "government had lost its constitutional legitimacy and, as a result, any cabinet meeting is anti-constitutional and worthless."

But the maneuvering over the court is one piece of a much larger battle with Hezbollah on the offensive. Hezbollah is insisting that its alliance be given seats in the cabinet, to have veto power over all decisions. One Hezbollah official said the outcome of this fight could jeopardize the delicate system of power sharing between religious communities that was established in the Taif agreement of 1989, which brought an end to 15 years of civil war. "If they want to govern without Shiite ministers, then nothing would prevent a Shiite from running for president in the future," said Tarrad Hamadeh, the Hezbollah minister of labor, who resigned Saturday. "They are messing with the country's future."

In war-torn neighborhoods of the south, in the Bekaa Valley, and in Dahiya, often the only sign of authority is Hezbollah's yellow flag. Hezbollah remains the de facto government within its communities. "We can make a revolution in Lebanon, we can occupy Lebanon, but this is not what we want," said Bilal Naeim, a Hezbollah politburo member who is overseeing the group's relief effort. "We could make a coup d'état."

Mr. Naeim works out of a large tent that Hezbollah put up in Dahiya to serve as a sort of office for reconstruction and distribution of assistance. Its office was flattened by Israeli bombs, but its work was not stopped. On Sunday, Ali Ahmed Raychouny entered the tent looking for help rebuilding his bookstore. Hezbollah is preparing to give out money for inventory damaged by the war, and since he and his employee and his landlord depend on the income from his bookstore, he wanted to make sure he was on the list.

DOJ_NMG_0092655

"I never expect anything from the government of our country," he said. "I have five kids and I support three families. Hezbollah is in my blood."

Iran Vows Retaliation If Israel Strikes (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, November 13, 2006

Iran's military will retaliate swiftly and strongly if Israel attacks any Iranian nuclear sites, the Foreign Ministry said Sunday.

The warning came two days after Israel's deputy defense minister suggested Israel might be forced to launch a military strike against Iran's disputed nuclear program as "a last resort."

"If the Zionist regime commits such stupidity, the response by the Iranian military will be swift, strong and crushing," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammed Ali Hosseini said. "Iran will take no longer than a second to respond."

The comments by Israeli Deputy Defense Minister Ephraim Sneh were the clearest yet from a high-ranking official of possible military action against Iran. However, the Israeli government later said the comments did not necessarily reflect its views or those of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Israel bombed Iraq's Osirak nuclear reactor in 1981 to destroy Saddam Hussein's nuclear weapons program. While Israel neither acknowledges nor denies possessing nuclear arms, it is thought to have about 100-200 nuclear warheads, according to a 2006 report by the Center for Nonproliferation Studies at the Monterey Institute of International Studies.

Hosseini downplayed the possibility of an Israeli attack. "The situation and capability of the Zionist regime are far too small to threaten Iran," he said.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, meanwhile, again criticized the U.N. Security Council over its efforts to impose sanctions on Iran because of its nuclear program. Iran says its program is for peaceful energy purposes, but the United States and other Western countries fear its a cover for developing weapons.

"It is most embarrassing that the U.N Security Council, which should be the defender of nations' security and rights, threatens countries pursuing nuclear fuel for peaceful purposes under the law," Ahmadinejad said, addressing the general assembly of Asian Parliaments Association for Peace in the capital, Tehran.

He accused the U.N. of applying a double standard, saying it was pursuing Iran "while those countries, armed with nuclear weapons, deny the rights of other countries to produce nuclear fuel and exploit it for peaceful purposes."

The Iranian president also criticized the United Nations for what he described as its lack of concern for the Palestinians. He condemned the United States for vetoing a U.N. Security Council draft resolution that criticized an Israeli military offensive in the Gaza Strip, including an artillery barrage that killed 19 civilians last week.

"While this fake regime commits crimes, the U.N. has not taken a single positive and operative step to restore the rights of the Palestinian nation," he said.

Hosseini, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, also said Iran began installing an additional 3,000 centrifuges at its uranium enrichment plant in Natanz with the knowledge of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog.

In October, Iran injected uranium gas into a second network of 164 centrifuges.

Injecting gas into centrifuges can either yield nuclear fuel or material for a warhead, but does not represent a major technological breakthrough and is unlikely to bring Iran within grasp of a weapon.

Iran produced a small batch of low-enriched uranium — suitable as nuclear fuel but not weapons grade — in February, using its initial cascade of 164 centrifuges at Natanz.

Earlier this year, Tehran said it planned to install 3,000 centrifuges at Natanz by year's end, but it would take 54,000 centrifuges to fuel a reactor.

Iran Criticizes Security Council Over Threat Of Sanctions (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092656

TEHRAN, Nov. 12 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Sunday described efforts by the United Nations Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran as "disgraceful."

"It is disgraceful that the Security Council, which should be the defender of nations' security and rights, creates cases against countries that seek to produce nuclear fuel for peaceful purposes and threatens them," he said, addressing the general assembly of the Association of Asian Parliaments for Peace, which was founded in 1999 to promote peace and development and now has 39 members. It is meeting in Tehran.

The five permanent members of the Security Council — Britain, France, the United States, China and Russia — are scheduled, along with Germany, to resume talks Monday on a European draft resolution that would impose sanctions on Iran for refusing to halt its uranium enrichment program.

Iran contends that its nuclear program is peaceful and that its aim is to produce fuel for its nuclear power plants.

Mr. Ahmadinejad accused the United Nations of applying a double standard for not objecting to development of unconventional weapons by Britain, the United States and Israel. He said the nuclear-armed countries sought to deny the right of other countries to produce nuclear fuel for peaceful purposes because they feared they could lose their monopoly over the technology.

"They are afraid that independent countries, such as the Islamic Republic, would not let them maintain their monopoly over nuclear fuel," he said.

Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, returned from Moscow on Sunday after a series of talks with Russian officials. Russia is urging the other five countries that are discussing the sanctions to resume talks with Iran.

Mr. Larijani said Friday in Moscow that Iran would not halt its program and that sanctions would not harm it, the ISNA news agency reported. He also said, commenting on the results of the American elections, that he believed that the Democrats would adopt a softer approach toward Iran over its nuclear program to avoid more tension.

Islamic Militants Claim Capture Of Town (AP)

By Mohamed Sheik Nor

AP, November 13, 2006

Islamic militants said they captured a town in central Somalia on Sunday after they came under attack from pro-government militiamen backed by troops from Ethiopia and a semiautonomous region in northern Somalia.

The fighting erupted near the border of the Puntland region, one of the few areas in Somalia still outside the control of the Islamic movement. The group said it captured the town of Bandiradley, about 430 miles north of the capital, Mogadishu, and two of its fighters were killed in the battle.

"The fighting is continuing and we are pursuing Puntland troops," Mohamed Mahmud Agaweyne, spokesman for the Islamic group in central Somalia, told The Associated Press by telephone.

Sa'id Abdirahman Dakaweyne, a colonel with the Puntland militia, confirmed the fighting. Puntland officials said they had put their troops on full alert.

Government officials declined to say if anyone from their militia had been killed.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991 when warlords overthrew a dictator and then turned on each other. The new interim government was formed with the help of the U.N. two years ago. But it has failed to assert any real control outside the southern town of Baidoa where it is based.

The Islamic courts militia, meanwhile, has been rising since June and now controls most of the country's south and the capital. The United States has accused the group of sheltering suspects in the 1998 al-Qaida bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

Experts warn Somalia could become a proxy battleground for neighboring Ethiopia and Eritrea, which broke away from Ethiopia in 1991 following a civil war. Eritrea supports the Islamic militia, while Ethiopia backs the interim government.

A confidential U.N. report obtained recently by The Associated Press said 6,000-8,000 Ethiopian troops were in Somalia or along the border. It also said 2,000 soldiers from Eritrea were inside the country. Eritrea denies having any troops in Somalia, while Ethiopia insists it has sent only a few hundred advisers.

DOJ_NMG_0092657

Agaweyne said the Islamic fighters had captured two tanks and 11 pickup trucks mounted with machine guns. Islamic forces said the tanks had Ethiopian markings.

Ethiopian officials were not immediately available for comment.

Sporadic skirmishes have broken out in central Somalia since May, when the Islamic movement took the town of Jowhar and began extending northward toward Puntland, which has close ties to Ethiopia and opposes the spread of the Islamic forces.

Puntland declared itself an autonomous state within Somalia in 1998. It has generally been spared the violence that has wracked the southern part of the country.

Several peace initiatives between Somalia's interim government and the Islamic movement have failed to take hold. A peace deal agreed to Friday by a renegade lawmaker and the Islamists was rejected 24 hours later by the interim administration, which said it was done without its approval.

Meanwhile, Kenya announced that all flights to Somalia would be suspended as of Monday due to security reasons. The order affects almost daily service from Nairobi to Mogadishu and three other towns in Somalia.

Late last week, the U.S. Embassy in Nairobi warned that extremists in Somalia were planning suicide attacks in Kenya and Ethiopia.

___

Associated Press writer Salad Duhul and Mohamed Ali in Mogadishu also contributed to this report.

Tension Rises In Somalia As Islamists Expand Reach (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Nov. 12 — Islamist forces expanded their reach in Somalia on Sunday by seizing towns near Galcaio, in the country's north, which until now had been relatively peaceful.

The Islamists then turned their guns toward Galcaio and began shelling the outskirts of the city, witnesses said.

The fighting threatened to push Somalia closer to the brink of an all-out war between the Islamist forces that rule Mogadishu, the seaside capital, and the weak, so-called transitional government based in the inland city of Baidoa. The militias that were routed Sunday were loyal to the transitional government, and their defeat was interpreted as another sign of its weakness.

Each side blamed the other for the bloodshed, which claimed as many as 10 lives.

"The government troops ambushed us," said Abdulrahim Ali Modei, spokesman for the Council of Islamic Courts, the network of Islamist forces ruling Mogadishu, according to [a news service].

However, an official with the transitional government denied that, saying that the Islamists attacked first.

On Saturday, leaders of the transitional government rejected a deal to restart peace talks, though several members of the transitional government had agreed to negotiate with Islamist leaders.

Somalia has been engulfed in anarchy for years, but many Western officials in East Africa worry that the conflict on the horizon could be worse than before because it has the potential to drag in Somalia's neighbors. Already, Ethiopia has sent hundreds and possibly thousands of troops into Somalia to support the transitional government, and several Arab countries are suspected of backing the Islamists.

"If there is a war," said a high-ranking American military official, who spoke last week on condition of anonymity, "the fighting ends up protracted and long and spills across the border."

On Saturday, Kenyan authorities banned all scheduled flights in and out of Somalia, citing security risks. The United States recently issued a warning that said suicide bombers from Somalia might be plotting attacks in Kenya and Ethiopia.

Hizbollah Ministers Quit Lebanon's Cabinet (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, November 13, 2006

Lebanon's political crisis deepened over the weekend with the resignation from the cabinet of all five Shia ministers from the pro-Syrian Hizbollah movement and its allies as unity talks collapsed.

DOJ_NMG_0092658

Hizbollah repeated its threat to stage "peaceful" demonstrations to back up its demand for a decisive say in the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora or else to force new elections.

The anti-Syrian majority that controls the government and Parliament has vowed that the cabinet will meet on Monday as planned to approve a UN draft for an international tribunal to try suspects in the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri, who was killed in a massive bomb blast along with more than 20 others in February last year.

The country's pro-Syrian president, Emile Lahoud, said that the resignation of the Shia ministers renders any new cabinet decision "anti-constitutional". But the anti-Syrian majority, as well as constitutional experts, have denied this.

Anti-Syrian politicians accused Hizbollah and its allies of forcing the crisis to block Lebanese approval of the international tribunal. The UN last week sent a draft of the framework for such a tribunal to the government after the permanent members of the Security Council reached a consensus.

The Shia ministers last year suspended their participation in the cabinet for several weeks over the issue of the tribunal.

Hizbollah's deputy leader, Sheikh Naim Kassem, said that the crisis "has nothing to do" with the international tribunal. He accused the anti-Syrian majority of using the issue to obscure their responsibility for the failure of the political talks and said Hizbollah would stage peaceful street protests to back up its demands but it was not clear yet when these would start.

Anti-Syrian politicians have expressed fears that Hizbollah's protests will turn violent. They have vowed counter-demonstrations by their own supporters.

Several leading politicians will be out of the country until the middle of the week and there is a feeling that the demonstrations or renewed talks will only take place after they return.

Hizbollah's leader, Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, said last month that he is demanding more of a say in the government for himself and his allies in order to stop the anti-Syrian majority from giving in to the "American-Israeli demand" to disarm the movement.

Hizbollah feels under pressure because of the presence of the beefed-up UNIFIL international military presence in its heartland in the south of the country following this summer's war with Israel.

Hizbollah wants to bring its main Christian ally, former General Michel Aoun, and his bloc, into the government. The movement has demanded a share of one-third-plus-one of the cabinet seats for itself and its allies, which would give it veto power over the most important decisions.

The anti-Syrian majority has said that it may consider bringing Gen Aoun into the government but it refuses to grant its opponents veto power.

Both the president and the powerful speaker of Parliament, Nabih Berri of the Shia Amal movement, are pro-Syrian.

If the pro-Syrians were to get veto power in the cabinet, the results of last year's elections in which the anti-Syrian coalition triumphed, would be neutralised.

Lebanese Cabinet Thrown Into Crisis By Hezbollah Exit (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- Hezbollah, having defied efforts by Israel to eliminate it as a military force, is flexing its political muscle, jeopardizing the stability of a Lebanese government that the Bush administration presents as a democratic beacon for the Middle East.

The political crisis here, triggered by the collapse of talks to calm mounting tension, further darkens the White House's vision of a "new Middle East." It could also fortify Washington's two biggest foes in the region, Syria and Iran.

Hezbollah, along with its Shiite Muslim allies, on Saturday withdrew its representatives in the cabinet, where they had a minority voice. The group, which has organized huge rallies in the past, has also threatened street protests to press demands for a new government in which Hezbollah and its political allies would have effective veto power.

The political wrangling complicates one of Washington's principal foreign-policy goals in the region: the establishment of an international tribunal to judge Syrian officials implicated in the murder in February last year of Rafik Hariri, former prime minister of Lebanon. The Lebanese cabinet was supposed to meet today to discuss tribunal proposals endorsed last week by the United Nations Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0092659

Though small, with less than four million people, Lebanon has outsize significance as a proxy for the geopolitical ambitions of more powerful nations. Hezbollah is the focus of these rivalries. The group is denounced by Israel and the U.S. as a terrorist organization.

Meanwhile, the group is hailed by Iran, Syria and many ordinary Muslims around the world as a legitimate resistance movement.

"Whether they like it or not, there is a new Middle East in the making, but it is the antithesis of what America wanted," said Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, a Beirut-based scholar who has written a sympathetic book about Hezbollah.

Hezbollah suffered heavy losses during its summer war with Israel but nonetheless escaped obliteration by the region's most powerful military. Hassan Nasrallah, the militant group's leader, declared this a "victory from God" -- a play on his own surname, which means the same thing in Arabic.

Since then, he has been pushing for a bigger role in the generally pro-American cabinet of Fuad Siniora, a former banker. Hezbollah also seems to have been emboldened by the Republican Party's rout in U.S. midterm elections last week.

"America has failed in Iraq and Bush has now failed in America," Sheik Naim Qassem, Hezbollah's deputy leader, said in a speech Saturday. In an apparent reference to Prime Minister Siniora and other pro-American forces in Lebanon, he said: "It is important for those who follow Bush to reassess their stand."

Mr. Qassem drew titters from his audience by mocking Donald Rumsfeld, who resigned last week as U.S. defense secretary.

Wary of Hezbollah's growing clout, the Bush administration has ramped up its rhetoric. Hezbollah and Iran, said White House spokesman Tony Snow on Saturday, "remain a dangerous, global nexus of terrorism." Mr. Snow earlier accused Hezbollah, along with Iran and Syria, of "preparing plans to topple Lebanon's democratically elected government."

Lebanon's cabinet, though now shorn of Shiite ministers, can in theory still endorse the establishment of a tribunal to pursue the Hariri murder case. But the norms of Lebanon's delicate sectarian politics generally require that all groups take part in major decisions. Lebanon's pro-Syrian president, Emile Lahoud, yesterday sent a letter to Prime Minister Siniora, who is backed by the U.S. and its allies in Lebanon, warning that the departure of Shiite ministers had rendered the cabinet unconstitutional.

Parliamentary speaker Nabih Berri, who heads a Shiite group allied with Hezbollah, expressed modest hope that a compromise might still be found. Speaking in Iran, where he is attending a conference, Mr. Berri said Lebanon's rival groups were near divorce but "had not yet hit a brick wall."

Hezbollah, meanwhile, has suggested it will wait before calling its supporters into the streets.

The U.S., seeking to buttress Lebanon's fragile government, last week agreed to provide American military equipment valued at $10.5 million, the latest installment of $230 million pledged by Washington after the war this summer. American aid, however, has had far less impact on public opinion, particularly among Lebanon's Shiite population, than bundles of cash handed out by Hezbollah to help people whose homes were destroyed by Israeli bombs. Most of this cash, say U.S. officials, came from Iran. "The other side is doing an excellent job," conceded an American official.

China Sub Secretly Stalked U.S. Fleet (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

A Chinese submarine stalked a U.S. aircraft carrier battle group in the Pacific last month and surfaced within firing range of its torpedoes and missiles before being detected, The Washington Times has learned.

The surprise encounter highlights China's continuing efforts to prepare for a future conflict with the U.S., despite Pentagon efforts to try to boost relations with Beijing's communist-ruled military.

The submarine encounter with the USS Kitty Hawk and its accompanying warships also is an embarrassment to the commander of U.S. forces in the Pacific, Adm. William J. Fallon, who is engaged in an ambitious military exchange program with China aimed at improving relations between the two nations' militaries.

DOJ_NMG_0092660

Disclosure of the incident comes as Adm. Gary Roughead, commander of the U.S. Navy's Pacific Fleet, is making his first visit to China. The four-star admiral was scheduled to meet senior Chinese military leaders during the weeklong visit, which began over the weekend.

According to the defense officials, the Chinese Song-class diesel-powered attack submarine shadowed the Kitty Hawk undetected and surfaced within five miles of the carrier Oct. 26.

The surfaced submarine was spotted by a routine surveillance flight by one of the carrier group's planes. The Kitty Hawk battle group includes an attack submarine and anti-submarine helicopters that are charged with protecting the warships from submarine attack.

According to the officials, the submarine is equipped with Russian-made wake-homing torpedoes and anti-ship cruise missiles.

The Kitty Hawk and several other warships were deployed in ocean waters near Okinawa at the time, as part of a routine fall deployment program. The officials said Chinese submarines rarely have operated in deep water far from Chinese shores or shadowed U.S. vessels.

A Pacific Command spokesman declined to comment on the incident, saying details were classified.

Pentagon spokesmen also declined to comment.

The incident is a setback for the aggressive U.S.-China military exchange program being promoted by Adm. Fallon, who has made several visits to China in recent months in an attempt to develop closer ties.

However, critics of the program in the Pentagon say China has not reciprocated and continues to deny U.S. military visitors access to key facilities, including a Beijing command center. In contrast, Chinese military visitors have been invited to military exercises and sensitive U.S. facilities.

Additionally, military intelligence officials said Adm. Fallon has restricted U.S. intelligence-gathering activities against China, fearing that disclosure of the activities would upset relations with Beijing.

The restrictions are hindering efforts to know more about China's military buildup, the officials said.

"This is a harbinger of a stronger Chinese reaction to America's military presence in East Asia," said Richard Fisher, a Chinese military specialist with the International Assessment and Strategy Center, who called the submarine incident alarming.

"Given the long range of new Chinese sub-launched anti-ship missiles and those purchased from Russia, this incident is very serious," he said. "It will likely happen again, only because Chinese submarine captains of 40 to 50 new modern submarines entering their navy will want to test their mettle against the 7th Fleet."

Pentagon intelligence officials say China's military buildup in recent years has produced large numbers of submarines and surface ships, seeking to control larger portions of international waters in Asia, a move U.S. officials fear could restrict the flow of oil from the Middle East to Asia in the future.

Between 2002 and last year, China built 14 new submarines, including new Song-class vessels and several other types, both diesel- and nuclear-powered.

Since 1996, when the United States dispatched two aircraft carrier battle groups to waters near Taiwan in a show of force, Beijing also has bought and built weapons designed specifically to attack U.S. aircraft carriers and other warships.

"The Chinese have made it clear that they understand the importance of the submarine in any kind of offensive or defensive strategy to deal with a military conflict," an intelligence official said recently.

In late 2004, China dispatched a Han-class submarine to waters near Guam, Taiwan and Japan. Japan's military went on emergency alert after the submarine surfaced in Japanese waters. Beijing apologized for the incursion.

The Pentagon's latest annual report on Chinese military power stated that China is investing heavily in weapons designed "to interdict, at long ranges, aircraft carrier and expeditionary strike groups that might deploy to the western Pacific."

It could not be learned whether the U.S. government lodged a protest with China's government over the incident or otherwise raised the matter in official channels.

U.S.: Castro's Health Is Deteriorating (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

DOJ_NMG_0092661

AP, November 13, 2006

The government believes Fidel Castro's health is deteriorating and that the Cuban dictator is unlikely to live through 2007.

That dire view was reinforced last week when Cuba's foreign minister backed away from his prediction the ailing Castro would return to power by early December. "It's a subject on which I don't want to speculate," Felipe Perez Roque told The Associated Press in Havana.

U.S. government officials say there is still some mystery about Castro's diagnosis, his treatment and how he is responding. But these officials believe the 80-year-old leader has cancer of the stomach, colon or pancreas.

He was seen weakened and thinner in official state photos released late last month, and it is considered unlikely that he will return to power or survive through the end of next year, said the U.S. government and defense officials. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about the politically sensitive topic.

With chemotherapy, Castro may live up to 18 months, said the defense official. Without it, expected survival would drop to three months to eight months.

American officials will not talk publicly about how they glean clues to Castro's health. But U.S. spy agencies include physicians who study pictures, video, public statements and other information coming out of Cuba.

A planned celebration of Castro's 80th birthday next month is expected to draw international attention. The Cuban leader had planned to attend the public event, which already had been postponed once from his Aug. 13 birthday.

U.N. Envoy Meets With Ugandan Rebel (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Nov. 12 — Joseph Kony is one of the most vilified rebel leaders on the planet.

He stands accused of brainwashing countless children across northern Uganda, turning the girls into sex slaves and the boys into prepubescent killers. His so-called Christian movement, the Lord's Resistance Army, has terrorized this corner of Africa for nearly 20 years, killing tens of thousands of people, burning down huts and hacking off lips. The fact that Mr. Kony, whose followers believe he is a prophet, rarely appears in public has only added to his brutal mystique.

But on Sunday, he came out of the bush. At a camp deep in the forest on the Congo-Sudan border, Mr. Kony materialized to meet Jan Egeland, the United Nations under secretary general for humanitarian affairs and emergency relief.

"He looked a lot younger than I expected," Mr. Egeland said by telephone from Juba, in southern Sudan. Mr. Kony is thought to be around 44 years old.

"And I was surprised how soft-spoken he was," Mr. Egeland added.

For weeks now, Mr. Egeland had been trying to arrange a tête-à-tête with the elusive Mr. Kony, who is wanted by the International Criminal Court to face charges of crimes against humanity.

Once he got the word that the meeting was set for Sunday afternoon, Mr. Egeland flew by helicopter from Juba to a little-known Sudanese Army outpost near the border of Congo, where he took a truck even deeper into the jungle.

"You can't believe how remote this was," he said. "And those roads. They were the worst possible roads you can imagine."

Mr. Kony was several hours late. With the sun dropping fast and the helicopter pilots eager to get back, Mr. Egeland said he thought the meeting was going to be a bust.

But then, he said, Mr. Kony arrived, on foot, with a small entourage of soldiers carrying machine guns and wearing thick rubber boots. He and Mr. Egeland ducked into a tent and spent a half an hour talking about a host of issues related to the fragile peace treaty that was signed in August between Mr. Kony's army and the government of Uganda.

They began with child soldiers, and Mr. Egeland said he pressed Mr. Kony to release them. For the past several years, according to the Ugandan military, Mr. Kony has been living in a remote corner of Congo, near the borders of Sudan and Uganda, surrounded by a harem of child brides and protected by a battalion of child soldiers.

"I listed all of our humanitarian concerns and urged him to free women, children, the sick and the wounded," Mr. Egeland said. "But Kony insisted he didn't have anyone who fit that description."

The two also talked about the government of Uganda and ways to keep the peace efforts moving.

DOJ_NMG_0092662

"But Kony still has a lot of mistrust," Mr. Egeland said.

The stickiest issue, Mr. Egeland said, was the arrest warrants issued by the International Criminal Court against Mr. Kony and four of his commanders. Mr. Kony has said he will never surrender as long as he faces the risk of being arrested. The Ugandan government has said that it will support dropping the charges, but that Mr. Kony must surrender first.

The impasse frustrates many Ugandans, who are sick of war and say they would rather the charges go away than the war grind on. Tens of thousands of people have been killed and nearly two million displaced since the rebellion started in the mid-1980s. It began as a war between the Acholi people, a long dispossessed ethnic group in northern Uganda, and the central government. Even though the bloodshed has diminished from its apex in the mid-1990s, human rights groups continue to document abductions and killings.

Mr. Egeland said he told Mr. Kony that he did not wield any influence with the International Criminal Court, which is based in The Hague and is independent of the United Nations.

"But I did tell him that it would benefit his cause if he made some humanitarian gestures, like releasing the women and children," Mr. Egeland said.

He said that although no great results were achieved on Sunday, he was glad he went.

"We can now talk," Mr. Egeland said.

As for the actual talking, Mr. Kony spoke in Acholi, his native language, during the meeting (though several interpreters were present). He was dressed in green army fatigues and accompanied by a handful of top commanders.

Mr. Egeland said Mr. Kony seemed very guarded at first, even a little paranoid. But eventually he offered to shake hands and even smiled.

Mr. Egeland's response: "I shook his hand but I didn't smile," he said. "I know what Joseph Kony is responsible for."

Ugandan Rebel Emerges To Talk With U.N. Official (WP/AP)

By Katy Pownall

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

RI-KWANGBA, Sudan, Nov. 12 -- The top U.N. humanitarian official met Sunday with a Ugandan rebel leader accused of war crimes, but he failed to secure the immediate release of women and children held captive by the insurgent group.

The United Nations' Jan Egeland waited for two hours at a clearing in southern Sudan before Joseph Kony, the messianic leader of the Lord's Resistance Army, emerged from the bush with 30 bodyguards, bayonets fixed to their assault rifles.

Kony and Egeland shook hands before speaking for 10 minutes in a green tent erected by the United Nations. Egeland was seeking the release of women and children enslaved by the group during its 20-year conflict with the Ugandan government.

But Kony denied that his forces were holding prisoners.

"We don't have any children," he said in a brief news conference in the clearing just across Sudan's border with Congo. "We only have combatants."

Egeland is the first high-ranking U.N. official to meet Kony, who has declared himself a Christian prophet fighting to rule Uganda and its 26 million people by the Ten Commandments.

Kony has appeared in public only a handful of times, fearing arrest and extradition to The Hague to answer war crimes charges from the International Criminal Court, which has also issued arrest warrants for his top deputies. The rebels have been accused of murder, mutilations and kidnapping children for use as soldiers and sex slaves.

Almost 2 million people have been displaced by the conflict, aid organizations say.

After the talks, Egeland described the meeting as a success, saying the rebels had agreed to give an assessment of how many women and children were in their camps.

Egeland traveled by helicopter to Ri-Kwangba, a neutral zone just north of the Congolese border where the rebels are to gather under the terms of a peace deal with the Ugandan government. About 100 Lord's Resistance Army fighters loitered on the outer edge of the clearing.

"I am a humanitarian worker; I help people by relating to people who can unlock situations," Egeland said late Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0092663

Egeland said he was unwilling to discuss the arrest warrants, which the rebels say threaten the fragile peace deal signed with the government in southern Sudan's regional capital, Juba.

The rebels want the warrants dropped before they sign a comprehensive peace deal; the Ugandan government says it will ask for them to be lifted only after a full agreement is reached.

Uganda's government welcomed Egeland's meeting with Kony.

"If he can secure the release of women and children through his meeting, then that would be a very positive boost for the Juba talks," said Ruhakana Rugunda, head of the government negotiating team and Uganda's minister of internal affairs.

The Lord's Resistance Army is made up of the remnants of a rebellion that began after Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni took power in 1986. It has set up rear bases in Sudan and Congo and has been accused of attacking civilians and threatening stability in those countries.

A New Al Jazeera With A Global Focus (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Nov. 12 — Al Jazeera, the Arab news channel that began a decade ago as an upstart, has became a thorn in the side of every dictator in the region as well as of the Bush administration.

Critics call it radical; its admirers lionize it. And the network continues to battle accusations that it is sympathetic to Al Qaeda and other extremists.

Several of its reporters have been jailed — one is in prison in Spain for ties to Al Qaeda — and its offices have been shut in almost every major Arab country at some point, and bombed by American aircraft in two wars.

Now, Al Jazeera's journalists are working to transform the channel into a conglomerate with global reach.

By the end of the year, Al Jazeera will have news channels in Arabic and English, a pan-Arab newspaper, Web sites and blogs, sports and children's outlets, and even a channel modeled after C-Span.

The network (it turned 10 on Nov. 1) is also looking to extend its sphere of influence beyond the Arab world. On Wednesday, it will start the English-language Al Jazeera International, its most ambitious initiative yet, which will go on the air from Asia to the United States.

The channel will broadcast from network hubs in Qatar, London, Washington and Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, offering news, talk and documentaries that its managing director, Nigel Parsons, said would have a decidedly different tone than on established Western channels.

In effect, Al Jazeera International intends to become for the developing world what Al Jazeera became to the Arab world: a champion of forgotten causes, a news organization willing to take the contrarian view and to risk being controversial.

"We want to be a channel that covers the untold stories," Mr. Parsons said by telephone from Qatar. "We would be anchored in the Middle East, but we intend to cover the developing world fully."

To do that, he said, Al Jazeera will use Asian reporters to cover Asia, and will have Africans talking about Africa, "rather than having instant experts land there and tell us a story."

The channel has signed prominent journalists, including the host and commentator David Frost; the former BBC correspondent Rageh Omar, and a onetime CNN anchor, Riz Khan, as well as numbers of producers and reporters from Western networks and some unknowns with a decidedly international look.

"We will carry on the tradition of showing the ugly side of conflict," Mr. Parsons said. "War has been too sanitized in the media."

Viewers should not expect to see the Al Jazeera that the Arab world watches daily. Mr. Parsons and others stressed that Al Jazeera International was not merely a translation of Al Jazeera from Arabic. It has separate crews and editors working completely independent of the original network.

Insiders note that the cultures of the Arabic- and English- speaking teams have at times clashed, though Mr. Parsons says many of those differences have been ironed out.

DOJ_NMG_0092664

Still, some analysts doubt that Al Jazeera can take significant market share away from networks like CNN and BBC. But its international offshoot is not under pressure to turn a profit anytime soon, in part because of its endowment from the emir of Qatar, Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani, who has underscored his long-term commitment to Al Jazeera despite pressure from many governments.

The Arab channel, largely locked out of the advertising market by Saudi businesses, who account for most ads in the region, has yet to turn a profit. Mr. Parsons says Al Jazeera International will broadcast with ads from multinational companies.

Nor is he necessarily focused on reaching American viewers.

The new channel is about the untapped world of English speakers in the East, increasingly frustrated with Western coverage of their world. When it goes live, it is expected to have access to 40 million homes — most of them outside Europe and the United States.

The station has struggled to break into American cable television markets, where most operators have decided against adding it to their offerings. Americans, though, can watch a streamed broadcast over the Internet.

"People are too concerned about how it will do in the United states, but I don't think it matters," said Marc Lynch, a political science professor at Williams College and author of "Voices of the New Arab Public: Iraq, Al Jazeera and Middle East Politics Today."

"Al Jazeera," he said, "has this huge untapped market around the world where people have English as a first or second language."

This is a world increasingly skeptical of American intentions and frustrated with American foreign policy.

"We're very proud of our brand," Mr. Parsons said, "and as a network, everybody is proud of what Al Jazeera has achieved. There is a lot of cynicism about TV journalism today. We intend to continue the tradition of being fearless and not frightened of rattling the cages."

¡Viva El Capitalismo! (NYT)

By Álvaro Vargas Llosa

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

Guatemala City

THE irony could not be more poignant. Twenty years ago today, Ronald Reagan went on national television and admitted his government's involvement in an arms deal with Iran, the proceeds of which, we later found out, were diverted to the contra rebels fighting a Marxist regime in Central America. Now Daniel Ortega, the man those funds were aimed against, has just been elected president of Nicaragua.

And the irony does not stop there. A few days before last week's elections, Oliver North, the face of the Iran-contra scandal, landed in Managua and asked Nicaraguans to vote for the right-wing Liberal Constitutionalist Party, which is made up in part of old contra sympathizers, and to stop Mr. Ortega.

Whatever else he might have been doing all these years, Mr. North has not been following Nicaraguan politics: for the last seven years, the Liberal Constitutionalists have been allied with Mr. Ortega's Sandinistas, and they paved the way for Mr. Ortega's victory by lowering the electoral bar for a first-round victory and by helping split the anti-Sandinista vote. The Gipper must be turning in his grave.

Some will be tempted to conclude that Mr. Ortega's return amounts to a revival of the cold war dynamic in the Western Hemisphere and, in particular, to a retrospective impugning of Reagan's policy in Central America. Some might also be inclined to see the vote as a confirmation that the radical left is sweeping Latin America and that the Venezuelan leader Hugo Chávez, who supported Mr. Ortega and provides municipalities under Sandinista governments with fertilizer and oil, has scored a strategic victory.

That would be giving too much credit to Nicaragua, which is today a political and economic pygmy in the region; to left-wing radicalism, which had little to do with Mr. Ortega's comeback; and to Mr. Chávez, whose favored candidates were recently repudiated in Peru and in Mexico, the two countries where he concentrated most of his efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0092665

Daniel Ortega's comeback is the result of two factors. One is the power-sharing pact that the former President Arnoldo Alemán sealed with the Sandinistas in 1999, with a view to protecting himself and his Liberal Constitutionalist cronies from charges of corruption after leaving office. (It didn't work out well for Mr. Alemán, who in 2003 was given a 20-year sentence.) The deal they came up with gave Mr. Ortega, who was politically moribund at the time, the kiss of life and gave the Sandinistas seats on the Supreme Court and control of some key institutions, including the election authority.

The other factor was Mr. Ortega's betrayal of his own creed. The Sandinista leader shed his Marxist rhetoric and, conscious of the need to seduce a profoundly Catholic nation, mended fences with the Roman Catholic Church he had once persecuted. His old nemesis, Cardinal Miguel Obando, presided over the religious (should I say bourgeois?) ceremony in which Mr. Ortega married his longtime partner last year.

The man responsible for the infamous "piñata" — a series of laws put in place just before he lost power in 1990 that allowed the Sandinista leaders to take for themselves confiscated property worth hundreds of millions of dollars — is now talking about his respect for private property and foreign investment.

He has tossed the olive green fatigues and the red and black flag; his campaign colors were pink and turquoise, and his theme song a Spanish version of John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance." He apologized for the massacre of the indigenous Miskito people that took place in the north of the country during his first regime and, finally, he instructed his legislators to vote for a bill banning abortion even in cases of a threat to the woman's life.

What this farcical saga tells us is that Daniel Ortega was much more interested in being president than in being principled and, more important, that anyone who wants to lead today's Nicaragua needs to persuade voters that he will respect the rule of law and private property, will try to lure investment and will be sensitive to the nation's religious heritage. The fact that Mr. Ortega's past conduct casts a shadow over the proclamation that he is a reformed character does not detract from the fact that Nicaragua has not voted for radical leftist policies.

What about the broader claims — that Mr. Ortega's victory is a confirmation that radical left-wing politics are back in Latin America? True, in addition to Mr. Chávez, leftists have taken power in Brazil, Chile, Panama, and Uruguay. (Mr. Chávez's efforts have apparently led the Bush administration to quietly lift a ban on the training of military personnel from 11 Latin American countries in the United States.) But these other Latin American socialists belong to the "vegetarian left" rather than the "carnivorous left." Other than the occasional Castro-like rhetorical flourish, the new leaders are avoiding the mistakes of the old left, including confrontation with the United States and Europe, fiscal profligacy and nationalization of industry.

Hugo Chávez has been unable to reproduce his regime in any other country except in Bolivia, where President Evo Morales is now increasingly unpopular and has been forced to backtrack on some of his revolutionary announcements. Mr. Morales, for example, campaigned on a promise to force the nationalization of Bolivia's natural gas fields, but last month came to a deal in which two major Brazilian companies agreed to share revenues and operate as service providers to the state energy company. He even sent his vice president to Washington in July to appeal to the White House for renewed trade preferences.

And in the week since his victory, Mr. Ortega has been sending the signal that he thinks joining the "vegetarians" will bring him more credit than being a clone of Hugo Chávez without the oil. "No one is going to allow the seizure of property big or small," he told a group of Nicaraguan businessmen after his victory. "We need to eradicate poverty, but you don't do that by getting rid of investment and those who have resources."

Now, whether the moderate left will continue to enjoy the support of the masses is an entirely different question. Since many of these new leaders are not engaging in systematic reform, it is likely that voters will hold them to account should their economies — now buoyed by the forces of globalization, through rising exports and foreign investment — start to sag. But for the moment, it's their show, and the carnivores are outside looking in.

In a sense, these moderate left-wing leaders, perhaps now including Mr. Ortega, are a lot more in sync with what Ronald Reagan and his men were aiming for in Central America in the 1980s than Oliver North would care to admit. As they fall over themselves pandering to the church, the business community and conservative voters, there's little time left over for creating a New Man.

Ortega's Encore (TIME)

DOJ_NMG_0092666

By Tim Padgett

Time, November 13, 2006

Jaime Morales was a wealthy Nicaraguan bankerÂ in the 1980s when Daniel Ortega stole his six-bedroom house. Ortega, who was then Nicaragua's President, called it a justified "confiscation" on behalf of the Marxist revolution that he and his Sandinista Front were leading. Morales became a leader of the U.S.-backed contra army that waged a civil war with the Sandinistas. That conflict killed 30,000 people and led to Ortega's ouster in a 1990 election--after which he paid Morales for the house.

It's a sign of either Ortega's maturation or his opportunism--or both--that when he recaptured Nicaragua's presidency in the Nov. 5 election, his running mate was none other than Morales. Ortega still wears that drowsy look of arrogant defiance, speaks in the same mumbling cadence and insists on driving his SUV himself to cultivate a populist image. But with Morales beside him in a Managua hotel ballroom, schmoozing local and foreign investors, Ortega sounds like a changed man. "We won't eradicate poverty by eradicating capital or alienating investors but by joining forces with them," he says. Ortega is playing to the audience, but even former rivals believe that his evolution from communist strongman to nascent capitalist may be genuine. Says Morales: "Daniel Ortega deserves a chance to vindicate himself."

That, of course, is exactly what some in Washington are afraid of. Ortega's turn-back-the-clock triumph has rekindled memories of Washington's cold war obsession with Nicaragua, which embroiled the U.S. in a bloody guerrilla campaign and nearly doomed the Reagan presidency. Although Nicaragua, a nation of 5.5 million, is one of the poorest countries in the western hemisphere, the prospect of an Ortega restoration prompted the Bush Administration to threaten to cut off more than $200 million in total aid to the country and moved cold warriors like former U.S. Marine Lieut. Colonel Oliver North to fly to Managua to campaign against him. The U.S. is concerned that Ortega will become another boisterously anti-American voice of Latin America's new left, which is led by Venezuelan President Hugo ChÃ¡vez. When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with her advisory committee on democracy promotion last week, Richard Soudriette, president of the Washington-based International Foundation for Election Systems, volunteered that he had just returned from Nicaragua. "Coming from Oklahoma," he told her, "where we're familiar with people who are born again, it appears that the future President, Daniel Ortega, is at least claiming that he has had a change of heart." Rice answered tersely, "We'll see."

Ortega still likes to take shots at Washington--in one of his victory speeches, he said Bush "is seeking to start wars with the whole world"--but he has strived to adopt a more moderate look. His campaign anthem this year was sung to the tune of John Lennon's Give Peace a Chance. To underscore his warmer, fuzzier incarnation, supporters often wore pink to rallies instead of the party's more militant red and black. But whether Ortega has shed his penchant for cynicism is another question. He and his Sandinista comrades were global guerrilla heroes when they overthrew the brutal dictator Anastasio Somoza in 1979. As Nicaragua's Marxist comandante, Ortega was widely criticized for being as incompetent and corrupt as he was authoritarian. Those who know him say his quest to regain the presidency--he lost elections in 1996 and 2001--stemmed less from leftist ideals than from a raw need to accumulate power and avenge his 1990 humiliation. In 2000 he formed an alliance with President Arnoldo AlemÃ¡n--a right-wing Somoza acolyte who was later jailed for embezzlement--that helped the Sandinistas dominate Congress and the courts. In 2001 a Sandinista judge who had been a high-ranking official in Ortega's first government dismissed charges by Ortega's stepdaughter ZoilamÃ©rica NarvÃ¡ez that Ortega had sexually abused her when she was a girl in the 1980s. Ortega denied the charges, but the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights said the case had merit. (Ortega's wife and NarvÃ¡ez's mother, poet Rosario Murillo, stands by Ortega.)

Ortega may have trouble solidifying his hold on power, as he won with only 38% of the vote. That was still 9 percentage points ahead of his nearest rival, U.S.-backed banker Eduardo Montealegre, leading some to conclude that Ortega profited from voter backlash against perceived U.S. meddling in the election. However, a bigger problem than Yanqui interference may have been Yanqui neglect. After Ortega was ousted from power in 1990, the U.S. did little to help war-ravaged Nicaragua get back on its feet. "We got rid of the Sandinistas and said everything else would take care of itself," says Michael Shifter, vice president for policy at the Washington-based think tank Inter-American Dialogue. "That created a lot of discontent" that aided Ortega's eventual comeback. The new Ortega may still prove to be the old caudillo, but his victory is a reminder of the price the U.S. so often pays for prematurely declaring its missions accomplished. With reporting by Tim Rogers/Managua, Elaine Shannon/ Washington

DOJ_NMG_0092667

Felipe Calderón (TIME)

Time, November 13, 2006

What sort of initiatives do you plan to pursue in your first 100 days in office?

I have clearly established three priorities: combatting poverty, creating jobs--which was the principal platform of my campaign--and improving public security. Regarding poverty, I want to create a public-policy consensus, above all in education and health, that will let me move ahead quickly, and I'll need support from the Congress for these budget priorities. As for employment, I insisted during my campaign--and I still insist--that we need a competitive, job-creating economy. But in order to have that, you have to make market conditions more competitive, and that means reducing the monopoly power of some public and private companies. Third, public safety is the most difficult challenge we face. I hope to push through reforms that will address judicial and law-enforcement problems.

In the U.S., people say that Mexico is just next door, but it seems to be thousands of miles away economically, while China is thousands of miles away, but it seems to be just next door economically. Why is the Mexican economy so far behind?

There are several elements we need to reform in order to become more competitive. One is a system based on the rule of law. According to one study, the difference between developing economies that observe the rule of law and economies that don't is a more-than-3% growth in GDP. There is a lot of room for improvement in Mexico's government and judicial practices. Second, I am considering reducing the tax rate in order to promote a tax system that is competitive with other developing countries, such as China. Third, we need to create more jobs to take advantage of the growing number of young people entering the workforce each year.

Immigration has become one of the hottest topics in U.S. politics. Could you give me your view on this divisive issue from your side of the border?

I cannot imagine the future of North America--Canada, the U.S., Mexico--without a free market. Free in all senses of the word, in terms of goods and services and in terms of labor too. You cannot have an efficient and prosperous economy, even in the U.S., without developing a single, free market. On the other hand, I realize how important the immigration problem is for Americans. It is the same for Mexico. Every year we lose the best of our people: young, responsible, hardworking people. In Mexico you see a lot of towns made up of only women and the elderly. That is not exactly the country we want to have. I believe that migration is a bilateral problem, and it needs to be solved by creating jobs in Mexico. First we need to create a framework in order to promote investment in Mexico. Then we need to come up with government-sponsored works projects to create new jobs. My philosophy is that to stop migration, it is better to build a road in MichoacÃ¡n than a wall in Texas.

Our 'Africa' Lenses (WP)

By Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Growing up in Nsukka, a small university town in eastern Nigeria, I often had malaria. It was so commonplace that when you went to the medical center, a nurse would say, "Malaria has come again, hasn't it?" Because I know how easily treatable malaria is, I was surprised to learn that thousands of people die from it each year. People like the relatives of David Banda, Madonna's adopted son from Malawi.

But of course most American media do not say "Malawi"; they just say "Africa." I realized that I was African when I came to the United States. Whenever Africa came up in my college classes, everyone turned to me. It didn't matter whether the subject was Namibia or Egypt; I was expected to know, to explain.

I reject this facile compression of a varied continent into a monolithic country, but I have also come to accept that African nations do have much in common with one another. Most have a history of European colonization. Most also have a failure of leadership, a long line of presidents and prime ministers and heads of state all intent on the plunder of the state.

And so I was wearing my "African" lenses as I watched Madonna on television, cautiously, earnestly explaining the media circus around her adoption. I did not think it my place to wonder what her motivation for adoption was. I did cringe, however, when she said that her greatest disappointment was that the media frenzy would discourage people who wanted to do the same thing that she had done: adopt an African child. She wanted people to go to Africa and see what she had seen; she wanted them, too, to adopt.

DOJ_NMG_0092668

Later, watching David Banda's biological father speak about being grateful that she would give David a "better life," I could not help but look away. The power differential was so stark, so heartbreakingly sad; there was something about it that made Africa seem terribly dispensable.

Madonna will give David a better life, at least a materially better life: better food, housing, books. Whether this will make him a happier and normatively better human being is open to debate. What really matters is not Madonna's motivation or her supposed flouting of Malawian adoption laws (as though non-celebrities would not also hasten adoption processes if they could). Rather, it is the underlying notion that she has helped Africa by adopting David Banda, that one helps Africa by adopting Africa's children.

It is easy to romanticize poverty, to see poor people as inherently lacking agency and will. It is easy to strip them of human dignity, to reduce them to objects of pity. This has never been clearer than in the view of Africa from the American media, in which we are shown poverty and conflicts without any context.

If I were not African, I would, after watching the coverage, think of Africa as a place of magnificent wild animals in which black Africans exist as tour guides, or as a place of desperately poor people who kill or are killed by one another for little or no reason.

I once watched CNN's Anderson Cooper, who is undoubtedly well-meaning, interview a Belgian (who, we were told, was a "Congo expert") about the conflict in that country, while Congolese people stood in the background and watched. Surely there was a Congolese who was qualified to speak about Congo. Surely there are Congolese who are working just as hard as the foreigners and who don't fit into the category of either killer or killed. Surely the future for Africa should be one in which Africans are in a position to raise their own children.

Which brings me back to Madonna. I applauded her funding of orphanages in Malawi. I wish, however, that instead of asking television viewers to go to Africa and adopt, she had asked them to send a check to malaria-eradication organizations. I wish she had added, after one of those thoughtfully dramatic pauses, that Africa cannot depend on aid alone, that aid is like salted peanuts: The more failed leaders got, the more they wanted. I wish she had said that she was setting up an organization to use donations as micro-credit and that this organization, by the way, would be run by locals rather than expatriate staff members who would raise rents out of the reach of the people they were supposed to be helping.

I wish she had pointed out, with suitable celebrity-style rage, that Western countries need to stop appeasing and propping up hopeless African leaders, that Western banks must stop enabling and accepting stolen money from these leaders, that Western donors who insist on the free movement of capital across borders must also insist on the free movement of labor. I wish she had then shown, with graphs on the screen, how these things affect the father and relatives of David Banda.

Of course this isn't really about Madonna. It is about a formula that well-meaning people have adopted in looking at Africa, a surface-only, let's-ignore-the-real-reasons template that African experiences have all been forced to fit in order to be authentically "African." If I were not African, I wonder whether it would be clear to me that Africa is a place where the people do not need limp gifts of fish but sturdy fishing rods and fair access to the pond. I wonder whether I would realize that while African nations have a failure of leadership, they also have dynamic people with agency and voices. I wonder whether I would know that Africa has class divisions, that wealthy Africans who have not stolen from their countries actually exist. I wonder whether I would know that corrupt African countries are also full of fiercely honest people and that violent conflicts are about resource control in an environment of (sometimes artificial) scarcity.

DOJ_NMG_0092669

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Lawyers To Argue Ressam Sentence Before Appeals Court (AP) ... 3

War News:

Democrats To Press For Phased Withdrawal From Iraq (LAT) ... 3
Democrats Push For Troop Cuts Within Months (NYT) ... 5
Bush And Democrats Square Up Over Iraq (FT) ... 6
Democrats To Propose Iraq Pullout (WT) ... 7
Senators Push For Timetable For Withdrawal From Iraq (USAT) ... 8
Democrats' Challenge: Stay In The Center (NSWK) ... 9
We Won! Now What The Heck Do We Do? (USNEWS) ... 11
The Peril Of Opportunity (USNEWS) ... 12
"We Have To Start From A Level Of Trust" (TIME) ... 13
Lieberman A Wild Card In Iraq Policy (WP) ... 13
Bush Must Call For Reinforcements In Iraq (FT) ... 15
Iraq Is Gone. Now What? (WP) ... 16
Oh, The Humanities! (WP) ... 17
Iraqi Prime Minister Promises Government Shake-Up (NYT) ... 17
Iraq Prime Minister Plans Big Reshuffle (FT) ... 18
Blasts Kill Dozens Of Iraqi Police Recruits (WP) ... 19
Iraqi Leader Scolds Parliament, Promises Change (LAT) ... 20
Iraqi Leader, Feeling Pressure, Promises To Remake Cabinet (USAT) ... 21
Iraqi Prime Minister Pledges To Reform Cabinet (LAT) ... 22
Al-Maliki Vows Cabinet Shake-up (WT/AP) ... 23
Influence Rises But Base Frays For Iraqi Cleric (NYT) ... 23
Cleric Al-Sadr May Hold Iraq's Future In His Hands (USAT) ... 25
Iraq's Secret Death Chambers (TIME) ... 27
Violence In Iraq Claims At Least 159 (AP) ... 29
For Iraqis, News Is A Deadly Business (CSM) ... 30
Shi'ite Fanatic Rises In Iraq To Fill Void Left By Zarqawi (WT) ... 31
Dalai Lama Wants Saddam Spared (AFP-Y) ... 32
Insurgent Activity Rising In Afghanistan (AP) ... 33
Afghan Army Could Help Unify A Nation (LAT) ... 33
U.S. Pressed To Go Beyond Military Action (WT) ... 37

Corporate Scandals:

KB Home CEO Resigns Over Backdated Options (WSJ) ... 38
Convicted Executives Forced To Sell Homes (USAT) ... 39

Criminal Law:

Nigeria Bribery Case Heats Up Again (HC) ... 41
Witness Against Murder Inc. Gang Gets Freedom (WT) ... 43
Identity Thief Is Often Found In Family Photo (NYT) ... 44
Staving Off Modern-day Pirates (LAT) ... 46
Authorities Discredit Latest "sighting" Of James "Whitey" Bulger (BOS) ... 48
Was That Whitey Departing The Departed? (BOSH) ... 49
Police Believe Slaying At Md. FedEx Site Was Random (WP) ... 49
Petty Disputes Spur Most D.C. Killings (WT) ... 50
Va. State Police Swap '10-4' For 'Message Understood' (WP) ... 51

Civil Law:

Partial-Birth Replay (WP) ... 52

Civil Rights:

Sex Predators TV Show Raises Rights Issues (LAW) ... 53
A New Way To Sue (WSJ) ... 54

Antitrust:

Are Private Buyouts Good For The Economy? (CSM) ... 55

Environment:

Inside The Beltway (WT) ... 56

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Satellite Gear Aided In Finding Arellano (SDUT) ... 57
Accused Drug Dealer Reaches Plea Agreement After Laced Heroin Deaths (NBC10) ... 58
7 Indicted In Prospect Heights Crack Sting (PROJO) ... 58
Another View: Smokescreen Of Medical Pot Clouds View Of The Dangers (SACBEE) ... 59
Jewelry Theft Ring Is Busted Up, FBI Says (SLPD) ... 59
Insurgent Activity Spikes In Afghanistan (AP) ... 60
UN: Iran, Afghanistan, Pakistan Need To Share Drugs Data (AP) ... 61
U.S. Reaffirms Support For Embattled Kabul Government (WP) 61

Immigration:

Hunch Unravels Immigrant Wedding Scam (WP) ... 62
Democrats May Proceed With Caution On Immigration (WP) ... 64

Congress-Administration:

Can Bush Sr. And His Team Save Son's Presidency? (NSWK) ... 65
The Rescue Squad (NSWK) ... 67
Changing The Guard (USNEWS) ... 69
Searching For A Strategy (TIME) ... 70

The New Face: A Spy With Fresh Eyes (NSWK) ... 72
A New Man. Next, A New Plan For Iraq? (USNEWS) ... 73
Rescue Squad (USNEWS) ... 73
How History Will Judge Donald Rumsfeld (NSWK) ... 74
When "Oops" Isn't Enough (TIME) ... 75
Zakaria: What The Baker Commission Is Ignoring (NSWK) ... 76
Democrats Signal Hope For Approval Of Gates (FT) ... 77
Gates Would Leave Fidelity To Take Defense Post (WSJ) ... 78
Gates Likely To Sustain Terror War (WT) ... 79
Will Rumsfeld's Reforms Last? (CSM) ... 80
Bush Faces GOP Ire Over Rumsfeld Timing (AP) ... 81
Rumsfeld And The Realists (WSJ) ... 82
Places For Progress (TIME) ... 83
After The Triumph, The Tribulations (TIME) ... 84
Post-Thumpin' Politics (USNEWS) ... 85
Health's Ailment (USNEWS) ... 85
My Mother, My President (TIME) ... 86
Lame-duck Congress Takes Roost (LAT) ... 87
For Post-Election Congress, Extensive To-Do List Is Awaiting Action (NYT) ... 88
Washington Lame Ducks Have Heavy Agenda Bush, GOP Congress Take Last Try At Goals (AJC) ... 89
Setting Aside Differences (WSJ) ... 91
GOP Pressed On Offshore Drilling Limits (AP) ... 93
Don't Force An Energy Bill (NYT) ... 94
The Lame-Duck Congress (WP) ... 94
Blocked: Bye-Bye To Bolton? (NSWK) ... 95
Bush Stands By Keeping Bolton As U.N. Ambassador Despite Opposition (WP/AP) ... 95
Bolton And Bipartisanship (WSJ) ... 96
Carmakers Seek More Attention From Bush (USAT) ... 96
Renewable Fuels May Provide 25% Of U.S. Energy By 2025 (WSJ) ... 97
True Blue Populists (NYT) ... 97
Return To Rubinomics? (WP) ... 98
Democrats: Identify Pork Sponsors (USAT) ... 99
Speaker-to-be Is No Stranger To Earmarking (LAT) ... 100
Reid Pledges Earmark Reform, But May Benefit (LAT) ... 101
'There Is No Reason To Wait' (USAT) ... 103
Pelosi On Drugs (WSJ) ... 103
Congress's Sci-tech Agenda To Shift Under Democrats (CSM) 105
Pelosi Backs Murtha For Majority Leader (AP-Y) ... 105
Pelosi Endorses Murtha As Next Majority Leader (WP) ... 106
Supply Side Can Mike Pence Win? (WSJ) ... 107
A GOP Unchanged (WP) ... 108
In New Senate, The Middle Rules (CSM) ... 109
Array Of Fresh Faces Set For 110th Senate (WT) ... 111
McConnell Had Hoped To Be Majority Chief (AP-Y) ... 112
Study Health-Plan Options Carefully This Open Season (WP) ... 112
Hiding From Oversight (NYT) ... 113
Truth About The Trade Deficit (NYT) ... 114

Other News:

Karl Rove: The Architect's Faulty Specs (NSWK) ... 114
"A Passing Thing" (TIME) ... 115
Will: Retreat From Exuberance (NSWK) ... 115
Reaching For The Center (TIME) ... 116
What Voters Really Want (USNEWS) ... 118
How The West Is Being Won (NSWK) ... 119
Washington Whispers (USNEWS) ... 119
Where The Republicans Went Astray (NSWK) ... 120
Alter: The End Of The Road For U.S. Conservatism (NSWK) ... 123
Quinn: The Economic Perception Gap (NSWK) ... 124
Steele Interested In Heading RNC (AP-Y) ... 125
Two Democrats Struggle As Georgia Bucks A Trend (NYT) ... 125
Fresh Off The Farm In Montana, A Senator-to-Be (NYT) ... 126
How Many Wins Make Up A 'Wave'? (WP) ... 128
Midterm Election Leaves Political Landscape Blurry (WP) ... 129
The Media's Dark Role (WT) ... 131
For Democrats, How Long A Honeymoon? (WP) ... 132
McCain Edges Toward '08 Presidential Run (AP-Y) ... 133
McCain To Form Committee To Explore White House Bid (WP) 134
McCain Takes Step Toward 2008 Race (WT) ... 135
And They're Off! (USNEWS) ... 136
Shaken And Stirred (USNEWS) ... 136
Time In Senate May Be Irrelevant If Obama Runs (WP) ... 137
Hillary's Dilemma (USNEWS) ... 138
Flank Stakes (USNEWS) ... 139
Bill, George Show Keeps Laughs Coming (AP-Y) ... 140
YESTERDAY (WP) ... 140
A Charity With An Unusual Interest In The Bottom Line (NYT) ... 141
Confessions Of A Values Voter (USAT) ... 142
Tax Epiphany (WSJ) ... 144
As Vietnam Trip Nears, Bush Rejects Iraq Link (USAT) ... 144
In Vietnam, Old Foes Take Aim At War's Toxic Legacy (WP) ... 145
Vietnam Frees U.S. Citizen Convicted Of Terrorism (WP) ... 147
Bush, Putin To Bask In Trade Deal (AFP) ... 148
SKorea Balks At Measures To Sanction North (AP) ... 149
Early December Proposed For NKorea Talks: Russia (AFP) ... 149
Nuclear Deals Said To Be Thwarted (LAT) ... 150
Olmert Tackles Iran On U.S. Visit (WT/AP) ... 150
Olmert Arrives In US For Talks With Bush In New Political Climate (AFP) ... 151
In New Middle East, Tests For An Old Friendship (NYT) ... 151
How Bush And Olmert Could Help Each Other (WP) ... 155
Q&A: Israel's P.M. On Iran, Lebanon, Palestinian State (NSWK) 156
Syria A 'Dangerous' Country, Says Rice (AFP) ... 157
Hamas Endorses Peace Conference (WT/AP) ... 158
As Hezbollah Seeks Power, Lebanon Is Feeling Edgy (NYT) ... 158
Iran Vows Retaliation If Israel Strikes (AP) ... 160
Iran Criticizes Security Council Over Threat Of Sanctions (NYT) 161
Islamic Militants Claim Capture Of Town (AP) ... 161
Tension Rises In Somalia As Islamists Expand Reach (NYT) ... 162
Hizbollah Ministers Quit Lebanon's Cabinet (FT) ... 162
Lebanese Cabinet Thrown Into Crisis By Hezbollah Exit (WSJ) 163
China Sub Secretly Stalked U.S. Fleet (WT) ... 164
U.S.: Castro's Health Is Deteriorating (AP) ... 165
U.N. Envoy Meets With Ugandan Rebel (NYT) ... 165
Ugandan Rebel Emerges To Talk With U.N. Official (WP/AP) ... 166
A New Al Jazeera With A Global Focus (NYT) ... 167

DOJ_NMG_0092671

¡Viva El Capitalismo! (NYT) 168
Ortega's Encore (TIME) 169
Felipe Calderón (TIME)..... 170
Our 'Africa' Lenses (WP)..... 171

TERRORISM NEWS:

Lawyers To Argue Ressam Sentence Before Appeals Court (AP)

By Gene Johnson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, November 13, 2006

SEATTLE (AP) -- The Justice Department says there is "precious little" to explain why Ahmed Ressam received a sentence of only 22 years for plotting to bomb Los Angeles International Airport on the eve of the millennium. Ressam's lawyers say the sentence was a decade too long.

A three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will hear their arguments Monday.

Both sides are challenging aspects of the punishment U.S. District Judge John C. Coughenour imposed last year. Ressam's lawyers, Thomas Hillier and Michael Filipovic, believe that one of the nine counts he was convicted of should be thrown out, which would reduce the sentence by 10 years.

The U.S. Attorney's Office has suggested that Coughenour's decision to sentence Ressam to less than the 35 years it requested may have been colored by a distaste for the Bush administration's treatment of "enemy combatants." In their appeal, prosecutors repeatedly cited Coughenour's comments at sentencing, when he said Ressam's case illustrated that U.S. courts are plenty capable of handling terrorism cases.

"We did not need to use a secret military tribunal," the judge said at the time, "or detain the defendant indefinitely as an enemy combatant, or deny him the right to counsel, or invoke any proceedings beyond those guaranteed by or contrary to the United States Constitution."

Customs agents in Port Angeles, across the Strait of Juan de Fuca from Canada, caught Ressam with explosives in the trunk of his rental car when he arrived by ferry in December 1999. The arrest prompted the cancellation of millennium celebrations at Seattle's Space Needle. He was convicted of terrorism and explosives charges at trial in 2001, then decided to tell investigators what he knew about al-Qaida in an effort to win a shorter sentence.

"We believe the district court seriously erred in straying so far from what would have been the advisory guideline sentence, which was 65 years to life," U.S. Attorney John McKay said. "Even taking into account his cooperation, the sentence was far too short. Ressam has told us he intended to kill as many people as he could at the Los Angeles Airport. That's what he should be sentenced for."

Coughenour noted that before the trial, the government offered Ressam the chance to plead guilty in exchange for a sentence of 25 years, with no cooperation required; the judge reasoned that 25 years represented the government's assessment of Ressam's crime, and any cooperation he later provided should be discounted from that. The government disagreed, saying that since Ressam didn't accept the 25-year offer, it shouldn't factor into the court's decision.

Ressam's testimony helped convict one of his co-conspirators, but his cooperation came to a halt by early 2003. Years of solitary confinement, broken by periods of intense interrogation, had taken their toll on his mental health and corrupted his memory, his lawyers insisted.

The government didn't buy it and was furious that without further help, it had to dismiss cases against two of Ressam's alleged co-conspirators, Samir Ait Mohamed and Abu Doha.

On appeal, Ressam's lawyers are arguing against his conviction on one count of carrying explosives during a felony. The felony was providing a false name and other information to customs agents.

Hillier says that during trial, jurors were not asked to find that Ressam carried the explosives "in furtherance of" providing the false information, as he says the law requires. The crime carries a mandatory minimum of 10 years in prison.

Gene Johnson has been covering courts and legal affairs for the AP since 2000.

WAR NEWS:

Democrats To Press For Phased Withdrawal From Iraq (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0092672

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats poised to take control of Congress said Sunday that they would press to begin a phased U.S. military withdrawal from Iraq within four to six months, part of an agenda aimed at overhauling key aspects of U.S. policy in the Middle East.

"First order of business is to change the direction of Iraq policy," said Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), who is in line to become chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee next year when Democrats become the majority party in both chambers of Congress.

Senior White House officials countered that setting timetables for U.S. troop withdrawals would weaken the Iraq government and embolden insurgents, but they acknowledged a need for fresh ideas on Iraq and expressed a new willingness to negotiate with Democrats on an array of foreign policy issues.

White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten indicated that the president would block legislation calling for a scheduled withdrawal.

"I don't think we're going to be receptive to the notion there's a fixed timetable at which we automatically pull out, because that could be a true disaster for the Iraqi people," Bolten said on ABC's "This Week," one of two Sunday talk shows on which he appeared.

Even so, he added, the White House is "willing to talk about anything" and is prepared to adjust tactics.

The developments came as President Bush and members of his national security team prepared to meet today with a panel of foreign policy experts who have been charged with developing proposals for how to proceed in Iraq. The panel is headed by James A. Baker III, who served as secretary of State when Bush's father was president, and Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman who chaired the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

The urgency of the work of that commission was underscored Sunday by the continuing violence in Iraq, where nearly 100 people were killed in a 24-hour period, including 38 in twin suicide bombings at a police recruiting center, the deadliest strike on a police facility in months. In addition, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki harshly criticized fellow lawmakers for placing partisan concerns above the national interest, and he promised major changes in his Cabinet.

The comments by Levin and others offered a glimpse of how the Democrats' control of Congress might alter foreign policy, which has been dominated by Republicans and the Bush administration since the Sept. 11 attacks more than five years ago.

Senior military officials have recently voiced increasing concern that the security benefits of keeping large numbers of troops in Iraq are outweighed by significant downsides to the heavy U.S. presence. Among them are a perceived reluctance by Iraqis to take the lead in stemming the violence as long as U.S. forces are there.

"We have to tell the Iraqis that the open-ended commitment is over and that we're going to begin to have a phased withdrawal in four to six months," said Levin, who also appeared on "This Week."

Levin was joined in his call for a phased pullout by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who is in line to become chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader in the Senate, told NBC's "Meet the Press" that decisions on drawdowns should rest with U.S. military officers in Iraq. Still, Reid said that "we need to redeploy" and that a withdrawal should start within several months.

Given the results of last week's elections, the Baker-Hamilton panel, formally known as the Iraq Study Group, has become a focal point for members of both parties as they seek an upper hand in setting the Iraq agenda. The panel is expected to deliver its findings by the end of the year.

Levin said he hoped the commission would endorse calls for a phased pullout. But Bush is likely to use his meeting with the panel today to make the case for elements of the administration's approach.

Iraq was a key factor in Republican losses in last week's election, with nearly six in 10 voters participating in exit polls saying they disapproved of the war and a majority calling for a withdrawal of some or all U.S. troops.

Even so, it's unclear how far GOP lawmakers will be willing to go to challenge the White House and back calls for a drawdown. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said Sunday that he still believed the United States needed to send more troops to Iraq to curb sectarian violence and reduce the influence of heavily armed Shiite militias.

"I believe that there are a lot of things that we can do to salvage this, but they all require the presence of additional troops," he said on "Meet the Press."

"The question, then, before the American people is 'Are we ready to quit?' And I believe the consequences of failure are chaos in the region, which will spread," said McCain, who is widely seen as the front-runner for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0092673

Members of both parties said they expected the Baker-Hamilton commission to recommend that the United States hold a conference with representatives from Iraq's neighbors to seek greater cooperation in pacifying the country and creating a stable government.

Biden told ABC that Iran and Syria should be included in such a conference because of their influence in the region. Baker recently met with an Iranian envoy at the United Nations to discuss the prospects for cooperation.

But a proposal that calls for joint meetings with Syria and Iran would pose thorny diplomatic problems for the administration, which has labeled Iran part of an "axis of evil" and has been reluctant to engage either country.

Bolten stopped short of rejecting such a conference, but made it clear that the White House doesn't believe dialogue with Iran and Syria would improve matters.

"I don't think there's been a communications problem. There's been a cooperation problem," he said. "Iran and Syria have been meddling in Iraq in a very unhelpful way."

Iran has ties to Shiite groups in Iraq, has large numbers of intelligence operatives in the country and has been accused of supplying components for bombs that have been used to strike Iraqi and U.S. troops.

Democrats Push For Troop Cuts Within Months (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg, Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 12 — Democratic leaders in the Senate vowed on Sunday to use their new Congressional majority to press for troop reductions in Iraq within a matter of months, stepping up pressure on the administration just as President Bush is to be interviewed by a bipartisan panel examining future strategy for the war.

The Democrats — the incoming majority leader, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada; the incoming Armed Services Committee chairman, Senator Carl Levin of Michigan; and the incoming Foreign Relations Committee chairman, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware — said a phased redeployment of troops would be their top priority when the new Congress convenes in January, even before an investigation of the conduct of the war.

“We need to begin a phased redeployment of forces from Iraq in four to six months,” Mr. Levin said in an appearance on the ABC News program “This Week.” In a telephone interview later, Mr. Levin added, “The point of this is to signal to the Iraqis that the open-ended commitment is over and that they are going to have to solve their own problems.”

The White House signaled a willingness to listen to the Democrats’ proposals, with Joshua B. Bolten, the chief of staff, saying in two television appearances that the president was open to “fresh ideas” and a “fresh look.” But Mr. Bolten said he could not envision the White House signing on to a plan setting a timetable for the withdrawal of troops.

“You know, we’re willing to talk about anything,” he said on “This Week.” “I don’t think we’re going to be receptive to the notion there’s a fixed timetable at which we automatically pull out, because that could be a true disaster for the Iraqi people. But what we’ve always been prepared to do, and remain prepared to do, is indeed what Senators Levin and Biden were talking about, is put pressure on the Iraqi government to take over themselves.”

The spirited exchanges on the Sunday morning talk shows — a staple of weekend life for the political elite here, especially on the Sunday after an election that blew through Washington like a tornado — came at a delicate moment for the White House on Iraq. The bipartisan panel on strategy, led by James A. Baker III, the secretary of state under the first President Bush, and Lee Hamilton, a Democratic former congressman, will be at the White House on Monday to begin its final round of interviews.

The panel will meet separately with Mr. Bush and members of his foreign policy team, including the secretaries of state and defense, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency and the director of national intelligence, and will then interview Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain by videoconference. On Tuesday, the group plans to meet with Democratic foreign policy leaders.

The panel is expected to make its recommendations by the end of the year, and Democrats said they did not intend to push a resolution for troop withdrawal until after the report was issued. But after Tuesday’s election, in which Republicans took what Mr. Bush has called “a thumping,” Democrats used their Sunday appearances to signal that they believed they had a mandate about Iraq and would seize on it.

“The people have spoken in a very, very strong way that they don’t buy the administration policy,” Mr. Levin said on ABC. Mr. Reid, in an appearance on CBS, said troop redeployment “should start within the next few months.”

In June, the Republican-controlled Senate rejected two amendments on troop reductions backed by Democrats. One called for all United States combat troops to be withdrawn within a year. The other, whose sponsors included Mr. Levin, called for troop reductions to start by the end of the year without setting a deadline for complete withdrawal.

In the interview after his television appearance, Mr. Levin said that any resolution about troop reductions in the next session of Congress would not contain detailed benchmarks mandating how many troops should be withdrawn by specific dates.

DOJ_NMG_0092674

As Democrats outlined their proposal to reduce the American presence in Iraq, Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona and a likely presidential contender for 2008, reiterated his stance that there were not enough American troops there.

Appearing on the NBC program "Meet the Press," Mr. McCain said that "the present situation is unacceptable" but added that any withdrawal from Iraq would create chaos throughout the Middle East.

Mr. McCain, emphasizing the importance of breaking the back of the Mahdi Army, the militia allied with the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, said that the Iraqi prime minister "has to understand that we need to put down Sadr, and we need to take care of the Mahdi Army, and we need to stop the sectarian violence that is on the increase in a nonacceptable level, and I think that the best way to assure that is for him to know that we will do what's necessary to bolster the — train and equip the Iraqi army, et cetera."

Mr. McCain added, "If we send the signal that we are leaving, of course, he's going to try to make accommodations with others, because he knows what is going to be the inevitable result."

After a week in which both parties used the fallout from Tuesday's midterm elections to promise a new era of bipartisanship, the Sunday television interviews suggested that profound differences remained over Iraq, the issue that proved central in the elections.

But there was one area on which Democrats hinted they might find common ground with the White House: the confirmation of Robert M. Gates, the former C.I.A. director, to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who had become a magnet for criticism about the war and whose departure was announced by Mr. Bush the day after voters handed Democrats majorities in both houses of Congress.

"I'm inclined to vote for him now," said Mr. Biden, who voted against Mr. Gates for the job of C.I.A. chief 15 years ago, adding, "To put it very, very bluntly, as long as he's not there, Rumsfeld is there."

The White House is clearly looking to the Baker-Hamilton group to provide a path toward progress in Iraq. Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton have already told committee staff members to begin drafting parts of the report. But other commissioners did not see any of those drafts before the election, two members of the commission said in interviews last week.

"I guess the thinking was that anything that gets circulated before the election would get leaked, and one side or the other might use that for electoral purposes," said one member, who was granted anonymity because the commission is supposed to operate in secrecy.

Other members of the commission speculated that Mr. Baker, in particular, had been waiting to see the outcome of the elections, perhaps calculating that a major victory for the Democrats would put the White House in less of a position to challenge the recommendations.

The commission will meet again the week after Thanksgiving, when many of the most critical debates about options are expected to take place among commission members.

Mr. Baker has already made some of his views known. In television interviews, some timed to promote a book he has just published, he has expressed skepticism that a rapid withdrawal can be accomplished without setting off chaos or civil war, and has been doubtful that partitioning the country will work.

The message from White House officials on Sunday was that the president was indeed open to new ideas on Iraq, as long as they did not involve a plan with a specific date for beginning the drawing down of troops.

Dan Bartlett, counselor to Mr. Bush, said on Fox News that the president had directed the chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, Gen. Peter Pace, to assess strategy in Iraq and would be open to listening to "good suggestions," regardless of where they came from.

But Dana Perino, the deputy White House press secretary, said in an interview that Mr. Bush remained adamant that decisions about how to deploy troops would be made by military commanders in Iraq.

"That didn't change overnight on November 7," Ms. Perino said.

Bush And Democrats Square Up Over Iraq (FT)

By Krishna Guha, Jean Eaglesham

Financial Times, November 13, 2006

The promise of bipartisan co-operation in Washington following the congressional mid-term elections came under immediate strain on Sunday as the White House squared up to the Democrats over the US ambassador to the United Nations and strategy for Iraq.

Josh Bolten, the White House chief of staff, told ABC's This Week that the administration would make a final attempt to have John Bolton, the controversial UN ambassador, confirmed during the lame duck session of the outgoing Republican-dominated Congress, which begins today.

DOJ_NMG_0092675

Meanwhile top Democrats stepped up calls for the US to adopt a timetable for a phased withdrawal from Iraq and backed direct talks with Iran and Syria.

Although courteous in tone, the renewed sparring shows how difficult it will be to sustain the bipartisan approach to government pledged by leaders of both parties following last week's vote, in which the Democrats won control of both houses of Congress for the first time in 12 years.

On Saturday, President George W. Bush told the nation: "We must put these elections behind us and work together on the great issues facing America."

Forging ahead with the confirmation of Mr Bolton, though, will be divisive.

Mr Bolton was given a temporary recess appointment by Mr Bush but needs Senate approval to continue in the job.

Joe Biden, the incoming Democrat chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, said the confirmation bid would fail. He warned the White House not to try to find a procedural device to bypass the Senate and keep Mr Bolton in his job.

Carl Levin, the incoming Democrat chairman of the Senate armed services committee, told the same programme he would reintroduce his motion calling for a phased withdrawal from Iraq starting in four to six months, and claimed a number of Republicans would now support it.

Harry Reid, the incoming Senate majority leader, later endorsed the call for a redeployment beginning "in the next few months". But he hedged his bets saying he would not insist on a precise date.

For the White House Mr Bolten said: "I don't think we are going to be receptive to the notion that there's a fixed timetable at which we automatically pull out," he said. The US had to give the Iraqi government the support it needed to succeed, he said, warning that the alternative would be "truly disastrous".

Mr Bush on Monday meets James Baker and Lee Hamilton, leaders of the Iraq Study Group charged with finding ways forward in Iraq. Many experts predict the ISG will recommend that the US open direct talks with Iraq's neighbours Iran and Syria.

Mr Biden, the Democrat, said the US should talk to both countries, a position backed yesterday by moderate Republican Senators Arlen Specter and John McCain - who repeated his calls for more US troops to be sent to Iraq.

Mr Bolten continued to resist the idea of talks with Iran and Syria. "I don't think there has been a communication problem. There has been a co-operation problem," he said. "Iran and Syria have been meddling in Iraq in a very unhelpful way."

He reiterated the administration's charge that Iranian weapons are being used to kill US soldiers in Iraq and declared "that needs to stop."

But in a potentially important concession, he told CNN "nothing is off the table."

Tony Blair will seek to use the state of flux in Washington politics to try to persuade the US to include efforts towards a wider peace settlement in the Middle East – in particular Lebanon and Palestine, and including talks with Syria and Iran – as part of a revised Iraq strategy.

In a speech at the Guildhall on Monday, the prime minister will argue that the conflict in Iraq has evolved and the strategy to deal with it must also evolve.

He is expected to reinforce this message when he gives evidence to the ISG panel by video-link on Monday.

The UK's efforts to influence a change in Washington's approach to Iraq come amid continued bloodshed there.

Four British servicemen were killed and another three seriously hurt on Sunday in an attack on a patrol boat in Basra.

In a separate incident, the US military said three American soldiers had been killed in combat while operating in western Al-Anbar province.

Two suicide bombers killed 35 people and wounded 60 at a police commando recruiting centre in western Baghdad, according to reports.

Democrats To Propose Iraq Pullout (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

The two top Senate Democrats on foreign policy yesterday said they will introduce a resolution in January calling for troops to start being withdrawn from Iraq by this summer, a move that Sen. John McCain said would put the U.S. in the worst of both worlds.

Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat in line to lead the Senate Armed Services Committee, said his party's election victory last week vindicates calls for a change of strategy in Iraq and said withdrawals would need to start this year, despite White House opposition to any timetables, a stance it also reiterated on yesterday's political shows.

"The people spoke dramatically, overwhelmingly, resoundingly, to change the course in Iraq," he said during an appearance on ABC's "This Week." The Senate's "first order of business is to change the direction of Iraq policy."

DOJ_NMG_0092676

"We need to begin a phased redeployment of forces from Iraq in four to six months, to begin that redeployment," he said. "We have to tell Iraqis that the open-ended commitment is over."

On the other hand, Mr. McCain said on NBC's "Meet the Press" that the U.S. troop presence in Iraq would need to be increased to achieve victory and said he would favor a total withdrawal if that didn't happen.

"I believe that there are a lot of things that we can do to salvage this, but they all require the presence of additional troops," he said.

Moderator Tim Russert said: "It sounds as if McCain is saying, 'Either send more troops in, secure the country and win, or make the decision and get out.' "

"I think that that's pretty much my position," said the Arizona Republican, who is considering a run for the White House in 2008. "Maybe it's more nuanced than that."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., who appeared on the same ABC segment as Mr. Levin, said he backed the Michigander's resolution and elaborated on some of its other details.

It also would call for "a political settlement in Iraq, put pressure on the Iraqis to insist upon a means to distribute the oil equitably, to make sure that there's some form of federalism and to deal with the militias, and call for an international conference," said the Delaware Democrat who is expected to take the reins at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Besides Mr. Levin and Mr. Biden, Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming majority leader, also called for a redeployment of troops from Iraq, which he said "should start within the next few months," although he said the withdrawal should be phased.

"We need to have a redeployment in Iraq. What does that mean? Pull everybody out now? Of course not," Mr. Reid said during an appearance on CBS' "Face the Nation."

White House officials said yesterday that President Bush opposes a specific timetable for withdrawal and partitioning of Iraq, but that he is willing to reconsider proposals on conducting the war.

"I don't think so. And I think it would be a very bad idea," White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten said when asked on CBS' "Face the Nation" whether his boss would support a timetable, although he added that "nobody is happy with what our situation in Iraq is now."

Still, Mr. Bolten told ABC's "This Week" that "the president's open to fresh ideas here."

"The president obviously wants to take a whole fresh look at what we're doing in Iraq," he said on CBS.

Mr. Bush will meet today with members of a commission, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, that Congress appointed to make recommendations about U.S. policy in Iraq.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett also denied speculation that the administration, based on reports about the Baker-Hamilton panel, is considering a partitioning of Iraq into regions based on ethic or religious makeup.

"I think many observers and experts watching the political process in Iraq would say that that would be a mistake to go that route," he said during an appearance on "Fox News Sunday." "Most importantly, the sovereign government of Iraq believes that that would be the wrong way to go. To partition the country would only increase sectarian violence and strife, not call for reconciliation."

Mr. McCain added that he opposes a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. forces.

"I believe that a withdrawal, or a date for withdrawal, will lead to chaos in the region, and most military experts think the same thing," he said.

However, Mr. Levin and Mr. Biden both said they would not support cutting off funds for the war, a move some liberals have demanded but which Rep. Nancy Pelosi, likely the next speaker of the House, ruled out the day after the election.

"As far as I'm concerned, it's absolutely off the table," Mr. Biden agreed.

Senators Push For Timetable For Withdrawal From Iraq (USAT)

USA Today, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Congressional Democrats continued to press ahead on Sunday with proposals to start withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq but faced resistance from the White House and a top Republican.

Democratic Sens. Carl Levin of Michigan and Joseph Biden of Delaware said they expect some Republican support for a resolution calling for troops to begin coming home as soon as March.

Levin is in line to be chairman of the Armed Services Committee when Democrats become the Senate majority in January; Biden is set to be chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

“We're going to urge the president on a bipartisan basis, hopefully, to change course in Iraq by doing a number of things,” Levin said on ABC's This Week. “Not only telling Iraqis that we're not there in an open-ended way, but also to set some milestones here so that we can begin to withdraw in four to six months.”

White House chief of staff Josh Bolten said President Bush wouldn't support that idea.

DOJ_NMG_0092677

"We clearly need a fresh approach," Bolten said, but "I don't think we're going to be receptive to the notion that there's a fixed timetable at which we automatically pull out, because that could be a true disaster for the Iraqi people." Bolten appeared on talk shows on ABC, CBS and CNN.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., meanwhile, called for more American forces to be sent to Iraq. "I believe that a withdrawal, or a date for withdrawal, will lead to chaos in the region, and most military experts think the same thing," said McCain on NBC's Meet the Press. "I believe that there are a lot of things that we can do to salvage this, but they all require the presence of additional troops."

Bush and his national security team are scheduled to meet today with the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel formed to re-evaluate U.S. involvement in Iraq and propose policy changes. Bush removed Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld last week after Democrats won control of Congress, saying voters wanted new ideas on handling the war.

Before the elections, Bush had accused Democrats of being weak on national security, suggesting that a Democratic triumph on Election Day would amount to a victory for terrorists. Exit polls showed about six in ten voters disapproved of the war in Iraq, and they voted overwhelmingly for Democrats.

Not all Democrats were united behind Levin's idea of a withdrawal timetable. Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said on Fox News Sunday that a fixed timetable is "probably not the way it's going to work."

Democrats' Challenge: Stay In The Center (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - Like any newly elected congressman, Indiana's Brad Ellsworth has a lot to learn. Before he had even digested his victory over Republican incumbent John Hostettler last week, Ellsworth was poring over forms and factoids, shipped straight to Indiana from some new friends on Capitol Hill. "They're asking me what kind of BlackBerry I want," said a mildly exasperated Ellsworth. "I don't know what kind of BlackBerry I want. I've always just used a cell phone." As his campaign staffers caught up on sleep, Ellsworth worried over pension plans, travel arrangements and finding a home in the nation's capital. "Did you know that some [congressmen] live with seven or eight other guys?" he asked. "People back home would be amazed."

But wide-eyed as he may be, Ellsworth has already learned a crucial rule for survival in Washington: find allies you can trust. Two days after his victory, he placed a call to another newly elected Democratic congressman, North Carolina's Heath Shuler. Shuler is a former NFL quarterback; he and Ellsworth, a sheriff, had been two of the "macho Democrat" stars of the '06 cycle—manly men whose conservative positions on issues like abortion and gay marriage had helped them win in their Red States. Now Ellsworth was calling to congratulate his soon-to-be colleague and to say that the two should stick together in the new House. After all, he said, they both had to answer to the same kind of conservative constituents back home—and both know they won't last long in Congress if they go native in D.C. "We both won; now we're both in the same boat," Ellsworth said. "We've got to remember that the people back home put us here and they can take us back out."

Most Democrats in Washington weren't thinking so far ahead. After 12 years in the minority, the Democrats swept control of both houses of Congress—and the party leadership reveled in the exotic new pleasures of victory. Rahm Emanuel, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, danced on national television. Harry Reid, the usually staid Senate Democratic floor leader, kissed the television screen in his hotel suite when a network projected Claire McCaskill the winner in her hard-fought Missouri Senate race. Nancy Pelosi, soon to be the first female Speaker of the House, paraded across the broadcast networks, a proud grandma in an olive pantsuit, proclaiming herself "thrilled."

But Pelosi has been around long enough to know that in Washington the party never lasts too long. She will soon be judged on her ability to make the Congress work, no simple task for an incoming Speaker whose majority in the House is thin and is made up of members with loyalties to different generations, regions and ideologies. Fresh-faced conservatives like Ellsworth might say they don't "want our president to be viewed as weak," but they won't have much say about the matter with powerful Democratic committee chairmen like John Conyers and Henry Waxman mulling investigations on issues like Iraq-war contracts and NSA wiretaps. And while President George W. Bush was quick to say he'd offered Pelosi a list of "Republican interior decorators" to help her spruce up her new office, no one in either party expects the White House to bend over backward to help the Democratic Congress find its groove.

The challenges facing the Democrats are massive—changing the tone in Washington, working with a polarizing president, addressing the deficit and, ahem, coming up with some kind of new plan for Iraq. It is far from clear that Pelosi, Reid and their cohorts have the mettle to stick together and take them on. After all, they are Democrats. But if the party's 2006 performance proves anything, it's that discipline isn't a foreign concept to this crew. The leadership of the new majority has already put out word that members will pay a price if they jeopardize the party's attempts to place itself on a centrist footing. Liberal activists, who poured countless hours and millions of dollars into the '06 effort, are eager for the Dems to deliver on a progressive agenda. But the leadership is talking up a domestic program that steers clear of social issues and seeks consensus on the minimum wage, college tuition and trade. Thrilled as they may still be with their victory, many Democrats are now realizing that that their future depends on a tricky proposition: actually becoming the centrist, big-tent party they've spent two years claiming to be.

DOJ_NMG_0092678

Pelosi is an odd champion of the center. Only 34 percent of respondents in the NEWSWEEK Poll had a favorable impression of her in part because, as the congresswoman from San Francisco, she has spent her career being lampooned by conservatives as the chief spokesperson for America's loony left. A strong supporter of abortion rights and same-sex marriage, she was a favorite target for Republicans this fall trying to portray her party as extreme. (Ellsworth's opponent ran an ad against him claiming a vote for Ellsworth would be a vote for Pelosi "and her radical plan to advance the homosexual agenda, led by Barney Frank.") The voters who re-elected Pelosi to her 11th term by an overwhelming margin also handily approved a measure calling for the impeachment of Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney.

Still, the "San Francisco liberal" label has never really quite fit Pelosi. She gained political entree in the city not by protesting in Haight-Ashbury but by holding fund-raisers in ritzy Presidio Heights. While others in her generation were burning their bras and draft cards, she was dressing her five children in plaid pinafores and marching them off to the Convent of the Sacred Heart. "There isn't one shred of evidence that she's veered off to the left with the Democratic caucus," says her friend, Washington Congressman Jim McDermott. "In fact, some of us on the left wish she would tilt a little more our way from time to time."

Pelosi developed her strategy for claiming the Speaker's gavel by consulting corporate America—not your typical liberal play. After the party's disastrous defeat in the 2004 elections, she began casting around for fresh ideas on how the Democrats could reintroduce themselves to the American people. "I decided to go to the private sector," she told NEWSWEEK, "and ask them how to become No. 1."

Through her staff, Pelosi found her way to a group of corporate-image consultants including high-tech entrepreneur Richard Yanowitch, computer-software marketer John Cullinane and Jack Trout, a marketing strategist who'd worked with big corporate clients like Merck and IBM. "I specialize in differentiation," Trout says. "I told her, 'That's your problem—you haven't found a way to differentiate the party from the Republican Party in a clear, simple way'." Trout encouraged Pelosi to take advantage of the weak points in Karl Rove's base-driven Republican strategy. "You've got to go the opposite way," he told her. "It's Marketing 101. Say 'We're about good governing for all, not a privileged few ... ' Bring back the big-tent idea."

Pelosi liked what she heard. The centrist messaging dovetailed nicely with Emanuel's strategy of recruiting candidates who could run in Red States and highlight conservative positions on cultural issues. As the elections approached, she made sure that the old bulls of Congress were onboard. In the final days of the campaign, she held conference calls with senior members, urging them not to deviate from the party's emphasis on restoring civility, integrity and fiscal responsibility in Congress. "She doesn't want to be Speaker for two years," says an aide. "We can do it," but "we have to keep our people together."

Already, Pelosi has made it clear that she will brook little dissent as Speaker. When Conyers, the presumed chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, raised the possibility of bringing articles of impeachment against President Bush earlier this year, Pelosi quickly chastised him, saying any talk of impeachment would distract from the Democrats' message.

Veteran House committee chairmen understand Pelosi's need for loyalty, and share her desire to win. But they are also eager to conduct a reality check on President Bush. No sooner were the election returns in than Henry Waxman, the soon-to-be chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, directed his aides to draw up an "oversight" plan for the panel. With a staff of more than 80 investigators, Waxman has instantly become the most formidable of White House adversaries. (Two top D.C. lobbyists and a white-collar defense lawyer, who asked to remain anonymous discussing still-hypothetical investigations, told NEWSWEEK they were already getting nervous phone calls from prospective Waxman targets, seeking counsel about what to do if they get hauled before his committee.) Waxman's interest in oversight could quickly lead him to the Jack Abramoff scandal. This worries some leadership aides who remember that Republicans frittered away their popularity in the '90s by persecuting the White House from Capitol Hill. (Waxman has said he's not interested in payback, but rather accountability).

The most difficult debate facing the Democrats will be over Iraq. After six years of decrying their lack of oversight on military policy, party leaders now have co-ownership of the Iraq account. Many Democrats say the party should focus its energy on pressing the White House for a change of course in current policy, rather than dredging up old debates over the manner in which the administration took the country to war. But Carl Levin, the new chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, says he also intends to demand access to some 58 internal Defense Department memos dealing with prewar Iraq intelligence and military planning. These memos involve the Pentagon's Office of Special Plans and the Counter-Terrorism Policy Evaluation Group, two secretive units that have been accused of cooking the books on Saddam's weapons of mass destruction and alleged ties to Al Qaeda. "There [is] still some significant unfinished business in the area of documents that have been denied us," Levin told NEWSWEEK.

DOJ_NMG_0092679

Less likely to dominate and divide the party, at least for the moment, will be old debates over abortion. Many in the leadership are convinced that the party was successful in the midterms because it de-emphasized cultural issues and backed pro-life candidates like Pennsylvania's Bob Casey. "The reason this election went well for the Democrats is that [they] decided to have a bigger tent on abortion," says Rachel Laser of Third Way, a Democratic think tank. "Democrats should always be the party of abortion rights, but they should also become the party of reducing abortion."

Republicans, of course, will do their best to keep values issues on the table and search for other openings to exploit. But Bush is at least going through the motions of putting the bitter campaign behind him. "If I sit here and mope about it, what is that going to prove?" he asked a senior aide after the election results came in. (The aide declined to be identified discussing a private conversation with the president.) Bush lunched with Pelosi and peppered her with questions about her daughter Alexandra, a filmmaker Bush befriended when the younger Pelosi was making her documentary "Journeys With George." (Cheney was also present at the lunch, says an aide to Pelosi, but said hardly a word the whole time.)

No one expects the bipartisan era of good feeling to last. And it won't be long until Pelosi's ability to ride herd over her ranks will be tested. Eli Pariser, the executive director of the grass-roots organization MoveOn.org, says the party won votes not by tilting rightward but by backing "bold, populist, progressive candidates ... and by connecting with people around the formula of being for the little guy." MoveOn supports the agenda Pelosi and Reid have announced—but sees it as only a small start. The group wants the Democratic Congress to come up with comprehensive plans for alternative energy and global warming and wants U.S. troops out of Iraq by the end of next year. "People want responsible redeployment," Pariser says. Meanwhile, some Dems are already trying to oust MoveOn hero Howard Dean from his perch as party chairman. Clinton ally James Carville began floating rumors that defeated Tennessee Senate candidate Harold Ford Jr. could replace Dean—without consulting Ford, who says he isn't interested in the job.

Viewed from any partisan vantage point, many of the pending items on the Democratic agenda seem small-scale—harking back to President Bill Clinton's triangulation strategy. A baby-steps approach will be crucial to keeping the coalition together but may nonetheless prove frustrating to newcomers like Ellsworth, who ran on promises of big, fast change. For his part, Ellsworth says he doesn't have any plans to challenge the more liberal and more seasoned Democrats he'll soon be working beside. What will he say to Barney Frank, the congressman whose "homosexual agenda" Ellsworth's opponent tried to link him to in the campaign? "I don't know what I'll say to him," Ellsworth says. "He's got to represent his people and I've got to represent mine."

With Eleanor Clift, Michael Isikoff, Jonathan Alter, Debra Rosenberg, Karen Breslau and Richard Wolffe

We Won! Now What The Heck Do We Do? (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

One hard job-winning-is over. Now for the much harder job-governing. Flushed with their narrow wins in the House and Senate, Democratic Party leaders couldn't strike a bipartisan chord fast enough: "Partnerships," said House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi, "not partisanship." In his first post-election press conference, Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the master tactician behind the House victory, called sternly for governing from the "vital center"-five times. Harry Reid, the Senate majority leader-elect, chimed in: "It's a time for results."

That won't be as easy as it sounds. Democrats hold a relatively modest 229-to-196-seat majority in the House (with 10 seats undecided at the end of last week) and an advantage of just one in the Senate. The president, of course, still has his trusty veto pen. To get results then, Democrats will have to hold the centrist and left wings of the party together and work with Republicans if they're going to get the kind of results they'll need to impress voters in '08.

The new crop of Democrats is a pretty varied lot-Iraq veterans, antiwar candidates, social conservatives, gun-control foes, fiscal hawks. In the House, Democrats picked up at least 29 seats, many of which are in traditionally red districts in states like Indiana and North Carolina that President Bush won handily in 2004. In the Senate, much the same is true, with new Democratic members from Montana, Missouri, and Virginia. Centrist Democrats, like the New Democrats and the Blue Dogs, will swell in numbers by up to around 20. Can the leadership deal with such a polyglot group and find a way to persuade them all to work together? "Pelosi is from a very liberal district and is a very liberal congressperson," says Democratic lobbyist Thomas Hale Boggs Jr. "But she is a very street-smart politician, and she is a pragmatist."

Despite their enthusiastic show of unity last week, some Democrats in the House are already squabbling. "Everyone recognizes why we're in the majority," says Matt Bennett, a Democratic strategist. "It's because of moderates." Not so fast, counters the left's Robert Borosage, head of the progressive Campaign for America's Future. The election results, he says, reflect "the increasing power of a populist anti-[Iraq]-war wing of the party." Indeed, the election of majority leader-a contest likely to pit John Murtha, the Pennsylvania Vietnam vet who called for troop redeployments, against current Minority Whip Steny

DOJ_NMG_0092680

Hoyer, who's more cautious on Iraq-is already exposing the deep tensions within the party. "It is a real division," says Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University, "but I don't think it is insurmountable."

Others aren't so sure. While there may be some wrangling about the direction of the party, many of those in line to become committee chairmen are liberal old warhorses. Among them: 51-year House veteran John Dingell is set to take over the Energy and Commerce Committee; 31-year member Henry Waxman will chair the House Government Reform Committee; 25-year veteran Barney Frank is set to take over the committee that oversees Wall Street policy. "The American people want Democrats to provide real accountability to the Bush administration, not political payback," Waxman tells U.S. News. "There is an enormous difference between the two, and we'll stick to accountability."

The Peril Of Opportunity (USNEWS)

By Gloria Borger

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

Now that it's the morning after, elated Democrats might take a moment to come to grips with the new reality: Their congressional takeover brings to Washington a wave of new members more like Bill Clinton than Howard Dean. They're largely more moderate than liberal, more fiscally conservative than old-fashioned big spenders. Some like the president's tax cuts. Others, like Sen.-elect Bob Casey of Pennsylvania, are antiabortion. Or pro-gun, like Virginia's newest senator, Jim Webb.

And one more reality check: This election wasn't really about the Democrats. It was about the other guys-and how they couldn't run Washington or manage the war. There was no Democratic agenda beyond their "Had Enough?" bumper sticker. Did it work? Yep. But did it produce a mandate? Nope-at least not beyond the marching orders to clean up Washington, fix Iraq, and get something done.

It's a huge opportunity for the Democrats. If they're smart, they'll find a way to grab it-and fast. Immigration reform and the minimum wage top the list. Then, of course, there's finding a way out of Iraq. That's what the voters want. What they do not want is a slew of subpoenas by Democratic committees, finger-pointing about intelligence failures, scapegoating, and more talk of filibusters. And now that Donald Rumsfeld is gone, how many more times can the president cry uncle? He lost; the Democrats won. Let the governing begin.

Those instructions apply to both parties: It's not going to be easy for an administration so used to cultivating its base to reach across the aisle. (Heck, Republicans in Congress say the White House never even reached out to them.) Nor will it be a cakewalk for Democrats to keep all those liberal committee chairmen from throwing darts at their favorite targets. But the public ordered cooperation, and those who refuse to listen do so at their own peril. Consider the numbers: More than a quarter of all voters called themselves independents, self-proclaimed refugees from both parties. And 47 percent said they are moderates—voting overwhelmingly Democratic. If Democrats turn left, they can forget about the White House.

The public will be watching their approach to Iraq. Voters don't want to relitigate the decision to go to war; most, in fact, were coconspirators. Nor are they interested in providing future Democratic presidential candidates with the proof that they were lied to about Iraq's weapons, so they can excuse their pro-war votes. Voters blamed the administration for mismanagement and incompetence, and that's what they want to end. And they want the war to end, too—but in the right way. If that doesn't happen, voters in 2008 could be looking for someone to take the fall. They'll ask: Whom do we blame? The people who got us into the war? Or the ones who got us out?

The first brawl? No doubt about it, Democrats now have some uncomfortable choices to make. Their base supporters want an immediate withdrawal from Iraq. Their newly enlarged moderate contingent is more open to finding some other way. Democrats papered over their differences during the campaign because being against Bush on Iraq was enough. That won't work now. But instead of seeking some kind of unified road map, House Democrats now seem intent on fighting among themselves. Consider the race for majority leader: Rep. John Murtha, who wants a near-immediate withdrawal from Iraq, is challenging colleague Steny Hoyer, who does not. "It's not a fight we should be having," confides a top House leadership aide. "Who wants the first brawl inside the Democratic caucus to be about the war?" Precisely.

Democrats have just months to reach consensus before they have to start voting on spending bills for the war. And if there's no plan, what will they do? Cut off funds for the troops? Hardly. The public wants to see Democrats working with Republicans to unravel the knot. That could well happen if the bipartisan Iraq Study Group comes up with a palatable exit strategy. At least that's what both sides are privately hoping.

It's all refreshing, for a change. After six years of base politics—in which each party appealed to its most partisan supporters—the middle is making a comeback. That's good news for 2008; expect the presidential wannabes to start preaching bipartisanship. After all, the public is already there. It just took some time for the political leaders to catch on to the voters' orders on governing: Just do it.

DOJ_NMG_0092681

"We Have To Start From A Level Of Trust" (TIME)

By Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, November 13, 2006

TIME What will it mean to be the first woman Speaker of the House?

PELOSI It is a sensational feeling. Women walk up to me on the street. Every place I go, they are so thrilled. It is a source of inspiration for a lot of people. What it means is, I have to uphold the highest ethical standards and to have the most open and bipartisan Congress, to do so in a way that makes women proud and makes sure that pretty soon we'll have another woman Speaker of the House.

TIME Can Democrats trust President George W. Bush enough to work with him?

PELOSI I think we have to start from a level of trust. On some issues where there is consensus, we can cooperate and build bridges of trust.

TIME Oblivious, in denial, incompetent, dangerous. Do you regret using any of these words to describe the President?

PELOSI No.

TIME Should at least 30,000 troops be home from Iraq by this time next year?

PELOSI Yes. I would hope at least that number would be out of harm's way. They are viewed as an occupation force. Our presence there is a magnet for terrorists.

TIME If President Bush had fired Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld two months ago, would you be in the position you are now?

PELOSI Yes. Donald Rumsfeld is an employee. The President of the United States makes the policy, and the more he campaigned, the better we did.

TIME If Bush vetoes one or two of the bills you pass in the House, will that be a sign that he's not prepared to work with you?

PELOSI No, it's just a sign he disagrees with us.

TIME Will Americans see their taxes raised by Democrats?

PELOSI Middle-income families in America will see their taxes reduced.

TIME Is it correct that you might have hearings about how Hurricane Katrina was handled, but looking forward?

PELOSI Yes, exactly. The point is, What are the lessons learned from Katrina? Katrina still lingers. The challenge is still there for us. We have to address the issue of natural disasters in a way that doesn't say that your survival depends on your economic well-being.

TIME Will your performance as Speaker have implications for Hillary Clinton if she runs for President?

PELOSI I'm not sure you would have asked a man that about another man. But since this is unusual, I will respect your question. I think it's really important for the people of our country to see that women can wield power and success in this rarefied and high altitude of power. I don't think Hillary Clinton, though, needs any validation from any other woman. She is an experienced Senator, articulate and a force in her own right.

Lieberman A Wild Card In Iraq Policy (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Voters seemed to be speaking loudly and clearly about Iraq last week when they elected war critics such as Bernard Sanders of Vermont, Sherrod Brown of Ohio and James Webb of Virginia to the Senate.

Yet they also gave a fourth term to Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, a staunch supporter of the war, and in the narrowly divided Senate that will convene in January, the veteran Connecticut Democrat is positioning himself to become a key figure in discussions about U.S. policy in Iraq.

Yesterday, Lieberman -- who won as an independent last week -- spelled out his vision for a congressional working group of Democratic committee chairmen and senior Republicans to monitor the course of the war and work with President Bush to bring it to a successful end.

"We're not going to fix this and succeed in Iraq without working across party lines," he said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

As Congress returns this week to Washington for a post-election session -- the final stint with Republicans in charge -- Lieberman is already asserting his status as a self-described political freelancer, beholden to neither party.

He has pledged to "sign up" with the Democrats for the 110th Congress but has made it clear that his motives are at least partly practical. By organizing with the party, even though he lost the Democratic primary to Ned Lamont, Lieberman will retain his 18 years of Senate seniority and rise to the chairmanship of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0092682

Both sides are seeking to please this political wild card.

Republicans and the White House are indebted to Lieberman for supporting the unpopular war throughout his tough election campaign. They view him as a valuable bridge to their Democratic adversaries on national security issues.

Many Democrats remain angry with their former vice presidential nominee for not bowing out after his primary loss to the more liberal Lamont. Still, they recognize that he is crucial to their one-seat Senate majority.

Pro-war in an antiwar state, Lieberman is one of the few prominent war defenders to survive a tough challenge on Nov. 7, and with his victory comes a measure of validation.

Speaking in Hartford last Wednesday, Lieberman remained unwavering in his opposition to Democrats' calls for withdrawing troops from Iraq. "What we are doing now there is not working, but that doesn't mean in any sense that it is time for us to retreat," he said. "This is a test in a very difficult and dangerous hour in our history."

But his victory also was something of an aberration, and whatever the fate of Lieberman's proposed bipartisan group, which he pledges to introduce in January, his continued support of Bush's stay-the-course approach places him well outside the Democratic mainstream.

"The voters spoke on Tuesday that they're unhappy with the status quo," Lieberman said. However, he added, "I don't believe they want us to pick up and leave."

Yet Senate Democratic leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) and other Democrats called yesterday for the Bush administration to begin withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq in the next few months.

The new Congress, said Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), in line to chair the Armed Services Committee, "is willing to implement the people's will and to put some pressure on this president to change course in Iraq, forget the stay-the-course policy that is no longer viable." Levin said on ABC's "This Week" that redeployment should begin within four to six months.

The Senate will include nine new members who are Democrats or who will organize with the party, and most of them either opposed the war or demanded a radical change of course.

Webb, a former Marine whose son is serving in Iraq, advanced a detailed plan to wind down U.S. involvement in the war by moving troops to other points in the region, such as Jordan and Kuwait, while beginning multilateral diplomatic talks. Jon Tester of Montana called for "a clear plan to give the Iraqi military control of their own country and bring our troops home."

Brown and Sanders, who opposed the war as members of the House, are seeking troop withdrawals. Claire McCaskill of Missouri was less vociferous in her opposition to the war but laid out a two-year timeline "to transition to a multinational security force and redeploy our troops."

Democratic leaders have promised a raft of initiatives as they take control of Congress, from a minimum-wage increase to alternative-energy incentives. But a major goal is to force Bush to reconsider his war strategy and his refusal to set a timetable for troop withdrawal. The current Republican leadership rarely challenged Bush in public, holding few of the hearings and floor debates that are mainstays of the legislative branch when it comes to major national events.

The ground could start shifting as early as next month. The independent Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a Republican, and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), is expected to make a series of recommendations on the future course of the war.

Although some observers conjecture that the election results may have damaged the group's likelihood of reaching recommendations both parties can support, its report could become a catalyst for a free-flowing dialogue on the war.

"Democrats will say this is a bipartisan effort," said James B. Steinberg, a Democratic national security expert and former Clinton administration official. If the recommendations prove reasonable, he noted, "it's going to be hard to say no."

In the Senate, Levin and Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) are certain to be major players in the war debate, along with the new Foreign Relations Committee chairman, Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), a likely presidential candidate in 2008. Lieberman, according to Steinberg, is unlikely to be invited into the huddle.

"They're not going to turn the policy over to the guy who's the closest to the administration," he said.

Relations within the party are a bit touchy. Some Democrats hope that Lieberman's collaborative spirit does not translate into going too lightly on the administration by failing to scrutinize spending and policy priorities that fall under the homeland security panel's jurisdiction. Reid, who is expected to become Senate majority leader, spoke to Lieberman after his reelection and is urging his colleagues to forgive and forget.

"The only way we're going to be successful is to stay together," Reid said.

One scenario is that Lieberman could emerge as an interparty broker on Iraq along with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the presumptive front-runner for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0092683

"There's the potential there for some interesting coalitions," said Jennifer Duffy, who monitors the Senate for the independent Cook Political Report.

Bush Must Call For Reinforcements In Iraq (FT)

By Robert Kagan, William Kristol

Financial Times, November 13, 2006

President George W. Bush has just over two years left in office. The central question facing him is: what kind of Iraq will he bequeath to his successor? Will it be a metastasising mess dumped on the doorstep of the next president, or an Iraq on the path to stability and success? The answer will determine how this president should be remembered by future generations.

There are, of course, other grave issues that will consume the Bush administration over the next two years: the continuing need to defend Americans from terrorist threats; Iran's efforts to acquire nuclear weapons; containment and weakening of a nuclear-armed North Korea; an increasingly belligerent Russia; and manifold challenges presented by a rising China. But the fact remains that Mr Bush (correctly, in our view) took the nation to war to remove Saddam Hussein, and the success or failure of that war will be central to his legacy.

The trajectory is downward towards failure. Indeed, this has been the case for more than three years, ever since Pentagon officials decided to put far too few troops in Iraq to bring stability after Hussein's ousting. The result has been not only a consistently inadequate level of forces. The endless cycle of promised draw-downs, deteriorating security and cancellation of the proposed draw-downs has been politically disastrous in both Iraq and the US.

In Iraq, US policies have steadily undermined public confidence that America has either the will or capacity to provide the security Iraqis need. So they have turned to their own sectarian armed groups for protection. That, and not historical inevitability or the alleged failings of the Iraqi people, has brought Iraq closer to civil war.

These policies have been equally damaging in the US. The American people have rightly judged that the administration is floundering in Iraq and, worse, is not committed to doing what is necessary to succeed. This perception undoubtedly played a large part in last week's mid-term election. Now, many Americans are looking to the Iraq Study Group, the commission headed by James Baker and Lee Hamilton, for a face-saving, bipartisan way to withdraw from Iraq as quickly as possible. The great irony is that with nothing new to offer, the Baker commission's forthcoming report – if it takes the shape most observers predict – will probably suffer the same fate as similar past efforts.

There is a popular theory that the prospect of US withdrawal will force Iraqis to reach an accommodation with one another. This would be more plausible had it not been disproved by three years of painful experience. Instead of looking for a face-saving way to lose in Iraq, President Bush could finally demand of his top advisers a strategy to succeed: provide the US force levels necessary to achieve even minimal political objectives. This could begin by increasing US troops in Iraq by at least 50,000 in order to clear and hold Baghdad without shifting troops from other parts of Iraq. These operations could then be expanded into areas of insurgency. This strategy would not stabilise the country right away but could secure Iraq's vital centre and provide real hope for progress.

Those who claim that 50,000 more troops do not exist to send to Iraq are wrong. But it is true that US ground forces are stretched, and that steps are needed to increase their overall size.

If the president undertook to send the necessary troops, we have no doubt many likely recommendations from the Baker commission would make sense and could be supported. We share the commission's belief that the administration should actively seek bipartisan support for its approach to Iraq. Democratic hopefuls for the 2008 presidential elections should welcome any effort to ensure they are not left to deal with a collapsing country. There is much easy talk of how a victory strategy in Iraq has been rendered impossible by Tuesday's elections. This is nonsense. First, victory in Iraq is a national priority, and to abandon it because of a loss of House and Senate seats would be irresponsible. The Republican loss was largely due to lack of confidence that Mr Bush had a victory strategy for Iraq, not a belief that he was not exiting fast enough. If the president makes clear he has such a strategy, he will have the support to do what is necessary.

As for the Baker commission's likely recommendation that the US should engage Syria and Iran in the search for solutions in Iraq, we are sceptical these countries want to help. But it is one thing to seek their help while the US is losing and its negotiating position is weakest, and quite another to engage in such diplomacy while increasing US force levels to try to improve the security situation.

Finally, as others have noted, if the Iraqis choose to organise their country in a less "unified" and more "federated" way, that is fine – as long as it is peaceful and stable. A peaceful, federated Iraq will, however, require no less of a commitment of US troops to provide security than a unitary one.

DOJ_NMG_0092684

The president has two years to turn things around and leave a viable Iraq to the next president. It should be obvious that "staying the course" is a recipe for failure. So are politically driven exit strategies. The president is left with the choice: quit, or do what is necessary to succeed. We trust he understands that the task before him in Iraq is to find a strategy for success.

Robert Kagan is author of "Dangerous Nation" (Alfred A. Knopf) and a contributing editor at The Weekly Standard. William Kristol is editor of The Weekly Standard. This article is based on a longer essay in this week's Standard.

Iraq Is Gone. Now What? (WP)

By Monica Duffy Toft

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Some 3 1/2 years after the U.S. invasion, most scholars and policy analysts accept that Iraq is now in a civil war. But many policymakers have not been willing to face up to the consequences. The key question is how Iraq will be stabilized.

It is an important question, because the stability and prosperity of a post-civil-war state depends in large measure on how the war ends. The fighting can stop in a variety of ways -- by military victory or negotiated settlement. Historically speaking, military victories have been the most common and have most often led to lasting resolutions. So while a negotiated settlement may seem the most desirable end point, this resolution is frequently short-lived even with third-party support.

A negotiated settlement is what the United States has attempted to implement for the past two years in Iraq, and it is failing.

The process of writing and adopting a constitution and electing a president and parliament were all designed to give each of Iraq's communities a say in the government. Although the Kurds and the Shiites participated fully in the process, the Sunnis did not. Consequently, the Sunnis do not see the government as representing, much less protecting, their interests. Although the Kurds participated in the formation of the government, they have maintained their distance while strengthening their own militia.

The trend lines in Iraq are toward a continuation of this fragmentation. So the argument in favor of a sustained U.S. presence to help enforce a peace settlement ignores both the situation there and past precedent.

Military victories, by contrast, historically result in the most stable outcomes. The reason is that typically a strong faction with a robust military is preserved. In these instances, problems with democratization, governance and political institutions certainly remain, but the state that survives retains its monopoly on the legitimate use of force and is able to leverage that legitimacy to stabilize and institute peace. Only after peace is achieved can issues of democracy, development and justice be dealt with.

Although the United States seemed to have forgotten the centrality of a state's monopoly on the legitimate use of force when it summarily disbanded Iraqi security forces, it subsequently relearned this lesson. The United States and its Iraqi partners are desperately trying to rebuild Iraq's security forces in order to have more effective policing. The problem is that it is already too late for "Iraqi" security forces to reestablish stability. The Iraqi government's forces are increasingly identified as "Shiite" forces. As it stands, schisms will continue to grow, neighbor will attack neighbor, quasi-states with their own militias will solidify and the challenges of stabilizing an Iraqi state will escalate by an order of magnitude.

What does all this mean for Iraq's end state? First, it means the end of the state of Iraq as we have known it. Iraq is rapidly disintegrating, and there is no longer anything that can stop the disintegration, save perhaps an invasion by Israel, Iran or Syria. Second, having missed a number of critical opportunities from the beginning of its campaign to topple Saddam Hussein and establish democratic government in Iraq (the latter proposition dubious at best), the United States is now faced with an awful choice: leave and allow events to run their course or lend its dwindling support to one or more of the emerging states.

If it leaves, the Shiites will brutally settle accounts with the Sunnis before, perhaps, opening hostilities against the Kurds (with tacit support from Iran and Turkey).

If it supports the Kurds and Shiites -- the two peoples most abused under Hussein, most betrayed by the United States since 1990 and, as a result, the two most worthy of our support on moral grounds -- it risks alienating important regional allies: Turkey, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Pakistan. On the other hand, doing the right thing (supporting the Shiites) also means doing the most practical thing, which is ensuring a stable peace and establishing long-term prospects for democracy and economic development. As a bonus, it is possible that U.S. support of the Shiite majority might pay diplomatic dividends as regards Iran's impending nuclearization.

If the United States supports the Sunnis, it will be in a position very close to its Vietnam experience: struggling to underwrite the survival of a militarily untenable, corrupt and formerly brutal minority regime with no hope of gaining broader legitimacy in the territory of the former Iraq.

Moreover, even if successful, supporting the Sunnis -- in effect the incumbents in what was until recently a brutal dictatorship -- will result in a much greater likelihood of future war and regional instability (not to mention authoritarianism), even with a formidable U.S. military presence (and the less-than-formidable U.S. presence has already become politically untenable in the United States).

DOJ_NMG_0092685

It is high time the United States and its allies began national discussions about the relative merits of leaving or staying and, if they stay, about the merits of supporting the Sunnis, Shiites or Kurds. Either way, what we now think of as Iraq is almost certainly as gone as what we once thought of as Yugoslavia, and for the same reasons.

The writer is an associate professor of public policy at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government. She is the author of "The Geography of Ethnic Violence" and is finishing a book on the termination of civil wars.

Oh, The Humanities! (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Wednesday, on the hung-over morning after midterm voters told President Bush what they thought of the Iraq war, a White House news release arrived in our inbox, with the cryptic subject line "PERSONNEL ANNOUNCEMENT."

Hidden therein was a list of this year's National Medal of Arts and National Humanities Medal winners, to be honored the next day by the president and first lady Laura Bush in the Oval Office. No invite, no number to call for information, just a list.

Why so little fanfare? Could it have been because the humanities honorees included Middle East scholars-turned-Bush advisers Fouad Ajami and Bernard Lewis, whose views helped get us into Iraq in the first place?

On the day of the prestigious ceremony, the White House Web site featured -- nothing.

Iraqi Prime Minister Promises Government Shake-Up (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 12 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said Sunday that he was planning a major shake-up of his cabinet, apparently to redress his six-month-old government's failure to curb widespread corruption, reduce sectarian violence and improve public services.

Speaking to a closed session of Parliament, Mr. Maliki suggested that some of his ministers were incompetent but said he had been forced to accept his cabinet under pressure from the country's major political blocs, according to several legislators. The prime minister asked for more independence in choosing new cabinet members.

The parliamentary session came on a day when at least 100 people were found dead or reported killed in mayhem throughout the country. In one attack, a pair of suicide bombers detonated themselves outside a police recruitment center in Baghdad, killing at least 35 potential recruits and wounding at least 56, the police said. Military officials reported that four British soldiers and three American soldiers died in attacks in Anbar and Basra provinces.

During the parliamentary session, Mr. Maliki did not disclose which ministers he planned to replace. But legislators close to the prime minister said he did not intend to change the political distribution of the cabinet seats. Mr. Maliki's cabinet is mostly Shiite, but includes representatives of Iraq's main ethnic and sectarian communities.

The proposed shake-up, coming as the Bush administration has begun a major reassessment of U.S. policy in Iraq, appeared to be an effort both to curry American favor and to placate Mr. Maliki's domestic detractors, including Sunni Arab leaders demanding a greater role in government and more action against Shiite militias accused of spawning death squads.

The Maliki administration has been facing mounting criticism from American officials and some Iraqi leaders impatient with the prime minister's inability — or unwillingness — to disarm militias, particularly those linked to the most powerful Shiite parties that form the basis of his ruling political alliance. Mr. Maliki has been so concerned about growing American disenchantment that last month he sought, and received, assurances from President Bush that the United States was not plotting to unseat him.

Several months ago, Mr. Maliki expressed his intention to replace several of his 36 ministers, but Sunday's announcement suggested far more sweeping changes that, according to some legislators, could involve more than half of the cabinet.

Mr. Maliki was nominated as prime minister on April 21 and his full cabinet was ratified by Parliament on May 20. But he told legislators on Sunday that he was essentially sidelined by the major political blocs during the ministerial selection process. In some cases, he said, a minister's name was presented to him only minutes before the nomination was made public.

Hassan al-Sined, a Shiite legislator and an adviser to Mr. Maliki, heralded Sunday's announcement as a "courageous move" because it represented an admission that the government's performance had been weak.

But others questioned the prime minister's sincerity and wondered whether Mr. Maliki was not simply trying to blame the political blocs for his lackluster progress.

"Now that he has not succeeded, he doesn't want to shoulder all the responsibility," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish legislator.

DOJ_NMG_0092686

According to a statement issued by his office, Mr. Maliki called on the legislators to unify behind his national reconciliation plan, a strategy he unveiled in June to reduce violence through amnesty and dialogue. He also asked them to suspend their criticism of the government and to declare their loyalty to a unified Iraq above religious and sectarian allegiances.

After the parliamentary session, Salman al-Jumaili, a Sunni Arab legislator, said: "Let me tell you, all this talk means nothing for us unless we see some decisions and practical moves taken on the ground. We hope that there will be a chance for reform before things get worse."

The attack outside the police recruitment center, in western Baghdad, came Sunday morning as scores of men were waiting to pass through checkpoints that led inside the building. The two bombers waded into the crowd and detonated their hidden explosive belts, spraying metal balls and shrapnel.

Recruiting centers have been an occasional target for insurgents trying to interfere with the government's efforts to build the Iraqi security forces. The chief spokesman for the Ministry of Interior, which oversees the police forces, said that in spite of measures adopted to safeguard recruits as they arrive at the centers, bottlenecks inevitably formed at the entrances. "There's no way to protect against such accidents," said the spokesman, Abdel Karim Khalaf.

A spokesman for Britain's Ministry of Defense said in London that the four British soldiers were killed and three wounded when their patrol boat was bombed Sunday on the Shatt al Arab waterway in the southern city of Basra. Military officials said it was unclear where the bomb had been hidden or how it was detonated.

At least 125 British troops have been killed in Iraq since the American-led invasion in 2003, officials said. Prime Minister Tony Blair has been under considerable public pressure in Britain to draw down British troops in Iraq. The American military command announced Sunday that three American soldiers were killed Saturday in an insurgent attack in Anbar Province, bringing the tally of American troops killed so far this month to 27.

In addition to those killed at the recruitment center, at least 25 people were killed on Sunday and 65 wounded in more than a dozen other attacks reported by the authorities in Baghdad and Baquba. In addition, at least 33 bodies, all showing signs of torture and with gunshots to the head, were found in Baghdad and in Diyala Province, the ministry official said.

One of the bombs exploded near the house of Sheik Abu Ali, who works for the Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the most revered Shiite cleric in Iraq, a police official said. Three of the sheik's children were killed in the blast, the official said.

Iraq Prime Minister Plans Big Reshuffle (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, November 13, 2006

Nouri al-Maliki, Iraq's prime minister, told parliamentarians on Sunday that he was planning a "comprehensive" reshuffle of ministers in his national unity government, and scolded lawmakers for failing to show their loyalty to a united Iraq.

The declaration is part of an apparent push to revive an initiative to bring the country's quarrelling sectarian blocs into a national pact, after the government was accused by both Sunni and Shia of failing to protect them.

"The prime minister has called for a comprehensive cabinet reshuffle appropriate for the current situation in the country," said a statement from the prime minister's office issued after the parliamentary session.

The statement came as violence continued to rage in and around Baghdad, with a suicide bombing outside a police recruiting centre in the capital yesterday killing at least 33 people.

Meanwhile, police were searching south of the capital for gunmen who killed 10 Shia travellers and kidnapped about 50 others late on Saturday.

A leading Shia politician warned that local tribes were heading to the area to join the search – a development that could herald a fresh round of violence.

Speaking before parliament, Abd al-Karim al-Anzi said the kidnappers had worn Iraqi army uniforms and complained that security forces were not doing enough to rescue the hostages.

The incident illustrates how each round of violence diminishes the public's already shaky confidence in the state.

This lack of confidence has led to a reluctance on the part of the country's different factions to compromise over control of security agencies deemed essential to their community's survival and explains the rise of local militias.

Yassin Majid, prime ministerial press adviser, said that the reshuffle could include between seven and nine ministers, but did not say what those ministries would be.

Iraqi parliamentarians have been forecasting a reshuffle for months, but this is the clearest indication from the government so far that a change in the government is imminent.

Criticisms have focused on the vital interior and defence ministries, which control the security forces. The interior ministry is held by independent Shia politician Jawad al-Bolani, who has attempted to purge officers connected with Shia militias and recently referred some others accused of torture to trial.

DOJ_NMG_0092687

But according to many Sunni, the government has not moved quickly enough to fulfil its pledge to create a non-sectarian police force.

The defence portfolio is held by Abd al-Qader al-Ubaidi, an independent Sunni Arab.

In choosing new ministers, Mr Maliki will face the challenge of winning approval from parties that have seen little interest in reaching compromises, and instead appear to have sought control over government agencies to give them an edge in the country's sectarian conflict.

In the closed session, Mr Maliki told the attendant lawmakers: "You all have militias. I will not accept a government made up of militiamen," according to a parliamentarian quoted by the Associated Press.

Under pressure from the US, Mr Maliki is trying to reach consensus among Iraqi politicians on a range of divisive issues including control of the country's oil resources, disarming militias and insurgents and the scheduling of provincial elections.

Blasts Kill Dozens Of Iraqi Police Recruits (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 12 -- Two suicide bombers detonated explosives Sunday as a crowd of men gathered in front of a police recruiting center in central Baghdad, killing at least 35 people and wounding 56 in one of the deadliest suicide attacks in Iraq this year.

The blasts, coming hours before Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced plans for a major cabinet shake-up, delivered the latest blow to U.S. and Iraqi efforts to strengthen the country's fledgling security forces. Such efforts are a key element of the U.S. strategy to draw down troop strength and contain the sectarian violence that is pushing the country toward civil war.

At Baghdad's Yarmouk Hospital, young men with bandaged limbs lay in small beds, writhing in pain. Some said they had come from as far away as the southern city of Basra to join the police force because they were unemployed and needed to feed their families.

"We were all sitting down waiting for instructions from the loudspeaker. Suddenly, there was a huge amount of fire and dust," said Ali Mutashir, 35, limping slowly across the cream-colored floor, his tan shirt splattered with dried blood. "We fled toward a side street. Then came another blast of fire. It threw me against a wall."

The bombers detonated explosives belts almost simultaneously around 9:30 a.m., Interior Ministry officials said. Some witnesses said two mortar shells fell minutes after the bombings, as they were fleeing the scene.

The officials said they expected the death toll to rise because many of the wounded were in critical condition. As of late Sunday, there were differing accounts of the toll, with one Interior Ministry official saying that as many as 42 people had been killed.

The attack comes as the Bush administration and the Iraqi government prepare for a shift in U.S. policy in Iraq in the wake of the Democratic takeover of both houses of Congress in elections last week. U.S. military commanders and the Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, a former congressman, plan to recommend alternative ways of dealing with Iraq as pressure mounts to withdraw U.S. troops.

Faced with his own pressures, Maliki called for a sweeping reorganization of his cabinet in a closed session with Iraqi lawmakers Sunday, echoing a similar statement he made earlier this month. His office said in a statement that Maliki had "called for a complete ministerial reshuffle in accordance with the current situation," but it provided no details of the shake-up, which had been rumored for weeks.

Maliki's six-month-old government is under pressure from the United States, its main patron, to stop sectarian strife, disarm militias that have infiltrated government ministries and root out widespread graft by government officials. The prime minister also faces growing criticism from Iraqis frustrated with the government's failure to provide basic services, employment and security.

Maliki's efforts have so far been ineffective, as he struggles to balance the needs of his diverse political allies inside the government -- some of whom operate the militias he is trying to disband -- against the demands of a politically weakened Bush administration.

On Sunday, Maliki had in effect acknowledged that his government was weak, said Hasan Suneid, a lawmaker and close aide of the prime minister's. Maliki told lawmakers in the closed session that he had been forced to accept ministers chosen by political blocs and that some were incompetent, said Suneid, who attended the meeting. Maliki asked the blocs to nominate new people for his cabinet, based more on their qualifications than on their political loyalties.

"From the first day, Maliki knew that his cabinet is not in a shape that can face all the challenges of the country," Suneid said. "But now he's seeing he cannot keep silent about some ministries. A new cabinet needs to rise. . . . Personally, I am expecting a reshuffling of more than half the cabinet."

DOJ_NMG_0092688

Sunday's bombing was the bloodiest assault on a police recruitment center since January, when a suicide bomber killed 70 police recruits in the western city of Ramadi. Sunni Arab insurgents frequently target police, to deter recruitment and also because national police are widely believed to be infiltrated by Shiite militias keen on protecting the interests of their sect.

Less than a half-hour after the suicide attacks, two bombs targeting a national police patrol exploded on a main artery in central Baghdad, killing three policemen and wounding five others. The blasts also killed two civilians and wounded seven, said Col. Kareem Hamza, an Interior Ministry official. On Saturday, policemen were attacked in the cities of Baqubah and Kirkuk.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the recruits killed or injured Sunday would "receive all the salaries and rights of any other employee at the Ministry of Interior."

In other violence, the U.S. military announced the combat-related deaths of three U.S. soldiers in Anbar province, bringing to 27 the number of American troops killed this month.

At least 50 bodies were found behind a regional electrical company in Baqubah and 25 others in Baghdad, the Associated Press reported.

A car bomb killed one civilian and wounded four in the central Karrada district of the capital, and a roadside bomb wounded four in the Radwaniyah district of southwestern Baghdad, Khalaf said.

At Yarmouk Hospital, Mutashir, the wounded recruit, said three of his relatives, also police recruits, had been killed in the bombing. One was burned so badly that his corpse could be identified only by a scar on his leg.

Two of his cousins were seriously wounded, including Ali Jumat, 23, who was lying in a bed. His body was peppered with pink shrapnel splotches. His hair was singed brown from the explosion's flames. His eyes were deep red.

When asked why he wanted to become a policeman, Jumat appeared to be in even more pain. "I am the only supporter of my family," he replied, before closing his eyes.

Iraqi Leader Scolds Parliament, Promises Change (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki scolded lawmakers at a closed Parliament session Sunday for putting sectarian concerns over national interests, and promised sweeping Cabinet changes, following complaints that his unity government has been ineffective at containing violence that killed nearly 100 people in 24 hours.

He later told journalist he has authorized the use of "extreme force" against private militias blamed for surging bloodshed between Iraq's dominant Muslim sects that has claimed more lives lately than the anti-U.S. insurgency.

"There cannot be a government and militias together. One of the two should rule," al-Maliki said in a session Sunday with Iraqi newspaper editors that was broadcast on national television. "I personally will not be in a government based on militias."

It was unusually tough language for a leader widely criticized for not standing up to key members of his governing Shiite coalition, some of whom are backed by militias blamed for killing sprees against the Sunni Arab minority.

The bodies of at least 33 victims of sectarian killings, many of them cuffed and tortured, were found in parts of Baghdad and Baqubah in the 24 hours ending Sunday night, officials said.

At least 65 other people were killed in bombings, drive-by shootings and other attacks Sunday, including 38 who died in twin suicide bombings at a police recruitment center in Baghdad .

Frustration has been mounting on all sides at the unrelenting toll. Sunni political leaders in recent weeks have threatened to walk out of the government, undermining a multi-ethnic coalition that U.S. officials had hoped would blunt the violence. .

Shiites in Diwaniya, a strife-torn region south of Baghdad, threatened to take up arms Sunday and hunt down the kidnappers of at least 11 fellow tribesmen if the government failed to find them, provincial leaders said.

There also has been intense pressure from U.S. officials who want al-Maliki to commit to timelines to make the tough political and security decisions needed to contain the bloodshed.

Al-Maliki demanded in the closed session that lawmakers set aside personal interests and partisan loyalties for the sake of national stability, according to his office.

Al-Maliki's aides had previously indicated he planned to replace a few members of his Cabinet, but Sunday's statement suggested the changes would be broader.

Al-Maliki asked for a free hand in shaping the new government, complaining he had no say over current members, who were selected by the main political blocs after months of wrangling.

"He even said he was only given some of the names five minutes before he announced them," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish legislator.

Othman did not expect the balance among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds to change in a new government, but he said al-Maliki wanted to select names himself within those blocs.

DOJ_NMG_0092689

There was no word on when the new Cabinet would be announced.

Sunni lawmakers welcomed al-Maliki's tougher stance against militias but questioned whether he would be as effective against Shiite militias as Sunni groups.

"There will be selectivity in dealing with the sides that are carrying guns for and against the government," Sunni legislator Salim Abdalla predicted.

Underscoring the gravity of the violence, two suicide bombers joined a crowd waiting outside a Baghdad police recruitment center and detonated the charges strapped to their waists, said Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Khalaf.

He said the coordinated attack had "the fingerprints" of al- Qaida in Iraq, the country's most feared terrorist group.

The near-simultaneous blasts killed 38 people and injured more than 50, according to officials at the nearby Yarmouk Hospital.

Salah Hasnawi, a 21-year-old Shiite, was among those waiting to clear security to enter the center when the attack happened.

"I was thrown to the ground," he said from a bed in Yarmouk Hospital, where he was being treated for shrapnel wounds to both legs. "I tried to run, fearing other explosions, but my legs wouldn't carry me."

He was saved, he said, by two Sunni men who survived the first blast unscathed only to be wounded by the second.

"We tried to carry him to the hospital, then we felt the second explosion," said one of the two, 23-year-old Mousa Zoubayi.

Zoubayi's face was burned and shrapnel sliced into his back, arm and one eye. He said he did not think Hasnawi's other rescuer survived the second blast.

South of the capital, in Najaf, a bomb planted in a pile of sand in front of the home of Sheikh Abbas Alsarraj killed two of the Shiite cleric's sons and injured a third, police said.

Iraqi Leader, Feeling Pressure, Promises To Remake Cabinet (USAT)

USA Today, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's prime minister, a Shiite Muslim, promised Sunday to reshuffle his Cabinet after he accused lawmakers of disloyalty and blamed Sunni Muslims for sectarian violence that claimed at least 159 more lives.

Also Sunday, the country's defense minister challenged Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's contention that the U.S. military should pull back and let the Iraqi army take control of security all across the country. Defense Minister Abdul-Qadir al-Obaidi said his men are still too poorly equipped and trained to do the job.

“We are working hard to create a real army, and we ask our government not to try to move too quickly because of the political pressure it feels,” al-Obaidi said. “Our technical needs are real, and that is very important if we are to be a real force against insecurity.”

Al-Maliki has called for U.S. troops in Iraq to be confined to bases and to be called on only in emergencies. He predicted that the Iraqi army could crush violence within six months. Last month, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey said that it would take 12 to 18 months before Iraq's army was ready to take over — and that the Iraqis would still need some U.S. backup.

The prime minister promised a Cabinet shakeup during a closed session of the parliament Sunday, his office said in a statement.

“The government's performance has been unconvincing,” said Khaled al-Attiya, the Shiite deputy parliament speaker who chaired the closed session. “That's why the prime minister wishes to change the Cabinet.”

Al-Maliki is under pressure from both Washington and his fellow Iraqis to curb violence. The United States is leaning on him to disband Shiite militias believed responsible for many of the killings. His government, however, relies heavily on the support of parties tied to militias, such as that of Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

In the latest violence, two suicide bombers blew themselves up simultaneously Sunday outside a police station in western Baghdad, police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razaq said. The attack killed 35 police recruits. It was one of several bombings in the capital.

In Baqouba, the Iraqi army's provincial public affairs office said troops found 50 bodies dumped behind the offices of the provincial electric company. Nineteen of the bodies were taken to a morgue. The army was waiting for U.S. bomb-disposal teams to arrive before moving the other 31, for fear that they were booby-trapped.

Abdul-Razaq said Baghdad police had found 25 bullet-riddled, handcuffed bodies in several parts of the capital. Dozens more bodies were found around the country.

After nearly 48 hours without reporting a death, the U.S. military said three soldiers assigned to the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division died Saturday of combat wounds in Anbar province, the insurgent stronghold west of the capital.

Four British servicemen died in an attack on a patrol boat in Basra's Shatt al-Arab waterway, the Defense Ministry said in London.

DOJ_NMG_0092690

Iraqi Prime Minister Pledges To Reform Cabinet (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — Prime Minister Nouri Maliki scolded lawmakers Sunday for putting sectarian concerns over national interests and promised sweeping Cabinet changes after complaints that his unity government has been ineffective at containing violence.

Maliki later told journalists that he had authorized the use of "extreme force" against private militias blamed for the growing bloodshed between Iraq's dominant Muslim sects, including the deaths of nearly 100 people in 24 hours.

"There cannot be a government and militias together. One of the two should rule," Maliki said in a session Sunday with Iraqi newspaper editors broadcast on national television. "I personally will not be in a government based on militias."

It was unusually tough language for a leader widely criticized as failing to stand up to key members of his governing Shiite coalition, some of whom are backed by militias blamed for nightly killing rampages against the Sunni Arab minority.

The bodies of at least 33 victims of sectarian killings, many handcuffed and tortured, were found in Baghdad and Baqubah in the 24 hours ending Sunday night, officials said.

At least 66 other people were killed in bombings, drive-by shootings and other attacks Sunday, including 38 who died in twin suicide bombings at a police recruitment center in Baghdad.

Three U.S. soldiers assigned to the Army's 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division died Saturday of wounds sustained in combat in Al Anbar province, the military said Sunday.

Frustration has been mounting on all sides over the unrelenting toll. Sunni political leaders in recent weeks have threatened to walk out of the government, undermining a multiethnic coalition that U.S. officials had hoped would blunt the violence.

Shiites in Diwaniya, south of Baghdad, threatened to take up arms Sunday and hunt down the kidnappers of at least 11 fellow tribesmen if the government failed to find them, provincial leaders said.

There also has been intense pressure from U.S. officials, who want Maliki to commit to timelines to make the tough political and security decisions needed to contain the bloodshed.

Maliki demanded in a closed session of parliament that lawmakers set aside personal interests and partisan loyalties for the sake of national stability, according to his office.

The prime minister's aides had previously indicated that he planned to replace a few members of his Cabinet, but Sunday's statement suggested the changes would be broader.

Maliki asked for a free hand in shaping the new government, complaining he had no say over current members, who were selected by the main political blocs after months of wrangling.

"He even said he was only given some of the names five minutes before he announced them," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish legislator.

Othman did not expect the balance among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds to change in a new government, but he said Maliki wanted to select the names within those blocs.

There was no word on when the new Cabinet would be announced.

Sunni lawmakers welcomed Maliki's tougher stance against militias but questioned whether he would be as effective against Shiite militias as Sunni groups.

"There will be selectivity in dealing with the sides that are carrying guns for and against the government," predicted Sunni legislator Salim Abdalla.

Underscoring the gravity of the violence, two suicide bombers joined a crowd waiting outside a Baghdad police recruitment center and detonated charges strapped to their waists, said Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Khalaf.

He said the coordinated attack had "the fingerprints" of Al Qaeda in Iraq, the country's most feared terrorist group.

The near-simultaneous blasts killed 38 people and injured more than 50, according to officials at nearby Yarmouk Hospital.

Salah Hasnawi, a 21-year-old Shiite, was among those waiting to clear security to enter the center when the attack occurred.

"I was thrown to the ground," he said from a bed at the hospital, where he was being treated for shrapnel wounds to both legs. "I tried to run, fearing other explosions, but my legs wouldn't carry me."

He was saved, he said, by two Sunni men who survived the first blast unscathed, only to be wounded by the second.

"We tried to carry him to the hospital, then we felt the second explosion," said one of the two, Mousa Zoubayi, 23. "I saw body parts scattered here and there, even in the trees and rooftops of houses that have been abandoned by their owners because of the danger in this area."

DOJ_NMG_0092691

Zoubayi's face was burned and shrapnel had sliced into his back, arm and eye. He said he did not think Hasnawi's other rescuer survived the second blast.

Asked whether he knew that the man he helped save was a Shiite, Zoubayi said: "I saw a man who was in need of help and that is why I helped him. It makes no difference whether he is Shiite or Sunni."

South of the capital, in Najaf, a bomb planted in a pile of sand in front of the home of Sheik Abbas Alsarraj killed two of the Shiite cleric's sons and injured a third, police said.

Al-Maliki Vows Cabinet Shake-up (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The Shi'ite prime minister promised yesterday to reshuffle his Cabinet after calling lawmakers disloyal and blaming Sunni Muslims for raging sectarian violence that has claimed at least 159 more lives -- including 35 men waiting to join Iraq's police force.

Among the unusually high number of dead were 50 bodies found behind a regional electrical company in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, and 25 found scattered throughout the capital. Three U.S. troops were reported killed, as were four British service members.

Also yesterday, the Sunni defense minister challenged Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's contention that the U.S. military should quickly pull back into bases and let the Iraqi army take control of security countrywide. Defense Minister Abdul-Qadir al-Obaidi said his men still were too poorly equipped and trained to do the job.

"We are working hard to create a real army, and we ask our government not to try to move too quickly because of the political pressure it feels. Our technical needs are real, and that is very important if we are to be a real force against insecurity," Mr. al-Obaidi said.

Mr. al-Maliki wants the Americans confined to bases, where they can be called in emergencies, but he boldly predicted that his army could crush violence within six months if left alone to do the work.

The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, said last month that it would take 12 to 18 months before Iraq's army was ready to take control of the country with some U.S. backup.

Lawmakers from Mr. al-Maliki's Islamic Dawa party said Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani was at the top of the list to lose his post in the coming Cabinet shake-up, which the prime minister promised during a closed-door parliament session yesterday, because that has reached civil war proportions in Baghdad and the center of the country.

Mr. al-Bolani, a Shi'ite whose police and security forces have failed to halt unbridled sectarian killing, is an independent. The United States had demanded that the defense and interior posts be held by officials without ties to the Shi'ite political parties that control militia forces.

Mr. al-Maliki is under pressure both from his people and the United States to curb violence, with Washington leaning on him to disband Shi'ite militias, whose death squads are thought to be responsible for much of the killings.

The prime minister's hold on power depends on both the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, with its Badr Brigade military wing and radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's political movement.

The interior minister controls police and other security forces, which already are infiltrated by the Badr Brigade and the Mahdi Army, the armed wing of Sheik al-Sadr's political movement.

After nearly 48 hours without reporting a death, the U.S. military said three soldiers assigned to the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division died Saturday of combat wounds in Anbar province, the insurgent stronghold west of the capital. Their deaths raised to 2,848 the number of service members who have had died since the start of the war in March 2003.

Four British troops were killed in an attack on a patrol boat in Basra's Shatt al-Arab waterway in southern Iraq, the Ministry of Defense said in London.

Influence Rises But Base Frays For Iraqi Cleric (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 12 — Few have ever described Moktada al-Sadr, the mercurial leader of Iraq's mightiest Shiite militia, as a statesman.

Yet there he was last month sitting on a pristine couch with the prime minister (no longer cross-legged on the floor), making public calls as well as sending private text messages to aides discouraging sectarianism, and paying visits to the home of Iraq's most senior Shiite cleric.

DOJ_NMG_0092692

For years an angry outsider, Mr. Sadr, 33, has moved deep into the inner sanctum of the Iraqi government largely because his followers make up the biggest and most volatile Shiite militia. Now, after more than a year in power, he and his top lieutenants are firmly part of the establishment, a position that has brought new comfort and wealth. That change has shifted the threat for the American military, which no longer faces mass uprisings by Mr. Sadr's fighters when it enters their turf.

But the taming of Mr. Sadr has produced a paradox: the more settled he becomes in the establishment, the looser his grip is over his fighters on the streets and those increasingly infiltrating the security forces. In the two years since they fought against American tanks at Mr. Sadr's command, many have broken away from the confines of compromise that bind him, and have taken a far more active role in killing, something his supporters say worries him. He says he is trying to weed them out — 40 were publicly dismissed last month.

The increasing violence of some of his followers mirrors the overall unraveling of Iraq, which has become less centrally controlled and far more criminal since the American invasion in 2003. The situation is one of the highest priorities for the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress in the United States.

The Sadrists "are really facing a problem," said one Shiite politician. "They formed a militia. It expanded. Now each one is a cell. This is the dangerous thing."

As always with the elusive Mr. Sadr, who has rarely granted interviews to foreign journalists, it is not clear whether his public pronouncements and efforts at reform are sincere, or how long they will last. But in Iraq, power flows from the barrel of a gun, and he, better than anyone, knows that.

Mr. Sadr's new prominence in politics is partly a result of intense American and Iraqi efforts. For most of 2004, Iraqi leaders shuttled south of Baghdad to Najaf, where he lives, to persuade him to get followers in his militia, the Mahdi Army, to disarm and also to ask him to enter the political process. Eventually, he did, though many of his followers kept their guns.

Now parties loyal to him control the single largest portion of seats in Parliament and elevated the prime minister to power. They control five government ministries.

Mr. Sadr is often described as fickle, image-obsessed and having a short attention span. But lately, he has cut a more sophisticated image. He rented and refurbished a large house near his own for guests in Najaf, after returning from a monthlong trip early this year. It was his second visit abroad, and he met with princes and kings of Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon and Iran, according to a Shiite politician close to him.

"Now they can sit on couches," instead of rugs, he said. Perhaps most significant, Mr. Sadr has been paying visits to the son of Iraq's most senior Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, and apparently learning the arts of negotiation and compromise.

"Nowadays he's communicating better," said Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser. "Grand Ayatollah Sistani is trying to bring him within the fold."

While all this is happening, however, the war has grown far deadlier for Iraqis on the street, and many of Mr. Sadr's supporters are following a fresh crop of more militant Mahdi commanders.

It is not that poor, young Shiites no longer follow Mr. Sadr; his image still adorns concrete walls. Religious rap songs play just as loudly on the streets of Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite slum in eastern Baghdad that is the heart of his support. But Mr. Sadr's new call for calm — one he is required to make as a part of the Iraqi establishment — is not satisfying to many, who are deeply angry at sectarian killings by Sunni militias.

"When a worker is killed because he's from Sadr City, what do you expect from his family?" said a 26-year-old graduate student from Sadr City. "It is a fact that he will try to take revenge."

One result is a small proliferation of senior militia leaders — a coalition intelligence official said in September there were at least six — striking out on their own. One new commander is a fishmonger who goes by the name Abu Dera, meaning "man of the shield." According to legend, an American tank fired directly on him and missed.

Although his supporters deny it, Sunnis say Abu Dera is one of the city's biggest killers, responsible for thousands of murders of Sunnis whose bodies are surfacing daily in a giant garbage dump less than a mile from his block. He is often referred to as "the Zarqawi of the Shiites," a reference to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia who was killed by American forces last June.

The Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who is Shiite, has given the approval for the American military to arrest him. They have tried and failed at least twice.

Abu Dera clearly inspires Shiites who want to take the law into their own hands, or as they see it, carry out justice for Sunni aggression while their government looks on helplessly.

"Mahdi Army has killed the main insurgent figures," said the 26-year-old in Sadr City. "It did a favor for the Americans and the government."

DOJ_NMG_0092693

The fracturing of Mr. Sadr's militia traces the arc of Iraq's history since the American invasion. In 2004, the American military was the common enemy, and Mr. Sadr's followers even joined Sunnis to fight in Falluja. But as vicious attacks by Sunni militias intensified, perception of the enemy shifted, and Iraq's two main sects began fighting each other.

One result has been a spectacular spike in killing — the monthly death toll in the capital has been double the rate of a year earlier — and Mr. Sadr's militia is being blamed.

At first, Mr. Sadr denied that his forces were responsible. Some Shiite Iraqi officials have said that many people claim Mahdi affiliations, even Sunni militants. Whatever the case, the killing has gotten so bad that he considers it a threat to his power, his supporters say.

"Now he's become very worried," said the politician who had discussed Mr. Sadr's trip abroad. "The violence has reached this point of being out of control." Even Mr. Maliki, the prime minister, has noted the predicament. "We don't know what Mahdi Army means any more," he remarked ruefully to a [news service] reporter recently.

Mr. Sadr has tried to fashion his organization after Hezbollah, the Lebanese Shiite militia commanded by Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, which showed its efficiency and unity of purpose during the war with Israel this summer, instituting exams for new members and dismissing wayward heads of his offices. In Basra, in the south, he is on his seventh since 2003. But Mr. Sadr has been thwarted by his undisciplined forces.

Mr. Sadr has disavowed a number of his commanders. At a Friday Prayer last month, the names of 40 dismissed Mahdi Army commanders were read aloud at a lectern in front of a sea of men holding umbrellas against the hot sun. Among them were Hassan Salim, the leader of the Mahdi Army in Baghdad, and Hajj Shimel, a prominent cleric. Abbas al-Kufi, Mr. Sadr's strongman enforcer, arrived from Najaf to attend the reading.

That public response fits snugly with the agenda of the American military, which is chipping away at the most corrupt edges of Mr. Sadr's empire through arrests.

Even though the military has made more than six forays into the area since early August, including an Oct. 25 attempt to arrest Abu Dera, Mr. Sadr has been largely silent, and the only repercussions were a few angry public remarks by Mr. Maliki.

Indeed, the challenge Mr. Sadr presented to the American military in 2004, when his followers fought tanks in flip-flops, seems to have melted away.

"We have arrested people who in 2004 we would have had to move M1 tanks to Sadr City to suppress an uprising over," said one intelligence official who spoke to reporters in September about Mr. Sadr's army. That is in part because Mr. Sadr is standing by a newly declared truce with the Americans and also because of the Sadrists' new proximity to power, well-connected local residents critical of the Mahdi militia say.

During a recent raid, area residents said, $4 million was found in the house of one militia member.

"Now Mahdi leaders have the money, they have the Parliament," said a merchant who asked not to be identified for safety reasons. "They do not want to risk it by fighting. Those who tasted the sweets will never give them up."

American and Iraqi officials say Iran is also a major financial source.

But while the unraveling of Mr. Sadr's unified militia takes away some problems for the military, it also creates new ones through the infiltration of the Iraqi security forces.

"You have more points of entry," said Lt. Col. Eric Schacht, whose soldiers patrol areas of largely Shiite eastern Baghdad.

American officials have urged Mr. Maliki to take up this problem with Mr. Sadr and, to some extent, he has. But sectarian divisions have hardened in politics, and Shiite leaders, incensed at what they say is an American obsession with militias, have treated Mr. Sadr gently.

"We find his arguments very true," said a Shiite lawmaker, Sami al-Askiri. "We agree with him."

Cleric Al-Sadr May Hold Iraq's Future In His Hands (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — Muqtada al-Sadr, the anti-American cleric President Bush once dismissed as the head of a "band of thugs," has emerged as one of the most powerful forces in Iraq, commanding a large militia and a growing political organization.

U.S. and Iraqi forces passed on a chance to arrest al-Sadr two years ago. Instead, Iraq's Shiite leaders encouraged him to enter the political process. The idea was to co-opt a threat to the Iraqi government. Critics say the plan backfired, placing Iraq's future in the hands of a firebrand whose Mahdi Army militia has intensified religious warfare and threatened the country's stability.

"I believe that the Mahdi Army continues to pose a threat," Sen. John McCain said in Arizona last week. "I believe al-Sadr has to be taken out."

DOJ_NMG_0092694

That may not be realistic. “There are no good options in dealing with al-Sadr,” says Wayne White, who formerly headed the State Department's Iraq intelligence team and is now at the Middle East Institute. “He has grown too powerful to be addressed in any reasonable way.”

As President Bush and the Democrats in charge of a new Congress plot a new direction in Iraq, al-Sadr remains a huge obstacle unless the Iraqi government does what it has been unwilling or unable to do so far: neutralize him through political negotiations or a military confrontation.

His political group, for example, controls the Health Ministry and has used it to harbor death squads, infiltrate hospitals and punish al-Sadr's enemies, says Ayad al-Samarrai, the deputy chairman of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni group.

The U.S. military estimates the Mahdi Army has between 6,000 and 10,000 militants in Baghdad. Al-Sadr's militia and al-Qaeda in Iraq are among the groups most responsible for religious warfare, according to the latest Defense Department report to Congress.

The Bush administration has urged the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to confront Shiite militias, including al-Sadr's Mahdi Army. Al-Maliki, who relies on al-Sadr for political support, has been slow to act, saying it may not be until next year before militias are disarmed. Al-Sadr's support was instrumental in putting al-Maliki in power.

Because of al-Sadr, “Al-Maliki was able to become prime minister despite the fact that other political parties had gained more seats in parliament,” says Vali Nasr, author of The Shia Revival. “He is al-Sadr's prime minister.”

Al-Sadr, 33, comes from one of Iraq's most prominent religious families. He's the fourth son of Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, one of the country's top religious leaders. The senior al-Sadr was gunned down along with two of his sons in 1999, allegedly by Saddam Hussein's henchmen.

Al-Sadr lacks his father's scholarly credentials, but he is charismatic, and his fiery sermons have attracted a large following among the country's Shiites, according to a 2004 report in the Middle East Quarterly. Al-Sadr's power is concentrated in Sadr City, a Shiite slum of about 2 million people in eastern Baghdad that was named for his father. Al-Sadr's followers include legions of poor, disaffected youths, who also make up the backbone of his armed militia.

“He's kind of a spokesman for the dispossessed,” says Chris Toensing, editor of the Washington-based Middle East Report.

As early as July 2003, while most Iraqis were still celebrating the fall of Saddam's regime, al-Sadr was using his pulpit at a mosque in Kufa, south of Baghdad, to urge young recruits to join his new army. While Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most prominent Shiite religious leader, counseled patience, al-Sadr was whipping up his followers with anti-American speeches.

His forces clashed with U.S. forces in Najaf and Baghdad in 2004. Hundreds of his followers died in pitched battles with American troops. The militants were no match for superior U.S. training and firepower. But the revolt helped solidify al-Sadr's reputation.

In April 2004, an Iraqi judge issued an arrest warrant charging al-Sadr with the murder of a rival cleric, Abdul Majid al-Khoei. The U.S.-backed al-Khoei was hacked to death in April 2003, allegedly by al-Sadr's followers, as he left a Shiite shrine in Najaf.

Al-Sadr, however, was never arrested. Instead, he was invited to join the political process as part of the deal that ended his revolt.

Members of political parties loyal to al-Sadr won 30 seats in the 275-member parliament in elections last December. As a cleric, al-Sadr does not take a direct role in politics. But his supporters were given control of six Cabinet positions, including the Health Ministry.

On the streets, his militias have remained strong. “What makes him powerful is that he's the most effective military force in this sectarian conflict,” Nasr says.

Al-Sadr has denied that his militia has been involved in criminal activity. Common criminals often identify themselves as Mahdi Army militants to carry out kidnappings and killings, says Bahaa al-Araji, a lawmaker loyal to al-Sadr.

Last month al-Sadr fired 41 members of the militia linked to illegal activities, al-Araji says, adding that there are rogue elements acting outside al-Sadr's control.

Iraq's Health Ministry is a case study in how al-Sadr used his government role to consolidate his political and military support.

Ministry-run hospitals have been used as a weapon against rival Sunnis, according to critics, such as Sunni lawmaker Mithal al-Alusi. “It's a jungle,” al-Alusi says. “What (al-Sadr) has done with that ministry is criminal.”

Last month, a Sunni man was taken to Kindi Hospital in central Baghdad for a gunshot wound, says Omar al-Jubouri, human rights director at the Iraqi Islamic Party.

DOJ_NMG_0092695

He was shot and killed in his hospital bed, al-Jubouri says. His brother went to retrieve the body. He brought 17 male relatives along for protection, but they were quickly outgunned by an even larger group of armed men, believed to be the Mahdi Army, al-Jubouri says. The group was kidnapped and killed, he adds.

Two days later, the family picked up the 19 bodies, escorted by an Iraqi army convoy, from the Baghdad morgue. Al-Jubouri says some of the bodies showed signs of torture, including drill holes to the skull and electrocution burns.

So many Sunnis have been followed and killed after picking up relatives at the ministry-controlled Baghdad morgue that al-Jubouri's party regularly coordinates Iraqi army convoys to escort the families, he says. "We'll wait until we have 17 or 18 bodies waiting," he says. "Then we'll send for the convoy."

Convoys are not always safe. On June 12, Ali al-Mahdawi, a physician and head of the Diyala Province health department, arrived at the Health Ministry headquarters with six bodyguards for an 8:30 a.m. meeting with Health Minister Ali al-Shemari, al-Samarrai says.

Al-Mahdawi had been nominated by Sunni political leaders to be deputy minister. After arriving at the ministry, three of the bodyguards waited in the parking lot, while three escorted the doctor to the meeting, al-Samarrai says. When the meeting ran late, a bodyguard in the parking lot called al-Mahdawi on his mobile phone.

"Don't worry, he's with friends," a voice on the other end said before switching off the phone. Al-Mahdawi and the three guards haven't been seen since, al-Samarrai says. "Most probably, he's dead now," he says. "It happens so often. Everybody knows about it. And they're not doing anything about it."

Health Ministry spokesman Qasim Yahya would not comment on the allegations.

Mahdi Army militants have used Health Ministry and associated offices to detain and torture abductees, most of them Sunnis, according to U.S. officers.

Last month, U.S. and Iraqi troops raided a compound belonging to a social organization named for al-Sadr's father, says Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, commander of the Army's 1st Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment, which assisted in the raid. U.S. investigators believed the compound was run by al-Sadr loyalists, he says. One room contained a long wooden bench stained with blood and urine, indicating victims were tortured there, Smiley says.

Militia infiltration is not the ministry's only problem. The ministry also has become less effective since al-Sadr took over, says Jaleel Hadi al-Shamary, a physician and general director of the Karkh Health Department in western Baghdad.

Qualified bureaucrats have been replaced by party loyalists, leading to a steady exodus of qualified doctors and other officials, he says. About 600 of his department's 3,000 doctors have resigned or left the country, he says.

"The Health Ministry is in a real state of collapse," al-Shamary says. "It's a scientific ministry and needs a scientific mind to run it. But … high-ranking officials are chosen due to their affiliation to the party."

U.S. troops say a two-story complex linked to the al-Sadr organization in a nearby neighborhood also is being used as an illegal detention center. "Torturing, killing, everything under the sun happens there," says 2nd Lt. David Michael Stroud, a platoon leader with the 1st Battalion, 23rd Infantry. "It's the heart of darkness."

The complex is considered a "no-touch" zone, since it's aligned with al-Sadr, Stroud says. U.S. and Iraqi army units often need Iraqi government permission before raiding government offices. The Shiite-dominated government sometimes is reluctant to allow raids of al-Sadr associates. "It makes it difficult if someone is sponsoring or being complicit with criminal activity who's in a government position," Smiley says. "It disrupts the essentials to making progress."

Al-Maliki's government has targeted some Mahdi Army officials, and Iraqi security forces have clashed with the militants several times this year. In August, U.S. and Iraqi troops, working on a tip about a kidnapping ring, raided the Health Ministry offices and arrested five of al-Shemari's bodyguards.

Adil Muhsin Abdullah, the inspector general of the Health Ministry, says he has not received any reports of deaths squads or kidnapping cells linked to ministry-controlled hospitals or offices.

Al-Maliki has been reluctant to let U.S. troops launch large-scale attacks against the Mahdi Army because it would make the militia more popular and undermine rival Shiite parties, including his own Dawa Party, Nasr says. Recently al-Maliki's government ordered the removal of Iraqi and U.S. military checkpoints that had been placed around Sadr City.

"The government is paralyzed against these militias," says Mahmoud Othman, a leading Kurdish lawmaker. "Groups in parliament are not working as a team and don't have a united agenda, making government and parliament unable to do much. The whole thing is getting more complicated by the day."

Iraq's Secret Death Chambers (TIME)

By Brian Bennett

Time, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092696

Before he is put to death, Saddam Hussein will be allowed one last phone call. He will be given a glass of water, a moment to pray and an opportunity to make a statement about his life and crimes. The entire event will be recorded on video to be stored in the Iraqi government archives. Then his neck will be slipped into the noose of a 2-in.-thick hemp rope. A few moments later, his life will end.

That's how recent executions have proceeded in Iraq--at least when the equipment works. Since the Iraqi government reintroduced capital punishment in 2004, several executions have been beset by glitches and logistical snafus. At first, executioners used an old rope left over from Saddam's regime that stretched too much to break the condemned's neck; it sometimes took as long as eight minutes for the hanged to die. New ropes brought in for later executions jerked harder on the convicted person's spine, but executioners soon noticed the cords fraying on the bend of the reinforced steel installed in the cement ceiling of the gallows. During a recent round of executions, on Sept. 6, the rope snapped after 12 hangings, sending a condemned man plummeting 15 ft. through the trap door onto the hard concrete floor below. Miraculously, he survived. "Allah saved me!" he shouted. "Allah saved me!" For 40 minutes, prison guards, officials and witnesses engaged in heated arguments over whether or not to interpret the broken rope as divine intervention.

It may not be an efficient process, but the death penalty is back in vogue in Iraq. After the U.S. invasion, capital punishment was suspended by L. Paul Bremer, head of the now-defunct Coalition Provisional Authority, but interim Prime Minster Iyad Allawi reinstated it a year later. Since September 2005, when three men were hanged in the southwestern city of Kut after being convicted of running a murder-and-kidnapping ring, the Iraqi government has executed 50 prisoners convicted of murder or kidnapping, says spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh. An adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki says the government plans to execute "two or three more batches of 14 or 15 each" in the coming months. Al-Maliki told the BBC last week that Saddam too could be hanged "before the end of the year." For the beleaguered Iraqi government, the practice of executions plays a political role as well as a legal one: amid the inescapable violence on Iraq's streets, the death penalty plays well with Iraqis tired of seeing gangs commit murder with impunity. "From the Iraqi point of view," says al-Maliki's adviser, "they don't like to see a lot of people get killed every day and have a low number of executions."

And yet an examination of the way the death penalty is administered in Iraq casts doubt on the government's candor about the frequency of executions, and that raises questions about whether justice is being flouted in Iraq's rush to execute. According to an Iraqi official involved in coordinating executions, the hanging rope has been used more extensively than has been publicly acknowledged by the Iraqi government. Three days of secret executions took place between December 2005 and March 2006, says the official, who attended all three sets of hangings. When the additional executions are taken into account, according to an official in the Prime Minister's office who declined to give an exact number, approximately 90 have been executed, almost double the officially declared tally.

The government's underreporting of executions reflects a general lack of transparency in the process. Hangings are conducted in secret, at a heavily fortified location in Baghdad built by an American contractor. Only a few officials are notified beforehand, and the vast majority of the names of those executed are never made public. Human Rights Watch, which monitors the fairness of judicial systems around the world, is concerned about the ability of defendants in Iraq to get a fair trial and access to a thorough appeals process. Iraq has repeatedly rebuffed requests from the Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights for statistics on the country's death-penalty cases, leading the high commissioner to request that Iraq commute all death sentences. The government has refused. In a written response to the U.N., the government said that suspending capital punishment would "undermine our policy on crime," citing capital punishment as a "public deterrence."

That was the objective when the Iraqi government announced in March that they had executed an infamous psychopath and insurgent hit man named Shukair Farid, "the butcher of Mosul," whose gang slaughtered more than 200 during a yearlong rampage in the northern city. Farid, a police lieutenant, had gained fame after appearing on the hit reality-TV interrogation show Terrorism in the Hands of Justice, on which he told in gruesome detail of the scores of Iraqi lives he took, often using his uniform to trap victims. Farid didn't go easily. On the morning the convoy of Iraqi officials drove out to oversee the execution, 30 cars ambushed them with gunmen firing PKC automatic weapons. After fighting their way through to the gallows, the executioners were surprised at how defiant Farid was as he faced his own death. When asked to verify his identity before they put the rope around his neck, Farid said, "That's me, so what." "That guy was ready to go to hell, I guess," says a government official.

But there are many others on death row who continue to profess their innocence. Women doing time for murder in Baghdad live in a single 10-bunk cell in Khadamiyah Women's Prison in the northern part of town near the Tigris River. There waits Zayneb, a brown-haired woman in her late 20s wearing a black head scarf, convicted in September of conspiring with her husband to murder three relatives. The judge gave her three death sentences, one for each relative who was murdered. She says she didn't have anything to do with their deaths. She has only one chance to appeal the ruling before she faces the noose. The reality of her predicament sinks in as Zayneb looks at the empty bunk across the room, until recently occupied by a friend of hers who has been transferred to another jail to wait for her own execution. "We spent a long time together here," Zayneb says, tears welling up in her copper-colored eyes. "They took her two days ago." She sees little hope for herself. "I am convicted of three crimes. If one is waived, what about the other two? For sure I will be hanged."

DOJ_NMG_0092697

The saving grace for defendants like Zayneb is that Iraq's judicial system operates at a crawl. It's a "lethargic process," says Basam Ridha, an adviser who has been tasked by al-Maliki to hasten the punishment. Some cases, says Ridha, have taken a year or more just to be heard by the investigative judge, who decides if the case needs to go to trial or not. Other prisoners short-circuit the process and find ways to get out of prison, either by paying their jailers or, in some instances, bribing the judge to dismiss their case.

Saddam, though, is almost out of time. If his sentence is upheld by the appeals court, Iraqi and U.S. officials say the plan is for him to be hanged from the same gallows used for common criminals. That could change for security reasons, says a U.S. lawyer working closely with the court, but even a technical snafu probably won't be enough to save him now. Remember the man who slipped the noose, believing Allah had saved him? His reprieve didn't last long. "We hanged him," says an Iraqi official who watched as prison guards took down his body and wheeled it into the adjacent refrigerated morgue. "We followed the law." With reporting by M. Ezzat, Mark Kukis/Baghdad

Violence In Iraq Claims At Least 159 (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, November 13, 2006

The Shiite prime minister promised Sunday to reshuffle his Cabinet after calling lawmakers disloyal and blaming Sunni Muslims for raging sectarian violence that claimed at least 159 more lives, including 35 men blown apart while waiting to join Iraq's police force.

Among the unusually high number of dead were 50 bodies found behind a regional electrical company in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, and 25 others found scattered throughout the capital. Three U.S. troops were reported killed, as were four British service members.

Also Sunday, the country's Sunni defense minister challenged Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's contention that the U.S. military should quickly pull back into bases and let the Iraqi army take control of security countrywide.

Defense Minister Abdul-Qadir al-Obaidi rejected calls by al-Maliki for the U.S. military to speed transfer of security operations throughout the country to the Iraqi army, saying his men still were too poorly equipped and trained to do the job.

"We are working hard to create a real army and we ask our government not to try to move too quickly because of the political pressure it feels. Our technical needs are real and that is very important, if we are to be a real force against insecurity," al-Obaidi said.

Al-Maliki wants the Americans confined to bases for him to call on in emergencies, but he boldly predicted his army could crush violence within six months if left alone to do the work.

The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey last month said it would take 12 to 18 months before Iraq's army was ready to take control of the country with some U.S. backup.

Key lawmakers from al-Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party said that in the coming Cabinet shake up, which the prime minister promised during a closed-door parliament session Sunday, Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani was at the top of the list to lose his post because police and security forces were failing to quell the unbridled sectarian killing that has reached civil war proportions in Baghdad and the center of the country.

Al-Bolani, a Shiite who was chosen in June and a month after al-Maliki's government was formed, is an independent. The United States demanded that the defense and interior posts be held by officials without ties to the Shiite political parties that control militia forces.

Al-Maliki is under pressure both from his people and the United States to curb violence, with Washington leaning on him to disband Shiite militias believed responsible, through their death squads, for much of the killings.

Al-Maliki is dependent on both Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, with its Badr Brigade military wing, and radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's political movement for his hold on power.

The interior minister controls police and other security forces which already are infiltrated by the Badr Brigade and the Mahdi Army, the armed wing of al-Sadr's political movement.

After nearly 48 hours without reporting a death, the U.S. military said three soldiers assigned to the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division died Saturday of combat wounds in Anbar Province, the insurgent stronghold west of the capital. Their deaths raised to 2,848 the number of service members who have had died since the start of the war in March 2003.

Four British servicemen were killed in an attack on a patrol boat in Basra's Shatt al-Arab waterway, southern Iraq, the Ministry of Defense said in London.

DOJ_NMG_0092698

In Sunday morning's bombing targeting police recruits, two men detonated explosives strapped to their bodies simultaneously, police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razaq said. The attack, killing 35 men outside the police station near western Baghdad's Nissur Square, was one of several blasts in the capital.

Police and police recruits, who are largely Shiite Muslims, have been regularly targeted by Sunni insurgents, al-Qaida in Iraq and other terrorist organizations aligned with it.

In Baqouba, the Iraqi army's provincial public affairs office said troops found 50 bodies dumped behind the offices of the provincial electric company.

Nineteen of the bodies were taken to the morgue in Baqouba and the army was waiting for U.S. bomb disposal teams, fearing the 31 other bodies behind the electrical company were rigged with explosives.

Abdul-Razaq said Baghdad police had found 25 bullet-riddled, handcuffed bodies in several parts of the capital. Dozens more bodies were found around the country.

Al-Maliki confirmed an Associated Press report 10 days ago about the coming government shake-up during a closed-door parliament session in which he responded to public charges by lawmakers that the government was complicit in the killing of members of the Sunni minority, two parliamentarians told AP.

Some Shiites had complained al-Maliki was being unduly harsh in dealing with Shiite militia members. Al-Maliki told the lawmakers that their speeches were affecting the security situation, according to Shiite legislator Bassem al-Sharif.

Dhafer al-Ani, of the Sunni Iraqi Accordance Front, told AP that al-Maliki's comments "were disappointing because they were sidelining (Sunnis) and included threats." In remarks earlier in the week, al-Maliki blamed Sunnis alone for Iraq's violence.

On Saturday, al-Maliki told editors of local newspapers that Syria, which the U.S. and his government accuse of allowing foreign fighters to cross into Iraq, wants to start afresh with Iraq.

"We have the same desire," al-Maliki said in a videotape of the remarks to Iraqi journalists on Saturday.

Foreign Ministry Undersecretary Labib Abbawi said Sunday that Syria's Foreign Minister Walid Moallem had accepted an invitation to visit Iraq, though no date was set.

The opening to Syria comes with the expected release in the United States of recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana.

It was believed the commission would recommend trying, among other things, to engage both Syria and Iran, Iraq's eastern neighbor.

___

AP correspondent Qassim Abdul-Zahra contributed to this report.

For Iraqis, News Is A Deadly Business (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD

At dawn, a guard at the fledgling Iraqi television station watched helplessly as a death squad - more than a dozen heavily armed men with silencers on their pistols and many with Iraqi police uniforms on their backs - rolled up in a convoy to Al Shabiya TV.

He immediately phoned the station's anchorman, Firas al-Rikabi, at his nearby home. The guard was beside himself, warning Mr. Rikabi to "try to run away." After 75 minutes, the gunmen left the station, and Rikabi arrived to find 11 of his journalist colleagues dead.

No one heard a single shot.

The professional hit, conducted last month, delivered one of this year's heaviest blows to Iraqi journalists. Amid the swirl of sectarian bloodletting and insurgent attacks, the Iraqi media faces the treacherous task of navigating the political differences between parties, and widespread ignorance about their role.

The label "independent" media in Iraq has become a death sentence, in what has become the world's most dangerous environment for local journalists. Already this year 55 Iraqi journalists have been killed - more than any other year - and four remain hostages.

"Now we are facing a crisis," says Rikabi, who was to be a news program host for the nascent Al Shabiya TV, which was attacked before it had even begun regular broadcasts.

"When they see their friends dead in front of their eyes, they are very angry, very sad," says Rikabi, who, like many, has taken heed of the threats and has decided he will no longer appear before the camera. Instead, he found another job in media. "We believe: If they want to kill us, even if we are working in the Green Zone, they will kill us because they have power."

DOJ_NMG_0092699

The dangers of Baghdad were evident again Sunday, when 52 people lost their lives in the Iraqi capital - including 35 in a double suicide strike against police commando recruits. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told a closed session of parliament he wanted a "comprehensive cabinet shake-up" and pledge of loyalty to a unified Iraq.

A growing number of incidents in recent months have demonstrated the insurgency and militia's power to target and intimidate. There have been a string of media murders against print, radio, and TV journalists. When Al Shabiya TV was hit, it was the second such attack in a fortnight.

"There is no progress. We are going backwards," says Ziad al-Ajili, head of the Iraqi Journalistic Freedoms Observatory, an Iraqi free speech watchdog group that tabulates attacks against Iraqi journalists.

"The level of freedom has dropped to a very low level, because the insurgents and militias have relations with the government," says Mr. Ajili.

"When they see the government close Al Sharqiya TV, Al Arabiya and Al Jazeera, [insurgents and militias] think they have a right to kill journalists."

The proof is in the numbers, which Ajili's group - formed in 2004, and now with a string of 30 observers reporting from across Iraq - keeps careful count of on-line, name by name.

Seven Iraqi journalists were killed in 2003. When the insurgency took root in 2004, the toll jumped to 50. In 2005 another 44 died; 2006 has already set a record, with 1-1/2 months to go. In many cases, attackers steal the mobile phones of their victims, and call and text message threats to all their colleagues in the address book.

When Nakhsin Hama Rashid, a woman who broadcast for a government-backed Kurdish TV program, was murdered two weeks ago, everyone in her phone list received this text warning on their mobile phones: "Today Nakhsin, tomorrow you."

The political dimension is also growing, as political parties - usually in the government, often with ties to their own powerful militias, and owners of their own sympathetic media outlets - seek to influence independent voices.

The number of court cases against journalists, for example, surged from just two or three last year to 10 so far this year. While there have been rumors that lawmakers have recently begun to draft a press law, no one has seen a copy nor expects it to uphold any freedoms.

"Until now, there is a dictatorship in the Iraqi mind," says Ajili. "They are targeting independent journalists all the time." He points to the case of Sunni journalist Ahmad al-Rashid of Al Sharqiya TV. He was driving through a Sunni area, when a three-man hit squad in another car, almost certainly Sunnis, shot him dead.

"These results [tell us] politicians want journalists to be the voice of their parties. When you join parties, you get protection from them," says Ajili. Passage of any press law, he says, would "end many journalist freedoms."

"This is very difficult for journalists, even more difficult than the assassinations," says Ajili, noting that no case involving an attack on journalists has been solved. "We can't work, if we are giving all the sacrifices with no democracy."

The Al Shabiya TV attack, many journalists here believe, also has political motivations. If the killers were a Shiite death squad, as is widely believed, attacking a TV station with a largely Shiite staff and a Shiite manager, the reason may be that the station was calling for Iraq to stay unified.

That message is contrary to the position of some key Shiite parties, which demand a federal Iraq.

"The targeting of journalists is from the government itself, and parties in the government," says Rikabi, who also survived a brief capture by insurgents in 2004, was beaten heavily, and threatened repeatedly with death. Insurgent groups believe all journalists "work for the occupation."

And the third problem, he says, is that today's Iraq has left no room for dialogue. "There is not another opinion. But if there is a disagreement, they will kill you."

Which is why Ajili has spent much of his own money upgrading security at his home, and keeps his AK-47 assault rifle beside him at night "like a soldier going out on a mission." Sometimes his friends call him and ask if he will reserve space on his media freedom group's website, where photographs and details of all killed Iraqi journalists are posted.

Limitations of work in Iraq hit home for Ajili during a recent trip to Jordan. Ajili says he slept just three hours, overwhelmed by the ability to move safely anywhere.

"I felt free, using my microphone in the streets," he says. "I wanted to do so many stories."

Shi'ite Fanatic Rises In Iraq To Fill Void Left By Zarqawi (WT)

By Colin Freeman

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Less than six months after an American air strike ended Abu Musab Zarqawi's campaign of Sunni terrorism, an equally brutal fanatic has emerged on the Shi'ite side of the religious divide.

DOJ_NMG_0092700

Abu Deraa's trademark method of killing is a drill through the skull rather than a sword to the neck, but his work rate is just as prolific as the former al Qaeda in Iraq leader's and shows the same diabolical artistry.

In the past year, he and his followers are thought to have killed thousands of Sunnis, their victims' bodies symbolically dumped in road craters left by al Qaeda car bombs.

Stopping monsters such as Abu Deraa -- whose nom de guerre means "the shield" -- is a top U.S. priority as it tries to halt sectarian violence, which regularly claims 100 lives a day.

But the Shi'ite-dominated government has shown a marked reluctance to sanction the kind of large-scale operation necessary to arrest him in his stronghold of Sadr City, a vast Shi'ite slum in eastern Baghdad.

Taking action against him could cost it valuable support among other Shi'ite militias who, despite official disdain for Abu Deraa's bloodthirstiness, value the fear that such a loose cannon inspires in their enemies.

"We are proud of leaders like Abu Deraa," said Hassan Allami, 25, a fighter with the Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi's Army, which Abu Deraa quit earlier this year to form his own faction. "His drills destroy the crazy minds of the Sunnis."

The worsening of interreligious bloodshed reflects badly on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, whose chief task when he took power in June was to win back Sunni confidence in the political process by stamping out the tacit backing of Shi'ite militias such as the Mahdi's Army.

Yet, increasingly, men such as Abu Deraa appear to operate beyond anyone's control. He is among at least 20 former Mahdi's Army commanders who are pursuing their own agendas, sometimes sectarian, often simply criminal.

Sheik al-Sadr may be a thug himself, coalition officials say, but at least he represented a single, identifiable authority. If dozens of freelance players emerge alongside him, negotiation becomes impossible.

"The whole thing is becoming increasingly localized, with people like Sadr being outflanked by extremists whom he can't control," said Eric Herring, the British author of "Iraq in Fragments," a study released last year that charts Iraq's breakup into innumerable competing factions. "It's possible that we may eventually remember Sadr as a moderate."

The emergence of local warlords with their own agendas is not confined to the sectarian front lines of Baghdad. In the city of Amara, in Shi'ite-dominated southern Iraq, local Sadrists are in a violent power struggle with the Badr Brigade, a rival Shi'ite militia backed by Iran.

In the capital, the two factions sit together as fellow members of the Shi'ite Unity parliamentary block. But in Amara, they have been fighting pitched battles since the British army ended its permanent presence in the city in August.

Both factions have tried to stake out political territory by introducing rafts of Taliban-style restrictions, including banning music at weddings, segregating schools, shutting Internet cafes and stopping people from watching Western satellite-TV channels.

"The Mahdi Army heard I had a satellite dish that was tuned to the Western channels," said Abu Fadl, 45, a teacher. "They went up to my roof, removed it and then beat me. Then they sold the receiver in the central market. They aren't doing this for God, just to show who is in power."

Maj. Charlie Burbridge, a British forces spokesman, insists that such complaints are not widespread. But he agreed that if they were happening, it was more a product of territorial squabbling than any genuine Islamization.

"I think if someone gets their satellite dish smashed up by the Mahdi Army, it is probably because they belonged to the Badr Brigade," he said.

Maj. Burbridge added that the situation in Amara was "a significant test of the Iraqi government and security forces, but we believe they can cope."

Mr. Fadl, however, said, "I wish the British would come back."

Dalai Lama Wants Saddam Spared (AFP-Y)

AFP, November 12, 2006

Tibet's exiled spiritual leader the Dalai Lama has appealed for Saddam Hussein's life to be spared, saying the deposed Iraqi president was not beyond redemption.

"The death penalty is said to fulfil a preventive function, yet it is clearly a form of revenge," the Nobel peace laureate told reporters as he ended a two-week visit to Japan.

"However horrible an act a person may have committed, everyone has the potential to improve and correct himself," he said.

"I hope that in the case of Saddam Hussein, as with all others, that human life will be respected and spared."

An Iraqi court sentenced Saddam, ousted in a US-led invasion in 2003, to hang on November 5 for the deaths of 148 Shiites in an Iraqi village in 1982, after an attempt to assassinate him.

Iraq's Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki has said he expected Saddam to be hanged before the end of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0092701

The Dalai Lama has been critical of the US-led invasion of Iraq despite his relationship with US President George W. Bush, who has met with him in defiance of China.

China, which sent troops into Tibet in 1950, accuses the Buddhist monk of being a "splittist" and opposes his frequent travels overseas.

The Dalai Lama has said he was seeking greater autonomy for the Himalayan region within China and opposed all forms of violence. He fled into exile in India in 1959.

Insurgent Activity Rising In Afghanistan (AP)

By Jason Straziuso

AP, November 13, 2006

Insurgent activity in Afghanistan has risen fourfold this year, and militants now launch more than 600 attacks a month, a rising wave of violence that has resulted in 3,700 deaths in 2006, a bleak new report released Sunday found.

In the volatile border area near Pakistan, more than 20 Taliban militants — and possibly as many as 60 — were killed during several days of clashes, officials said Sunday.

The new report said insurgents were launching more than 600 attacks a month as of the end of September, up from 300 a month at the end of March this year. The violence has killed more than 3,700 people this year, it said.

Afghanistan saw about 130 insurgent attacks a month last year, said the report by the Joint Coordination and Monitoring Board, a body of Afghan and international officials charged with overseeing the implementation of the Afghanistan Compact, a five-year reconstruction and development blueprint signed in February.

The violence "threatens to reverse some of the gains made in the recent past, with development activities being especially hard hit in several areas, resulting in partial or total withdrawal of international agencies in a number of the worst-affected provinces."

The report said that the rising drug trade in Afghanistan is fueling the insurgency in four volatile southern provinces. The slow pace of development is contributing to popular disaffection and ineffective implementation of the drug fight, it said.

Afghanistan's poppy crop, which is used to make heroin, increased by 59 percent in Afghanistan this past year.

Insurgents have launched a record number of roadside bombs and suicide attacks this year, and there have been clashes all year between insurgents and Afghan and NATO security forces, particularly in the southern and eastern provinces near the border with Pakistan.

The 3,700 deaths the report attributes to insurgent-related violence is comparable to the number of deaths — about 3,500 — tallied by The Associated Press this year based on reports from the U.S. military, NATO and Afghan officials.

In the east, Gen. Murad Ali, the deputy Afghan army commander for Paktika province, said 20 bodies were recovered from fighting in Bermel district in the last several days. In addition, he said, two trucks carrying Taliban fighters were destroyed by airstrikes or artillery fire, and officials estimated 40 fighters were killed in those strikes.

Four NATO soldiers and three Afghan soldiers were injured, he said, though a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force said he was not aware of any serious injuries among NATO troops.

Maj. Luke Knittig said the operations in Bermel, which borders Pakistan, were part of an ongoing Afghan-NATO mission to root out Taliban militants before winter.

"We know we've engaged in successful operations in Bermel with a purpose, and we think those have had a very positive effect against insurgent activity there," Knittig said.

Knittig said Ali's estimate of 60 dead fighters "sounds about right to me," but he did not have an independent estimate of the number killed. "We are not into the numbers game here lately," he said.

Death tolls in remote areas of Afghanistan are almost impossible to verify and often vary widely.

Abdul Baqi Nuristani, the provincial police chief, said only 25 militants have been killed in Bermel the last couple days. He said three Afghan and three NATO soldiers were injured in what he called "a very big battle."

Ali said tribal elders took the bodies of eight Pakistani fighters back over the border to be buried.

Afghan officials have repeatedly accused Pakistan of not doing enough to prevent Pakistani or other foreign fighters from crossing the border to launch attacks. Pakistan says it does all it can, though border attacks have increased since a September agreement led the Pakistani military to pull out of its lawless tribal region.

Bermel is home to a military base that hosts both Afghan and U.S. soldiers. NATO-led troops aided by military aircraft killed 15 suspected insurgents in the district on Tuesday after troops on patrol came under attack.

Afghan Army Could Help Unify A Nation (LAT)

By David Zucchino

DOJ_NMG_0092702

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

THE commander of Afghan troops confronting the Taliban here is a career officer with a clipped gray beard and a formal bearing who once fought for a Soviet-backed puppet government. His deputy is his former enemy.

Many of their soldiers fought for or against the Russians, against the Taliban or for various warlords — except those so young they had never picked up a rifle.

From this unwieldy mix, the U.S. military and the Afghan government are attempting to create something Afghanistan has never had: a national army that is made up of all the country's ethnic groups and represents a unified central government.

Five years after the fall of the Taliban government, thousands of well-armed insurgents have reemerged to seize large swaths of southern Afghanistan.

In many districts, warlords, opium dealers and corrupt police help the religious extremists exert authority. Except for their fortified, American-built bases in the south, Afghan army units control virtually no territory, and they depend totally on the Americans for supplies and support.

The continued presence of foreign troops, who repeatedly have killed Afghan civilians by accident, and the U.S.-backed government's failure to improve the quality of life or rein in local warlords angers Afghans, pushing some of them back into the arms of the Taliban.

"People are very upset and disappointed with the government," said Col. Abdul Raziq, a brigade commander in southern Afghanistan.

Officers of the new Afghan army know that the Taliban hold will not be broken until they can establish enough security for the government to provide essential services. Until they do, U.S. and North Atlantic Treaty Organization forces won't be able to go home.

But with fighting escalating and the Afghan army entirely dependent on the U.S. military, the day when foreign troops can leave seems a long way off.

The army is important for reasons beyond security. Afghanistan has no unifying institutions. The government of President Hamid Karzai controls Kabul but little else. The national police force is notoriously corrupt and, in the hinterlands, often loyal to warlords or opium merchants.

Instilling loyalty to the national government will require changing the nature of Afghanistan. The army is a place to start.

"To the Afghan people, the words 'Afghan national army' are sweet words," said the Afghan commander here, Maj. Gen. Rahmatullah Roufi, 49, whose 205th Corps is responsible for six volatile southern provinces. "They've never had a real national army before, only tribes and militias. There's a hunger for it."

His deputy, Brig. Gen. Khair Mohammed, 50, said officers were willing to forget the past. Mohammed, a trim, energetic man, gestured toward one of his battalion commanders, who drew to attention and saluted.

"He was a communist, and I fought against him," Mohammed said. "But that was the past, and we Afghans don't look back. Now we're all brothers, all Afghans, and that's the way of the future."

Relying on Americans

THE army has been built from scratch since U.S. trainers arrived at the end of more than 20 years of warfare that swept up Roufi, Mohammed and many men of their generation.

It has grown in the last five years to 36,000 trained soldiers and officers, more than halfway to the goal of 70,000 men. The troops enjoy productive relations with 1,200 U.S. and NATO trainers at 85 bases. A few battalions now take the lead during combat operations. Searches of towns and villages are conducted by Afghan soldiers, not American troops.

But the army is still directed and supplied by U.S. and NATO forces. U.S. officers say they plan operations jointly with Afghan commanders, but some Afghan officers say the Americans dictate the scope of operations by controlling supplies, vehicles and air support.

Uniforms, trucks, fuel, food and ammunition are provided by the U.S. Equally important, the Afghans rely on Americans for air support, attack helicopters, artillery and air medical evacuation. And U.S. officers are clearly in command.

Nor do the Afghans control media coverage. U.S. officers blocked Times journalists from being embedded in an Afghan unit, despite approval by Roufi and the Afghan Defense Ministry.

Roufi complained that his authority had been undermined. "It's frustrating to me, and kind of shameful as well," he said.

Afghan privates and generals alike complain that they are sent into battle in ordinary Ford Ranger pickups with no body armor or helmets, while U.S. soldiers wear flak vests and travel in armored Humvees.

Raziq said his military communications equipment was so bad that he relied on his own cellphone.

The Afghans disparage their weapons, generally old and balky AK-47s collected from the private armies of warlords.

"Our enemy's weapons are much more modern than ours," said Roufi, who commands about 7,000 men.

DOJ_NMG_0092703

"We fight on the same ground and under the same threat as the Americans and the coalition, but we don't have what we need to operate independently. This has a poor effect on our soldiers' morale," said Gen. Zahir Azemi, the army's chief spokesman.

U.S. soldiers, except when sent out on combat missions, live in air-conditioned barracks with cable TV and Internet access. They eat in modern dining facilities that are more like shopping-mall food courts than mess halls.

By contrast, most Afghan soldiers live in poorly maintained buildings, where some men segregate themselves by ethnicity. In the barracks behind Roufi's headquarters in Kandahar, his men cooked lamb and rice on the floor, next to a laundry drain. In the bathroom, mud smeared the showers, and sinks were clogged with food scraps and garbage.

With their scruffy beards and slender frames, the Afghans appear to lack the fitness and discipline of their U.S. counterparts. Although their Afghan-made uniforms are paid for by the U.S. and similar to the ones worn by American troops, some Afghans are more comfortable wearing slip-on loafers than combat boots. Afghan soldiers also tend to prefer traditional scarves to helmets.

U.S. trainers, while praising Afghans for their courage, complain of lax discipline, petty thefts and poor maintenance of weapons and equipment. The Afghans will often run up hills or charge into caves wearing virtually no armor and without waiting for backup. And while U.S. troops are stoic and focused during combat missions, many Afghans are freewheeling and talkative.

The trainers constantly urge Afghan commanders to discipline their men. They say at least two bases have been abandoned by Afghan units after American trainers were transferred out.

For American troops, the Afghans' blase attitudes toward supply lines, coordinated planning or maintaining effective communications can be maddening.

"These guys fight magnificently. They run to the fight, not away from it," said Col. Michael "Jeff" Petrucci, who is Roufi's counterpart and mentor. "But they cannot sustain operations over a long period."

Lt. Jason Elphick, a U.S. trainer, said Afghan soldiers tended to operate "hour by hour" rather than planning ahead. They work hard in the mornings, he said, but in the afternoon, when U.S. trainers want them to clean and maintain their weapons, "all they want to do is nap."

Some critics say disbanding the Afghan militias that initially dominated the army robbed the force of experienced mujahedin fighters. Under a United Nations-sponsored disarmament program, the militiamen were demobilized and trained for civilian jobs. Critics say that left the army dependent on young recruits with no combat experience.

The roughly two years needed to replace militiamen with recruits has given the Taliban time to reestablish itself in the south, its traditional power base, said Ismail Khan, a Tajik warlord who commanded a powerful militia that was largely disbanded when he was appointed energy minister.

"The one force that knew how to defeat the Taliban was disarmed," he said.

Asked whether he had faith in the army to defeat the Taliban, Khan thought for a moment and replied, "No."

'Not just one tribe'

THE typical army recruit arrives at a training center in Kabul in a baggy tunic and trousers, his possessions crammed into plastic shopping bags. He has no other job prospects and no military experience. More likely than not he is illiterate.

Asadullah Jalal Abad, 19, a fresh-faced Pashtun from a rural eastern village, said he signed on because he was tired of working as a day laborer in Pakistan. But he also wants to serve his country by providing security for all of its ethnic groups, he said.

"In my village, people want the army to come there. They know it serves everybody, not just one tribe," Abad said the day he arrived at the Kabul training center, where he was eager to learn how to fire a rifle.

Lyagat, 25, a Pashtun who, like many Afghans, uses one name, arrived the same day, having given up a job as a driver.

"I don't even know how much the army pays, but it doesn't matter," he said. "I want to help protect my country. It's a very young country and needs my help."

Lyagat said he had assumed that units were segregated by ethnic group but was pleased to learn that he would not be serving strictly with Pashtuns.

"I found out it's not the Pashtun army or the Tajik army," he said. "It's the national army."

The Kabul center turns out 1,000 trained recruits a month on hot, dusty fields where the Afghans flop on their bellies and fire at distant targets. Training has been increased from six weeks to 15 weeks, and the size of trained battalions from 400 men to 1,200.

More so than in Iraq, the Afghan army is designed to reflect the country's ethnic balance. U.S. and Afghan commanders say the army's ethnic makeup generally matches the national population — about 42% Pashtun, 27% Tajik, 9% each Hazara and Uzbek, and numerous smaller groups.

DOJ_NMG_0092704

In Iraq, the national army is dominated by Shiite Muslims, many loyal to Shiite militia commanders. The Afghan army at first incorporated Tajik-led militias of the Northern Alliance, the U.S.-backed warlords who helped defeat the Taliban. And initially, the defense, interior and foreign ministries were held by Northern Alliance Tajiks. Now Pashtun, Hazara and Uzbek officers have filled some commands once held exclusively by Tajiks, U.S. and Afghan officers said.

Roufi and Mohammed are Pashtuns, as is Defense Minister Abdul Rahim Wardak.

Although many young men join to serve their country, Roufi said, the army's main attractions are steady, if low, wages, a place to live and ample food.

"These are very poor young men, and this is a good life for them," Roufi said. "And most Afghans have never had any discipline. They get discipline here, and they find it agreeable."

The pay is meager. A first-year Afghan soldier earns $70 a month, less than a common laborer. The top enlisted man makes $180 a month, a major $300, a colonel $400 and a general $530.

Although the army has attracted more than enough recruits, the low pay means that many of them won't reenlist when their three-year tours are up.

"For every 1,000 recruits who graduate from basic training, at least 500 will leave after three years to find other work — either in Afghanistan or Pakistan or Iran," Raziq said.

Soldiers often disappear for days or weeks while making their way home to give money to their families. Afghanistan has no national banking system, so soldiers are paid in cash. In some battalions, soldiers claim, commanders skim cash for themselves. In others, the cash arrives several weeks late.

Some soldiers return weeks later, expecting to rejoin their units and get paid as if they had never left.

Some soldiers have quit and returned home to protect their families from retaliation by the Taliban. Commanders say it is a pervasive threat.

Roufi said his wife and children lived in Kabul, protected by his extended family. Mohammed lives with his wife and eight children in a bombed-out former Soviet apartment complex, guarded by soldiers on the Afghan military base in Kandahar.

"Everyone in the command worries about threats to their families. These threats are very real," Roufi said. Several soldiers said an officer who recently returned to Kabul to check on his family was captured and hanged by the Taliban.

Brig. Gen. Douglas Pritt, a member of the Oregon National Guard who commands the training effort, said the low retention rate was the Afghan army's biggest problem. The U.S. is working to improve weapons and equipment, he said, and Afghans should be working to offer reenlistment bonuses and pay increases.

"Here's what I tell the [Afghan] corps commanders: 'I understand your desire for better and more equipment. That will happen. But right now the biggest issue facing you is retaining soldiers,' " Pritt said. " 'You need to focus on that … take care of them so that their basic needs are met so that they aren't inclined to leave.' "

A formidable enemy

FOR centuries, Afghans have adopted guerrilla tactics to defeat invaders. U.S. trainers want them to do the opposite, learning to fight as a modern counterinsurgency force. As the Afghans have absorbed those lessons, the insurgency has gained strength.

Fighting the Taliban on its home turf is proving troublesome. Even Afghan soldiers have difficulty distinguishing civilians from Taliban fighters.

Taliban fighters have funneled weapons and supplies from Pakistan as they emerged from hiding in towns and villages across the south. They have built an elaborate network of caves and tunnels to ambush Afghan and foreign troops and then disappear. They attack in larger groups and are mounting bolder operations.

"The intensity of the [Taliban] threat is infinitely worse than just a year ago," Petrucci said. "Now the Taliban will mass, they will maneuver and they will not break contact like they used to. They'll grab you by the belt, and they won't let go."

The Taliban controls southern districts through intimidation and terror, Afghan commanders say, and the army cannot protect civilians from reprisals.

The Taliban also has built alliances of convenience with opium dealers and warlords. Corrupt district commissioners, nominally loyal to the central government, also help the insurgents, Roufi said.

"These are the real snakes in the sleeve," Roufi said of the commissioners.

Brigade Sgt. Maj. Kefaitullah, the top enlisted man in an Afghan unit here, said the Taliban capitalized on the frustration ordinary Afghans felt toward the government, particularly over civilians killed by U.S. forces.

Taliban spies and sympathizers have infiltrated the army, providing or selling information, U.S. and Afghan officers said. Local men monitor the main gate of the Kandahar base, using cellphones to alert Taliban fighters of approaching U.S. and Afghan army convoys.

DOJ_NMG_0092705

Capt. Andre Sison, a U.S. trainer, said he didn't trust all Afghan soldiers. "But the ones I train in my company, I trust enough to go out with them every day on combat ops," he said.

Asked whether the army had been infiltrated, Pritt said: "Certainly I think so. But I know of no situations in which information was directly leaked that compromised an operation."

To help prevent leaks, rank-and-file soldiers are not told beforehand of the times, dates and locations of operations, Pritt said. The U.S. uses other countermeasures, he said, including putting out false information and monitoring communications to see if it's passed on.

Taliban fighters use call signs and code words in radio communications, something U.S. trainers are trying to teach the Afghan army to do, Sison said. Too often, Afghan officers simply shout commands into their radios.

Roufi said it worried him that his enemy had adopted successful tactics used by Iraqi insurgents, including roadside bombs, suicide bombings and assassinations of government officials.

There were just two suicide attacks in Afghanistan in 2002, six in 2004, 21 in 2005 — and 91 so far this year. Roadside bombs are becoming larger and more effective. Of the 29 soldiers in his corps killed in the previous month, Roufi said, most were hit by roadside bombs. Two days earlier, three of his men had been killed by a roadside bomb.

Kandahar and other southern provinces were the Taliban's stronghold.

"They'll do anything to get it back," Roufi said.

As he spoke, a convoy of Ford Rangers roared up to his command center, the trucks coated in dust as soldiers returned from a combat mission. The general pointed out that the men wore no vests or helmets and that the Rangers were ordinary pickups. He said his soldiers would need better equipment before they could even think about operating without U.S. support.

"That truck is like a piece of tissue paper," he said. "If a bomb explodes, everyone inside will die. An armored Humvee would be much better."

U.S. Pressed To Go Beyond Military Action (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

NEW YORK -- Pakistan, a key ally in the war on terror, welcomes an expected reappraisal of U.S. policy in Iran and Afghanistan, and thinks military action alone is "not the answer" to the threat posed by extremists in the two countries, its prime minister says.

Shaukat Aziz told The Washington Times that he would like to see a more nuanced approach to battling extremism, which includes massive investment and economic assistance to the two countries in order to build a sense of well-being for the poor and disenfranchised.

In New York for meetings at the United Nations, Mr. Aziz also said the world needs to focus more seriously on Afghanistan's narcotics trade, which is becoming an increasingly important source of terrorist financing. By some estimates, the trade accounts for half of Afghanistan's gross domestic product.

An American commission headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton is expected to recommend strategies for the Iraq war before year's end, a development that Mr. Aziz welcomed.

"We believe that conflicts like Iraq, Afghanistan and so on need to be carefully reviewed because military action is not the answer or the solution to such a crisis," he said.

"We must work on winning the hearts and minds of the people. We have to involve the people, to give them the sense that the world cares and their future tomorrow will be better than yesterday."

The United States has spent about $38 billion on infrastructure and development projects in Iraq since the invasion in 2003, but Mr. Aziz said more must be done to address "root causes," namely poverty and hopelessness, and to make extremist ideologies less attractive.

The prime minister gave an implicit reminder that the United States must leave Afghanistan eventually, in consultation with the Afghans, their neighbors and myriad stakeholders.

"History is full of examples where we didn't focus too much on exit strategy," Mr. Aziz said. "A good exit strategy is one which leaves that country, that area, peaceful, economically and politically empowered. ...

"We are the most important stakeholder, and we are there for life. We cannot take off; countries cannot change their neighbors."

Mr. Aziz declined to comment on the U.S. midterm elections last week or the resignation Wednesday of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

DOJ_NMG_0092706

He downplayed Washington's continued demands that Pakistan do more to prevent al Qaeda and Taliban fighters from crossing in and out of Pakistan, arguing that it is in Pakistan's national interest to fight narcotics, extremism and terrorism in Afghanistan.

With parliamentary elections due late next year, the Pakistan government faces a delicate balancing act, seeking to address U.S. demands without alienating a Pakistani public that could deliver its votes to a political coalition that is thought to be aligned with the Taliban.

"In our neighborhood, a lot of events are taking place that can impact us," said Mr. Aziz, whose military sustained more than 40 deaths in a suicide bombing last week. "We are not doing this to please anybody; we are doing this in our own national interest. ... Terrorism knows no borders."

The prime minister also defended his country's agreement to allow tribal leaders to take charge of one portion of the 1,700-mile border with Afghanistan, saying that the area is difficult to police.

Asked whether similar deals may be struck in other tribal, agencies, he said: "If we can restrict activity that is prejudicial to our security, it will be done. At the right time and right place we will do more."

Mr. Aziz is a member of an elite panel advising the United Nations on how to consolidate and better coordinate aid activities in the field. His staff said he had no official contacts with Washington during the visit, focusing instead on the local Pakistani community and economic business.

After repeated assassination attempts against Mr. Aziz and President Pervez Musharraf, the prime minister travels in a tight security cocoon that is noteworthy even by U.N. standards. A city block in front of his hotel was sealed off to automotive traffic during his stay.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

KB Home CEO Resigns Over Backdated Options (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

The stock-options fraud scandal claimed one of the nation's most successful and highly paid chief executives, KB Home's Bruce Karatz, who agreed to leave the company after an internal investigation found that he backdated his own option grants to increase his pay.

KB Home, a home-construction company once known as Kaufman & Broad, said Mr. Karatz would immediately leave his posts as president, CEO and chairman. He will forfeit about $13 million in gains from the backdating as part of an agreement with the company, based in Los Angeles.

Also departing is Richard B. Hirst, executive vice president and chief legal officer, and Gary A. Ray, the head of human resources. Mr. Hirst resigned, and Mr. Ray was terminated, the company said. A person familiar with the investigation said both Mr. Karatz and Mr. Hirst cooperated with the internal investigation.

Messrs. Karatz, Hirst and Ray couldn't be reached to comment.

Mr. Karatz is one of the highest-profile casualties of the stock-options scandal, which has now claimed the jobs of more than 50 executives and directors, including William McGuire, the chief executive of UnitedHealth Group Inc. More than 130 companies, including KB Home, are under federal investigation in a wide government action. Five former executives at the companies have been charged with criminal wrongdoing.

KB Home didn't detail how the backdated options came to pass, though it said Mr. Karatz and Mr. Ray selected the dates for the options. A person familiar with the matter said that an investigation by KB Home's board determined that the dates were selected retroactively by the two men without permission of the board, though this person said the investigation didn't conclude that there had been intentional wrongdoing. The company said the misdated options were granted between 1998 and 2005.

KB Home said Mr. Karatz would be succeeded as CEO by Jeffrey T. Mezger, the company's chief operating officer. The company said Mr. Mezger wasn't involved in any options troubles. KB Home said it created the new post of nonexecutive chairman, and will conduct a search for the position.

Mr. Mezger takes the helm of the company amid a slow housing market, which has caused KB Home's sales and those of other home builders to plummet. He said in an interview that he expects the options investigation won't have any long- term effect on the company's operations or reputation and that its home-building brand remains "extremely strong." "I think this will be a seamless transition," Mr. Mezger said last night. "We see business as usual going forward."

MORE ON OPTIONS

· Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny1

DOJ_NMG_0092707

· Perfect Payday: Complete coverage2

Options allow recipients to buy stock at a preset exercise price, generally set at the market price on the day they were granted. Backdating involves pretending that an option was granted on an earlier date when the market price was lower, conveying an opportunity for extra profit. The practice can lead to overstated profits and significant tax problems for the companies and executives involved.

Mr. Karatz, a 34-year veteran of KB Home, has been its chief executive since 1986. He has overseen tremendous growth, shepherding KB Home through a burgeoning real-estate market that had it building houses at a fast clip. From the end of 1995 through the end of last year, KB Home shares climbed tenfold. The company's stock has dived 40% this year as the property market rapidly chilled.

Along the way, Mr. Karatz has been among the nation's most highly compensated corporate executives. Since 1992, he has reaped nearly $180 million from exercising options, according to Standard & Poor's ExecuComp, a service that tracks executive compensation. Last year, he made more than $150 million from salary, bonus, restricted stock grants and options exercises, according to ExecuComp. The options exercises accounted for the bulk of his pay.

The backdating appears to have begun in 1998, when Mr. Karatz received more than 450,000 options. That year also apparently marked a shift to much larger options awards -- in each of several previous years, Mr. Karatz had received 100,000 options or fewer.

His grants between 1998 and 2001 appeared particularly well-timed. In that period, he recorded one grant dated the day the stock touched its lowest closing price of the year, another at a quarterly low, and two more at monthly lows.

One grant of 450,000 shares carried the date of Oct. 25, 1999, and an exercise price of $17.75, the year's lowest close. KB Home shares subsequently rocketed upward, rising 25% by the end of November.

KB Home disclosed in August it was conducting an internal probe of its options grants, after being contacted by The Wall Street Journal about an unusual pattern of well-timed grants. The company also was the target of a shareholder lawsuit filed in July in Los Angeles County Superior Court alleging manipulation of past stock-options awards. The company has said it is studying the suit.

KB Home appears to have concentrated its options grants at the top. Mr. Karatz received 500,000 options in 2000, which was 30.9% of all the awards to employees. They were dated at a monthly low. Mr. Karatz has cashed all of those options out, for a total profit of about $54 million.

The $13 million he will forfeit is part of an agreement reached to refund the excess profit from backdating to the company, KB Home said. Mr. Karatz will repay the company to cover extra profit on already-cashed-out options, and his remaining outstanding options will be repriced.

The company said that it and Mr. Karatz haven't negotiated any terms of his departure other than the agreement to repay profits from backdating. To correct its accounting for the backdating, KB Home said it expected to take charges of no more than $50 million.

As of Nov. 30, 2005, Mr. Karatz had options for about three million KB Home shares, of which about 2.2 million he could immediately exercise, according to securities filings. The negotiations with the company over his departure will likely determine how much of that total he will walk away with. Under his employment agreement, some of his options remain in force if his departure is deemed a retirement. If he is terminated for cause, he could lose at least some of his outstanding options. Other severance terms also depend on how his departure is characterized.

The home-building industry isn't typically known for flash, but Mr. Karatz cultivated a high profile. He made a name for himself in the 1970s building a model house on the top of a department store in Paris to promote the company's homes in France.

Last year, he was instrumental in partnering with Martha Stewart to build and market homes together -- a move seen as increasing KB Home's name recognition in an industry that isn't known for having well-known brand names.

Convicted Executives Forced To Sell Homes (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, November 13, 2006

When CEOs sell their multimillion-dollar homes, it's usually because they're relocating to a different market, or trading up to an even bigger house.

In the case of Walter Forbes, the former Cendant chairman whose baronial 8-acre estate in New Canaan, Conn., is on the market for $12.5 million, the reasons are a little different.

DOJ_NMG_0092708

Forbes, 63, was convicted two weeks ago of conspiracy and making false statements in connection with a massive fraud that cost Cendant investors $14 billion when it was exposed in 1998. Unless his conviction is overturned on appeal, he'll be relocating, all right, but most likely to a property surrounded by thick walls and concertina wire.

As such, Forbes is poised to join the pantheon of convicted former executives who've had to sell their trophy properties or luxury toys to pay off legal bills, settle civil lawsuits or meet criminal forfeiture requirements mandated by judges. Among them:

Dennis Kozlowski, former CEO of Tyco International

Kozlowski was convicted last year of stealing approximately $500 million in cash and stock. Prior to his trial, Kozlowski became the poster child of corporate excess when it was revealed that he spent millions of dollars of Tyco funds on a luxury apartment in Manhattan, filled with exotic details such as a $6,000 shower curtain, and treated his wife to a $2 million party for her 40th birthday on the island of Sardinia. Tyco shareholders picked up half the tab for the party.

Kozlowski, who's currently serving an 81/2-to-25-year sentence in a New York state prison about an hour outside Manhattan, has been selling assets in an attempt to pay $167 million in fines and restitution imposed on him by the judge who presided over his trial.

Last week, Kozlowski's luxury ski home in Beaver Creek, Colo., featuring three wine cellars, sold for $10 million. The house's furniture is being sold separately for $750,000. Another property, an oceanfront mansion on Nantucket called Sea Rose Farm, has been on the market for $23 million but has not yet found a buyer.

Two months ago, Kozlowski sold his luxury yacht, the Endeavour, for $13 million.

Bernie Ebbers, former CEO of WorldCom

Ebbers was convicted last year of ordering his subordinates to cook the books in what turned out to be an $11 billion fraud. Ebbers began serving a 25-year prison term in September, but prior to sentencing, he turned over almost all his assets to a trust fund established to pay damages to WorldCom investors.

Ebbers, whose fortune at one time topped $1.3 billion, once owned the largest cattle ranch in Canada, as well as thousands of acres of timberland in the southeast USA. But when WorldCom's stock floundered, he had to borrow $400 million from his board of directors to meet margin calls from his bank.

His Mississippi mansion was sold in June for $7.5 million, and in May, sports mogul Stanley Kroenke purchased the cattle ranch for $68.5 million. The proceeds of these and other asset sales went to funds to pay investors and creditors.

Scott Sullivan, former CFO of WorldCom

Sullivan pleaded guilty to manipulating the company's earnings in 2004 and cooperated with the government's prosecution of Ebbers. As a reward for that cooperation, he received only a five-year jail sentence, but he still lost his assets to the same class-action lawyers who reached a settlement with Ebbers.

Sullivan's 30,000-square-foot mansion in Boca Raton, Fla., was sold last year for $9 million.

John Coffey, the class-action lawyer at Bernstein Litowitz Berger & Grossmann who got Ebbers and Sullivan to hand over most of their assets to the investor fund, said that the trend of convicted executives turning over their property to settle civil actions is a new development.

“For years and years, it wasn't usual that white-collar criminals had to sell their homes,” he said. “One of the things we wanted to do at WorldCom is change that. We picked both Scott Sullivan and Bernie Ebbers clean.”

One of the high points of his negotiations with the two men, Coffey said, was when he got Sullivan to come into his office and sign over the remainder of his 401(k) plan, a sum between $200,000 and $300,000, to the class-action fund.

Coffey says he succeeded with Sullivan and Ebbers because both men wanted to make a good impression on U.S. District Judge Barbara Jones prior to their sentencing.

Jeff Skilling, former CEO of Enron

Skilling was convicted in May of lying to investors about the company's financial condition and sentenced last month to 24 years and 4 months in prison. Prior to sentencing, he settled criminal forfeiture proceedings with the government by agreeing to sell his home and transfer all his assets, as much as $45 million, to a fund for injured shareholders.

In the case of Cendant's Forbes, the fines and penalties he'd have to pay if his conviction stands up could be staggering. After his top lieutenant, E. Kirk Shelton, was convicted last year of securities fraud in the same case, a judge ordered him to pay $3.2 billion in restitution. Forbes could get similar treatment.

On top of that, Cendant says it will try to recover a $47 million severance package it paid Forbes to oust him in 1998, as well as $15 million in legal fees advanced to him. Cendant lawyers say they will argue that Forbes' conviction nullifies both contracts.

Technically, Forbes' home in New Canaan, as well as two other homes he owns in Florida and Colorado, are not in his name, but his wife's. But since he transferred the titles of the properties after the investigation into the Cendant fraud began, forfeiture experts think lawyers won't have much difficulty winning rights to those assets.

DOJ_NMG_0092709

"That's easier," says Steven Kessler, who specializes in forfeiture cases.

In high-profile white-collar criminal cases in general, Kessler adds, "I have noticed that the houses are worth so much money that the government, either through criminal forfeiture or money judgments or restitution agreements, are getting defendants to sell their homes."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Nigeria Bribery Case Heats Up Again (HC)

Houston Chronicle, November 13, 2006

Several probes active, but charges have not been filed in delta inquiry

PARIS — There are new signs of life in a sprawling four-year investigation of whether a unit of Houston's Halliburton Co. and other oil-services companies paid huge bribes in the 1990s to land a $5.6 billion construction project in the Nigerian delta.

French and Swiss investigators are trying to gain access to specific bank records in Switzerland and other European countries to determine if tens of millions of dollars in suspected bribe money ended up in accounts linked to Nigeria's former military dictator.

In Britain, police and agents from the Serious Fraud Office this summer searched four homes and a business looking for links to the case, which began in 2002 when a French oil-services executive facing corruption charges told a judge about a $175 million "slush fund" he claimed had been used to bribe Nigerian officials.

The U.S. Department of Justice is looking into possible criminal offenses, and the Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating possible financial misdeeds. The Nigerian government is also conducting a formal investigation.

In late October, Halliburton officials reported to the SEC that a third person has been dismissed as a result of its own investigation of possible corruption in overseas projects and indicated it had reason to believe improper payments may have been made.

Despite these forward steps, no charges have yet been filed, and investigators concede they do not yet have enough detailed financial information to build an airtight case. They say they cannot yet establish exactly where the money ended up.

The complex case, which spans the globe from Africa to Europe to Houston, drew attention during the 2004 presidential campaign, when Democratic candidates used the allegations about bribery in Nigeria to attack Vice President Dick Cheney for his close ties to Halliburton, where he was chief executive officer from 1995 to 2000.

When the inquiry began, French officials suspected that Cheney might have played a role because he was in charge when at least one of the questionable payments was made. But French officials and lawyers now say that their investigation has not turned up any evidence against the vice president.

In Washington, Justice Department officials declined to comment on the matter.

How inquiry startedThe inquiry developed from allegations that executives from M.W. Kellogg Co., which became part of Halliburton subsidiary KBR, and French, Japanese and Italian oil-services companies formed a consortium called TSKJ that bribed Nigerian officials.

In a lengthy statement to the SEC in late October, Halliburton officials said the possible wrongdoing extended beyond Nigeria.

"We have reason to believe, based on the ongoing investigations, that payments may have been made by agents of TSKJ to Nigerian officials," the company stated. "In addition, information recently uncovered suggests that, prior to 1998, plans may have been made by employees of the M.W. Kellogg Co. to make payments to government officials in connection with the pursuit of other projects in countries outside of Nigeria."

Investigators and lawyers handling the inquiries in France and Switzerland say the investigation has been slowed in recent months because of the difficulty of obtaining the financial records because of bank secrecy policies that protect account holders.

"The French investigating judge has requested information from the Swiss, from Monaco, and from Great Britain, and for the moment he is waiting for the answer on the financial data," said Olivier Schnerb, a French lawyer who represents the whistle-blower who first alerted officials to the possible bribe scheme. "The mystery is how much money has been hidden."

The French and Swiss inquiries are headed by powerful "investigating judges" who can use the European version of subpoenas to question witnesses and obtain records. There is no equivalent in the U.S. judicial system, where prosecutors and police build criminal cases and must seek subpoenas from magistrates, often in adversarial proceedings.

The two judges are seeking access to private bank accounts in several countries, but this process is slow because individuals and banks can appeal in court before records are opened.

U.S. officials also seek this data.

DOJ_NMG_0092710

Most of the transactions under investigation took place during the regime of the late Nigerian military dictator Gen. Sani Abacha. During his brief five years in power he is suspected of embezzling more than $3 billion from his country's treasury.

Swiss officials say it was brazen larceny on a scale rarely seen before or since. The inquiry involving Halliburton's subsidiary represents only a small part of a much larger series of legal actions to track and recover Nigerian national assets from Abacha's family.

"We don't know in Geneva exactly how much he stole," said Judge Daniel Dumartheray, the Swiss judge charged with investigating the Abacha regime's financial affairs. "He stole money directly from the state, and he used fraud, substantially raising the prices of contracts and getting paybacks, and he got bribes from people who paid to get contracts."

Money scattered globallyDumartheray said in an interview that the unprecedented attack on Nigeria's oil-swollen cash reserves was difficult to trace because the dictator had scattered his money in a number of countries where banking secrecy laws make investigation painstakingly slow.

"He also had money in the United Kingdom, in Jersey, in Lichtenstein, in Luxembourg, in France and perhaps in Israel," the judge said. "We don't know if we have knowledge of all that he did. He had the assistance of a lot of different intermediaries in other countries, and all those people helped him open accounts in the name of other companies, so his name doesn't appear."

The judge said the dictator used his immediate family to create accounts that helped him launder his stolen billions and that his son used false names and false passports to make it easier to hide money in various offshore accounts.

"All this makes it very difficult to get a paper trail of his money," Dumartheray said. "For an investigation, each time the money moves you have to write for legal permission to get the information, and people can fight it and appeal it and stop the inquiry."

One of Abacha's suspected cronies, Abubakar Atiku Bagudu, was arrested in Houston in May 2003 on an international arrest warrant charging that he had helped the Abacha family loot hundreds of millions of dollars in public funds.

He has since been extradited to Nigeria.

The trail also led to Britain this summer.

Serious Fraud Office spokesman David Jones said last week that four homes and one business in London and Somerset were searched on July 20 as part of the ongoing bribery investigation.

The unit only takes on investigations involving allegations of major malfeasance when large sums of money are thought to be involved, he said.

Death stopped plunderingAbacha's theft of his country's vast oil wealth ended with his sudden death from a heart attack in 1998. His elected successor, Olusegun Obasanjo, launched a global search for the money Abacha and his family squirreled away in secret accounts.

Already, the new Nigerian government has been able to have more than $1.1 billion returned from Switzerland and other countries where Abacha's funds were located. It has become the biggest money-laundering case in Swiss history, lawyers said.

In addition, lawyers said that roughly $800 million in bank accounts linked to Abacha have been frozen in Lichtenstein, Luxembourg, Jersey, France and Britain.

Enrico Monfrini, a Swiss lawyer representing the Nigerian government, said the scale of the corruption was staggering because Nigeria's oil revenues were so huge.

"We know many of the ways Abacha stole money, including having boxes of cash containing $40 million to $60 million delivered to the presidential villa," he said. "But the bribes have proved the most difficult to investigate because they were paid offshore. So there is often no way to know how much money was paid."

He said Swiss law allows an investigating judge to get financial data from specific bank accounts with a judicial order. The process is somewhat similar to obtaining a search warrant in the United States.

This tactic can be effective in many cases, but it does not work well when money is placed in accounts opened by intermediaries who are not known to authorities, or opened under fictitious names.

No fishing expeditions"You can't go on a fishing expedition," Monfrini said. "You have to name the specific person with specific suspicions and say the account contains the proceedings from crime."

The investigation opened in 2002 after Georges Krammer, a former oil-services company executive facing possible criminal charges for alleged corruption, told a French investigating judge that the TSKJ consortium had set up a substantial slush fund used for bribing Nigerian officials.

The consortium was able to obtain contracts worth roughly $5.6 billion to build a liquefied natural gas plant on Bonny Island in Nigeria.

At the time, Krammer was working for Technip, a major French oil-services company that was part of the consortium, which also included Japan's JGC and Italy's Snamprogretti. His disclosures prodded French Judge Renaud van Ruymbeke, known in France as an effective fighter against corporate corruption, to begin a full-scale investigation of the consortium and its finances.

DOJ_NMG_0092711

Some investigators involved with the case expect the Swiss to deliver financial information within a month. This would allow investigators in the United States, France, Switzerland and Britain to decide whether to file criminal charges.

Others fear more delays will slow the inquiry for months or years.

Halliburton's role in the possible bribery case only began in 1998, when it took over M.W. Kellogg, the American component of the TSKJ consortium, as part of a larger acquisition of Dresser Industries. Some of the suspected corrupt activities took place before Halliburton was involved.

M.W. Kellogg, an engineering and construction firm, is now part of KBR, formerly known as Kellogg, Brown and Root, which is part of Halliburton.

Halliburton's SEC statement said that some of the employees suspected of making improper payments are still active Halliburton agents and consultants.

Halliburton cooperatingHalliburton's lengthy statement indicates that the company is cooperating with the Justice Department and SEC investigations in the United States and with the Nigerian government inquiry.

Many company records have been subpoenaed and made available to investigators, Halliburton said in its SEC filing. Halliburton spokesman Cathy Mann said the company has been forthcoming in releasing information about the Nigerian affair.

"We have provided public disclosure about this matter for some time, and we have provided updates as appropriate," she said in an e-mail response to questions.

The SEC filing states that the SEC has subpoenaed A. Jack Stanley, a former executive dismissed in 2004 for allegedly receiving "improper personal benefits" from Jeffrey Tesler, a British lawyer who set up a company called Tri-Star that received payments from the consortium. Lee Kaplan, Stanley's lawyer, declined to comment on the case.

Halliburton has also severed its relationship with Tesler, who is being investigated by a number of agencies but has not been charged with any crimes. He and his lawyer declined to be interviewed for this article.

In addition, Halliburton states that a number of current and former employees and former executives have been subpoenaed by the SEC.

Halliburton officials have also declined to name the employee who was recently suspended or to reveal the location outside Nigeria where they believe improper business practices may have been used to obtain contracts.

The company agreed to the SEC's request for a so-called tolling agreement extending the statute of limitations.

The agreement in essence gives the government more time to conduct its investigation and the company to make its case.

Halliburton also asserts in its SEC filing that its managers have been cooperating with investigators in France, Nigeria and Switzerland and are aware of the investigation by the Serious Fraud Office in Britain, where Tesler is practicing law.

Witness Against Murder Inc. Gang Gets Freedom (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

A former high-ranking member of the Murder Inc. crime syndicate in the District, which was charged in 31 killings, has won a "very unusual" sentence that will keep him out of prison, newly unsealed court records show.

Maurice Andrews, 36, former confidant of D.C. drug kingpin Kevin Gray, faced 30 years to life in prison under federal sentencing guidelines after pleading guilty to racketeering charges related to several murders.

However, in what prosecutors call a "very unusual" request, the U.S. Attorney's Office recently sought a sentence of time served and probation. Authorities cited Andrews' role as a key government witness in the prosecution of the violent street gang.

"He testified in dozens, literally dozens of criminal incidents that he was aware of, ranging from individual drug deals to murder," Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew G. Olsen said at Andrews' Sept. 29 sentencing.

U.S. District Court Judge Royce C. Lamberth sentenced Andrews, who has been in the federal witness-protection program for five years, to time served and five years' probation, according to a transcript of the hearing.

The proceedings had remained sealed until last week.

Federal authorities have called Murder Inc. the most violent gang in the District's history. It ran much of the city's crack cocaine and heroin trade during the 1990s and killed potential government witnesses, authorities said.

Several leaders of the gang -- including Gray, convicted of 19 murders, and Rodney Moore, convicted of 10 murders -- are serving sentences of life in prison without parole. A jury deadlocked on giving them the death penalty.

The Murder Inc. case resurfaced last month when government witness Bethlehem Ayele was fatally shot after her car was stopped in Alexandria. Police have described the killing of Miss Ayele, a restaurant owner and real-estate agent, as a targeted hit. She was one of several people who cooperated in the case.

Andrews pleaded guilty in July 2000. Among other charges, he admitted to supplying the gun used to kill one man and assisting in plans to kill two others.

DOJ_NMG_0092712

One victim, Carlos Cardoza, was suspected of cooperating with investigators. According to testimony, Andrews drove contract killer Oscar Veal Jr. to Cardoza's house to have him killed. Asked how he felt upon learning Veal killed Cardoza, Andrews testified, "It just another thing, I mean, it was the life I was living at the time."

Veal, who also cooperated, admitted that he committed seven killings. He is serving 25 years in prison.

At his sentencing, Andrews apologized by saying: "I just got myself into something I couldn't get out of. I was too far in and I wanted out. But I didn't know how to get out."

Andrews grew up in Southeast. He worked sporadically in carpentry and clerical jobs, meeting Gray sometime in 1994. The pair clicked. They spent nearly every day together for five years, Andrews testified.

Andrews testified that Gray got drunk and told him about committing numerous murders. But Andrews added that he knew better than to directly ask Gray such questions.

"He gets suspicious and thinks you're asking him questions for a reason, and he ends up killing you," Andrews testified.

However, defense attorneys sought to discredit Andrews, saying he repeatedly lied under oath to get a reduced sentence.

One defense theory held that Andrews testified for the government because he needed help paying his medical bills after learning in jail he was HIV positive.

Under cross-examination in 2002, Andrews told Moore's attorney that he received $1,200 to $1,800 a month at various times after joining the witness-protection program.

He also said that he got money for furniture, a car and a job and that the government paid more than $1,600 of his unpaid parking tickets.

In January, Sebastian Graber, an attorney for Larry Wilkerson, whom Andrews testified against, filed court papers stating Andrews and other cooperating witnesses conspired to "put murders" on Gray, Wilkerson and others.

Andrews was "known for not telling the truth," and associates knew him by the nickname "Lie-Lie." Mr. Graber stated in court filings.

"Mr. Andrews is willing to lie and lie about murders," Mr. Graber told Judge Lamberth during a hearing in 2004.

Yet prosecutors say Andrews was a reliable and truthful witness, despite his reputation.

"Although he was known on the streets as a partyer and drug dealer who could not be trusted, he took his cooperation ... very seriously," Assistant U.S. Attorney Amy Jeffress wrote in a Sept. 27 memo to Judge Lamberth.

"We understand that a departure of this magnitude is very unusual," Miss Jeffress wrote, referring to Andrews' sentence.

"We believe, however, that defendant Andrews' extraordinary cooperation justifies this significant benefit."

It is not clear what Andrews has been doing for the past five years.

"He's got a steady job, pays his taxes and stays out of trouble," his attorney, James Lyons, told Judge Lamberth.

"I'm going to keep doing what I've been doing," Andrews added.

Identity Thief Is Often Found In Family Photo (NYT)

By John Leland

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

In the five years since his divorce, Eric Wagenhauser had moved on with his life. He had remarried and was sharing custody of the three children from his first marriage. Then, last year, Mr. Wagenhauser discovered a new wrinkle on American divorce: his former wife had used the children's Social Security numbers to apply for nine credit cards in their names. She obtained two.

Mr. Wagenhauser's ordeal over the next year, which involved police departments in two Texas counties, banks, credit bureaus and the Social Security Administration, is familiar to many identity theft victims — the crime often begins at home.

Though most victims never learn who stole their identities, half of those who do say the thief was a family member, a friend, a neighbor or an in-home employee, according to surveys by the Federal Trade Commission and Javelin Strategy and Research, a private research firm. The surveys estimate that 9 million to 10 million Americans have their identities stolen each year.

Mr. Wagenhauser's former wife, Ivy Ash, began applying for credit cards in the children's names soon after the divorce. She ran up about $200 in unpaid bills, he said, which grew to about $1,000 with late fees and interest penalties. She pleaded guilty to two counts of fraudulent use of a credit card this year and is now in a Texas prison.

But the effect of the thefts is still being felt in the Wagenhauser household. "This has been a financial strain, and to be quite honest, you can hear my wife and I bickering right now over this," said Mr. Wagenhauser, a Houston construction worker. "We've had to go into marriage counseling ourselves because this has been so stressful on our own marriage, just dealing with it, the fighting, the arguments.

"It has almost reached the point where my wife and I have gotten a divorce over all the stress related to having to fight the crime. It stretches out over so many things. That's what makes it so devastating and insidious."

DOJ_NMG_0092713

Identity theft involving family members takes many forms, said Betsy Broder, assistant director of the Federal Trade Commission's division of privacy and identity protection. A child steals a parent's identity to buy drugs, one sibling steals another's identity to try to avoid arrest or debt.

Identity theft is often difficult to solve and prosecute, and, in the case of families, victims may be reluctant to report relatives to the police.

The fraud went on for five years before Mr. Wagenhauser became aware of what was happening. By then, the mother's actions had created credit histories for two of the under-age children, which Mr. Wagenhauser worries will cause them future trouble.

"When my kids turn 18 and go to college, they're not going to be able to buy a car or get a student loan because they've got bad credit," Mr. Wagenhauser said. "No one's going to rent them an apartment. They're going to be turned down for jobs because there's so many companies that run credit histories."

"They're kids," he added. "They don't have any idea what's going on. All the sudden they're adults, and they're left holding the baggage."

Suspicious parents can look out for clues that their children's identities have been compromised, said Jay Foley, a founder and director of the Identity Theft Resource Center, a nonprofit organization that helps victims.

"Let's say Mom and Dad are divorced, and Junior goes to stay with dad," Mr. Foley said. "When he calls Mom, she sees the kid's name on the caller ID instead of Dad's. If that was set up in the kid's name, what else was set up?"

If young children start to receive applications for credit cards in the mail, it is a sign that someone with access to their Social Security numbers has applied for credit in their names, Mr. Foley said.

After their mother went to prison, Mr. Wagenhauser's children moved in with him. He and his new wife, Tracey, have not decided how they will explain the crime, or the punishment, to their youngest children, who are 10 and 8.

"It's definitely estranged me from my oldest daughter," who is 15, Mr. Wagenhauser said. "My oldest daughter, who is old enough to understand, has been told that I am the one who put her mother in jail. She's not accepting that her mother is the one who did this to her and to herself."

Identity theft by a family member or someone close to the family is probably underreported and raises thorny questions about trust, responsibility and loyalty, Ms. Broder said.

"We see parents taking advantage of their children, and children taking advantage of their older parents," she said. "We can tell consumers and businesses to be careful about how they safeguard their personal information, but it's hard to tell people to safeguard their information from the people that they love."

For Brenda Bare, of Snellville, Ga., the identity thief was a trusted friend whom Ms. Bare, 58, had known for 22 years. The friend, a woman, had been living in Ms. Bare's house.

When Ms. Bare returned home in August after being away for a month to care for her mother, she discovered that 10 checks and a recently expired driver's license were missing. A credit card offer in her name was in the woman's bedroom with the application form torn off.

"I said, 'You have to leave here tonight,' " Ms. Bare recalled.

For the next two weeks, Ms. Bare tried to repair the damage. She found helpful a checklist for identity theft victims; versions are available from the Federal Trade Commission and the Identity Theft Resource Center. Ms. Bare discovered that four checks had been cashed, for about $400 in all, and that an application had been made for a credit card, though it had not been approved.

Because the crime was committed in her home by someone she trusted, Ms. Bare said she felt vulnerable.

"The first two weeks I slept with the front and back porch lights on, and if I would hear a noise, I was awake," she said. "I have a dog, but my dog knows her. But I'm feeling better about it and going on with my life."

Ms. Bare's checks had been cashed in another county. She finally tracked down the stores and banks where the checks were cashed, and local police officers issued arrest warrants. But even after her bank cleared her of responsibility for the forged checks, she said, she was still not off the hook.

"After the bank reimbursed my money, they went back to the merchant and took the money back from the merchant because the check was no good," she said. "So the store thinks I wrote a bad check, so they come after me. I had to go prove I didn't do this. This was a nightmare. My bank was supposed to close my checking account, but when I went back in there it was still open."

Although she canceled her credit cards and registered a fraud alert with credit bureaus, she said she was concerned that there was little preventing the thief from using her information again or selling it to someone else.

"There's still four or five checks that were never retrieved," Ms. Bare said. "My license was never retrieved. She can sell all this information. The D.A. just said, 'Oh, she won't do that again.' "

DOJ_NMG_0092714

Identity theft by family members can put special pressure on the victims when there is a possibility of children, parents or former spouses going to jail or prison. Many victims pay the debts and choose not to involve the police or the courts, said Mari J. Frank, a lawyer who works with people whose identities have been stolen.

"It's such a breach of trust," Ms. Frank said. "When someone you don't know steals your identity, it's very impersonal. They just want money. But when it's a family member, it's far more emotionally destructive."

For a Michigan couple, the problem began in August with a notice that a bank had received a credit card application in their name. The couple declined to be identified because they are hoping to resolve the matter privately.

The couple immediately suspected their son, who had tried the same thing four years earlier. This time they found that he had obtained two credit cards, run up debts of more than $22,000 and applied for new cards or higher credit limits.

"The explanation was that we never helped him when he wanted the money," the father said.

After much soul searching, the parents said, they did not want to see their son put in jail. They negotiated a plan for him to assume the debt on one card and resigned themselves to paying a debt of about $5,000 on the second card rather than reporting the crime to the police.

"We'd make an arrangement for him to pay us, but I'm sure he wouldn't," the mother said. "He has a unique way of getting around anything. It doesn't send a very good message, but putting him in jail is not going to help either. There aren't too many good options out there. If he goes to jail, he's not going to learn anything except to wisen him up to be street smart. What choices do we have? All our life from now on we have to watch our credit."

She blamed herself for the way her son had turned out. "I don't know what went wrong, but in the end we have to say it's our fault, and that is terrible to live with," she said. "I can't think of anything worse for a parent."

Staving Off Modern-day Pirates (LAT)

By John M. Glionna

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia — Noel Choong was working late the night he got the distress call: Just off the Malaysian coast in the darkness, a Japanese tugboat and barge were being attacked by a dozen pirates armed with AK-47s and rocket launchers.

The 154-man crew aboard the barge Kuroshio was frantic. As the vessel churned slowly northward through choppy waters of the Strait of Malacca, headed for Myanmar, it had suddenly been surrounded by three fishing boats.

The armed men stormed the little tug. Shots were fired. The captain and two others were taken hostage. The desperate barge crew plotted a rescue mission to free their shipmates, who were being held with guns to their heads.

A slender, tough-to-ruffle figure in his mid-40s, Choong urged the crew not to try anything stupid. "The pirates had high-powered weapons," he said later. "We told them: 'You're unarmed. You can't fight guns.' "

As his staff radioed for help from Malaysian marine police, Choong stayed on the phone with the terrified seamen. Pirates may be oceangoing desperadoes driven by poverty or greed, he assured them, but they usually are not killers.

Unless, that is, they were cornered or provoked.

"For that crew, this was a night from hell," Choong recalled. "I was just trying to be their friendly voice of reason."

Choong is a pirate catcher, a maritime crisis negotiator who handles the high-anxiety drama of modern-day pirate attacks in real time. He's also a detective, a high-seas sleuth with a host of shadowy shipping industry informants he uses to run down hijacked ships.

In the outlaw Strait of Malacca, whose waters are considered the most pirated in the world, his services as director of the International Maritime Bureau's Piracy Reporting Center are in near-constant demand.

The 550-mile-long channel, flanked by Singapore and Malaysia to the east and the Indonesian island of Sumatra to the west, is one of the world's most strategic international waterways and its busiest shipping lane. Each year, 60,000 vessels, the equivalent of nearly half the world's entire merchant fleet, negotiate the funnel-shaped shortcut between the Pacific and Indian oceans. They range from mammoth supertankers as large as city skyscrapers to tugs and barges.

Such seaborne commercial traffic attracts a sophisticated brand of piracy that has moved far beyond the scabbards and cutlasses of the 17th century.

Many are opportunists, Choong said, impromptu gangs of poor fisherman who can't resist the allure of lumbering, unarmed vessels laden with cash and goods: "They realized that robbing unarmed sailors is a lot easier than robbing a bank." Others are more ambitious and well-organized, professionals who plunder ships for crime syndicates, warlords, corrupt government officials and even regional terrorist groups.

DOJ_NMG_0092715

In recent years, Choong says, emboldened pirates have become more sophisticated. They forge passports and other documents to turn working maritime vessels into slave- and drug-running ships. They use satellite phones and global positioning systems.

With high-speed fiberglass boats, they creep up from behind, using the cover of the ship radar's blind spot. With grappling hooks and expert climbing skills, they scale the vessel's mooring ropes and overpower isolated and vulnerable crews.

The pirates don't just use the cover of darkness. They also take advantage of national sovereignty laws.

Knowing that marine police must observe territorial boundaries, flotillas of fishermen from such places as Sumatra or freelance commandos from the Indonesian navy ambush ships and then race back to the safety of their sovereign waters, often just a few miles away.

In a trick from centuries ago, pirates may disguise themselves to approach wary vessels. Some pose as marine police, uniforms and all, doing routine checks.

Shippers have retaliated: In the Strait of Malacca, vessels use powerful water hoses to blast would-be boarders off the deck or to swamp the boats below. Some post mannequins dressed in overalls and hard hats to give the impression of a larger crew. Captains of smaller boats spread carpet tacks on their decks at night, hoping to slow pirates, who often attack barefoot to give themselves a better grip and to minimize sound.

Bigger boats illuminate decks with floodlights and travel in a zigzag to create a wake to sink small boats. Day and night, the more watchful captains use closed-circuit TV to monitor the water around them. Some hire armed commandos for security, because in the anarchy and take-care-of-your-own credo of the high seas, isolated ships in jeopardy know they cannot expect help from another unarmed craft.

Many pirate attacks are hit-and-run robberies. In others, crew members are kidnapped for ransom, even tortured and killed. Countless vessels have been hijacked, their nameplates and paperwork swiftly changed, and turned into ghost ships used by syndicates for drug and slave smuggling.

Authorities estimate that only 10% to 30% of pirate attacks are reported. Still, in the last five years, 195 attacks on seaborne vessels in the Strait of Malacca have been logged, including 49 kidnappings and seven deaths. More than $1 million in ransom was paid last year by owners of ships transiting the passageway, statistics show.

By 2005, the shipping gantlet had become so dangerous that Lloyd's of London declared the strait a high war-risk area for insurance purposes, citing its "war, strikes, terrorism and related perils." The advisory was lifted this year after Singapore and Indonesia began coordinated air and sea patrols.

Although the last 12 months have brought an uneasy hiatus, Choong says recent incidents suggest piracy may be back — with an ominous new wrinkle.

In July, armed attackers boarded two United Nations-chartered vessels carrying tsunami relief supplies. In the first incident, six men in military fatigues brazenly stormed the ship before noon, one of the first reported daylight raids.

The next day, a dozen heavily armed men claiming to be attached to the Free Aceh Movement, an Indonesian separatist group, commandeered another U.N. ship. That same week, a gang of 35 pirates armed with machine guns and rocket launchers seized a fully loaded gasoline tanker and kidnapped its captain. He was later released with the vessel.

Choong and others believe such instances suggest the possibility of a major terrorist attack in the Strait of Malacca, which slices through the heart of a region rife with political and religious unrest. International security experts also fear that militants might commandeer a giant crude oil tanker for use as a floating bomb.

Just a mile and a half wide at its narrowest point, the strait is a crucial maritime choke point. Experts say terrorists could sink a huge tanker at a narrow juncture, wreaking environmental havoc and bringing international maritime commerce to a halt.

Though experts differ on its likelihood, some say the idea is not farfetched.

"If someone in 2000 said people could hijack planes and fly them into the World Trade Center, critics would have said, 'Oh, that's not going to happen.' But some incidents suggest terrorists are looking at the Malacca Strait," said John Brandon, director of the Asia Foundation, which monitors U.S.-Southeast Asia relations.

"Pirates recently hijacked and tried to learn to steer an oil tanker in the Malacca Strait. That raises a troubling question: Why do they want to learn to steer?"

Choong has given briefings to global investigative agencies such as Interpol and to anti-terrorism officials from numerous countries, including the United States.

His assessment is troubling.

"Singapore is vulnerable — it's very pro-West and surrounded by Muslim nations," he said. "Militants could cause environmental damage and cripple the world economy. What more could a terrorist ask for? Everything is there."

Choong came to the piracy reporting center in 1997, no stranger to the sea. As a former chief officer and merchant marine, the soft-spoken Chinese-Malay, who grew up here, knows the fear that pirate attacks inspire.

DOJ_NMG_0092716

A religious man who doesn't drink or smoke, he maintains a coolly professional anger against sea robbers and bandits who torture, kidnap and kill his fellow seamen. His employer, the International Maritime Bureau, is part of the Paris-based International Chamber of Commerce, whose fight against piracy is mandated by the United Nations.

From his 35th-floor office in a Kuala Lumpur high-rise 100 miles from the choppy waters of the strait, Choong keeps a bunkered-down mentality, always ready for the next pirate attack. The walls of his reception area are covered with world maps that bear red pins to mark the latest plunders.

Choong's purview is worldwide, from the troubled waters off Somalia and Bangladesh to the ungoverned South China Sea, but the Strait of Malacca is his most constant headache.

His role is not to make arrests or conduct criminal post-mortems after attacks. Rather, he runs a sort of 911 service for seaborne vessels under siege. Through daily situation reports, his agency offers vessels an early-warning system, giving crews a heads-up that they are entering waters with recent pirate activity.

He has also developed a network of informants, shipyard workers and fishermen who peddle tips to help track down hijacked ships. Many contacts are criminals, so Choong takes precautions: He's never photographed. Some family members do not know his job. He changes his route to work.

In delving into Asian organized crime syndicates, he and his team meet shadowy characters in big-city airports and dense jungles.

He wants information and he's willing to pay, money that comes from ship owners and insurers. "We tell our informants we can't guarantee their safety — and some do get killed. There's nothing we can do about that," he said.

"We don't get personal with them. That way we can live with it if they die."

Choong has been threatened. One source told him he could have anyone killed for $500. "I knew what he meant, and it scared me," he said. "But I tell these people that if you kill us, new people will be hired. If you bomb our headquarters, a new one will be built. You can't close us down."

Despite such threats, Choong's war against piracy goes on. Some battles end better than others.

On that night in March 2005, when bandits attacked the Japanese tugboat Idaten and its construction barge, the Kuroshio, Choong urged the barge crew by phone to take pictures of the pirate vessels for evidence.

For nearly an hour, the pirates held the tugboat's captain, chief engineer and a crewman at gunpoint. Then, sometime before midnight, the armed invaders fled with the three men. As Malaysian marine police escorted the tug and barge to port, Choong alerted the ship owner to begin the delicate task of negotiating the release of the hostages.

Over the next few days, the owners, along with Japanese government officials, kept up a dialogue with the pirates. Meanwhile, the hostages were spirited among fishing boats, and finally taken to the jungles of southern Thailand.

After the ship owners paid an undisclosed ransom that Choong described as "way above market value," the men were released, but the pirates escaped. The saga made headlines — with scant mention of Choong. And that's the way he likes it.

"This time nobody died," he said. "Still, it's a dangerous game."

john.glionna@latimes.com

Authorities Discredit Latest "sighting" Of James "Whitey" Bulger (BOS)

By David Abel

The Boston Globe, November 10, 2006

Authorities in California have investigated and discredited the latest reported sighting of fugitive Boston mobster James "Whitey" Bulger.

Bulger, 77, one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted fugitives, fled a month before his 1995 federal racketeering indictment and was later revealed to be a longtime FBI informant and charged with the murder of 19 people.

Since he vanished, authorities have investigated reported sightings of the fugitive throughout the world.

Monica Munoz, a spokeswoman for the San Diego Police Department, said last night that a security guard reported seeing someone in the city who looked like Bulger on Oct. 8 or 9. The guard last reported seeing the man board a trolley. But local transit officials did not find anyone matching the description, Munoz said.

"It wasn't a credible sighting. Someone called and said they saw him. San Diego trolley security did look, but they didn't find him. That's how we know it wasn't a legitimate sighting."

Darrell Foxworth, an FBI agent in San Diego, said he had received reports from police about the alleged sighting, but he also determined they were not legitimate. "The Police Department had responded down there, conducted a limited investigation, and after reviewing the description, they determined it wasn't credible," he said.

Authorities in Boston could not be reached last night about the latest reported sighting.

DOJ_NMG_0092717

Was That Whitey Departing The Departed? (BOSH)

By Dave Wedge And Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, November 13, 2006

California cop believes he saw Bulger flee flick

Notorious fugitive James J. "Whitey" Bulger may have starred in his own quick getaway scene after a cop spotted a man resembling the crime boss exiting a screening of the mob flick "The Departed" at a San Diego cinema.

Sources said an off-duty police officer spied the 77-year-old Bulger - or at least someone matching his description - leaving a downtown theater after watching the film, which stars Jack Nicholson as a dead ringer for the South Boston crime lord.

San Diego Police Department spokeswoman Monica Munoz confirmed the department responded to the report about three weeks ago.

The off-duty cop tailed the Bulger look-a-like out of the theater but lost him when the suspect hopped onto a trolley. San Diego transit cops searched the trolley system but were unable to find anyone matching the description, Munoz said.

A source told the Herald the cop recognized the man as Bulger from his "steely blue eyes" and muscular physique. A law enforcement source confirmed that authorities are probing the alleged sighting.

Samantha Martin, spokeswoman for the Massachusetts U.S. Attorney's Office, which is in charge of the Bulger Fugitive Task Force, declined comment.

The incident is the latest possible sighting of the crime boss who vanished in 1995 as an organized crime strike force made up of state police, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the Internal Revenue Service closed in. A longtime snitch, Bulger fled the night before he was indicted for 19 gruesome mob murders, thanks to a tip from his boyhood pal and longtime FBI handler John Connolly.

The last confirmed Bulger sighting was in London's Piccadilly Circus in September 2002.

The Task Force released a statement earlier this year saying authorities "run down every lead and exclude every look-a-like sighting." There were sightings reported in 19 countries in 2005.

In August, authorities released 25-year-old surveillance videos of Bulger in an attempt to ferret out more tips.

Bulger, who fled with longtime galpal Catherine Greig, has a $1 million bounty on his head and remains the FBI's No. 2 most wanted fugitive, behind only Sept. 11 mastermind Osama bin Laden. He has also remained a compelling media figure as stories about Bulger recently appeared in newspapers in England, where authorities once found Bulger's safety deposit boxes.

Police Believe Slaying At Md. FedEx Site Was Random (WP)

By Tara Bahrampour

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

She had emigrated from Guyana 19 years ago to give her children, Reina and Colin, a better life. After raising them and a younger daughter, Chantal, in a townhouse in Silver Spring, she moved to a spacious two-story brick house in Bowie. In August, Reina moved in, with her own two children, to save money to pursue her dream of becoming a nurse, like her mother.

That dream ended Saturday when Reina Natasha Lynch, 26, was found dead of a gunshot wound at the FedEx Ground distribution center in Beltsville, where she worked as a security guard. A colleague discovered her body at 7 a.m. in the booth at the entrance to the fenced compound on Trolley Lane.

Prince George's County police said yesterday that they had not found a motive. "We believe this was a random event," said Cpl. Stephen Pacheco. Investigators are looking for clues in Lynch's car and in security camera footage, he said.

As rain lashed Evans's living-room windows yesterday afternoon, she tried to absorb the fact that her eldest child, "Tasha," was not coming home. Heart-shaped silver balloons bobbed near the ceiling, left over from Tuesday, when the family celebrated Evans's 48th birthday. Lynch and her children, Alexia, 7, and Ethan, 4, had given Evans a handbag and a card telling her that they loved her.

"She was very willing, a very hardworking, loving, determined person," Evans said. "Being a single parent, it was so hard, so I told her she could come home. . . . I'm just trying to figure out who would do such a terrible thing."

Evans's sister, Desaree David, said, "This is quite new for us."

"We are from a society that is quite mild-mannered," she said in the Caribbean cadence she shares with her sister. "You try to get your kids away from this, and you think this is the kind of thing that happens to other people, on TV. When it happens to you, you're not, kind of, insulated for it."

Away from where the sisters sat on pristine white couches, Evans's other children padded around fielding calls. Lynch's children flitted about energetically, holding bags of potato chips and grabbing at the balloons.

DOJ_NMG_0092718

David described her niece, a graduate of Montgomery Blair High School, as "a brilliant student" who loved legal thrillers and her mother's pepper pot soup. She rose early each morning to drive a Montgomery County school bus; the weekend security job was for extra money, said her mother, adding that Lynch sometimes heard strange noises near the guard booth but chalked it up to nerves.

Lynch worked for Ronin Risk International, a security firm contracted by FedEx. Evans expressed anger at the companies. "I don't know who would just have one lone female guard just working at night," she said. "It's dangerous even for a man."

FedEx Ground spokeswoman Alison Sobczak said she had never heard of an employee being shot onsite and added that guard booths are typically locked at night.

Evans's son, Colin Lynch, 23, a radiography student at Washington Hospital Center, also works as a guard at the FedEx facility. He had offered to work his sister's shift that night because she was tired. Now, to ease his mother's fears, he will stop working there, he said.

Evans took a sleeping pill Saturday night but woke up crying. "It's too hard," she said, her voice breaking. "It's too fresh." She wiped away new tears. "We came here and worked really hard so we could achieve what we had. I brought them here so they could have a better life."

Now she will transfer that hope to her grandchildren, who will continue to live with her. Sitting close by, Ethan said he wants to be "a firefighter man." Alexia wants to be a police officer. "Alexia's the one who said this morning she wished she was there to help her mommy call 911," Evans said.

No funeral arrangements have been made. A reward of up to $25,000 is being offered for information leading to an arrest and indictment.

"Things were hard for her lately, but they were supposed to be getting better," Colin said. "I was trying to help her the best I could, and it was supposed to get better."

On Saturday, the family had planned to go to Six Flags America.

Hearing this, Ethan looked up and brightly chirped, "Six Flags!" -- remembering the promise of a few days ago.

Petty Disputes Spur Most D.C. Killings (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

The motive for most homicides in the District are arguments and petty disputes over perceived slights, accounting for more killings last year than robberies, domestic disputes, gang activity and drug wars combined, according to the Metropolitan Police Department.

"It's a pretty big deal among some people," said Chief Charles H. Ramsey. "A guy gets upset -- you know, 'You're disrespecting me.' Or they don't like the way you're looking at them. You'd be surprised at how many silly homicides we see."

The police department last year attributed 57 of the city's 196 killings to arguments, compared with 50 such killings among the city's 198 in 2004, according to a recently released department report tracking homicide information from 2001 to 2005.

During those five years, 1,126 persons were killed in the District, 901 of them fatally shot. The report also states that about 1,058 of the homicide victims were black, about 36 were Hispanic and about 32 were white.

Arguments have accounted for a steady increase in the percentage of overall killings in the city since 2001, when they were the primary motive in 19 percent of the 232 homicides.

Chief Ramsey said that guns are a big part of the problem.

"The guns make them feel like they're more powerful," he said. "They overreact."

As recently as 2002, drugs were the primary motive in more than one-third of the city's 262 killings. As a percentage of total homicides, that figure has declined each year, accounting for just 10 percent, or 19 killings, last year.

Chief Ramsey said the decline in homicides attributable to disputes over drugs proves how hard police have worked to eradicate the problem.

The ages of homicide victims have remained fairly consistent. About two-thirds of them each year are 18 to 44.

The report states that in 2005, "nearly all" homicide victims 25 to 34 had a prior-arrest record. The number of juvenile and adult homicides also increase sharply beginning at about 10 p.m., factors that the police chief said he considered when declaring the recent crime emergency, which ended less than two weeks ago.

"I look at numbers and trends every day," he said. "When you look at these things, you can't ignore them."

Other large U.S. cities are reporting a similar trend.

In Milwaukee, where homicides increased from 88 in 2004 to 122 in 2005, the number classified as arguments increased from 17 to 45. That was the largest category of killings, as the number of gang and drug-related slayings decreased, according to the New York Times.

DOJ_NMG_0092719

Disputes also made up the largest category in Houston. Homicides increased there 24 percent in 2005, with 113 of 336 related to disputes.

There were 380 homicides in Philadelphia last year, with 208 dispute-related. Drug-related killings, which accounted for about 40 percent of homicides during the early 1990s, accounted for 13 percent, the newspaper reported in February.

The District's report also states that for three straight years detectives have closed 60 percent of cases, peaking with last year's closure rate of 61 percent.

So far this year, police have closed 85 homicide cases for a closure rate of 57.4 percent.

There were 148 killings through yesterday. That figure is down 11.4 percent from the 167 killings recorded at that point last year and on pace to end 2006 with 174 killings. That would be the lowest total since 147 killings were recorded in 1985.

In 1997, the year before Chief Ramsey took over the department, there were 301 killings. The highest total during his tenure was 262 in 2002.

Va. State Police Swap '10-4' For 'Message Understood' (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, local governments have spent millions on high-tech radios to improve communication among police forces. Now, Virginia is taking the next step: changing the very way cops talk.

Starting this month, Virginia State Police have banned the "10 codes" used by generations of officers to flag everything from murders to bathroom breaks. Gone is the language of "10-4" and "What's your 10-20 [location]?"

The codes are as much a part of police culture as badges and coffee. But over time, individual police departments have adapted the codes in their own ways, creating confusion when they have to work together -- such as on Sept. 11.

Eager to avoid such mix-ups, Virginia's government has become one of the first in the nation to try to eliminate traditional cop talk. For months, officials in Richmond have worked with police and firefighters to come up with a substitute for 10 codes, finally deciding on a statewide "common language protocol."

In other words, English.

Police have reacted with a certain amount of 10-32 (alarm).

"My first reaction was, 'You've got to be kidding me,' " said Trooper Steve Mittendorff, 26, as he patrolled the Dulles Toll Road early this month. "How am I going to stop using something I've been using all these years?"

The switch reflects why it is so challenging for the U.S. Department of Homeland Security to create a national emergency response system. If someone sets off a dirty bomb at the Pentagon, Arlington County police might be on the radio with officers arriving from Fairfax County, Alexandria, the District or Maryland.

To Arlington police, "10-13" means "officer in trouble." To Montgomery County police, the same code means "request wrecker." Even everyday police commands can get lost in translation: In Alexandria, "10-54" refers to an alcohol sensor. For Virginia State Police, it's livestock on the highway.

"It's nuts," said Chris Essid, who is leading Virginia's campaign to get all police and firefighters to switch to plain English. "I had no idea how attached people became to codes."A Simpler Time

The 10-code system started catching on in the 1920s, when police radios had only one channel. Officers needed to bark out information succinctly to avoid tying up the system. But over time, a Babel of codes developed.

The jumble wasn't such a problem when police were on different radio systems, or were not as tuned in to the potential for apocalyptic disasters. But five years ago, as law enforcement agencies rushed to the Pentagon, they found that sometimes they were speaking in different tongues.

Local "police were talking 10 codes. So were the Pentagon police. The FBI have their own little 10 codes," said Capt. Richard Slusher, communications officer for the Arlington Fire Department. "You didn't know what they were talking about."

Usually such mix-ups are just an inconvenience. But the potential for trouble is clear. A few years ago, an agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives called in a "10-50" while working in Maryland, police said. To Montgomery police, that means "officer down." Squad cars rushed to the scene -- to discover that, in the agent's code, "10-50" meant traffic accident.

After Sept. 11, federal Homeland Security officials required first responders to use plain English in events involving other agencies. But many officers like to keep the codes for day-to-day use within their departments.

Some officials, though, said they fear such officers will revert to their own 10 codes under the stress of a disaster. That's why Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) decided to urge all first responders to switch to plain language full time.

But getting rid of 10 codes has met considerable resistance from some officers. At stake are efficiency, safety and professionalism. Not to mention cool.

DOJ_NMG_0092720

"The jargon is one of the things that sets the cops apart," said Tim Dees, a former police officer who is editor of Officer.com, a Web site run out of Beltsville. Not that police officers are alone, he noted: As shown by numerous TV shows, doctors and lawyers also love to snap out their jargon.

"It adds," he said, "a certain mystique."A Tough Transition

The day after Virginia State Police entered the plain-English era, Mittendorff was patrolling on the toll road. Night was falling, and the radio was squawking with news of rush-hour accidents.

Occasionally, a baritone voice would mutter a "10-46" (disabled vehicle) or "10-27" (requested license check).

"Everyone is trying to remember plain language," mused Mittendorff, an earnest officer with a Marine-style buzz cut. "I've been trying all day, and I keep slipping."

He pulled onto the side of the road, behind another cruiser with flashing red and blue lights. The driver, Trooper Jason Thomasson, 29, had just finished writing a traffic ticket. He and Mittendorff reminisced about the old 10 codes.

"I think they were a lot easier," said Thomasson, leaning on his friend's cruiser. "You can rattle it off a lot faster."

Mittendorff said he worries about troopers encountering greater danger now that their coded language has been stripped bare for anyone with a police scanner to understand.

"The public never knew what we were talking about," he said.

Virginia officials said they have created a simple set of four signals for cases in which police officers need to get radio information confidentially -- for example, if a suspect is on a terrorist list. As for the secrecy of the old 10 codes, Essid said, that's largely a myth.

"A lot of these codes are on the Internet," he said.

Still, traditional cop talk will not disappear easily. Officials in the Washington area have been talking for months about taking a common approach to the issue, but it hasn't happened. Montgomery has gotten rid of codes, but Prince George's County hasn't. D.C. police have kept a handful of 10 codes.

Even in Virginia, the record is mixed. Alexandria police tried to abolish codes a decade ago but reverted. The codes were more effective, said Lt. James Bartlett, a spokesman, and they limited the time long-winded officers were on the radio.

But, clearly, the attraction goes beyond efficiency.

"It's just our own little language," said another officer on the Alexandria force, Capt. Hassan Aden. He uses 10 codes so instinctually that his 4-year-old son has picked them up. When the boy has soccer practice, for example, Aden says: "Hey, come on, we've got to 10-18," or hurry. Dinner is "10-7 time."

His police officers switch to common language when working with other departments. Still, after years of code, they must make a conscious effort to speak plain English.

"It's like a different language," he said.

CIVIL LAW:

Partial-Birth Replay (WP)

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

IT ISN'T EVERY day that the Supreme Court confronts a law materially identical to one it has already struck down. But that is what the justices faced last week when they heard oral arguments over the federal ban on partial-birth abortions. Six years ago, the court struck down state partial-birth laws -- ruling that Nebraska's ban was overly broad and lacked an exception for situations in which protecting a woman's health required the use of the disfavored procedure. In response, Congress enacted its own version of the ban, complete with nearly all of the faults from which the Nebraska statute had suffered. The Justice Department contends that the new law can be reconciled with the court's prior ruling. This is laughable. The only way to uphold this law would be to overturn the prior decision -- a step that the justices should not take, in the interest of women's health and out of respect for precedent.

"Partial-birth abortion" is a political term, not a medical one. If Congress had wanted to pass a ban on either late-term abortions or on the particular procedure normally associated with the "partial-birth" label, it was free to do so as long as it defined it carefully and maintained a health exception. It did neither. Instead, it defined "partial-birth abortion" in a fashion that could once again include some abortions performed using the method most common in the second trimester. And it sought to get around the court's insistence on a health exception by asserting, in a purported factual finding, that the procedure is never medically necessary to protect a woman's health.

DOJ_NMG_0092721

This, as several lower courts have found, isn't true. And while the Supreme Court generally owes deference to congressional fact-finding, that does not entitle the legislature to get around the high court's constitutional holdings with factual assertions at odds with both its own legislative record and voluminous testimony in the lower federal courts.

The real question this case presents is whether the court, with Justice Sandra Day O'Connor retired, will continue to honor its precedent. In that sense, the case will shed important light on the court's new members, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., neither of whom tipped their hands at oral arguments. Both men testified eloquently at their confirmation hearings about their high regard for stare decisis -- the principle that precedents should generally be permitted to stand. Both would send a powerful message of respect for the court's institutional work if, in a case so politically loaded and with so many people expecting a predictable ideological split, they declined the invitation to either contort or reverse a high-profile precedent and merely applied it instead.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Sex Predators TV Show Raises Rights Issues (LAW)

By Tresa Baldas, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, November 13, 2006

The NBC television series "To Catch a Predator," which features confrontations with men allegedly seeking sex with minors online, may be popular with viewers, but not with criminal defense attorneys, who claim the show raises a range of civil rights issues.

Seating an unbiased jury when a client's face has been splashed all over national television is nearly impossible, they argue. Miranda rights and search-and-seizure issues are also compromised by the show, they add.

In the last two years, 183 alleged online sexual predators have been formally charged as a result of being caught on the show, which has run sting operations in California, Florida, Georgia, New York and Ohio with the help of an online predator-watchdog group. More than 20 of those cases have resulted in guilty pleas or convictions, with the remaining cases still pending.

'TOWN SQUARE' TRIAL?

"Without question, it tramples on their constitutional rights to due process and a fair trial," said Blair Berk of Tarlow & Berk in Los Angeles, who is representing a doctor featured on the show that aired on Oct. 6. The man allegedly showed up at a house hoping for a date with who he thought was a 13-year-old girl he met online. People v. Wolin, No. SCR 495892 (Sonoma Co., Calif., Super. Ct.).

Berk likened the show's tactics to "trying someone in town square without giving them due process.

"How do you, with a ratings-driven TV show, with a client as the poster child for the theme of the show -- which is that everyone featured on the show is a sexual predator by definition -- how do you have any chance at securing that person the presumption of innocence, due process or the right to a fair trial?" Berk said.

"They are being tried on TV from a purely prosecutorial prospective."

"Dateline NBC" correspondent Chris Hansen denied claims that the program fails to guard against entrapment and violates defendants' right to a fair trial. He noted that the sting operations always start with the alleged predators initiating the contact with the decoy, not the other way around.

"We are very cautious about this. We understand that everybody is due their day in court," Hansen said. "But at the end of the day, it's no different than if [the alleged predators] walked into an investigation that was run by law enforcement."

He said that "the reality is that the proof of intent in many cases is in the chat log. And the chat logs speak for themselves."

Gary Bostwick of Sheppard, Mullin, Richter & Hampton in Los Angeles, an attorney for NBC Universal Inc., was unavailable for comment.

Chat logs spoke loud and clear to one federal judge who, in August, convicted Maryland Rabbi David Kaye -- snared in an NBC investigation -- of traveling across state lines to have sex with who he thought was a 13-year-old boy he met on the Internet. U.S. v. Kaye, No. 1:06 cr205 (E.D. Va.).

In his opinion, U.S. District Judge James C. Cacheris cited chat logs as "providing more than sufficient evidence that defendant persuaded, enticed and induced the young boy to engage in a sexual act."

According to court documents, Kaye's lawyers argued that Kaye was " simply dirty talking," and that Kaye was induced and enticed by the sting volunteer.

Cacheris rejected both arguments. Kaye is scheduled to be sentenced on Dec. 1.

Steven Harmon, who is defending five California men caught on the NBC show, including a lawyer, a homeland security officer and a teacher, said his main concern is whether or not he can get a fair trial.

DOJ_NMG_0092722

"I'm just anticipating that dreadful moment of being in the courtroom when the judge informs the prospective jurors that this is one of those 'Dateline NBC' cases, and hear all the groans and see the rolling of the eyes and stares at my client," said Harmon of Harmon and Harmon in Riverside, Calif. "It's going to be very difficult to find a jury that will be able to listen to the whole story."

But "To Catch a Predator" doesn't tell a full story, argued Ian Friedman, an Ohio criminal defense lawyer whose firm is currently representing some men featured on the show.

To do so, Friedman said, "they'd have defense lawyers on who can explain to the viewers that this isn't a one-sided story."

Friedman, of Ian N. Friedman & Associates in Cleveland, said his firm has represented and advised about 100 men arrested in online predator stings, including a handful caught on the NBC show.

"This show makes our jobs more difficult, just like 'CSI' makes a prosecutor's job more difficult," Friedman said, referring to a popular CBS television show about crime scene investigations.

A New Way To Sue (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

We'll soon find out if that humongous gender discrimination class-action lawsuit pending against Wal-Mart is an aberration -- or the legal wave of the future. And rest assured the trial bar is hoping for the latter with dreams of riches.

Last week, a U.S. District Court in San Francisco heard arguments on whether a gender discrimination lawsuit against Costco should also proceed as a nationwide class action. A decision is expected in a few weeks, and the proceedings have an air of deja vu.

The same San Francisco District Court (though not the same judge) heard the Wal-Mart case, which was initiated by the same plaintiffs' lawyer, Brad Seligman. Mr. Seligman is seeking punitive damages, back pay and injunctive relief in both cases, and he is also pushing the same legal theory as to why the claims should be pooled into a class rather than handled individually. He even has some of the same "expert" witnesses.

The Wal-Mart case accuses the retail giant of not promoting women and systematically paying them less than their male counterparts for comparable jobs. Mr. Seligman presented the court with nationwide company data that supposedly shows gender disparities in Wal-Mart pay and promotions. Next came testimony from a sociologist who said corporations tend to engage in stereotyping, followed by a statistician claiming that widespread stereotyping was the likely cause of the alleged discrimination.

Commonality is supposed to be the essence of class actions. Yet the vast majority of Wal-Mart employment decisions are discretionary and made by individuals at thousands of locations across the country. But never mind. The San Francisco court said plaintiffs' statistics could justify class treatment and certified the largest private civil rights case in history, a decision that is currently on appeal to the Ninth Circuit.

In the Costco case, plaintiffs lawyers are again arguing that statistical analyses and formulas are enough to justify a nationwide class certification and deny Costco the chance to dispute whether any individual plaintiff actually suffered discrimination. But in addition, they're claiming that emotional distress -- a highly individualized harm, if it occurred -- can be determined on a class-wide basis as well.

Talk about stereotyping. The idea that a court should assume every female member of the class suffered the same amount of emotional distress seems, well, sexist. Mr. Seligman has also teamed up with specialists like Bill Lann Lee of Lieff Cabraser, a prominent plaintiffs firm that has brought its share of securities, tobacco and consumer class actions. And these lawyers are ready to tee up every deep-pocketed retailer in America on similar accusations if courts let them.

That's why the big game here is getting a large class certified. Companies as large as Wal-Mart can afford to fight a class-action case, assuming they don't mind the negative publicity. But the plaintiffs bar knows that most companies will be pressured to settle rather than risk a jackpot verdict that could put them out of business.

The precedent here is what happened with "strike suits," the Milberg Weiss invention that had lawsuits pre-packaged and ready to go whenever a company's stock price dropped. They were a source of extortion for years until Congress intervened (over Bill Clinton's veto). If mere statistical imbalances can trigger a class action, companies will be forced to make pay decisions based on statistics rather than performance and merit. Ultimately, that leads to racial and gender quotas, all in an effort to avoid frivolous lawsuits.

If these radical legal theories hold up in the Costco and Wal-Mart cases, the trial bar will gain tremendous leverage. The costs for business, employees and American consumers will be high.

DOJ_NMG_0092723

ANTITRUST:

Are Private Buyouts Good For The Economy? (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, November 13, 2006

The new birth of Burger King Corp. this year delivered the beef to the investing public: Under private management, the long-struggling company turned a corner and then made shares available on the New York Stock Exchange.

But the managers kept some major side orders to themselves. They took out a big loan and paid themselves a $367 million dividend and other fees as well. In all, they extracted cash worth about one-sixth of Burger King's market value.

That's one whopper of a payout, and it's not unusual these days.

Increasingly, investors with deep pockets are banding together to form "private equity funds." Just as the leveraged buyout firms did in the 1980s, they are buying up companies, restructuring them, and then selling them back on public stock exchanges - often for a supersized profit.

The practice isn't new, but it remains controversial. And the scale of the trend far exceeds what it was back when Henry Kravis and Michael Milken made their magazine cover debuts.

Hardly a week goes by without more major deals being announced. Meanwhile, the very success of these buyout funds is attracting billions more dollars from investors - raising the prospect of many more buyouts in coming months. In essence, the wealthy are deciding that if you want to make money in stocks, the stock market isn't the place to do it.

"Private equity is a very big deal. It has moved from the periphery of the capital markets 20 years ago much closer toward the center," says Robert Bruner, dean of the University of Virginia's Darden Graduate Business School.

With money pouring in from pension funds and other deep pockets, the trend shows no signs of stopping. It could end up engulfing companies as diverse as the Los Angeles Times newspaper and ailing automotive supplier Delphi Corp. Just last week, Bill Gates and a Saudi prince were among the investors backing a private buyout of Four Seasons hotels, while another buyout fund announced its plan to acquire the Outback Steakhouse.

Private equity is Wall Street jargon for massive funds - pools of money from large investors - used for owning and managing companies in private, rather than as companies listed on public stock exchanges.

Success begets more investment, especially at a time of rather tepid performance by traditional stocks and bonds. Like hedge funds, real estate, and commodities, private equity has become a new money magnet.

Sometimes the private equity funds pour their cash into young companies, but more of it has been going into buyouts of mature companies like Burger King or Hertz.

To supporters, the deals reflect the dynamism of America's capital markets, in which companies are made, remade, and sometimes broken into pieces by savvy investors. The result, arguably, is that capital finds its most efficient use. It not only enriches owners but helps to make companies more efficient and US workers among the most productive in the world. "We are all better off when companies operate well," Mr. Bruner says.

But skeptics, including some within the investment community, voice a number of concerns.

They say the deals are doing much more for the acquirers than for the economy at large, or even for the traditional shareholders who are forced to sell when the deals happen.

Indeed, the latest buyout wave may raise questions about both the virtue of private equity funds (are they really helping the companies that much?) and about the performance of traditional, publicly traded companies (why can't they do as well for their investors?).

"There is now little question that chief executives across America are increasingly content to allow private equity firms to somehow 'magically' deliver sparkling returns to their shareholders, which they themselves were incapable of producing during their time at the helm," write Henry McVey and David McNellis in a recent market strategy report for the investment bank Morgan Stanley in New York.

They argue that US corporations have essentially become too cautious about investing in new ideas to grow their business. The result is a buildup of cash, and a decline in debt.

That's one reason some of these public companies become tempting targets for private equity funds. The private buyers will plan to do some things that improve the business, so it can be resold later at a higher price. But they will also, often, tap free cash or borrow to provide dividends and fees that guarantee a high rate of return even before they sell.

Burger King is a case in point. In 2002, a group of private equity funds bought the restaurant brand for $1.5 billion from its parent company, Diageo.

DOJ_NMG_0092724

The private owners went through several CEOs, but finally got the hamburger chain sizzling again, with sales boosted by a value menu and new products. In the process, they made sure to get an early slice of the profits, with the $367 million dividend and other fees.

Clearly, the rich are getting richer here. But arguably the economy is also somewhat better off. Analysts see a larger, healthier company than in 2002. Burger King's market value is now more than $2 billion.

If the private equity had merely hollowed out the company with its cash extraction, it wouldn't be worth that much today, some experts point out.

But if private equity is helping corporate America be more productive, the returns may diminish at some point - partly because it's harder to find lucrative deals.

"I definitely think the returns [to private equity] are not going to be as robust as they've been," says Colin Blaydon, an expert on private equity at Dartmouth College's Tuck School of Business in Hanover, N.H.

ENVIRONMENT:

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

Burning Rex

More reaction to the sharply critical letter that Republican Sen. Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Democratic Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia sent recently to Rex W. Tillerson, otherwise welcoming him to his new post as chairman and chief executive officer of Exxon Mobil Corp.

The remainder of the three-page letter, shall we say, blasted a so-called "climate-change denial strategy carried out by and for Exxon Mobil" against global warming -- the senators accusing the oil giant of being "the primary funder of no fewer than 29 climate-change denial front groups in 2004 alone."

The bipartisan pair went so far as to request that Mr. Tillerson "publicly acknowledge both the reality of the climate change and the role of humans in causing or exacerbating it," even absent scientific proof of such a cause.

Now, one prominent Washington group is stepping forward to acknowledge receiving "modest funding from the energy sector, including from Exxon Mobil," although the National Center for Public Policy Research says such funding has never exceeded 1 percent of annual expenditures.

And while it "recognizes both that global temperatures have risen over the past 150 years and that anthropogenic greenhouse-gas emissions contribute to the greenhouse effect," the center calls attention to competing scientific data of the causes of global warming, and therefore believes that any anthropogenic signature is "likely to be modest."

And who can say they aren't right?

Nicolas Copernicus, as the center points out, was condemned for suggesting that the sun, rather than the earth, was the center of our universe. Giordano Bruno, meanwhile, was persecuted and ultimately burned at the stake for arguing that space extended beyond our solar system. And William Harvey was ridiculed by leading medical authorities of his day for suggesting that the heart was the center of the body's circulatory system.

"Copernicus, Bruno and Harvey were persecuted out of fear," it notes. "Each ultimately was proven to be correct."

As for Sens. Snowe and Rockefeller, the center charges they "are engaging in persecution of their own, attempting to silence dissenting voices ... and, as such, should be condemned by Americans of all political persuasions -- both left and right."

Eat your spinach

Still hesitate at the spinach counter, worried Popeye's leafy green bodybuilder will inflict harm instead of produce muscles?

Dr. Henry I. Miller, a physician and fellow at the Hoover Institution, says while the recent outbreak (only 200 cases) of E. coli traced to fresh, bagged spinach garnered a lot of attention, it's only a drop in the bucket of 76 million cases and 5,000 deaths annually from food poisoning in the United States.

As far as the spinach contamination went, it seems some wild hogs rolled out of the mud and into the spinach patch. In fact, the good doctor prescribes in TCS (Technology, Commerce, Society) Daily that Americans' food is not only the least expensive, but the safest in the history of humankind.

"However, there is a limit to how safe we can make agriculture, given that it is an outdoor activity and subject to all manner of unpredictable challenges," states Dr. Miller. "If the goal is to make a field 100 percent safe from contamination, the only solution that guarantees this is to pave it over and build a parking lot on it."

Worth quoting

DOJ_NMG_0092725

"Most of these markers stand over graves of Americans who came home to enjoy the peace they earned. Too many stand over the graves of those who gave their lives to protect that peace."

-- President Bush, in remarks this Veterans Day at Arlington National Cemetery

Buy a book

What do conservative commentator Pat Buchanan, North Dakota's Democratic Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, Republican former defense chief William S. Cohen, and Washington journalists Michael Isikoff and David Corn have in common?

Not a whole lot, quite frankly.

But they've each been selected as featured authors for Wednesday evening's (5:30 to 8:30 p.m.) National Press Club 29th annual Book Fair and Authors' Night, arguably Washington's most prestigious literary event.

Among this year's other authors on hand to sign their latest yarns will be John Dickerson, Ron Fournier, Doug Sosnik, David Maraniss, Helen Thomas and Frederic J. Frommer, whose book is perhaps the least controversial of this year's lineup: "The Washington Nationals 1859 to Today: The Story of Baseball in the Nation's Capital."

Then again ... .

·John McCaslin, whose column is nationally syndicated, can be reached at 202/636-3284 or jmccaslin @washingtontimes.com.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Satellite Gear Aided In Finding Arellano (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 11, 2006

Equipment revealed in court documents

U.S. agents used satellite equipment to track and arrest the suspected leader of the Arellano Félix drug cartel in a boat off the coast of Baja California Sur this summer.

Law enforcement officials hailed the arrest of Francisco Javier Arellano Félix, accused of running the drug cartel in recent years, as a key blow to the organization they say moved tons of drugs between Mexico and California.

Arellano is charged with racketeering and conspiracy to launder money and import drugs.

The existence of the satellite-tracking equipment was revealed in court documents filed by prosecutors this week in response to a defense lawyer's challenge that the arrests took place in Mexican waters and therefore are illegal.

In the papers, prosecutors said the arrests took place in international waters.

Investigators, led by the Drug Enforcement Administration, have been investigating the Tijuana-based cartel for years. In April, they identified a yacht, the Dock Holiday, that authorities said was bought by high-ranking members of the organization.

“On August 14, 2006, agents determined from global positioning satellite equipment that the Dock Holiday was at sea,” prosecutors wrote in the papers.

“At agents' request, the U.S. Coast Guard stopped and boarded the vessel in international waters – according to the GPS equipment, about 13 nautical miles – off the coast of Mexico.”

Mexico has jurisdiction in waters within 12 miles of land, the prosecutors said.

Because the boat was registered in Delaware and its designated home port was Newport Beach, it was a U.S. vessel that could be legally boarded by the Coast Guard in international waters, they said.

Although the boat was flying a Mexican flag at the time, prosecutors said it was not registered in Mexico and was “not entitled to fly Mexico's flag.”

Lawyers for Arellano and a passenger charged with lying to the Coast Guard about his name said they were surprised by the mention of the GPS device.

“We're informed that they got notice the vessel was at sea,” said David Bartick, one of Arellano's lawyers. “I don't know who gave them notice, I don't know how they knew.”

Jeremy Warren represents Cesar Niebla Lerma, the passenger charged with lying about his name. He said existence of a GPS device on the boat raises questions of how it got there.

Depending on how the device was planted, defense lawyers could argue that their clients' rights were violated, he said.

A DEA spokesman was unavailable yesterday, a federal holiday.

In an August news conference announcing the arrests, the head of the San Diego DEA office hinted that no informant tipped agents off to the location of the boat, despite a $5 million reward for information leading to Arellano.

“No one will be collecting that reward,” John Fernandes said.

DOJ_NMG_0092726

He wouldn't say at the time how agents knew the boat's whereabouts.

"These kinds of operations take surveillance, surveillance, surveillance," Fernandes said. "That's . . . boots on the ground, or in this case, boots on the water."

Eight men and three boys were on the boat. The boys and two of the men have returned to Mexico, and six of the men remain in U.S. jails. Only Arellano and Niebla face charges in the United States.

One of the others, a suspected cartel leader, Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, is facing extradition to Mexico, where he is wanted on racketeering and other charges.

The three others have refused a judge's order to testify before a federal grand jury here and are being held in contempt of court.

Accused Drug Dealer Reaches Plea Agreement After Laced Heroin Deaths (NBC10)

NBC 10.com, November 13, 2006

Dover Man To Spend At Least 20 Years In Prison

DOVER, Del. -- An accused drug dealer suspected of distributing fentanyl-laced heroin that killed a Dover man will spend at least 20 years in prison after agreeing to plead guilty to a federal drug charge.

A federal grand jury returned a six-count indictment in September against Joseph Bentley, 22, of New Castle.

On Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Wilmington, Bentley agreed to plead guilty to a single count of distribution of heroin and fentanyl resulting in the death of another individual. Prosecutors agreed to dismiss the other counts of the indictment.

The charge to which Bentley agreed to plead guilty carries a mandatory minimum 20-year prison sentence, and a maximum penalty of life in prison and $1 million fine. Federal prosecutors agreed to recommend a three-level reduction in the sentencing guideline range for his acceptance of responsibility in the death of Seth Boyd, 30, of Dover.

Bentley is the first person in Delaware prosecuted under a federal law that mandates prison time for a person who provides a drug that kills or seriously injures another person.

Boyd, who owned a business that sold vintage autographs and historical documents, was found dead in his home on April 28. An autopsy concluded that he died from respiratory failure due to inhalation of fentanyl.

Boyd's girlfriend told state investigators that Bentley had delivered 13 bags of heroin to Boyd's home on the day he died. State police found two empty heroin bags inside the home, one with a straw in it.

When state police arrested Bentley on May 5, he was carrying a copy of Boyd's obituary in his pocket.

Authorities later obtained tape recordings of telephone conversations between Bentley and his father, Arthur Bentley, who was being held at Delaware Correctional Center in Smyrna on drug charges. According to an affidavit by a Drug Enforcement Administration special agent, Bentley told his father that a batch of heroin he had obtained had killed two of his customers.

As part of the plea agreement, Bentley will reimburse Boyd's estate for ambulance, medical, funeral and burial expenses.

7 Indicted In Prospect Heights Crack Sting (PROJO)

By Tatiana Pina, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, November 10, 2006

PAWTUCKET — After a 10-month investigation, a federal grand jury has charged seven men with drug trafficking for allegedly selling crack cocaine out of the Prospect Heights housing project.

During a news conference at Pawtucket police headquarters yesterday, U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente said that four of the seven have been arrested. The others are considered fugitives.

Corrente said law-enforcement officers disrupted a large-scale cocaine-trafficking ring in Prospect Heights.

Some of the men who are charged are suspected of being part of a loosely knit gang known as the Prospect Heights Posse, which has no known national affiliation, Pawtucket Police Chief George L. Kelley III said.

A total of 22 ounces of crack cocaine was recovered, according to Corrente. It has a street value of $22,000. One of the men was also charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm. Law enforcement officers recovered a 25 calibre pistol.

The investigation was conducted by city police and the Drug Enforcement Administration Task Force. Teams of federal agents and city officers arrested three men last week. One man was already in custody for his alleged role in robbing a delivery man at Prospect Heights.

John L. Kimborough, 38, of Pawtucket, who is also known as "Country," was charged with distributing crack cocaine and being a felon in possession of a firearm. Jorge Henriquez, 22, of Central Falls, was charged with two counts of distributing crack cocaine, one of them involving more than 50 grams. Samuel Ross, 27, of Pawtucket, was charged with distributing more than 50 grams of crack cocaine; he was already in custody. Francisco Arias, 25, and Braulio D. Henriquez, 19, both of Central Falls, were each charged conspiracy to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine and possession with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine. Candido Rodriguez, also known as Jeilin Vasquez, 38, was charged with two counts of distributing more than 50 grams of crack cocaine. Fernando J. Torres, 22, of Pawtucket, was charged with distributing more than 50 grams of crack cocaine.

DOJ_NMG_0092727

Arias, Rodriguez and Torres are considered fugitives. The other four men pleaded not guilty and are being held.

Another View: Smokescreen Of Medical Pot Clouds View Of The Dangers (SACBEE)

By Gordon D. Taylor, Special to the Bee

The Sacramento Bee, November 13, 2006

Pro-pot advocates often spread misinformation on the subject of so-called "medical marijuana." It's important to show the other side of the issue.

In the past 10 years, California has seen a surge of organized crime groups that have moved into the marijuana industry in a big way. Heavily armed drug cartels have made a multibillion-dollar business of going into our public lands and clear-cutting our pristine forests so they can cultivate enormous marijuana crops. Sophisticated criminal syndicates are buying homes in the Sacramento region and creating indoor marijuana factories in the midst of our family-oriented neighborhoods.

A rogue "pot club" industry has also developed throughout the state. Over the past two years, the DEA has participated in six enforcement actions against pot clubs operating in the Central Valley and inland Northern California. Shockingly, three of the six pot store owners were convicted felons, each of whom was armed with a handgun during the course of the investigations.

The largest of the six pot clubs sold marijuana to an astounding 400 people a day. Owned by two 26-year-old men, this Modesto pot club reported selling more than $3.4 million in marijuana within a six-month period. This pot club was going so well that the owners were paying their security guards $125 to $150 an hour.

Most of the people buying marijuana from these pot clubs do not appear to be seriously or terminally ill; they are able bodied, some even athletically fit, most in their 20s and some even in their late teens. These young people are purchasing marijuana not because they are seriously or terminally ill, but because they want to use marijuana for recreational purposes. To put it bluntly, they want to smoke marijuana to get high while using state laws as their shield.

Marijuana has no proven safe and effective medical use and therefore remains a prohibited substance under federal law. Contrary to misinformation spread by many medical marijuana advocates, pot is not a harmless or soft drug. In fact, it's eight times more potent today than it was in the early 1970s. Sadly, more teenagers enter drug treatment for marijuana dependency than for all other illegal drugs combined.

It's up to each of us to not only protect our public lands and neighborhoods, but to educate our young people about the dangers of marijuana and help them see through the "medical marijuana" smokescreen. About the writer:

Gordon D. Taylor, a veteran DEA agent, has oversight of Drug Enforcement Administration operations in 34 counties throughout the Central Valley and inland Northern California. He is responding to the Nov. 5 Forum article "What a long, strange trip for state's medical marijuana laws."

Jewelry Theft Ring Is Busted Up, FBI Says (SLPD)

By Robert Patrick, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, November 13, 2006

FBI agents and police say they have broken a ring of crooks believed to have taken more than $1 million worth of goods from traveling jewelry salesmen in Missouri, Illinois and elsewhere since 2003.

In a sworn statement made public in federal court in St. Louis this week, FBI Special Agent Mark Wood wrote that investigators had known for years that a group of Colombian nationals was responsible.

Included were crimes in Des Peres in 2003, Clayton and Columbia, Ill., in 2005, and in Chesterfield, Frontenac and Town and Country this year, Wood wrote.

Five suspects were arrested, and two have been charged so far. The two, Dairo deJesus Giraldo-Soto and Roldolfo Aristizabal-Munoz, appeared in federal court in St. Louis this week to face charges of interstate transportation of stolen goods. They remain in custody.

Court documents laid out the scheme this way:

The men watched jewelry stores to identify visiting brokers and salesmen. Then they followed selected victims and either confronted them with a weapon or snatched merchandise from their unattended vehicles.

A motel employee tipped off investigators last month that some guests might be drug dealers. Drug Enforcement Administration agents followed the men, determined they were watching jewelry stores, and turned the matter over to the FBI and St. Louis County police.

Using a minivan and sedan, the suspects watched multiple jewelry stores in St. Louis County on Halloween. The next day, as investigators' suspicions mounted, the men parked close to Saettele Jewelers, near the St. Louis Galleria.

DOJ_NMG_0092728

The suspects followed a jeweler as he left the store carrying a case, but lost him in traffic. They then watched two other jewelry stores before investigators who had been trailing them closed in.

Inside the minivan, officers found three men, a stun gun, a glass cutter, a tool used to make a hole in glass, knives, cell phones, jewelry tools, a global positioning unit and UPS shipping supplies.

They also pulled over the sedan and found two men and similar equipment.

None of the missing jewelry has been recovered. Police said the robbers would ship the loot to Miami and quickly leave town.

Giraldo-Soto told investigators that the men had come to the St. Louis area from Chicago, intending to rob or steal from salesmen, including the man at Saettele's.

He admitted the suspects' role in multiple similar thefts or robberies and said the men had shipped or driven the jewels back to Florida, where they live, officials said.

The fingerprints of Aristizabal-Munoz linked him to a June 28 robbery in Town and Country, officials said.

In that case, police said at the time, a salesman from New York left Novak Jewelry after about 20 minutes to find that his car wouldn't start. He got out and was confronted by three men with a stun gun, who took a case containing more than $425,000 in jewelry inside.

In the Frontenac case, two men took more than $250,000 from a jewelry salesman in a parking lot outside the Safe Deposit Co. at 515 Lindbergh Boulevard on July 11, police said at the time.

John Stobbs, the attorney for Aristizabal-Munoz, told a reporter Friday, "He maintains his innocence." Giraldo-Soto's public defender could not be reached for comment.

The three other men had not been charged as of Friday. Two of them had entered the country illegally, and one was an American citizen, police said.

Yet another Colombian native was sentenced to 22 months in prison in 2002 for the robbery of $500,000 in jewels from a salesman at a fast food restaurant in Glen Carbon in 2001. That Colombian, Leonardo Quintero of Florida, who also had Stobbs as his attorney, cooperated with investigators and spoke of a similar ring of thieves and robbers.

Heather Ratcliffe of the Post-Dispatch contributed to this report.

Insurgent Activity Spikes In Afghanistan (AP)

By Jason Straziuso, The Associated Press

AP, November 12, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Insurgent activity in Afghanistan has risen fourfold this year, and militants now launch more than 600 attacks a month, a rising wave of violence that has resulted in 3,700 deaths in 2006, a bleak new report released Sunday found.

In the volatile border area near Pakistan, more than 20 Taliban militants _ and possibly as many as 60 _ were killed during several days of clashes, officials said Sunday.

The new report said insurgents were launching more than 600 attacks a month as of the end of September, up from 300 a month at the end of March this year. The violence has killed more than 3,700 people this year, it said.

Afghanistan saw about 130 insurgent attacks a month last year, said the report by the Joint Coordination and Monitoring Board, a body of Afghan and international officials charged with overseeing the implementation of the Afghanistan Compact, a five-year reconstruction and development blueprint signed in February.

The violence "threatens to reverse some of the gains made in the recent past, with development activities being especially hard hit in several areas, resulting in partial or total withdrawal of international agencies in a number of the worst-affected provinces."

The report said that the rising drug trade in Afghanistan is fueling the insurgency in four volatile southern provinces. The slow pace of development is contributing to popular disaffection and ineffective implementation of the drug fight, it said.

Afghanistan's poppy crop, which is used to make heroin, increased by 59 percent in Afghanistan this past year.

Insurgents have launched a record number of roadside bombs and suicide attacks this year, and there have been clashes all year between insurgents and Afghan and NATO security forces, particularly in the southern and eastern provinces near the border with Pakistan.

The 3,700 deaths the report attributes to insurgent-related violence is comparable to the number of deaths _ about 3,500 _ tallied by The Associated Press this year based on reports from the U.S. military, NATO and Afghan officials.

DOJ_NMG_0092729

In the east, Gen. Murad Ali, the deputy Afghan army commander for Paktika province, said 20 bodies were recovered from fighting in Bermel district in the last several days. In addition, he said, two trucks carrying Taliban fighters were destroyed by airstrikes or artillery fire, and officials estimated 40 fighters were killed in those strikes.

Four NATO soldiers and three Afghan soldiers were injured, he said, though a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force said he was not aware of any serious injuries among NATO troops.

Maj. Luke Knittig said the operations in Bermel, which borders Pakistan, were part of an ongoing Afghan-NATO mission to root out Taliban militants before winter.

"We know we've engaged in successful operations in Bermel with a purpose, and we think those have had a very positive effect against insurgent activity there," Knittig said.

Knittig said Ali's estimate of 60 dead fighters "sounds about right to me," but he did not have an independent estimate of the number killed. "We are not into the numbers game here lately," he said.

Death tolls in remote areas of Afghanistan are almost impossible to verify and often vary widely.

Abdul Baqi Nuristani, the provincial police chief, said only 25 militants have been killed in Bermel the last couple days. He said three Afghan and three NATO soldiers were injured in what he called "a very big battle."

Ali said tribal elders took the bodies of eight Pakistani fighters back over the border to be buried.

Afghan officials have repeatedly accused Pakistan of not doing enough to prevent Pakistani or other foreign fighters from crossing the border to launch attacks. Pakistan says it does all it can, though border attacks have increased since a September agreement led the Pakistani military to pull out of its lawless tribal region.

Bermel is home to a military base that hosts both Afghan and U.S. soldiers. NATO-led troops aided by military aircraft killed 15 suspected insurgents in the district on Tuesday after troops on patrol came under attack.

UN: Iran, Afghanistan, Pakistan Need To Share Drugs Data (AP)

AP, November 13, 2006

TEHRAN (AP)--Iran and neighboring Pakistan and Afghanistan must share intelligence on drug smuggling, the head of the United Nations agency against drugs said Friday.

Antonio Maria Costa, the director of the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, finished a three-day visit to Iran by praising the government's efforts against drug trafficking, according to a statement issued by the agency.

Iran had seized 231 tons of opium in 2005, more than any other country in the world, the statement said.

But Costa warned the world's production of opium was far greater than what was being intercepted.

"Afghanistan has produced a record 6,100 tons of opium this year and about 80% of this will flow through Pakistan and Iran," he said in his statement. "Only about a quarter of this is likely to be intercepted - about half the success rate with the world cocaine trade.

"I urge these three countries, and their international partners, to establish an intelligence-sharing platform," he added. "If counter-narcotics police in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iran share intelligence, they could really hit the traffickers hard."

While in Iran, Costa met President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and other senior Iranian officials and made a helicopter trip to the Iranian border with Afghanistan and Pakistan, the statement said.

U.S. Reaffirms Support For Embattled Kabul Government (WP)

By Pamela Constable, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Nov. 9 -- A senior State Department official said Thursday that the Bush administration has been "surprised by the intensity of the violence" in Afghanistan over the past year, but he reiterated its "firm commitment" to support the embattled Kabul government.

Richard Boucher, the top State Department official on South and Central Asia, said this week's U.S. elections and the abrupt resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would have "no impact" on U.S. military policy here.

His comments came as he was finishing a three-day visit to Pakistan and Afghanistan. The governments of both countries have recently faced rising violence from Islamic insurgents and a drop in domestic popularity.

Boucher described Afghan President Hamid Karzai as an "excellent partner" who faces "very difficult tasks," and he said Washington was "firmly with the government and the people of Pakistan" in their fight against Islamic extremists. He also noted the "very strong support among Republicans and Democrats for the mission" in Afghanistan.

U.S. military officials here echoed those comments, saying troop levels would remain at roughly 20,000 for the foreseeable future; currently, more than 10,000 of them operate under the NATO flag.

DOJ_NMG_0092730

Boucher said the key to combating a revived Taliban insurgency on both sides of the Afghan-Pakistani border was to "extend the benefits of government" to areas of conflict.

Many Afghans have expressed anger over the lack of government protection and services in rural provinces, a void that has helped fortify the Taliban and allowed for an upsurge in opium cultivation. There is also growing resentment against the presence of foreign military forces, and Taliban leaders have attracted support by calling for resistance.

Boucher acknowledged that U.S. officials had all been surprised by the level of violence in Afghanistan over the past year, during which more than 1,500 people have been killed and 70 suicide bombs have exploded. But he said two recent peace accords signed between Pakistan's government and tribal leaders in the country's violent border regions were "hopeful signs."

In separate meetings with journalists this week in Kabul and Islamabad, the Pakistani capital, Boucher deflected questions about rising anti-American and anti-government sentiment in the tribal regions. He declined to directly address the widespread public belief that the United States was behind an Oct. 30 missile attack on a religious school in the Bajaur tribal region of Pakistan. That attack killed 82 people.

"The Pakistani government said it carried out this action, initiated this action, and that it was necessary because militants, terrorists, were at a training center," Boucher said Tuesday. "I have no reason to doubt that, and frankly from what I have seen, I have every reason to believe it."

Pakistani officials have said they attacked the site, but many Pakistanis are convinced that the missiles were dropped by a U.S. drone plane and that the school contained only young religious students.

Boucher declined to say whether the airstrike was based on U.S. intelligence or whether Pakistan had acted because of U.S. concerns that it was not doing enough to fight terrorism.

The missile attack has convulsed the tribal region. After a suicide bombing at a military training camp Wednesday killed 42 recruits, Islamic extremists said it was a reprisal for the Bajaur attack.

IMMIGRATION:

Hunch Unravels Immigrant Wedding Scam (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

They didn't hug. They didn't kiss. They didn't even sit together.

Many couples going to the Arlington County Courthouse seemed more like strangers than people applying for marriage licenses. A man named Sam often escorted them to the sixth-floor clerk's office. Sometimes, there would be a furtive exchange of money in the elevator.

Before long, some of the same people would be back, filing for divorce, their court papers littered with mistakes -- always the same mistakes.

"They misspelled 'circuit,' " said David A. Bell, the longtime Circuit Court clerk. "It was obvious something was going on."

Bell tipped off police, triggering a nearly four-year investigation that recently broke up one of the Washington region's biggest and most brazen immigration scams: an estimated 1,000 fake marriages. The scheme was centered in the area's little-noticed but rapidly growing community of immigrants from Ghana.

For immigrants, marrying a U.S. citizen is a quick ticket to citizenship. Along the East Coast and all the way to West Africa, at car dealerships, malls, parties and even a Home Depot, the word had spread: If you are in the United States illegally, go to Arlington. It's easy to get married in Virginia, because marriage laws are relatively lax. Arlington, with its proximity to the Metro system and the District, is especially convenient.

In recent weeks, 19 of 22 people charged so far in the undercover investigation have pleaded guilty in federal court in Alexandria, including bank tellers, car salesmen and health-care workers. Court testimony and interviews document how Ghanaian immigrants married U.S. citizens they had met the same day, then were coached on how to fool immigration inspectors, usually months later, into believing that the marriage was real. All they wanted, they said, was to stay in the United States.

Now, they will have to leave.

Caroline Chepkwony, who entered the United States in 1996 as an employee of the Kenyan Embassy, sobbed on the witness stand recently as she told the judge that she found a sham husband for the sake of her 3-year-old son.

"This is why I entered into this marriage, just hoping to give my son the best life he can get," said Chepkwony, 36, as she pleaded guilty to marriage fraud. "And I figured out the only place he can get a better life is here in America."'The Program' Grows

DOJ_NMG_0092731

As Latinos have migrated in record numbers to the Washington region, there has been a quieter exodus: from Africa, especially the Republic of Ghana. The Northern Virginia and Maryland suburbs are home to the second-highest concentration of Ghanaians in the nation, about 20,000.

One of the first to arrive was Samuel "Sam" Acquah. Born in Ghana in 1949, Acquah came to the United States on a student visa. He got a master's degree, a law degree from George Mason University and a $112,000-a-year job in the chemical engineering section of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office in Alexandria.

As more Ghanaians arrived, Acquah wanted to help them stay. Better yet, he thought, he could make money doing it by finding strangers to marry them quickly after their visas expired.

Informally, he named his business "the program." When a fellow Ghanaian called, Acquah would charge the immigrant $3,000 to $3,500. Two employees were Acquah's "contacts" and helped find U.S. citizens willing to get married for money. Acquah split the profit with his contact, who paid the U.S. citizen $500.

Acquah set up shop in his government office, using his government-owned fax machine to communicate about illicit marriages.

Word of the scheme spread to immigrants even before they left Ghana. "Those who were coming over here knew where to find an apartment, where to find a job and where to find a spouse," said one law enforcement official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

The business became so lucrative -- Acquah has admitted pocketing $200,000 -- that it spawned competitors. One key rival was Eric Amoah, a Ghanaian immigrant whose own fraudulent marriage to a U.S. citizen had been arranged by Acquah.

A short, balding man with a calm demeanor and five children, Amoah, 43, came to the United States in 1999. Marriage fraud helped put him through pharmacy school, and he worked as a pharmacy technician at Prince William Hospital in Manassas, even as his marriage business continued to mushroom.

Amoah put out word among the U.S. Ghanaian community, which grew from 20,889 in 1990 to 101,169 in 2004, according to U.S. Census Bureau estimates. At his five-bedroom house in Woodbridge, Amoah threw elaborate parties. At one such gathering, he met Markey Simpkins, a supervisor at a Home Depot in the District.

Simpkins became a contact and asked co-workers if they wanted to marry an immigrant for money. Those interested would get to meet Amoah or another Ghanaian marriage arranger. Simpkins pocketed $50 per introduction.

Abena Nkrumah heard about Amoah when she needed an operation for abdominal problems. One way to get health insurance, her doctor's office suggested, was to marry a U.S. citizen.

At an Alexandria shopping center, Amoah and Nkrumah bonded through their shared Ghanaian heritage. "He told me he can help me get married," said Nkrumah, a health-care worker, as she entered her guilty plea last month. She told U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III that she could not have stayed with her sham husband, saying he smokes. Ellis smiled.

Occasionally, the men and women would decide they liked each other and would stay married. Far more often, they lived separate lives before reuniting, however briefly, at immigration offices in Fairfax County and Baltimore. There, they would recite their made-up stories about how they met or invent details such as which side of the bed their spouse slept on. Immigrants who marry U.S. citizens can get a visa to stay in the country immediately, instead of having to wait years, and can speed their citizenship by several years.

Ghanaians drawn to this prospect flocked to Arlington from as far as New York and South Carolina. "People would come here for two days to get married and then go back," said Robin Crumblin, one of Amoah's key lieutenants.

Northern Virginia was the obvious choice to center the scheme. Couples can get a license within minutes -- there are waiting periods in the District and Maryland -- and get married the same day.

Occasionally, the phony couples would go to courthouses in Alexandria, Fairfax County, Manassas, the District or Maryland. But the vast majority went to Arlington. The courthouse is on a Metro line, and plenty of civil magistrates nearby can perform a quick ceremony. "Everything was right there in the same spot," Crumblin said in an interview before pleading guilty last month to conspiracy to commit immigration fraud.

Crumblin, 44, can't read or write. She has eight children and lives in a public housing apartment in the District. But she achieved a position of prominence in Amoah's organization.

She met him through a friend, the first time in the parking lot of the Arlington courthouse. Her husband had been injured. She needed the work.

Crumblin's main job was to track down the U.S. citizens, up to a year after the actual marriage, so they could go with their Ghanaian spouse to the immigration office. Often, the search led her to a homeless shelter in the District or to a mother on welfare.

They often were not happy to see her. The U.S. citizens had been told that all they had to do for their $300 or so was get married. Now, they were demanding more money.

DOJ_NMG_0092732

The Ghanaians, increasingly desperate, would have to pay. Crumblin felt caught in the middle. "They'd call my house at 4 a.m. and say, 'Where's my wife?' " said Crumblin, who says she regrets her role because of the example it set for her children.

Pressure was also building on Amoah, whose business had slowed in recent months. He suspected he was under scrutiny and became more secretive, working out of a Red Roof Inn in Springfield instead of his home.Prison, Deportation Loom

In early 2003, an Arlington courthouse clerk noticed the oddly distant behavior of some marriage license applicants. She compared notes with fellow clerks, who were noticing the same thing, then relayed her suspicions to her boss, Bell, who called Arlington authorities. Soon, a federal-state task force was infiltrating the various marriage fraud organizations through cooperators and undercover agents. The Arlington courthouse was put under surveillance. It took time to build the cases.

By this fall, prosecutors thought they had enough evidence. Most of those convicted probably will serve less than a year in prison. Acquah and Amoah, who recently pleaded guilty to conspiracies to commit immigration fraud and money laundering, are expected to spend more time there.

But the biggest price is yet to come. Virtually all of the Ghanaians and other West African immigrants convicted -- most of those charged were immigrants, although several U.S. citizens were charged as well -- will be deported. Some now face the agonizing choice of whether to leave their children born in the United States, who are U.S. citizens, or take them to Africa.

U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee offered a few words of comfort to Chepkwony at her recent plea hearing. But his sympathy only went so far.

"America is composed of -- is a nation of immigrants," he said. "Everyone here came from somewhere else. However . . . there are rules on how one can immigrate to live here permanently.

"You did not follow the rules."

Democrats May Proceed With Caution On Immigration (WP)

By Darryl Fears, Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

When election results started rolling in Tuesday, Cecilia MuÃ±oz said that she and other immigration advocates were "holding our breath." One by one, Republicans who had fought tooth and nail for stricter immigration laws fell, turning control of Congress over to the Democrats.

By morning, a 700-mile Mexican border fence passed by Republicans in a pre-election gambit had fallen flat with voters. A sharply worded GOP bill that targeted illegal immigrants and spurred marches by millions of Latinos in the spring appeared likely to fade into memory.

"I think this is the best environment we've had on the issue in quite some time," said Cassandra Q. Butts, a senior vice president for the pro-immigration Center for American Progress.

But when it comes to immigration, things are never easy. In the days after the election, Democratic leaders surprised pro-immigration groups by not including the issue on their list of immediate priorities. Experts said the issue is so complicated, so sensitive and so explosive that it could easily blow up in the Democrats' faces and give control of Congress back to Republicans in the next election two years from now. And a number of Democrats who took a hard line on illegal immigration were also elected to Congress.

"It's not without its challenges, for sure," said Jeanne Butterfield, executive director of the American Immigration Lawyers Association. "You've got opposition in both parties. You still have restrictionists in the Republican Party. You have Democrats who've been reluctant to move on any kind of worker program."

Butterfield predicted that lobbyists and Democrats have less than a year to move legislation that could put some 12 million illegal immigrants on a path to legal residency, before the looming 2008 elections make a deal politically impossible. And analysts say the fate of President Bush's proposal to create a temporary worker program for 200,000 immigrants is in doubt, with labor's allies in charge.

In recent days, advocates have been burning up the phone lines talking to one another and to try to determine whom House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the presumed speaker of the next Congress, will appoint to key committees, and how the new Democratically controlled Congress will approach the issue.

Major challenges lay ahead. The Mexican border remains a sieve where an estimated 100,000 immigrants sneak into the country every year. Conservatives in the House, and some Democrats, want the border sealed with manpower, fencing and technological gadgets before they will even consider guest workers.

Mark Krikorian, executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies, which opposes increased immigration, said Democrats should implement an enforcement program first. Anything else might be political suicide.

"The Democrats need to get their majority reelected in the next two years," Krikorian said. "My sense is that the Democrats have grown up enough to know they can't get reelected trying to get everything they want."

Immigration experts are on the lookout for the kind of compromises that led to the flawed immigration reform laws of 1986 and 1996. In those years, a White House and Congress split between the two parties passed watered-down laws requiring employers to check the legal status of new hires to satisfy businesses and immigration advocates. They also failed to give enforcement agencies the money, staff, technology or practical ability to do the job.

The miscues paved the way for an explosion of illegal immigration.

"The question is, will this just be another split-the-baby approach, such as we saw in 1986," said Robert Bonner, commissioner of U.S. Customs and Border Protection from 2003 to 2005, "or are we actually going to do something that is going to seriously achieve the objectives of controlling the border?"

At the White House Friday, the Bush administration struck a bipartisan chord, trumpeting both border enforcement and a guest worker initiative. "The President believes a temporary guest worker program, where you will know if you're in or you're out, is going to relieve pressure on the border and also reduce the incentive for people to travel from Central America through Mexico in search of such jobs," said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

Bush supports a proposal by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) to allow foreign nationals currently outside the country to work in the United States temporarily. Illegal immigrants now in the country could work too, but only if they pay a $2,000 penalty for breaking the law, pay back taxes, undergo a criminal check, learn English, take civics lessons, go to the back of the employment line and then work six years with no legal problems.

The McCain-Kennedy bill would also strengthen the border and create a computerized system to check the legal status of workers. The Senate bill would authorize spending $400 million to expand a pilot program used by 5,000 employers to cover new hires by more than 8 million U.S. companies within 18 months.

But some experts are skeptical. The non-partisan Migration Policy Institute has said that the pilot system is flawed, will take at least three years to implement, and will fail unless it is made much more accurate. The MPI panel, co-chaired by former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) and former senator Spencer Abraham (R-Mich.) also said other steps are needed, such as producing tamper-proof Social Security or other employment ID card based on fingerprints or other unique identifying features.

Others say thousands of immigration investigators are needed to verify legal workers and track down those who remain in the country illegally.

James W. Ziglar, former commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, said if Congress does take up an overhaul, "the recognition that enforcement has to be of equal stature is something that will occur this time, because the lessons learned from the 1986 act are still burning very brightly in the minds of people on both sides of the debate."

MuÃ±oz, a vice president at the National Council of La Raza, the nation's largest Latino civil rights group, said Democrats should move carefully ahead with a plan that satisfies both sides.

"This notion that it's dangerous to vote to support comprehensive immigration reform I believe to be false," she said. In Arizona, she said, voters rejected anti-immigration Republicans Randy Graf and Rep. J.D. Hayworth.

But, to show how complicated the issue is, Arizona voters also approved three referenda to make life tougher for illegal immigrants.

Anti-immigration Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), who was distraught after the election, believing a guest worker program was inevitable under the Democrats, now says he's changed his mind.

"It seemed to me that it was not going to be as easy for them as I had anticipated or feared," Tancredo said. "They're not putting it out there as their number one, out-of-the-box issue."

The more he thought about the issue, the more cloudy the future seemed.

"I don't know," he said. A temporary guest worker program "could certainly happen. I may be just skipping past the graveyard."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Can Bush Sr. And His Team Save Son's Presidency? (NSWK)

By Jon Meacham

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - George Herbert Walker Bush is a proud father; tears easily come to his eyes when he thinks of his children, all of them, and there is gracious deference in his tone when he talks about the son he calls, with emphasis, "The President." He is not given to boasting about or bragging on his family; he still hears his mother's voice warning him to avoid "the Great I Am," but several times over the past few years the 41st president has mentioned to visitors that the 43rd president has read the Bible in its entirety—not once, the father says, but twice, sticking two fingers in the air. If so, then the incumbent may recall the Song of Moses: "Remember the days of old, consider the years of many generations; ask thy father, and he will show thee; thy elders, and they will tell thee."

DOJ_NMG_0092734

Ask thy father, and he will show thee: advice that, at long last, George W. Bush seems to be taking. Last week the president lost both houses of Congress and 16 more Americans died in Iraq, bringing the U.S. death toll to 2,844, with little discernible progress in sight. The war there has now lasted 44 months, the amount of time that elapsed between Pearl Harbor and VJ Day.

In a conference room filled with commemorative shotguns in his Houston offices last Wednesday, the father settled in to watch his son's post-election press conference on TV. Lunching on pizza, Bush Senior listened as George W. Bush said the loss of Congress was a "thumping," promised to "work with" a commission on Iraq chaired by James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton, and announced that Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld was resigning. Within two hours the president was in the Oval Office with Rumsfeld and his replacement: Robert M. Gates, Bush Senior's CIA director and the president of Texas A&M University, the home of Bush 41's presidential library.

In Houston the phones started ringing, and Bush 41 staffers were pulled away from their pizza. Reporters were calling and e-mailing: would 41 talk about 43's shake-up? The answer was no, though two perfunctory statements were issued (one for the College Station Eagle and one, as the former president put it, "for everybody else"). Still, the reality spoke for itself. Dad's team was back—a remarkable course correction in the political life of the son and, quite possibly, in the life of the nation.

The American people, as politicians like to say, spoke last week—and spoke in no uncertain terms. The 2006 vote does not suggest an eagerness for a sharp left turn. It seems, rather, to be a plea for a shift from the hard right of the neoconservatives to the center represented by the old man in Houston. The re-emergence of Iraq Study Group voices such as Baker, Gates and Alan Simpson—all longtime friends of Bush Senior—is not unlike the entrance of Fortinbras at the conclusion of "Hamlet." These are 41's men, and the removal of Rumsfeld—an ancient rival of Bush Senior's from the Ford days—is a move toward the broad middle. The apparent triumph of pragmatism over ideology on Iraq was welcome news, at least to the public. In the new NEWSWEEK Poll, 67 percent favor Bush Senior's internationalist approach to foreign policy over his son's more unilateral course.

Did 41 help bring Gates to the Pentagon? The White House denies it, but, as a Bush friend told NEWSWEEK, "his fingerprints are all over this." (The friend refused to be identified for fear of alienating the family.) Given the mists of secrecy that envelop the 41-43 relationship, it is striking that the broad Bush circle believes he had a hand in the Rumsfeld succession: as an old CIA director, 41 rarely leaves any clues at all.

What the two Bushes discuss has long been a subject of endless guesswork. "In my experience, the two men spent most of their time talking about family matters, about sports, about fishing," former White House chief of staff Andy Card told NEWSWEEK. "They spoke to each other much more as father and son rather than as president and former president." Still, politics and policy do come up. "It would be wrong to assume that they never discuss Iraq, the state of play in the world and some personalities," Card said. "But it would also be wrong to assume that they discuss these things all the time. They are mutually deferential to one another."

The Bush family psychodrama is the stuff of perennial speculation but little information, since the two people who know the most about it—the father and the son—speak of it so infrequently. Yet its complexity, its blend of love and rivalry, is rich analytical territory. (Maureen Dowd of The New York Times, an unlikely e-mail pal of 41's, has spent so much time contemplating the generational drama that she ultimately published an excellent book on the topic, "Bushworld"; it ran to 544 pages.) In perhaps the most revealing on-the-record remark about their relationship made by either man, the son once told Bob Woodward that his father is "the wrong father to appeal to in terms of strength. There is a higher father that I appeal to."

As the war has gone badly and the years have ticked by—2003, 2004, 2005 and now much of 2006—the senior President Bush, the man who managed to capture just 37 percent of the vote in 1992, has grown in stature. Raising taxes and capping domestic spending in 1990, refusing to exceed the United Nations mandate after expelling Saddam from Kuwait, and deftly managing the end of the cold war and the reunification of Germany loom ever larger. Given the midterm reaction to the son's inattention to alliances and to the details of postwar Iraq, it is clear that many Americans are nostalgic for the skills and sensibility the first President Bush brought to the Oval Office—a reversal of historical fortune that has come, sadly for the father, at the expense of his son.

In terms of foreign policy, it is true that 41 was more a realist than an ideologue—the prose to Reagan's cold-war poetry. And it is also true that the son would prefer to be remembered not as a second George Bush but as a second Gipper—a big, transformative president who confronted a mortal threat to the nation with steely soul and soaring words. Hence, it seems, the innate appeal of the neoconservative argument, advanced in part by Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney (a 41 figure who got neocon religion after 9/11), to strike Iraq in a noble bid to transform the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0092735

In classical terms, the tragic figure is someone whose inherent flaws are evident from the beginning. In the wake of September 11, we knew our president's virtues. He was resolute, disdainful of dissent; like his hero Winston Churchill, Bush dismissed critics he believes spin around with "the alacrity of squirrels." But we also knew Bush's vices. Resolution can harden into stubbornness; a refusal to listen to criticism can breed isolation.

Hindsight, of course, is a luxury, and life often appears clearer in retrospect than it does at the time, in the arena. The bet Bush has made in the Middle East is a grand one, and history is made, and people are freed, by grand gambles. The American Founders gambled with Britain in 1776; Churchill gambled with Germany in 1940; Reagan gambled with the Soviet Union in the 1980s. The line between triumph and tragedy is a thin one, and things may yet work out.

Or so we must believe. Faith is important to the Bushes, always has been, and to return to the Bible the president knows so well, there is a New Testament verse familiar to patrician politicians from Theodore Roosevelt and his cousin Franklin to Prescott and George H.W. Bush: "To whom much is given," the Scriptures say, "much is expected." Much has been given to George W. Bush, and now, in the twilight of his term, as his father's men step in, he has been given another great gift: one more chance to set things right.

The Rescue Squad (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - The rendezvous in the supermarket parking lot was a secret. On the Sunday before the elections, Robert Gates, the president of Texas A&M University and the deputy national-security adviser and CIA director in the administration of President George H.W. Bush, drove two hours from College Station, Texas, to the small town of McGregor, where he switched from his own car to one driven by White House chief of staff Josh Bolten. Gates was quietly taken to President George W. Bush's office on his ranch at Crawford, where the two talked long enough to convince Bush that Gates was the man to replace Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Guests at the presidential ranch, assembled for the 60th birthday of First Lady Laura Bush and the First Couple's 29th wedding anniversary, didn't even notice Gates's coming and going.

Across the state of Texas, at his house in Houston, James A. Baker III was following his favorite Sunday-afternoon routine. He was taking a nap. Later, it would be widely speculated that Baker was somehow in on the secret, that he helped arrange the firing of Rumsfeld and the appointment of Gates as part of a fundamental power shift, a last-ditch rescue operation—by the old guard of Bush 41 to save Bush 43 from sinking ever deeper into the Iraq morass. Baker is the co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, which is looking for a solution to the Iraq riddle, and Gates was a fellow commissioner, as well as a mutual friend of Baker and of Bush 41. Rumsfeld would have been a surefire obstacle to whatever Baker was proposing. Gates is likely to welcome the Iraq Study Group recommendations as if they were his own (which, in a manner of speaking, some of them are). Baker is one of the great behind-the-scenes manipulators of any age. So, NEWSWEEK asked the former secretary of State, Treasury secretary, White House chief of staff and all-around Wise Man, was he in on the deal?

"You don't have a virgin here," Baker said with his customary twang. Indeed not. He meant he wasn't about to be lured by a reporter into spilling any secrets—not, of course, that he had any secrets to spill. (The White House says that Baker had nothing to do with the Pentagon swap.) Baker warned against getting too optimistic about some sudden deliverance from the agonies of Iraq. "Look," he protested. "This is not a precooked deal. And there is no magic bullet."

Baker is known for lowering expectations shortly before he delivers the goods. But he has reason to want to downplay his role and the prospects for success. Over the next month or so, the Iraq Study Group must find a middle way, a plan of action that can be characterized neither as "cut and run" nor "stay the course." Judging by the election returns and the exit polls, it's what the people want—along with an end to rancorous partisan squabbling and ideological posturing. But getting a plan—and carrying it out—will be difficult to achieve.

For one thing, Baker still has to convince George W. Bush. At his post-election press conference, the president looked like a base runner trapped in a rundown, unable to go forward or scurry back. The president is probably stuck—he will have to embrace some kind of compromise approach on Iraq. He didn't look too happy about it. As he japed and mugged and fidgeted, he seemed worried by something more than Iraq or the election returns; his whole character appeared to be wrestling with some more personal, inner demon. Last week Bush's aides were resisting the story line that Bush was caught in a cosmic episode of "Father Knows Best." The president himself was said to be indifferent to the press chatter. "I don't care," he told his advisers when they asked him, the morning after the elections, how he wanted to deal publicly with the suggestion that he was picking one of his father's advisers. "He doesn't think the neocons ran him over a cliff and now he has to go to Dad," said a senior Bush aide, preferring to remain anonymous while discussing Oval Office conversations. "It's not the way he sees this. He wants the best and brightest."

DOJ_NMG_0092736

It is an irony of history, and the tragedy of the Bush family saga, that President Bush has all along had the best and the brightest just a phone call away. His father is a deeply seasoned and wise foreign-policy expert. Had, say, Sen. John McCain been elected, Bush 41 would have been jetting around the globe helping to resolve conflicts. Instead, aside from some tsunami and Hurricane Katrina relief work, Bush Senior has been relegated to watching all those political talk shows his son refuses to watch, wincing each time he hears his son's name being mocked or criticized. George H.W. Bush has been, in effect, sidelined by nepotism. He has repeatedly told close friends that he does not believe it is appropriate or wise to second-guess his son, or even offer advice beyond loving support.

This time, however, was different. A source who declined to be identified discussing presidential confidences told NEWSWEEK that Bush 41 left "fingerprints" on the Rumsfeld-Gates decision, though the father's exact role remains shrouded in speculation. "This would have been done by nuance and indirection. Forty-one would have said to 43, 'One of the people who I've been talking to who might be helpful is Bob Gates'," said a veteran of previous GOP administrations who declined to be identified talking about the Bush family. A onetime director of the CIA and loyal member of Skull and Bones, his Yale secret society, Bush "is a master of deniability," says an old aide to Jim Baker, who asked for deniability while discussing Bush.

Baker's role in the affair remains shadowy. He was spotted with both Bush father and son, as well as Bob Gates, in early October at the launching of the new aircraft carrier USS George H.W. Bush. But the four men may have just been discussing the Texas A&M football team. Baker, like Bush, is not likely to have been plotting in public. "For a meeting like that," says the former Baker aide, "the maximum number of people involved is two."

It's not even clear that Baker ("Bakes," to Bush 41) and Bush (el jefe, to Baker) spoke to each other about the Rumsfeld-Gates switch. Baker's relationship with the Bush family is close but rivalrous, and it has endured jealousies and suspicions. The two men became friends while playing doubles at the Houston Country Club in the 1970s ("although I still preferred and continued to play singles," writes Baker in a typical aside in his just-published memoir, "Work Hard, Study ... and Keep Out of Politics"). The two dads and their eight boys played an annual Turkey Bowl at Thanksgiving. ("It was touch football, but the touching sometimes looked a lot like tackling.") Baker has, on occasion, wondered why he wasn't the one elected president. Barbara Bush was widely reported to be miffed at Baker for not trying hard enough to get her husband re-elected in 1992.

George W., who sometimes reflects his mother's resentments, did not call on Baker for advice when he was preparing for his presidential run. "That was okay with me," writes Baker, who nonetheless answered the call when George W. needed a good lawyer to take on the Florida voting fiasco in 2000. Baker's cleverness and diligence for the Bush clan in its hour of need were possibly decisive. But make no mistake: Baker is no mere lawyer for the Bushes. Trying to describe Baker's role and his true allegiances in the Iraq Study Group, the former Baker aide quotes Justice Louis Brandeis, who once said that in certain cases the lawyer has a responsibility to represent the situation, not the client. In this case, the situation is the national interest in getting a solution to the Iraq mess—not protecting the president or the Bush family. "It so happens that this also serves Baker's interests," says the aide. As his memoir makes clear, Baker cares deeply about being remembered as a statesman, not a pol or a hired gun.

When the Iraq Study Group was launched in March 2006, the inspiration of some retired Washington foreign-policy mavens, its conclusion seemed destined for a dusty shelf. Baker had been fairly quiet on Iraq. Though it was generally known that the Bush 41 crowd was skeptical about invading Iraq, most of the attention fell on Brent Scowcroft, who was outspoken in his disappointment with Bush 43's advisers. "Dick Cheney I don't know anymore," Scowcroft told The New Yorker. Baker signed on to the Iraq Study Group only after getting Bush 43's personal assurance that the White House wanted him to take the job. (According to a source knowledgeable about the study group who requested anonymity discussing sensitive negotiations, Baker also received a backstage promise that Rumsfeld would stay out of the way as the commissioners interviewed generals and diplomats.) Baker did not have high hopes or expectations, he says. But the group—in part because of Baker's winning aura, and in part because Baker had a hand in choosing them—attracted first-rate commissioners like former justice Sandra Day O'Connor and ex-New York mayor Rudy Giuliani. Baker's co-chairman is tailor-made for bipartisanship. Lee Hamilton, a longtime Democratic congressman and former chairman of the House foreign-affairs committee, was known for fair-mindedness and deep substantive knowledge, qualities he showed again as co-chair of the 9/11 Commission. Baker refused to pose for NEWSWEEK unless Hamilton was photographed as well. "This has got to be bipartisan," says Baker. "Or it's not going to happen." Baker knows that if newly emboldened Hill Democrats see the Iraq Study Group as a tool of the administration and wait until the new Congress in January to call for their own pullout plan, the hopes for a middle-way compromise could collapse.

Baker's style is to prearrange deals by patiently and quietly lining up the parties before going public. He has had more success at bringing together potential adversaries than any one Washington politician or statesman in modern history, at least since Clark Clifford. Baker's fingerprints are on many legislative accomplishments (for which congressmen took all the credit, like the Tax Reform Act of 1986). For the Iraq Study Group, he has reached out to Iranian, Syrian and Saudi diplomats; he has traveled to Iraq and met with local civilian and military leaders, and he has stroked the large and sometimes fractious egos of his own commissioners. He may have a difficult time with hard-liners like former attorney general Ed Meese, who stepped into a commissioner's slot vacated by Giuliani (who quit possibly to pursue his presidential ambitions). Baker will have a month or more to line up his commissioners before they make their final report in December. But "we can't wire it," he insists.

DOJ_NMG_0092737

The commissioners are just now receiving a draft of the recommendations. The contents are a closely guarded secret, but the commission is certain to call for some kind of diplomacy with Iraq's neighbors, reversing the Bush administration refusal to negotiate with enemies like Iran and Syria. "There are going to be some things in this report that the administration is not going to be excited about," says Baker, choosing his words carefully. There may also be some kind of call for a troop drawdown or redeployment, though Baker says he is very reluctant to dictate to the U.S. military.

Baker says he drops in on President Bush from time to time to "chew the fat." But he insists he has not discussed the work of the Iraq Study Group. "Timing is everything for Baker," says the former aide, and the timing was not right until Bush could see the public registering its dissatisfaction at the polls. Baker is an avid hunter of wild turkeys, a sport that requires endless patience. "You can wait all day and you only get one shot," says the former aide, who marvels at Baker's ability to sit for hours in the cold or heat, silent but watchful. "When the time comes, and it's only a split second, he doesn't hesitate to pull the trigger," says this aide.

Baker's powers of persuasion are formidable. James Carville, no slouch himself at the art of politics, once described him as "the gold standard." Although his tongue can be sharp—he once described Bush 43's core principles as "God and exercise"—Baker is probably the best pure flatterer in Washington, which is saying something. He is also always prepared. He was schooled by his father, a patrician Texas lawyer, in the "five P's": "Prior preparation prevents poor performance." Baker's father—who was known by his children, not always affectionately, as "the Warden"—did not tolerate weakness or excuse. When little Jimmy was slow to get out of bed in the morning, the Warden doused him with a bucket of cold water as he lay there.

Baker is at once earthy and genteel. He is the sort of Texan, one local writer once observed, who can be seen drinking beer out of a can while wearing black tie. One old Princetonian recalls, with a certain awe, that Baker was president of something called "the 21 Club." That meant that he had been chosen as the champion of his eating club (the most exclusive, of course) in a contest to drink 21 straight shots of hard liquor. Baker was the last man standing. This does not mean that he was a wild frat boy (Baker is the living antithesis of John Belushi)— just that he was willing to do what it takes. At the University of Texas Law School, to please his father, he pledged his dad's old fraternity. This required carrying a dead fish somewhere on his person for a week. He had been a Marine lieutenant and had a wife and a child at the time.

Baker is 76 years old, silver-haired, more easily tired, but still formidable. He would be the obvious choice to pursue the diplomatic initiative that the Iraq Study Group will surely call for. In fact, if President Bush is looking for a tag team of worldly, seasoned and persuasive ambassadors, he knows where to find a pair of old tennis partners who live not too far from each other in Houston. Would Baker take the job? "That's too hypothetical," answers the former secretary of State, who is no virgin.

With Richard Wolffe, Michael Isikoff and John Barry in Washington

Changing The Guard (USNEWS)

By Brian Duffy

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

"It does no harm to throw the occasional man overboard," observed British politician Ian Gilmour. "But it does not do much good if you are steering full-speed ahead for the rocks." One of the great lions of the London political scene in the middle of the last century, Gilmour would have been among the last people surprised by the sudden defenestration of Donald Rumsfeld by the man who, just days earlier, pronounced that his embattled defense secretary was doing a "fantastic" job. The course for the rocks in Iraq had been largely charted by Rumsfeld, with his failure to provide a post-invasion plan with even the remotest chance of success. To a gimlet-eyed observer like Gilmour, the ouster was all but inevitable. Yet such was the depth of the White House state of denial over Iraq-indeed, over the several glaring embarrassments that have blotted its second-term copybook—that even jaded observers wondered whether President Bush knew something they didn't know when he professed, on the very eve of his political Waterloo, confidence in an 11th-hour GOP triumph.

After his defeat in the general election in 1945, Churchill, another grizzled veteran of London's political fratricide, responded to his wife's vain efforts to comfort him. "If it is a blessing," he told her, "it is certainly very well disguised." The same, perhaps, may not be said for the voters' rebuke of the White House. A less chastening result and, who knows, the president might have been persuaded to stick with Rummy and, even if he had to refrain from using the actual words, to "stay the course." Blessings come in all sorts of strange packages, and this may prove one of the stranger but, in the end, more salutary.

Psychobabble. One of Washington's more tedious parlor games has been the whispered wonderings about strains in the relationship between the younger Bush and his father. The return to center stage of one of the elder Bush's most trusted aides as Rumsfeld's replacement prompted a frenzied new round of psychobabble. Not only was Bob Gates the elder Bush's CIA director, but he also served as deputy to Brent Scowcroft, the older man's national security adviser and close friend. Scowcroft's break with the current White House over Iraq was offered as Exhibit A in the case for a rupture in the relationship between Bush père et fils. Hmm. If armchair psychology doesn't happen to be your thing, however, and you're one of the many millions of Americans whose vote seemed to express the belief that the Bush team has slipped its intellectual and political moorings, the casting of James Baker seemed to suggest a more simple if less charitable plotline: adult-supervision time!

DOJ_NMG_0092738

To those most deeply cynical about the 43rd president, of course, such supervision was supposed to have been supplied by Dick Cheney. But when someone like Scowcroft, who has known and worked with the vice president for about 30 years, says the current Cheney is someone he "doesn't know," the evidence of something being seriously amiss is pretty hard to ignore. Which is why last week's White House drama seemed to offer more plots and tangled subplots than a Tolstoy novel, only without any of the brooding darkness. Nope, Rummy was out, Gates was in, good fellows all, smiles all around. Thus, it was on to lunch with House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi, then a grip-and-grin with Harry Reid, the incoming Senate majority leader. Hatchets buried, knives sheathed—lots of work to do.

The cockeyed optimists among us would have us believe that elections offer a chance for renewal, a fresh start. Such hopes have been dashed countless times, of course, but voters spoke with such force and clarity last week that perhaps this time will be different. Old Gilmour would be having none of it.

Searching For A Strategy (TIME)

By Michael Duffy

Time, November 13, 2006

In the heady days after the first Gulf War, Robert Gates liked to tell a story about his boss, George Herbert Walker Bush. As Bush 41 was preparing to invade Kuwait in 1990 and free that nation from the clutches of Saddam Hussein, Pentagon generals came up with what they thought was a clever scheme that might prevent the President from going to war. Gates was in the Oval Office when the generals brought in maps, charts and pointers and told Bush that Kuwait could be liberated only if he was willing to spend six months deploying half a million troops halfway round the globe. The reluctant generals were betting, Gates explained, that no U.S. President would agree to such a crazy and expensive adventure. But what made Gates smile when he told the story was the cool and determined way Bush responded to the uniforms' rush job. "Sounds right," said the old Navy pilot. "Do it." The generals left the Oval Office looking pale and drawn. And the biggest and most successful U.S. military operation since World War II got under way.

Soon it will be Gates' job to go into the Oval Office with his own set of pointers, maps and charts, and run a very different briefing for a very different member of the Bush family about a very different conflict in Iraq. This time, Gates will be advising George W. Bush on how to get out of--not into--a war, even though the President still believes, in the face of a humbling electoral repudiation and a U.S. death toll approaching 3,000, that the invasion of Iraq was wise, worthy and well planned. Gates' task as the new Defense Secretary is to preach change to a leader who has stuck to his line--despite all kinds of evidence to the contrary--for years now.

The Greeks believed that the gods visit the sins of the fathers upon their sons. But when it comes to the Bush family and Iraq, the tragedy runs from stem to root. And so over the next few weeks, key members of Bush's father's vaunted foreign policy team--the real A-team of the Republican foreign policy establishment--will step in and conduct what amounts to a family intervention. Led by former CIA Director Gates and former Secretary of State James Baker, who co-heads a commission on Iraq, Dad's former aides will present the son with a plan for saving his presidency and, with it, some remnant of the family's brand name. None of those involved will call it an intervention, but it's fair to say the nation's future is at stake. Although Gates and Baker will be out front, others who worked for the patriarch are helping behind the scenes. Dynasties don't get to be dynasties by neglecting the line.

The task facing the Old Guard is to fashion an exit strategy from Iraq that can salvage U.S. prestige and avoid turning the civil war into an even wider and more violent catastrophe. There are only a few known knowns here: it surely pains the father that it has come to this. It is just as galling to the son that he had to invite his father's most trusted consiglieres to step in and help clean up his mess overseas. Neither man appreciates the chortling sounds coming from the vast Bush 41 crowd, which has long harbored grave doubts about the soundness of 43's foreign policy team. The biggest question is how the object of the intervention will react. As one senior official in the 41 White House says of the President, "He can fight this and turn into a constantly warring figure, or he can turn back into the friendly wise guy who gets along with everyone. The latter will serve him much better."

It does help Bush that the return of the realists comes at the very moment when both parties are looking for political cover on the war that went wrong. Although the leaders of the new Democratic majority in Congress say they plan to hold the Administration accountable for the spiraling costs, mismanagement and graft associated with the war, the reality is that the party remains divided over what kind of military strategy to pursue now. Democrats who voted for the war and have been on the defensive with the party's antiwar base are anxious to get behind any sign that points to an exit. Those who voted against the war but who don't have a clue about how to stabilize Iraq want to find a program they can get behind without looking like silly skedaddlers. The Republicans are equally torn, between realists furious at the Administration for refusing to change course sooner and true believers who fret that the White House is about to abandon the neoconservative project to bring democracy to the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0092739

Given all those diverging views, it's understandable that Bush talks about the commission headed by Baker and former Representative Lee Hamilton the way a child who can't wait for Christmas talks about Santa Claus. Bush mentioned the commission four times in his press conference last week. The President opposed the creation of the panel last fall but eventually came around, in part at the urging of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Worried about whether the White House believed in the commission from the start, Baker insisted on meeting with the President before taking the job and insisted that Bush personally ask him to take it on. Baker told Bush in his private session that he was likely to come up with recommendations that Bush might not favor. Asked by Baker whether he truly backed an approach that would lead to a strategic change, Bush said he did.

Since then, relations between the White House and the study group haven't always been perfect. When a White House official made skeptical statements in early fall about the group's direction, angry Democrats on the panel warned Baker that they would not be part of a charade. Baker in turn went on TV and reported that the White House was still on board, while privately informing the West Wing to shut down the skeptics for good. Baker has been strict about stressing the bipartisan nature of the group--which includes Clinton advisers like Leon Panetta and William Perry as well as former Wyoming Senator Alan Simpson and Reagan Attorney General Edwin Meese--and he told TIME it will act only by consensus. Still, everyone agrees that Baker is the first among equals.

So far, the Baker group has convened a number of listening sessions; its deliberations as a group begin this week. It is already evident that the panel is not laboring under illusions about the grim outlook for the U.S. enterprise in Iraq. The commission returned from its brief trip to Baghdad in September collectively stunned by the chaos--which is interesting, since they barely got to see it. They apparently saw enough: the donning of the body armor, the corkscrew approach in the Air Force cargo plane, the harrowing treetop chopper flight into the Green Zone--it all left the commissioners shaken, according to an adviser to one member. There are no plans to go back.

Instead, something akin to a shadow State Department has sprung up to figure out how to extricate the U.S. from Iraq. Baker and Hamilton reached deep into the government's foreign policy ranks--active and retired--and plucked their favorite generals, spooks and analysts to work in complete secrecy, installing some in a nondescript building that houses the U.S. Institute of Peace. Some 50 advisers, both here and in Iraq, have kicked in reports and working papers; Baker and his team have fired questions back at those who are the most promising. Baker has been in touch with representatives from Iran and Syria, countries the U.S. isn't keen to cozy up to. And about a dozen longtime aides and diplomatic wizards, including Brent Scowcroft, the grand master of the foreign policy establishment, are in communication with Baker and Hamilton as they go down to the wire. The bipartisan pragmatism encouraged by the Baker-Hamilton group, says Clinton U.N. Ambassador Richard Holbrooke, marks an end to the era when U.S. foreign policy was crafted by people who looked at the world as they wanted it to be, not the world as it was. Says Holbrooke: "Now there is a tremendous wedge between the neoconservatives and the rest of the national-security community."

Getting out of Iraq will require the sort of hard choices between interests and ideals that the Bush Administration has been historically reluctant to make. The Baker group is considering a series of proposals that will include calling for intensive regional diplomacy, such as direct, high-level talks with Iran and Syria--something the Bush team has resisted for months. Most significant, the commission plans to outline a plan for redeploying--that is to say, pulling out--some U.S. troops over the next year. The group is also considering telling the Shi'ite-led government in Baghdad that U.S. troops will stay and help steady the country only if the government puts an end to sectarian violence. If the killings continue, the U.S. will pull out quickly. "If these things don't happen," said Les Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations, "we're going to have to move out faster."

Baker has been talking to the President directly for months. The two men have a long history. It was Bush who installed himself in Washington in 1986 to keep an eye on his father's presidential campaign, then being run by Baker. And it was Baker who led the legal fight in Florida that handed W. his presidency in 2001. But if Baker is now laying the groundwork for another bailout of the man he once referred to as Junior, he can also thank Bush for bringing him back to center stage at a time of genuine national crisis. Baker has held three Cabinet posts, overseen a fourth agency and run five presidential campaigns. Untying the Gordian knot that is Iraq would cement his reputation as one of the nation's premier wise men of the past 30 years.

DOJ_NMG_0092740

It is tantalizing to imagine that Baker, who plans to issue his report next month, pushed Bush to dump Rumsfeld for Gates. A former Baker aide last week called the coincidence of timing "painfully obvious" and noted the appointment of Gates to the Baker commission last year. There is also the fact that Rumsfeld has long been resented by many Bush 41 loyalists, who recall the way Rumsfeld schemed to get Bush appointed director of the CIA in 1976 to prevent him from becoming Gerald Ford's running mate that year. But there were more pressing reasons for Rumsfeld to go--and quickly. "Baker wasn't going to let his report come out," says a Gates aide, "so that Rummy could stomp all over it." As for Bush 41, he is staying above the nitty-gritty of the takeover, says one of 41's former aides, but "he's definitely in the loop."

It will fall to Gates to execute the Baker plan. Bush first approached Gates about joining his team more than a year ago, when he was looking for a new director of national intelligence. As a former CIA director, Gates found the offer tempting but declined after he decided that the job amounted to little more than overseeing a vast bureaucracy rather than running a real intelligence operation. Bush didn't offer the Pentagon job to Gates until early last week. A little cloak-and-dagger was used to sneak Gates onto the President's ranch for his job interview: he was instructed to meet White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten and his deputy, Joe Hagin, at a supermarket parking lot in nearby McGregor, Texas, for the drive to Crawford. The President slipped out to meet Gates at the new office that opened on the ranch in 2004.

Having worked at the White House and run the CIA, Gates will manage the budgets, bureaucrats, jargon and generals on the Pentagon's E-Ring easily enough. But he will be judged by only one rule: whether he can organize what a Baker aide calls "the orderly transition and exit from Iraq." Someone who has worked with him describes Gates as "serious, subtle, reflective, never curt or abrupt." Departing CIA directors are flooded with offers of corporate jobs and strategic intelligence posts. Instead, when Gates left government in early 1993, he fled to Washington State, where he spent the next few years in a library working on his memoirs.

That was, in many ways, a return to where he started. He rose through the CIA's analysis directorate as a Russia scholar during the 1970s until plucked for stardom by Reagan spymaster William Casey. Gates had a reputation as a tough-nosed hard-liner; in fact, Gates was never a mirror image of the shrewdly moderate Baker. During the first Bush Administration, Gates was far more skeptical of Mikhail Gorbachev and his perestroika program than was either Baker or the President. Gates' closest ally in that minor crusade was none other than then Defense Secretary Dick Cheney. Gates' nickname in the first Bush White House was Eyeore: no matter the topic, he always seemed to worry about the worst-case scenario. Gates, who has a healthy sense of humor, was usually the first to admit he was the in-house pessimist.

He has also seen his share of controversy. Partly because he worked for Casey, Gates was a minor player in the Iran-contra scandal and was criticized for skewing intelligence analysis on the Soviets to suit hard-liners in the Reagan White House. More than 30 Democrats--10 of whom are still in the Senate--opposed his nomination to be CIA director in 1991. Gates went into his confirmation that year carrying a small, white oblong stone in his pocket, a memento of a hike he had taken in the Olympic mountains the summer before. He wanted a reminder of what he had to look forward to in case his nomination failed. He may want to dig that stone out of his closet. Given the current Administration's record of laundering intelligence, Gates is sure to endure another round of questions about his past in his confirmation hearings next month.

But Bob Gates is probably under no illusions about the limitations he faces. He once told TIME that people who go to work at the White House pass through two distinct stages of astonishment. At first, they are amazed at what the place can do. But then they are quickly disillusioned by what it cannot accomplish. Putting an Iraqi exit plan in front of the President will be relatively simple. Winning Bush's full support may be harder. And executing it in a country where strategic planning is almost an oxymoron may prove beyond any man's--or any White House's--capability.

The New Face: A Spy With Fresh Eyes (NSWK)

By Dan Ephron And Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - How does the incoming Defense secretary really feel about the war in Iraq? At sessions of the Iraq Study Group over the past months, Robert Gates was careful not to show his cards. But on the commission's long flight home from a fact-finding mission to Baghdad in September, after several drinks had been poured, the Republican panelist let loose on the Bush team. "He said they really screwed up Iraq and, to a large extent, he couldn't figure out why it happened," a source close to Gates who was on the plane told NEWSWEEK. Particularly foolish, Gates thought, were the decisions to occupy Iraq with a relatively small force and to purge the Iraqi civil service of Baath Party members. "He couldn't believe there was such a degree of incompetence," said the source, who did not want to be named because panelists were trying to keep their discussions out of the media.

That's one side of Gates. Since retiring from public service in 1993, the career intelligence officer has shown a capacity to speak truth to Republican (and Democratic) power. His 1996 memoir, "From the Shadows," takes his former boss at the CIA,

DOJ_NMG_0092741

William Casey, to task for shutting out Congress and scorning oversight. A 2004 study he coauthored with Democrat Zbigniew Brzezinski criticized the Bush administration's policy of not speaking to Iran. But his record as a CIA analyst, as deputy national-security adviser to the first President Bush and as CIA chief in the early '90s shows another side as well. Melvin Goodman, who served under Gates in the CIA's Soviet division, says the boss knew how to spin raw intelligence into the kind of briefs politicians wanted to read. Goodman cites a Gates-ordered CIA analysis that supported allegations of Soviet involvement in the 1981 assassination attempt on the pope as a particularly glaring example of skewed intel. "He always serves his masters," Goodman told NEWSWEEK after Gates's appointment last week. (Gates could not be reached for comment).

So which side will he show President Bush? Gates owes a debt to Bush Senior. The former president helped erase the Iran-contra stain on Gates's record from the 1980s (when he was alleged to have been less than candid about when he learned of the illegal transfer of funds to Nicaraguan rebels from profits on arms sales to Iran) by picking him to head the CIA in 1991. Last week, four days before his appointment as secretary of Defense, Gates dined with Bush and wife Barbara at a football dinner at Texas A&M University, where Gates has served as president since 2002. He did not bite as readily when the son came calling. Twice, Gates turned down job offers from the younger Bush, first to be the National Intelligence director and later to serve as deputy secretary of State. And then there's Iraq. Though the panel Gates sat on until last week will probably stop short of calling for a troop withdrawal, it will certainly urge Bush to change course.

For Gates and others on the panel, the Iraq trip appears to have marked a turning point. After traveling in an airliner for 13 hours to Kuwait, the commission members boarded a military C-130 for the 90-minute flight to Baghdad. Most of the panelists sat in the hull, along with about 25 soldiers who were returning to the front. One commission member remarked how young they looked, according to a source who traveled with the group. "To see these young men really brought home the reality of the mess in Iraq and the price we're paying to be there," the source said. It's a mess Gates now owns.

A New Man. Next, A New Plan For Iraq? (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine And Kevin Whitelaw

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld didn't appear on any ballot last week, but the war that he and President Bush have waged in Iraq emerged as perhaps the most decisive factor in the Republican defeat. After a dreadful year of worsening sectarian violence and revenge attacks, polls have clearly shown a diminishing faith in the Bush administration's ability to turn things around in Iraq-nearly 6 in 10 voters said they disapprove of the war.

President Bush wasted no time in announcing Rumsfeld's resignation (though insisting that the departure was planned regardless of the election's outcome). The nomination of former CIA Director Robert Gates for the Pentagon post is a clear signal that the White House is trying to shake off its history of "stay the course" rhetoric. But while Bush's motivation might have more to do with politics than with military strategy, Gates could make a real difference. A member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group led by former Rep. Lee Hamilton and former Secretary of State James Baker, who served in the first President Bush's administration, Gates could be a critical bridge between the White House and the clutch of foreign-policy graybeards many Republicans and Democrats are looking to as a lifeline— a last-gasp chance to reverse the downward trend in Iraq.

Shifting gears. The choice of Gates eases the way for Bush to latch on to at least some of Baker's proposals, due out soon. Baker's group could point to a strategy that "is a little different— or totally different," Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, who next month will become the No. 2 commander in Iraq, tells U.S. News. In any event, he adds, "it's going to be very much a factor."

The Baker report is expected to cement a shift in emphasis from creating a model democracy in the Middle East to simply achieving stability in Iraq-still no small feat. "Both the American people and the Congress don't want this to last a lot longer," says a senior U.S. military official. "You'll always get the party line of 'stay the course,' but everybody realizes that it's to a point." The question of an American troop surge, advocated by Republican Sen. John McCain, will come to the fore as well. "Do we need more people, or do they become a greater irritant?" asks Odierno. "There comes a time when you wear out your welcome."

Challenges. There are no magic bullets in Iraq. The underlying problem is that America's ability to change the dynamic there appears to be continually diminishing. The Sunni insurgents remain disturbingly strong—October was the deadliest month for U.S. soldiers in nearly two years. And troops have been unable to quell the sectarian violence. A vaunted security plan for Baghdad has failed to stem the bloodshed, Iraqi security forces remain unreliable, and U.S. officials have been unable to persuade Iraq's government to confront the Shiite militias or their leaders. The White House was particularly discouraged by what National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley found on his recent trip to Iraq. "The situation there is as complex as it's ever been and is getting more complicated every couple of weeks," says a senior administration official.

Rescue Squad (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

DOJ_NMG_0092742

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

Within the tightknit world of Bush family and friends, it came as no surprise when the president named Robert Gates as his new defense secretary. President Bush has, after all, turned to members of his father's governing team on a regular basis to bail him out of jams or give him a lift. He chose Dick Cheney, his father's defense secretary, as his running mate in 2000. He brought in James Baker, his dad's secretary of state, to run the legal operation that gave him the presidency in 2000. He recruited Andrew Card, his father's transportation secretary and confidant, as his first White House chief of staff. He named Condoleezza Rice, his father's Russia expert, to be national security adviser and promoted her to secretary of state. Now James Baker is back at the center of the action as cochairman of the Iraq Study Group, which will make recommendations on a new Iraq policy in the next several weeks.

The choice of Gates allows the commander in chief to at least create the perception that he is looking for a fresh start in Iraq. Certainly Gates doesn't have the baggage of Donald Rumsfeld, the man he will replace at the Pentagon and widely considered the architect of the war. Equally important, as a private citizen, Gates has criticized the administration for failing to use diplomacy aggressively enough to extract the United States from Iraq. And Gates has a track record of success. He was part of George Herbert Walker Bush's national-security team, one of the best in recent years. "The father's team has a proven track record," says a member of 41's administration. "They handled the dissolution of communism, the falling apart of the Soviet Union, the Persian Gulf War, the liberation of Panama—and all were successes. These are people who knew what they were doing."

Leaving the Aggies. Gates, president of Texas A&M University, site of the George Bush Presidential Library and Museum, was deputy national security adviser under George Herbert Walker Bush and director of central intelligence from 1991 to 1993. "He's pragmatic; he's a listener; he builds coalitions," says a former adviser to the father. That makes him a typical acolyte of the elder Bush—and the opposite of the arrogant Rumsfeld. The hallmarks of the elder Bush's national-security team were caution, pragmatism, and a commitment to diplomacy. This is far different from the central premises underlying the younger Bush's foreign policy—a belief in preventive war, a de-emphasis on international coalitions, and a campaign to spread democracy around the world.

Former aides to the father and some GOP advisers to the current White House think the departure of Rumsfeld, a longtime pal and ally of Dick Cheney, will leave the hard-line vice president isolated in the government. Others aren't so sure. No one knows whether Bush is ready to budge from his commitment to winning the war in Iraq and creating a democracy—a stance that Cheney strongly endorses.

Yet even if Bush does not make big changes in Iraq policy, there were many political and PR advantages to making the Pentagon move. Dumping Rumsfeld, 74, and naming Gates, 63, on the day after the election, Bush managed to shift the media's attention away from the GOP's disastrous losses on November 7. It also gave Bush some breathing room as he tries to rebuild public and congressional support for the Iraq war. Bush and his senior advisers acknowledge that a big reason for their setbacks at the polls was growing opposition to that conflict. By pushing Rumsfeld out, Bush removed the biggest symbol of his Iraq policy and a very divisive figure in Washington.

How History Will Judge Donald Rumsfeld (NSWK)

By John Barry And Michael Hirsh

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - There weren't many people in the Pentagon brave enough to give bad news to Donald Rumsfeld. Jim Roche, though, was one. The Air Force secretary and his boss shared Chicago roots and Washington ties going back 30 years—and, like Rummy, the white-haired Roche had made a lot of money in business. In the fall of 2002 it was becoming clear inside the Pentagon that George W. Bush intended to invade Iraq. A worried Roche dragooned the then Army secretary, Thomas White, to join him for a frank talk with Rumsfeld, according to a knowledgeable source who asked for anonymity because he was describing a private conversation. With some trepidation, the pair marched up to Rummy's elaborate dark-paneled office in the E-Ring, the power corridor of the Pentagon. "Don, you do realize that Iraq could be another Vietnam?" Roche asked. Rumsfeld, a political survivor of the Watergate era whose main goal was to exorcise the ghost of Vietnam forever—restoring American power and prestige in the world—was outraged at the very suggestion. "Vietnam? You think you have to tell me about Vietnam?" Rumsfeld sputtered. "Of course it won't be Vietnam. We are going to go in, overthrow Saddam, get out. That's it." Then he waved them out of his office.

Now Rumsfeld himself has been thrown out after six stormy years, a chastened if still-proud man who will spend the rest of his days grappling with the judgment of history. His tenure at the Pentagon is thick with irony. The squinty-eyed tough guy whom Bush once described as a "matinee idol," the podium wit who declared "I don't do quagmires," is now viewed as the author of one of the worst quagmires in American history. The "forward-leaning" ex-wrestler who wanted to project American strength abroad may now be blamed by historians for revealing the limits of American power—and weakening the nation's position in the critical Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0092743

When Rumsfeld arrived to take over the Pentagon for the second time in January 2001 he acted like a man on a mission. Rumsfeld came equipped with a glittering résumé: Princeton wrestling captain. Naval aviator. Congressman at 30. White House chief of staff at 42. Defense secretary at 43 (the youngest ever, way back in 1975). Fortune 500 CEO and turnaround specialist. And with 30 years of global experience, Rumsfeld had a clear vision for Defense. He wanted to draw down America's giant cold-war garrisons around the world and transform the U.S. military into a high-tech, "agile" force suited for expeditionary warfare around the globe.

Rumsfeld actually achieved a good part of this vision. He elevated the role and size of Special Forces, turning them into a separate worldwide command. He gave Special Operations—the global SWAT teams of the 21st century—the lead in the war against terrorism. He changed the way the Army and Navy operate worldwide, making both services more nimble. Finally, Rumsfeld began a profound shift of America's basic military approach to threats abroad, away from the old requirement of fighting three wars simultaneously (for example, in North Korea, Europe and the Mideast) and toward a new force organized to face unknowable contingencies.

But much of that transformational work may be forgotten in the history books. Instead, largely thanks to Iraq, Rumsfeld will likely go down as an erratic and arrogant manager who sullied America's reputation by allowing interrogation abuses at Abu Ghraib and other U.S.-run detention centers abroad; who haughtily dismissed advice from U.S. generals and senators alike to put in enough troops (in part because he didn't want another Vietnam), and who preferred to deny the reality of the Iraqi insurgency rather than confront it. Bush, in announcing Rumsfeld's departure last week, called him "a superb leader in a time of change." But that is a distinctly minority view in Washington, where it is hard to find any defenders of Rumsfeld, either Democrat or Republican. "He will be seen as the Robert McNamara of this generation," says retired Lt. Gen. William Odom, referring to the Vietnam-era Defense chief who has spent the last 40 years trying live down the carnage that occurred on his watch.

Rumsfeld himself is all too aware of this view, his associates say. That is one reason he wanted to stay on at the Pentagon through Bush's second term. Rumsfeld was hoping that by then things might have turned for the better in Iraq. Instead, Bush told Rumsfeld last week that enough was enough. If the violence in Iraq does abate over the last two years of Bush's term, credit will now go to Rummy's successor, Robert Gates, rather than to him.

Some of Rumsfeld's critics also say that much of his transformation was superficial. He was unable to pare down U.S. nuclear forces despite Bush's pledge to do so, sponsoring giant budgets filled with cold-war-era weapons. And they say he was unpardonably negligent in his handling of the central issue of his tenure, Iraq, which is likely to be the subject of fresh inquiries by the Democratic-controlled Congress. "Rumsfeld demanded responsibility for all of postwar Iraq and then did nothing with it," says a former senior Defense official who spoke anonymously "because I have to work in this town." "He tried to destroy the interagency process. And I think he was successful."

Historians will probably argue for decades over who gets most of the blame for the mistakes made in Iraq. But Rumsfeld's talent for bureaucratic infighting did work against success there. He offended allies, played down the State Department's role in planning for postwar Iraq and actively stymied Condoleezza Rice's efforts to do her first-term job as national-security adviser, which was to coordinate between agencies, according to numerous accounts. Sometimes he didn't even return her calls. "Rumsfeld treated Condi like the hired help," says a White House staffer who would discuss the relationship only if he was not identified. "He did everything he could to humiliate her. And the president never intervened." Two weeks ago, Iraq inspector general Stuart Bowen concluded that the Pentagon is still not working well with State in coordinating Provincial Reconstruction Teams, on which the administration once placed high hopes in Iraq.

Rumsfeld was not blind about Iraq. He foresaw clearly the pitfalls of a long foreign occupation. He planned to reduce the U.S. presence in Iraq to some 30,000 troops within months of the March 2003 invasion; if he'd had his way, he would have quickly handed over power to the Iraqis. "The secretary saw the Iraq war as his best chance to force the U.S. Army to abandon its cold-war model of a massive buildup taking months—what they did in Gulf War I—and move to a swifter, leaner way of operating," says one of his former top aides who would discuss him only anonymously. But once it became clear that Bush wanted a deeper democratic transformation of Iraq—one that would require a longer occupation—Rumsfeld failed to adjust. And that may be history's bottom line on his troubled tenure.

When "Oops" Isn't Enough (TIME)

By Michael Kinsley

Time, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092744

In the original film of Mel Brooks' The Producers, Zero Mostel advises a blithering Gene Wilder, who has just unintentionally observed Mostel's character trying to seduce an elderly woman: "You mean 'oops,' don't you? Just say 'oops' and get out!" Yet sometimes even "oops" is not enough.

Kenneth Adelman and Richard Perle said "oops" earlier this month. As personality types, these two longtime Washington hawks couldn't be more different. Adelman is relentlessly cheerful and upbeat, while Perle is legendarily gloomy and dark. But both played a role in pushing the U.S. into war in Iraq--Adelman in an influential Washington Post Op-Ed promising that the war would be "a cakewalk" and Perle warning of catastrophe if we left Saddam Hussein and his weapons unmolested. Now, interviewed in Vanity Fair, they say it all may have been a mistake. Oops!

Yet in Vanity Fair's quotes, there is no note of contrition. It's not their fault. In fact, dispensing with Saddam, establishing peace and democracy in Iraq and then watching those ideals spread throughout the Middle East is still a good idea. It's just that President George W. Bush bungled the job. Among other things, he failed to recognize the degree of "disloyalty" within his Administration, says Perle--who was chairman of Bush's Defense Policy Board--thus proving the accusation even as he makes it.

Opponents of the Iraq war ought to be happy for two such prominent converts. So why is their conversion so enraging? Well, first, howzabout an apology? It's maddening that there's no cost for being wrong, even when it translates into thousands of people dead and billions of dollars down the drain. In our culture of value-free celebrity, in which a famous ax murderer equals a famous actress equals a famous Nobel Peace Prize winner, Adelman and Perle have merely earned another 15 minutes as hot guests on the talk shows. They have reason to be pleased, having deserted the Bush Administration five minutes ahead of the other rats. But they should try not to show their pleasure.

Second, you don't get to assume the success of your intentions then plead a shrugging "Who knew?" when they don't pan out. I also am in favor of toppling dictators, establishing democracy and watching it spread painlessly throughout every region where there is no experience of it. Not only that: I am in favor of turning sand into ice cream and guaranteeing a cone to every child in the Middle East. But you can't turn sand into ice cream. That is not a defect in the execution of the idea. It is a defect in the idea itself. Although Perle and Adelman and others may think they are dissing the Bush Administration when they talk about its incompetence in failing to turn sand into ice cream, they are also displaying the Bush Administration's key vice, which is assuming that things are how you wish them to be and not how they are.

Third, condemning Bush's conduct of the Iraq war has become an overly handy cop-out for people who don't want to support the war but can't bring themselves to say it was wrong. This would include almost every Democratic candidate in last week's midterm elections. What would these Monday-morning quarterbacks have done differently? Sent in more American troops? Puh-leeze.

What is the proper way to act when you have made a boo-boo on the scale of what Perle and Adelman now admit to? A brief period of silence might be in order, followed by a bit of ideological spring cleaning. If this big idea has turned out to be wrong, isn't it possible that some of their other ideas are also wrong? In fact, maybe their whole philosophy is mistaken. Perle and Adelman are both neoconservatives, or neocons, a group that prides itself on being tough-minded and pragmatic while rejecting liberals as soft and romantic. Yet they managed to turn a President who was elected on a promise to eschew nation building into Woodrow Wilson in cowboy boots, promising democracy everywhere.

Adelman and Perle probably put on a better display of chagrin when they are 20 minutes late for a dinner party than they have managed to come up with so far in concluding that maybe the war was not such a great idea after all. "Just say 'oops' and get out" might be an excellent policy for the U.S. at this stage in the Iraq war. But it's not sufficient for the people who got us into it.

Zakaria: What The Baker Commission Is Ignoring (NSWK)

By Fareed Zakaria

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - Press accounts of its deliberations suggest that the much-anticipated Baker-Hamilton report will make some intelligent recommendations. The committee will point out that America's strategy in Iraq must be placed in a broader regional context. For three years, America's Iraq policy has largely ignored the rest of the Middle East. That was no accident. The neoconservative vision was always that Iraq would be made anew, shorn of the flaws and ailments of the Arab world. Before the invasion, senior policymakers speculated that Iraq's postwar government would recognize Israel. "The road to Jerusalem runs through Baghdad," they were fond of saying. Immediately after the war, a senior international diplomat attached to the Coalition Provisional Authority was embarking on a trip to Iraq's neighbors, and he asked Paul Bremer what message to deliver to them. The answer: none. The region was the problem, not the solution.

DOJ_NMG_0092745

This absence of a regional strategy left Iraq open to its neighbors' most irresponsible instincts. Iran and Syria have helped keep the violence there on the boil. Saudi groups and individuals have funded Sunni militants. None of the surrounding nations would benefit if Iraq actually did collapse, setting off territorial disputes, sending refugees into neighboring lands and exporting Iraq's instability. Such an outcome can still be avoided, but only with active support from these countries. The Baker-Hamilton commission can be expected to recommend a major regional effort.

The panel will also surely suggest intensive efforts to get the various groups in Iraq to forge a national compact. The elements of such a deal are clear—regional autonomy, a sharing of oil revenues, amnesty and the demobilization of armed groups or their incorporation into the Army. And this political settlement would go a long way toward reducing the violence in the country.

But if the commission stops there, it will have missed its moment. These recommendations are the easy ones, accepted by almost everyone but a few ideologues. Some are already being tried. The United States has been pushing hard to get the Iraqis to make a political deal. The administration has been talking more to the neighbors of late and has even made some small overtures to Iran.

That's not enough. Even if Iran and Syria actually agreed to help stabilize Iraq, there's no certainty that their efforts would bring dramatic changes to the country. The violence in Iraq has taken on a life of its own, and the entire structure of political authority has become fragmented and decentralized. If Prime Minister Maliki and Ayatollah Sistani cannot rein in the violence of their own fellow Shiites, is it likely that Iran and Syria could?

Here is the tough question: What are America's objectives in Iraq and how can we achieve them? More bluntly, what is to be done with the roughly 140,000 U.S. troops stationed there? What is their mission? If they have new goals, do these require more Americans or fewer? Not to tackle this issue is to present a doughnut document—all sides and no center.

In answering this question, we need to keep three factors in mind:

This is not our chessboard. The Iraqi government has authority over all the political issues in the country. We may have excellent ideas about federalism, revenue-sharing and amnesty, but the ruling coalition has to agree and then actually implement them. So far, despite our many efforts, they have refused. There is a desperate neoconservative plea for more troops to try one more time in Iraq. But a new military strategy, even with adequate forces, cannot work without political moves that reinforce it. The opposite is happening today. American military efforts are actually being undermined by Iraq's government. The stark truth is, we do not have an Iraqi partner willing to make the hard decisions. Wishing otherwise is, well, wishful thinking.

Time is not on America's side. Month by month, U.S. influence in Iraq is waning. Deals that we could have imposed on Iraq's rival factions in 2003 are now impossible. A year ago, America's ambassador to Iraq had real influence. Today he is being marginalized. Thus any new policy that requires new approaches to the neighbors and lengthy negotiations carries the cost associated with waiting.

America's only real leverage is the threat of withdrawal. Many outsiders fail to grasp how much political power the United States has handed over in Iraq. The Americans could not partition Iraq or distribute its revenues even if Bush decided to. But Washington can warn the ruling coalition that unless certain conditions are met, U.S. troops will begin a substantial drawdown, quit providing basic security on the streets of Iraq and instead take on a narrower role, akin to the Special Forces mission in Afghanistan.

And one last thing: for such a threat to be meaningful, we must be prepared to carry it out.

Democrats Signal Hope For Approval Of Gates (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, November 13, 2006

Senior Democrats signalled on Sunday that they hoped to complete swiftly the confirmation process for Robert Gates to replace Donald Rumsfeld as the new US defence secretary during the “lame-duck” session of the outgoing Republican-dominated Congress which begins on Monday.

It may be one of the few concrete measures agreed over the coming weeks.

Although packed with legislative initiatives, including bills on domestic wiretapping, the nuclear deal with India and a free trade agreement with Vietnam, political analysts are sceptical that the session will achieve much. They warn that many issues will have to wait until the new Democrat-controlled Congress convenes in January and some may disappear from the legislative agenda altogether.

The renewed effort by the White House also to win Senate confirmation for John Bolton, the US ambassador to the United Nations, during the lame-duck -session only complicates matters further.

DOJ_NMG_0092746

Carl Levin, the incoming chairman of the Senate armed services committee, who voted against Mr Gates when he was nominated to be head of the Central Intelligence Agency in 1991, on Sunday told ABC's This Week: "I hope that his confirmation hearings can be held and that he will get a vote prior to the end of this Congress."

He reiterated his long-held reservations about the nominee but said: "I'm going to have a fresh look at him."

Joe Biden, the incoming chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee who also voted against Mr Gates in 1991, said: "I am inclined to vote for him now.

"I know some of his views on Iraq," he said. "I know he wasn't of the Rumsfeld school. And to put it very, very bluntly, as long as he is not there, Rumsfeld is."

Dan Bartlett, the White House counsellor, held out hope that the lame-duck session could pass substantial legislation.

"I'm not going to prejudge the outcome of this lame duck," he told Fox News Sunday. "On the terrorist surveillance programme, the president came to an agreement with key members of the US Senate and House."

Analysts, though, point out that the agreement was with Republicans critical of the wiretap programme and may not now be enough to satisfy victorious Democrats.

The White House wants the outgoing Congress to pass appropriations (spending) bills for 2007.

Political experts, though, doubt there is appetite on either side of the outgoing Congress for big legislation, following a decisive vote in favour of the Democrats in the mid-terms.

"Most lame-duck sessions amount to very little and that is especially true after a change in party control," said Larry Sabato, professor of politics at the University of Virginia. "Why would Democrats in the Senate permit the GOP [Republicans] to pass any significant legislation when they themselves will be taking charge in January?"

Norm Ornstein, a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think-tank, said many Republicans in the House probably just want to "get out of town".

He said Senate Republicans "would like to finish up several things they almost got through at the end of September – the India deal, the Vietnam free trade agreement, the extension of popular tax cuts, the oil drilling compromise" but added "one would not expect much".

Mr Ornstein said the India bill had a better chance of passing Congress during the lame-duck session than the Vietnam trade accord but said the odds were "less than 50 per cent for each".

Gates Would Leave Fidelity To Take Defense Post (WSJ)

By John Spence

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

Fidelity Investments said Robert Gates, the Bush administration's nominee for secretary of defense, is expected to resign as chairman of the mutual-fund company's independent trustees if his cabinet appointment is confirmed.

Fidelity also announced manager changes at several of its funds and said it will cut fees for the 529 college-savings plans it manages for Massachusetts and other states. "On behalf of Fidelity, we are grateful that Bob Gates has served the Fidelity funds and the funds' shareholders for the last nine years with distinction," said Fidelity Chief Operating Officer Robert Reynolds.

Mr. Gates would step down from his role at Fidelity to prevent any perceived conflicts of interest, observers said.

The closely held Boston company said on its Web site Thursday that Jennifer Uhrig was named portfolio manager of $20.4 billion Fidelity Blue Chip Growth Fund, taking over for John McDowell and Brian Hanson. Mr. McDowell is retiring from portfolio management, while Mr. Hanson will continue to oversee Fidelity Advisor Strategic Growth Fund and Fidelity VIP Growth Stock Portfolio, the mutual-fund firm said.

The moves reverberated down the firm's management lineup, as Jason Weiner will succeed Ms. Uhrig at Fidelity Advisor Equity Growth Fund and Fidelity VIP Growth Portfolio. Mr. Weiner has managed Fidelity Independence Fund, Fidelity Fifty Fund and Fidelity Advisor Fifty Fund since 2003 and has worked as associate portfolio manager of Fidelity VIP Contrafund since March 2006, Fidelity said.

Meanwhile, Robert Bertelson will succeed Mr. Weiner at $4.6 billion Fidelity Independence Fund and Peter Saperstone was named portfolio manager of $1.2 billion Fidelity Fifty Fund and Fidelity Advisor Fifty Fund.

Fidelity said C. Robert Chow was named manager of Fidelity Equity Income II Fund, Scott Offen is in at Fidelity Advisor Equity Value Fund, and Richard Fentin was named portfolio manager of VIP Value Portfolio. The three are succeeding Stephen DuFour.

Finally, James Morrow is taking over for Timothy Cohen at Fidelity Advisor Diversified Stock Fund.

Some analysts were surprised at Mr. Bertelson's move to Fidelity Independence Fund given his unenviable record at Fidelity Aggressive Growth Fund, which he managed in the early 2000s. "He had a rough time of it between 2000 and 2002 when the fund lost about 75% and trailed the mid-cap growth peer group by a wide margin," said Dan Lefkovitz, an analyst at investment researcher Morningstar Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0092747

Fidelity spokesman Vin Loporchio said Mr. Bertelson suffered from bad timing in taking over the fund right at the peak of the market for aggressive growth stocks in February 2000.

Mr. Lefkovitz said he was dismayed by the changes at Fidelity Blue Chip Growth Fund as well. "We've been sticking by this fund despite its underperformance because it was in an unloved part of market and had experienced managers with a good track record," the analyst said. "We were expecting better days ahead, but we don't have as much confidence in the new manager."

Fidelity Blue Chip Growth has a three-year annualized return of 6.2%, trailing the Standard & Poor's 500 by more than five percentage points, according to Morningstar.

Fidelity also is preparing to lower its fees and add more investment options for 529 college-savings plans it runs for Massachusetts and other states, a Fidelity spokeswoman confirmed.

The move, which was earlier reported by the Boston Globe, is expected to be formally announced this week. It comes as rivals such as Vanguard Group have unveiled similar fee reductions as money flows into 529 plans, driven by federal tax exemptions on the tuition plans becoming permanent. So-called 529 plans are investment programs run by states that help Americans contribute to college-tuition expenses. The plans are administered by asset managers who determine how the money is invested.

Fidelity spokeswoman Sophie Launay said the company is readying age-based index portfolios with fees capped at 0.5%, providing a cheaper option than those employing actively managed funds. She said Fidelity plans to do away with its $20 annual fee on all direct-sold plans, and is lowering the minimum monthly contribution to $15 from $50. Fidelity manages 529 plans in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Delaware, Arizona and, soon, in California. The company manages about $7 billion in direct-sold 529 plans, Ms. Launay said.

Gates Likely To Sustain Terror War (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

Defense Secretary-designate Robert M. Gates is not expected to rein in the aggressive global war on al Qaeda started by predecessor Donald H. Rumsfeld or reverse the transformation of the Army, but instead focus on how to win in Iraq and get American troops home, current and former Pentagon officials say.

"He definitely is not seen as someone wimping out on the global war," said a Pentagon adviser. "How he does it, and what tools, and who he entrusts with them, that's a whole different issue."

Mr. Gates, once confirmed by what Republicans hope will be a December floor vote, will arrive at the Pentagon needing to replace a number of senior aides to Mr. Rumsfeld who set policy on intelligence, special operations and the war itself.

Some other officials Mr. Rumsfeld eyed for senior posts may be discarded because they would not get through a Democrat-controlled Senate, Pentagon officials said.

President Bush introduced his new defense secretary Wednesday and said Saturday that Mr. Gates was an "agent of change" in a sign of the growing momentum for a new direction in Iraq policy after election defeat for Republicans.

"He has experience leading large and complex organizations, and he has shown that he is an agent of change," Mr. Bush said in his weekly radio address. "He will provide a fresh outlook on our strategy in Iraq, and what we need to do to prevail."

That task will be Mr. Gates' overriding focus in the administration's last two years. The quiet government staff man and former college president will be the Pentagon leader the president hopes will ensure that Iraq is not as damaging in the 2008 election to Republicans as it was in 2006.

Mr. Gates resigned Friday from the Iraq Study Group, a blue-ribbon panel established by Congress to find new solutions for Iraq. The bipartisan group is headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, Indiana Democrat.

It is Mr. Gates' ties to Mr. Baker and Brent Scowcroft, former President Bush's national security adviser, that has Republican hawks worried. Mr. Gates worked with both in the first Bush administration as CIA director and deputy to Mr. Scowcroft.

Mr. Scowcroft opposed the war and is said to be cool to Mr. Rumsfeld's aggressive style of using the full force of the military to confront al Qaeda. He was among the team of aides who advised the first President Bush to end the fighting against Iraq in 1991 in the first Gulf war.

In an published interview two years ago in London's Financial Times, Mr. Scowcroft said Iraq was a "failing venture."

DOJ_NMG_0092748

Mr. Baker's State Department practiced pragmatism at times over loftier goals. He already has said he supports talking to one's enemies, a sign the study group may recommend engaging in talks with Iraq's terrorist-sponsoring neighbors, Iran and Syria.

"I don't think you restrict your conversations to your friends," Mr. Baker told ABC News.

Some conservatives fear such language means Mr. Baker -- and Mr. Gates -- will urge a political agreement that rewards the two hard-line regimes that have supported the deadly Iraqi insurgency with millions in cash, training and weapons.

"Gates has no credentials as a military strategist or innovator," said Jed Babbin, a senior Pentagon official in the first Bush administration. "To replace Rumsfeld with someone lacking these credentials is more than worrisome. ... How will we proceed to win the war? It all comes down to how the president wants to proceed. That's the most important open question."

Mr. Gates will bring a new style to a Pentagon. While Mr. Rumsfeld is brash and combative, Mr. Gates is studious and measured.

He is not viewed as a conservative ideologue, but rather a career manager who rose through the ranks of the CIA's academic-style analytical branch at Langley headquarters. He is more bureaucrat than revolutionary like Mr. Rumsfeld, who pushed through more than 100 transformational reforms and policies.

Mr. Rumsfeld in particular brought special-operations forces off the shelf after the September 11 attacks and empowered commandos with money and manpower to become al Qaeda hunters.

"Rumsfeld understood modern war and real transformation," said an Army Special Forces soldier. "Let's hope Gates doesn't can Pentagon [intelligence] collection efforts in favor of his old alma mater. Let's also hope that generals don't convince Gates that true transformation means more artillery and bigger tanks."

The cupboard will be a bit bare at the Pentagon. Peter Rodman, the assistant secretary of defense who oversees Iraq and Afghanistan policy, told his staff last week he will leave with Mr. Rumsfeld. Stephen Cambone, a close aide to Mr. Rumsfeld and his top intelligence official, also will likely leave. Thomas O'Connell, the top policy-maker for special operations, already had said he would be leaving after the election.

Mr. Gates, who will bring in his own staff, is working out of the White House to prepare for confirmation hearings before the Senate Armed Services Committee. By law, he is not allowed to engage in policy-making until sworn in.

Will Rumsfeld's Reforms Last? (CSM)

By Keith S. Collins

The Christian Science Monitor, November 13, 2006

Donald Rumsfeld's efforts as secretary of Defense to modernize the US military helped make American fighting forces more lean and muscular. He envisioned a military powered by information and relied on technology to deliver a more effective, more dominant, and more connected armed forces.

But not all experts believe the transformation has been helpful in the war on terror, and the sustainability of many of his reforms may ultimately depend on the ability of people to rise above intense negative feelings about him and see beyond his failings in the Iraq war.

"Rumsfeld made an impressive start [on military transformation]," says Andrew Krepinevich, executive director of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments in Washington. "He set out to restructure global basing posture and succeeded. He enlarged special operations. We have a strong precision-strike capability now."

From the beginning of his tenure in early 2001, Rumsfeld aimed to create a military firmly planted in the 21st century. He insisted that orders for powerful but, in his view, outdated weapons systems, such as the Comanche helicopter and the Crusader artillery, be canceled. He felt the 70-ton Crusader system, for example, was too cumbersome for the kind of rapid deployment needed in modern battlefield situations. After a bruising battle with Congress, he was able to kill the program in 2002.

Mr. Rumsfeld's intent was to change what he believed were old ways of thinking. Peter Singer, senior fellow at the Brookings Institution in Washington, says Rumsfeld wanted to send a message as much as to cancel programs. "He was telling the [armed] services: 'You have to have a new operating mentality,' " he says.

The military got the message. Discussions over designing the military of the future were once confined to universities and think tanks. But, Rumsfeld brought the debate to the Pentagon. Now, each branch of the military analyzes new ways to grow.

To help give his reforms momentum, Rumsfeld opened the Office of Force Transformation in late 2001, and he pushed the concept of "networkcentric warfare," the theory that a military can gain battlefield advantage through information advantage. The purpose, according to the Pentagon document "Elements of Defense Transformation," was to create "networked forces that operate with increased speed and synchronization and are capable of achieving massed effects, in many situations without the physical massing of forces required in the past."

DOJ_NMG_0092749

Networkcentric warfare has been on display in Iraq. Singer points to a tale of marines under mortar fire during the second US offensive on Fallujah in November 2004. The soldiers' call for help went not to fellow marines but to an office in Nevada, which was controlling an unmanned Predator drone in the skies above Iraq. The "pilot" in Nevada steered the drone over the area and launched a missile that took out the mortar.

But not everyone was buying into Rumsfeld's vision. Fighting today's wars, some experts say, is not just about smarter technology but about smarter ways of handling people. Jim Dobbins, director of the RAND Corp.'s Security and Defense Policy Center and the Bush administration's first special envoy to Afghanistan, believes Rumsfeld's efforts at transforming the military are "largely irrelevant" to the counterinsurgency efforts in places like Iraq and Afghanistan, and in fact may be destructive.

Mr. Dobbins acknowledges that at the tactical level, networked weapons systems can be helpful. But computers can not gauge collateral damage. The drone's missile may take out the mortar, but it may also take out the entire house.

"If you substitute firepower for manpower, you kill innocent people and antagonize the population you are trying to help," Dobbins says.

The unexpected difficulties of the Iraq war ultimately soured many people on the value of Rumsfeld's reforms. Pinpoint attacks can effectively take out tanks and missile silos. But lightning strikes don't work in house-to-house raids or when rooting out guerrillas in caves. Those scenarios require manpower.

Rumsfeld's management style, often described as arrogant, also raised resistance to his ideas.

In some ways, the fate of many of Rumsfeld's reforms has already been determined.

"He was so preoccupied with transformation and wrong about Iraq, I don't think most of his concepts will be realized," predicts Loren Thompson, chief operating officer of the Lexington Institute, a think tank on military issues. "He had two [unsuccessful] challenges on his watch: finding Al Qaeda's leaders and the war in Iraq. So his achievement will be discredited."

Will the new nominee for Defense secretary, Robert Gates, continue with Rumsfeld's reforms? "My impression is that Gates is being hired to deal with Iraq," says Mr. Krepinevich. "I don't see him giving high priority to transformation."

Bush Faces GOP Ire Over Rumsfeld Timing (AP)

By John Heilprin

AP, November 12, 2006

The White House is trying to soothe Republicans who say the party might have fared better on Election Day if President Bush had not waited until after the vote to oust Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"You could argue that either way, of what political effect an earlier decision on Secretary Rumsfeld would have had. But it doesn't matter," White House chief of staff Josh Bolten said Sunday.

"The president correctly decided that this decision does not belong in the political realm. And a decision as important as your secretary of defense should not be made based on some partisan political advantage. It would send a terrible signal to our troops, to our allies, even to our enemies," Bolten said.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich has suggested that if Bush replaced Rumsfeld two weeks before the election, voters would not have been as angry about the unpopular Iraq war. Republicans would have gained the boost they needed, according to Gingrich, to retain their majority in the Senate and hold onto 10 to 15 more House seats.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the outgoing chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, agreed with that assessment.

Bush should have removed Rumsfeld "as soon as he had made up his mind. And that's a hard thing to calculate. But it's highly doubtful that he made up his mind between the time the election returns came in on Tuesday and Wednesday when Rumsfeld was out."

"And if Rumsfeld had been out, you bet it would have made a difference," Specter said. "I'd still be chairman of the Judiciary Committee."

The same thought occurred to veteran Rep. Clay Shaw, R-Fla., who was on the verge of becoming chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. After the election, Shaw said that if Rumsfeld had stepped down before last Tuesday, Shaw and other Republicans might have won.

"It could have made a difference in who is running the Congress," said Shaw.

Bush said in an Oval Office interview with The Associated Press and other reporters on Nov. 1 that he expected Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney to stay in his administration until the end. A day after Democrats triumphed, Bush acknowledged he misled the reporters because he "didn't want to inject a major decision about this war in the final days of a campaign."

Bolten explained that when Bush spoke to the reporters, the president had begun seeking a replacement for Rumsfeld — but had yet to decide on a successor.

DOJ_NMG_0092750

"The president was not going to replace Secretary Rumsfeld unless he was confident that he had a very strong replacement available to him to put in place," Bolten said.

More important, Bolten said, was that Bush's misdirection to the press was justified by military need.

"If he had said something other than what he said, if he had been equivocal about his support for Secretary Rumsfeld, that would have started an outbreak of then warranted speculation about Secretary Rumsfeld's tenure," Bolten said. "It would have undermined Secretary Rumsfeld's ability to lead the military in a time of war."

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said he did not buy the idea that the timing of the resignation would have made a difference with voters — but allowed that the president was concerned with appearances.

"Think about the signal it would have sent two weeks before the election if President Bush, desperate to change political polls, would have jettisoned his secretary of defense. It would have looked desperate," Bartlett said.

"It would have looked like it was made based on political motivations, not on the security interests of our country," he said. "And I think that would have weakened the president and Republican support going down the stretch of this campaign."

Rumsfeld's departure was a turning point in the administration's Iraq policy. Bolten and Bartlett, making the rounds of Sunday talk shows, said Bush will now welcome new ideas about the war, even from Democrats he once called soft on terrorism.

Some Democrats raised concerns about Bush's choice of former CIA Director Robert Gates to succeed Rumsfeld. The questions revolve around what Gates knew during the Iran-Contra affair, which involved two Reagan White House covert operations: selling arms to Iran to free U.S. hostages in Lebanon and supplying arms to the Contra guerrillas fighting the leftist government of Nicaragua.

"I haven't decided what I'm going to do with Mr. Gates," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Bolten and Levin spoke on ABC's "This Week." Specter appeared on CNN's "Late Edition." Bartlett and Dean were on "Fox News Sunday."

Rumsfeld And The Realists (WSJ)

By Michael Rubin

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

On Dec. 20, 1983, Donald Rumsfeld, then Ronald Reagan's Middle East envoy, met Iraqi President Saddam Hussein in Baghdad. According to declassified documents, the Reagan administration sought to re-establish long-severed relations with Baghdad amid concern about growing Iranian influence. While U.S. intelligence had earlier confirmed Saddam's use of chemical weapons, Mr. Rumsfeld did not broach the subject. His handshake with Saddam, caught on film by Iraqi television, represented a triumph for diplomatic realism.

Iran and Iraq would fight for five more years, leaving hundreds of thousands dead on the battlefield. Then, two years after a ceasefire ended the war, Saddam invaded Kuwait. In subsequent years, he would subsidize waves of Palestinian suicide-bombers, effectively ending the Oslo peace process. Saddam's career is a model of realist blowback.

On Sept. 23, 2002, as Saddam defied international inspectors and U.N. sanctions crumbled under the greed of Paris, Moscow and Iraq's neighbors, Newsweek published a cover story, "How we Helped Create Saddam," that once again thrust the forgotten handshake into public consciousness. Across both the U.S. and Britain, the story provoked press outrage. NPR conducted interviews outlining how the Reagan administration allowed Saddam to acquire dual-use equipment. Mr. Rumsfeld "helped Iraq get chemical weapons," headlined London's Daily Mail. British columnist Robert Fisk concluded that the handshake was evidence of Mr. Rumsfeld's disdain for human rights, and Amy and David Goodman of "Democracy Now!" condemned Mr. Rumsfeld for enabling Saddam's "lethal shopping spree." While 20 years too late, progressives decried the cold, realist calculations that sent people across the third world to their graves in the cause of U.S. national interest.

What a difference a war makes. Today, progressives and liberals celebrate not only Mr. Rumsfeld's departure, but the resurrection of realists like Secretary of Defense-nominee Robert Gates and James Baker. Mr. Gates was the CIA's deputy director for intelligence at the time of Mr. Rumsfeld's infamous handshake, deputy director of Central Intelligence when Saddam gassed the Kurds, and deputy national security advisor when Saddam crushed the Shiite uprising. Mr. Baker was as central. He was White House chief of staff when Reagan dispatched Mr. Rumsfeld to Baghdad and, as secretary of state, ensured Saddam's grip on power after Iraqis heeded President George H.W. Bush's Feb. 15, 1991, call for "the Iraqi people [to] take matters into their own hands and force Saddam Hussein the dictator to step aside." In the months that followed, Saddam massacred tens of thousands of civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0092751

While Mr. Rumsfeld worked to right past wrongs, Messrs. Gates and Baker winked at the Iraqi dictator's continuing grip on power. For progressives, this is irrelevant. Today, progressivism places personal vendetta above principle. Mr. Rumsfeld is bad, Mr. Baker is good, and consistency irrelevant. * * *

Progressive inconsistency will only increase with the unveiling of the Baker-Hamilton commission recommendations calling for reconciliation with both Syria and Iran. In effect, Mr. Baker's proposals are to have the White House replicate the Rumsfeld-Saddam handshake with both Syrian President Bashar Assad and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

The parallels are striking. First, just as Saddam denied Kuwait's right to exist, Mr. Assad refuses to recognize Lebanese independence (Damascus has no embassy in Beirut) and Mr. Ahmadinejad calls for Israel's eradication. Washington realpolitik enabled Saddam to act out his fantasies; evidence suggests both Mr. Assad and Mr. Ahmadinejad aspire to do likewise.

Second, just as the Reagan-era Rumsfeld turned a blind eye toward Iraqi chemical weapons, so too does Mr. Baker now counsel ignoring their embrace by the Syrian and Iranian leadership. Tehran used chemical munitions in its war against Iraq, and senior Iranian officials have also threatened first-strike use of nuclear weapons. Syria is just as dangerous: On April 20, 2004, Jordanian security intercepted Syrian-based terrorists planning to target Amman with 20 tons of chemical weapons. Mr. Assad has yet to explain the incident.

And, third, there is the issue of detente enabling armament. Following his rapprochement with Washington, Saddam transformed investment into replenishment. The cost of ejecting Iraqi forces from Kuwait was far greater than any benefit borne of engagement.

Trade with Tehran has likewise backfired. Between 2000 and 2005, European Union trade with Iran almost tripled. During this same period, Iranian authorities used their hard currency windfall not to invest in schools and hospitals, but rather in uranium processing plants and anti-aircraft batteries. Mohammad Khatami, Mr. Ahmadinejad's predecessor and a man often labeled reformist by U.S. and European realists, showed the Islamic Republic's priorities when he spent two-thirds of his oil-boom windfall on the military. Said Mr. Khatami on April 18, 2002: "Today our army is one of the most powerful in the world. . . . It has become self-sufficient, and is on the road to further development." Subsequent discovery of Iran's covert nuclear facilities later that year clarified his boast. The Assad regime has shown its willingness to spend its discretionary income on a wide-range of weaponry and terror groups.

Realism promotes short-term gain, often at the expense of long-term security. With hindsight, it is clear that Mr. Rumsfeld's handshake with Saddam backfired. While it may have constrained Iran in the short-term, its blowback in terms of blood and treasure has been immense.

Why then do so many progressives then celebrate the return of realism? The reasons are multifold. First, having allowed personal animosities to dominate their ideology, they embrace change, regardless of how it impacts stated principles. Hatred of Mr. Rumsfeld became a principle in itself. Likewise, the same progressives who disparage John Bolton seldom explain why they feel forcing the U.N. to account for its inefficiencies or stick to its founding principles is bad. They complain not of his performance, but rather of his pedigree.

Second is a tendency to conflate analysis with advocacy. Progressives find themselves in a situation where they both embrace realism but deny reality. An Oct. 13 Chronicle of Higher Education article regarding a Columbia University professor's attacks on Azar Nafisi, author of "Reading Lolita in Tehran," highlighted the issue: "The conundrum, say these [Middle East studies] scholars, is how to voice opposition to the actions of the Islamic Republic without being co-opted by those who seek external regime change in Iran through a military attack." By embracing a canard, intellectuals convinced themselves of the nobility of ignoring evidence. Thus, Western feminists march alongside Islamists who seek their subjection while progressive labor activists join with Republican realists to ignore Tehran's attacks on bus drivers seeking an independent union, even as a Gdansk-type movement offers the best hope for peaceful change in Iran.

Both realism and progressivism have become misnomers. Realists deny reality, and embrace an ideology where talk is productive and governments are sincere. While 9/11 showed the consequences of chardonnay diplomacy, deal-cutting with dictators and a band-aid approach to national security, realists continue to discount the importance of adversaries' ideologies and the need for long-term strategies. And by embracing such realism, progressives sacrifice their core liberalism. Both may celebrate Mr. Rumsfeld's departure and the Baker-Hamilton recommendations, but at some point, it is fair to ask what are the lessons of history and what is the cost of abandoning principle.

Mr. Rubin, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, is editor of the Middle East Quarterly.

Places For Progress (TIME)

By Nathan Thornburgh
Time, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092752

Despite all the cordial luncheons and admissions that both sides love America, the President and the newly elected Democratic Congress aren't likely to find common ground on hot-button issues like stem-cell research and no-warrant wiretaps. Here's our pick of policies on which the two might actually do business:

Minimum Wage

The day after elections, the President's most prominent offer of cooperation came on this issue. Democrats have long made raising the federal minimum wage, which hasn't budged since 1997, a centerpiece of their platform. They want to boost it from $5.15 an hour to $7.25. The party's congressional members have pledged not to raise their own pay until the hike passes.

Education

Democratic Senator Ted Kennedy is set to chair the Senate committee that oversees education. Although he has bitterly accused President Bush of underfunding the No Child Left Behind Act of 2002, Kennedy has said he still believes in its principle: using standards to lift every student's performance. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings told TIME last week that she and the Senator had made the act's reauthorization a joint priority even before the election. "Kennedy and I talked this summer about the need to get this done--win, lose or draw," she said.

Alternative Energy

The two parties have pledged to work together to develop alternative fuel sources. Look for more tax credits and subsidies to help companies develop green and renewable energy. The President, who said in his last State of the Union address that "America is addicted to oil," is scheduled to talk up hybrid and ethanol-powered flex-fuel cars this week. And his market-centric approach may find an ally in Michigan's John Dingell, the Democrat who will be in charge of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Unlike many of his party colleagues, Dingell, a friend of his state's auto industry, is against mandating higher fuel-efficiency standards for carmakers.

Immigration

Members of Bush's party spent much of this year deriding and stonewalling his compromise plan for reforming immigration policy, which called for enhanced border security along with a path to citizenship for certain working immigrants. A Democratic Congress is much more likely to craft a Bush-style solution. Bush and the Democrats may well start with modest reforms like the AgJobs bill, an attempt by Senators from both parties to normalize the immigrant farm-labor economy. It stalled in the House this year.

After The Triumph, The Tribulations (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty

Time, November 13, 2006

Herding cats. Pushing a string. Making yourself heard in a preschool where no one has had a nap. The analogies that have been used to describe what it's like to be in charge of Congress have always suggested that the titles Speaker of the House and Senate majority leader were someone's idea of a joke. But now that the high fives and jubilant photo ops are behind them, Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid have to run the place. Whether anything is actually accomplished on Capitol Hill over the next two years will depend largely on the skills these two leaders develop in maneuvering through the tricky challenges ahead.

Pelosi is known for her steel; no one crosses her without paying a price for it. And she will need every bit of that toughness to manage a caucus that promises to grow more fractious. Much has been made of the relatively conservative bent of the incoming freshman class of House Democrats, many of whom were recruited to run because they fit so well in districts that have been sending Republicans to Washington for years. Once they arrive, however, they will be working under a set of committee chairs who proudly and tenaciously represent the farthest-left edges of their party--and who have been chafing under the past dozen years of G.O.P. rule. Most of the rest of the Democratic caucus also tilts to the left and is just as anxious to reassert itself.

Filling the exceedingly sensitive post of House Intelligence Committee chairman will be a good test of how Pelosi works. Her fellow Californian Jane Harman, its ranking member, wants the job, but Pelosi doesn't particularly like Harman, so speculation is that Pelosi could go to the next in line, Florida's Alcee Hastings. That would please the black caucus, but there's no small political problem in the fact that in 1989 Hastings was impeached by the (Democratic) House and removed by the (Democratic) Senate from his federal judgeship for conspiring to take a $150,000 bribe (although he had been acquitted in court). Pelosi must also deal with a potentially bitter and ideological race for the majority leader's job, which is the No. 2 post in the Democratic leadership.

For all the internal intrigue, Pelosi's job at least gives her a tight command of the House floor and requires her to pull together only a simple majority to get things done. Reid must surely envy that. It takes the support of 60 Senators--enough to get past a filibuster--to get anything controversial passed in the Senate; he's nine short of that. And while the majority leader has power over the schedule, the Senate's arcane rules give any individual Senator the power to bollix up the works.

DOJ_NMG_0092753

A person to watch will be incoming minority leader Mitch McConnell, one of the Senate's canniest operators. After wrangling with McConnell for years over campaign-finance reform, Senator John McCain declared, "There are few things more daunting in politics than the determined opposition of Senator McConnell." President Bush does not want to spend his last two years in office vetoing one Democratic measure after another. So McConnell will play a position much like the goalie in a hockey game, blocking legislation from ever reaching Bush's desk.

And finally there is the reality that the 2008 presidential campaign will be under way, and Reid oversees a chamber that is brimming with potential contenders of both parties. Primary politics in both parties rewards grandstanding and ideological purity, not compromise and teamwork. That's hardly a formula for compromise-- or for getting much of anything done.

Post-Thumpin' Politics (USNEWS)

By Michael Barone

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

The "thumpin'" that the Republican Party received last week will make profound changes in policymaking in Washington and in presidential politics. On the policy side, we have already seen something in the nature of parliamentary government: Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld lacked the confidence of the new congressional majority and promptly resigned. George W. Bush and the Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi both expressed a hitherto indiscernible desire to work together, either out of conviction or out of calculation that it was in their interest to do so.

Democrats, having won a small majority in the House and a paper-thin one in the Senate, now visibly share the responsibility for governance, and we can expect for a time less of the scathing rhetoric they routinely deployed. Bush clearly hopes to yoke the Democrats in support of a common changed approach to Iraq. On domestic policy, there will be constant negotiations between congressional leaders and Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman, complete with veto threats-much like those between Bill Clinton and Newt Gingrich. One can foresee areas of agreement. Bush will concede a fig-leaved minimum wage. On immigration, House Democrats and a solid Senate majority favor the Bush approach blocked by House Republicans. Advancing alternative fuels is another possibility. Some Democrats want tax-free savings vehicles for lower-paid workers; that sounds a lot like the individual investment accounts Bush proposed for Social Security. On some issues there will be no agreement-tax reform, probably. But big issues have been addressed in the past by divided governments.

In the process, Bush is decoupling himself from the Republican Party. House Republicans, with little chance to affect outcomes, will be mostly ignored as House Democrats were under Clinton. Senate Republicans, with the leverage of filibuster threats, will be brought into the loop. But congressional Republicans will be on their own in setting a course for 2008.

Narrow margins. As for presidential politics, we are still in an era of roughly even division between the parties. In the five House elections from 1996 to 2004, both parties received between 46 and 51 percent of the popular vote; final 2006 results are not in, but if they're outside this narrow range, it won't be by much. Bill Clinton tried to create a natural majority for his party but fell short. George W. Bush attempted the same for his party but has also missed the mark. The 2002 and '04 Republican majorities were too small to withstand the winds of 2006.

For a dozen years, our politics has been bitterly polarized, dominated by two baby boomer presidents who happen to have personal characteristics that people on the other side of the cultural divide absolutely loathe. Clinton in 1992 and Bush in 2000 both made genuine efforts to run as unifiers, but once in office proved to be dividers. The 2008 cycle will bring a different cast of characters. The leaders in the polls-Rudolph Giuliani, John McCain, and Hillary Rodham Clinton-all are, to varying degrees, in tension with their parties' bases. That suggests that they have the capacity, to varying degrees, to appeal across the cultural divide and pull their parties above the 51 percent ceilings they've been under for the past 10 years. Other potential candidates—Republican Mitt Romney and Democrat Barack Obama—may have similar potential. The culturally conservative Republican base and the vitriolically anti-war Democratic base don't seem to have strong candidates, unless you count Al Gore and John Edwards.

For the next two years, political governance and presidential politics seem likely to proceed on two separate tracks, with little relation between them. House and Senate Democratic leaders may want to avoid confrontation on issues that will put their presidential candidates on the defensive. Bush seems less likely to worry about the effect of his decisions on possible Republican nominees. That leaves the initiative on setting a post-Bush agenda to the presidential candidates of both parties. They start off closely matched. Pollster Scott Rasmussen, whose final Senate numbers were spot on, shows Hillary Clinton trailing John McCain 48 to 43 percent and tied 46 to 46 percent with Rudolph Giuliani. Democrats may have thumped Republicans last week, but the political future is very much up for grabs.

Health's Ailment (USNEWS)

By Josh Fischman

DOJ_NMG_0092754

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

Last Wednesday morning, the clouds scudding over Lake Monona in Madison, Wis., did little to obscure Tammy Baldwin's bright view of the future. "I think we have the chance to make some real changes to healthcare," said the Democratic representative, who had celebrated her return to the U.S. House for a fifth term the night before on a terrace by the lake. The liberal Baldwin is cosponsor of a bill, with conservative Republican Tom Price of Georgia, to allow states to experiment with different ways to expand coverage and access. Not only does the bill enjoy broad bipartisan support, "but with the Democratic takeover of the House, we can move on the bigger issues. Democrats recognize healthcare is an immediate crisis," Baldwin says.

Indeed, crisis is a word being used more and more often to describe the U.S. healthcare system. Medicare is going to cost a staggering $30 trillion over the next 75 years, "and no one has any idea how we are going to pay for this," says Robert Moffit, head of health policy studies for the conservative Heritage Foundation. Plus we're not getting enough for the money: A 2003 study in the New England Journal of Medicine showed that only about half of all adults get the medical care recommended in established guidelines. And no one is doing anything about the more than 46 million Americans who are uninsured. "Congress has, in many ways, been asleep at the wheel," says Jeanne Lambrew, a health-policy expert at George Washington University.

Lawmakers are unlikely to wake up and enact major overhauls during the next two years, despite Baldwin's optimism. Big fixes will remain stuck in ideological gridlock, though small changes-such as allowing Americans to buy drugs from abroad or expanding state insurance coverage for low-income children-are possible, say a broad spectrum of policy analysts and congressional strategists. But larger reforms, such as incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's proposal to let Medicare negotiate prices directly with drug companies, are likely to hit a wall in the Senate, where Republicans are still strong enough to hold up legislation and have genuine antipathy to expanding government programs. "Changing the drug benefit is not going to happen," says a high-ranking Senate aide.

The problem is that there are deep, genuine divisions in how to fix healthcare. It's not just playing politics, says Price, an orthopedic surgeon who just won his second term: "Representative Pelosi and Tammy Baldwin may believe that a single-payer system is the answer. I think it would be a complete disaster for medicine." Letting Medicare negotiate drug prices, many conservative analysts think, would simply reduce the supply—"That's what price controls do," says Moffit—not contain costs. Baldwin, on the other hand, points to countries like Canada "that buy in bulk for lower prices and don't have shortfalls."

States' rights. The beauty of the bill that she and Price put together, Baldwin adds, is that it gets away from theoretical debates: "We give states the ability to experiment with different systems. We'll actually get to see what works and what doesn't." States would propose plans for children's health insurance, elder care, or drug subsidies to a bipartisan congressional commission. It would pick a slate of proposals, and Congress would vote yes or no on the slate. States would then get money to try these things out for five years. A similar bill in the Senate, cosponsored by Ohio Republican George Voinovich and New Mexico Democrat Jeff Bingaman, is also on the table. "This is the first thing we're going to act on," says Voinovich spokesman Chris Paulitz. "We think it's important, and we think we can get it passed."

States, in fact, are becoming laboratories for health reform, says Mark McClellan, former head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. "Massachusetts passed a way to expand insurance, and other states, like New Mexico, are considering it, too. I think states are where the action is now, and their experiments may eventually start some national movements."

Federally, there are some other opportunities for action come January. Funding for the State Children's Health Insurance Program has to be renewed, and that gives Congress the chance to broaden eligibility or shift funds for more preventive care. Drug reimportation is already beginning to garner bipartisan support. But anything more extensive, even if it moves through Congress, "is probably going to run into President Bush's veto pen," says Henry Aaron, a health policy analyst at the Brookings Institution. "And that pen may get quite a workout."

My Mother, My President (TIME)

By Alexandra Pelosi

Time, November 13, 2006

Alexandra Pelosi is uniquely positioned to judge how the President and the future Democratic House Speaker will get along. At 36, she is the youngest of Nancy Pelosi's five children, and her famous HBO documentary, Journeys with George, was a backstage "video diary" of George W. Bush's 2000 campaign. She was the first to introduce the two. Her inside take on their relationship:

Back on the campaign plane when George W. Bush was a Governor running for President in 2000, he used to pass me notes to read to the Congresswoman from San Francisco. When a newspaper article touted her prowess at raising funds, he tore it out and wrote on it, "Ask her: Can I have some?" Or when a magazine ran its guesses for his vice-presidential short list, he wrote in "Pelosi," along with, "Can you get her to run with me?"

DOJ_NMG_0092755

When my parents came to have lunch with me at an Oakland airport hotel where Bush was giving a speech in March 2000, he did what he did when any member of the traveling press corps was in his or her hometown: he summoned us to his room so he could meet the parents. As he talked about the rigors of life on the trail, my mother politely explained how she was working her heart out to help Al Gore win the state of California.

The next time I saw them together, George was in the White House, and he told me, "You ought to be proud of your mom." At the time she was fighting her heart out on the House floor against the Iraq war. On any occasion that I have seen them together in private, they have appeared to be the best of "frenemies"--campaign-trail speak for politicians who keep their friends close and their enemies closer.

They actually have a lot in common. His father was President, and her father served in Congress and then as mayor of Baltimore. They both came to politics later in life, and they both mean it when they say that elections are not everything; if they lose, life will go on. Bush has the ranch, and my mother has her grandkids. And, of course, some people have made the mistake of underestimating both of them.

During the 2000 campaign, George used to respond to the jabs from late-night comedians by saying, "Let them laugh at me. I am going to be their President." On the trail in 2006, as the doubters were calling the Democrats a permanent minority, my mother repeated her mantra: We have better candidates. When anyone used the tired phrase, "Where are the Democrats?", she explained that everything was going exactly as planned; she was like a submarine on a stealth mission to take back the House.

On the day the President first criticized her at a fund raiser, she knew that he had given her a gift. When the President of the United States mocks you, it puts you on the map. And when he mocks you publicly, the money rolls in. Sure, they have their ideological differences. By now you have heard everything they have said about each other. But plenty of presidential candidates have said worse things about their opponents before they have chosen them as their running mate or their designated successor (witness John McCain).

While reporters like to stir the pot and focus on the catfights, they don't seem to grasp that these are two seasoned professionals working at the highest level of American government with skin so much thicker than the rest of us. As Bush noted in his press conference on the day after the election, "This isn't my first rodeo." Or as my mother has always told me, "This business comes with a free head clipping. Every time you stick your neck out, they come around and cut it off."

George W. Bush and Nancy Pelosi both know that if you want to breathe the rarefied air at the highest echelons of the U.S. government, you have to ignore the media buzzards. When I was watching Fox News recently, and she walked into the room, I had to explain that Sean Hannity was spending the month leading up to the election warning America that Speaker Pelosi would destroy this nation. She asked, "Which one is Hannity?"

So as all of us spectators sit home on our couches watching the bloviators pontificate about the state of American politics, rest assured that George Bush and Nancy Pelosi are so busy that they do not hear a word of it. And if they did, they couldn't care less. They have a country to run.

Lame-duck Congress Takes Roost (LAT)

By Richard Simon, Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — The ousted Republican-led Congress returns to the Capitol this week to try one last time to shorten a long legislative to-do list, while the just-elected members will vote for new leaders in races that could signal the direction the parties will take next year.

The lame-duck session mixes a dispirited Republican Party and a Democratic Party that knows it will soon have the upper hand in both houses -- a potentially combustible cocktail.

At minimum, Congress must pass a temporary spending bill to keep the government running until the next Congress takes office. Getting much else accomplished could be difficult.

"Democrats won't allow anything to pass they don't like, and Republicans have little interest in starting the Democratic reign early," said Thomas Mann, a congressional scholar at the Brookings Institution. "It could be a very short lame-duck session."

As the old Congress wraps up, the freshman lawmakers will arrive. They won't be sworn in until January, but they will meet with President Bush, pick up congressional IDs and learn everything from the proper attire for the House and Senate chambers to the location of the members-only gym. And they will have a say in choosing leaders.

Two House races -- one Democratic and one Republican -- could reveal how the parties will position themselves in the next session.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., is poised to become the first female speaker of the House. The choice for House majority leader, the No. 2 slot, is between a moderate and a leading anti-war Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0092756

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the current minority whip, faces Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, whose call for U.S. withdrawal from Iraq made him a favorite of party liberals.

Hoyer's supporters, including some of the new centrist Democrats, point to his tireless campaign to elect them. He visited 80 districts and raised more than $8 million. Murtha's backers say the former Marine's stance on the war was a significant factor in the Democratic victory.

Pelosi watchers are anxious to see how she finesses this one. Hoyer, although a committed Democratic soldier, fought Pelosi for the minority whip job in 2001, a race that left both bruised. Murtha has long been a Pelosi ally.

On the other side, three Republicans are battling to become their party's leader in the House, since the current House speaker, Rep. J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, has said he will not seek a leadership position.

House Republicans will choose between a veteran leader, whom some may want to blame for the party's loss of the majority, and two conservative challengers. Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the current majority leader, is facing Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana and Rep. Joe Barton of Texas.

The first order of business for the lame-duck Congress is to ensure that the government has money to run. Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the Senate Democratic leader, has advised current Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., who did not seek re-election, that Democrats would work with Republicans to clear spending bills for fiscal year 2007, which began Oct. 1, if they included "reasonable funding levels."

If Congress cannot finish the individual spending bills, lawmakers are likely to approve a "continuing resolution" that would keep the government operating at 2006 levels until the new Congress begins.

The session could extend some popular tax breaks that have expired or are due to expire, approve a U.S.-Vietnam trade pact in advance of Bush's visit to Hanoi on Friday, allow new offshore oil drilling and pass a nuclear deal with India, a Bush-administration priority.

Senate Republican leaders hope to win quick confirmation of Bush's nomination of former CIA chief Robert M. Gates to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as Defense secretary.

The White House wants the Senate to confirm the nomination of John R. Bolton as United Nations ambassador -- his current recess appointment expires when this Congress adjourns -- but he faces Democratic opposition, and last week a key Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, said he would not support him.

Another Bush priority also hangs in the balance: legislation that would rewrite domestic wiretap laws to give investigators the power to monitor e-mail and phone communications between suspected terrorists overseas and people in the United States without having to obtain court approval in advance. The House passed such a bill before the election, but the Senate recessed without taking action.

"We hope that the Democrats would see the utility in having this critical tool in the war on terror," White House counselor Dan Bartlett told "Fox News Sunday." Reid told CBS's "Face the Nation" that "we'll be happy to take a look at it" but would not say whether action would be taken.

For Republicans, the session could offer the last chance to insert pet projects, or earmarks, into bills. "There may be a little bit of, `Oh my gosh, if I don't get it done in the lame-duck now, since I'm still in the majority, it will never get done,'" said William Hoagland, Frist's top budget aide.

A leading proponent of earmark reform, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., told NBC's "Meet the Press" that "elimination of earmarking" should be a high priority. "The system of earmarking is corrupting," he said.

Also this week, Sens. Russell D. Feingold, D-Wis., and Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., are expected to introduce a bill to rescind an Oct. 1, 2007, termination date for a special inspector general's office that monitors U.S. expenditures on Iraq reconstruction. "This is a proposal that enjoys broad bipartisan support," said Jim Manley, a Reid spokesman.

The inspector general has produced a series of reports highlighting waste and fraud in the Iraq rebuilding effort. Language that would shutter the investigative office was quietly included in a military authorization bill, in an apparent effort to prevent further embarrassment for the Pentagon and the administration.

Both parties still hope to hold a separate vote on a bill to extend the research-and-development tax credit, a college-tuition tax break and more than 40 other expiring provisions.

For Post-Election Congress, Extensive To-Do List Is Awaiting Action (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 12 — The Democrats won the midterm elections, but time has not run out on the Republican majority in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0092757

Despite devastating losses at the polls, Republicans will control the post-election session that opens Monday as lawmakers return to try to finish 10 overdue spending bills and other legislation that stalled because of pre-election gamesmanship.

Republican leaders have compiled an ambitious to-do list, hoping to dispose of energy legislation, a trade deal or two, a civilian nuclear treaty with India and other favored bills before turning over the keys to the House and Senate chambers to the Democrats in January.

Democrats have some measures they want completed as well, most notably the spending bills, to save them the added work next year.

President Bush, hoping to get the most out of the remaining days of a Republican majority, is pressing two contentious matters: legislation authorizing domestic wiretapping by the National Security Agency and the nomination of John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations. And the Senate has scheduled confirmation hearings for Robert M. Gates to be the new secretary of defense to begin the week of Dec 4.

Members of both parties in Congress have all but written off the wiretapping legislation and the Bolton nomination, given the strong Democratic opposition and the impending power shift. It is also uncertain how hard Congressional Republicans will be willing to press Mr. Bush's more divisive issues. Some have expressed anger at his decision to remove Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld the day after the election, contending that earlier action might have cut Republican losses.

"The only things that can get done in the lame duck are things that have the consent of both sides," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York. "You can bluster around all you want, but it is not going to happen. Anything controversial just by definition won't get done."

The White House still intends to seek approval of Mr. Bolton and the eavesdropping program, said Mr. Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow, but it is not doing so to be "provocative" in the wake of the election.

"Those are goals: an effective U.N. ambassador, also an effective way of going after terrorists," Mr. Snow said. "Those are both constructive and important goals, and we'll see how the lame duck works through it."

Besides tackling a legislative workload that may take Congress well into December, the parties will elect new leadership for the 110th Congress. House Democrats and Republicans will decide contested races for top positions.

Though they will not be sworn in until January, members elected last week will be on hand for the leadership battles and for freshman orientation, creating the potentially awkward situation of bumping into the lawmakers they defeated. It looms as a difficult period for the 6 Republican senators and more than 20 House members who will be casting their final votes in the last gasps of the 109th Congress.

"We lost some good friends on our side, and we are going to miss those folks," said Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, who is expected to be elected the new Republican leader this week. "It will be sad."

Mr. McConnell said he thought that Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada and the incoming majority leader, laid out a reasonable agenda last week in a letter to Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader who is winding up his Senate career.

Mr. Reid urged Republicans to focus on the unfinished spending bills; a nuclear agreement with India; an offshore oil drilling bill; legislation to prepare for a potential flu pandemic and a biological attack; and a package of popular tax breaks.

"I think it is a good list, and if we can accomplish those things that would be a very productive lame duck," Mr. McConnell said, "and I like his attitude about it."

But the legislative agenda could shift quickly when lawmakers arrive with their own ideas of what should be on the table.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, elected as an independent, said Sunday on "Meet the Press" on NBC that he wanted Congress to take up the lobbying and ethics changes that died before the election. Some Democrats want to push changes in Iraq policy, and Republicans also expect Democrats to try to make early moves on domestic elements of their agenda.

In the first test of the bipartisan spirit that followed the elections, the House on Monday is set to approve a trade deal with Vietnam that Mr. Bush would like to have in his pocket as he travels to Hanoi this week for a regional trade meeting. But senators in both parties have raised objections to the deal that the administration is trying to resolve, and the fate of the trade pact is uncertain.

Washington Lame Ducks Have Heavy Agenda Bush, GOP Congress Take Last Try At Goals (AJC)

By Scott Shepard, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 13, 2006

Washington — The Republican-led Congress, which will yield to a new Democratic majority in January, reconvenes today for a lame-duck session with a long to-do list, including overdue spending bills and the election of new leaders.

But while President Bush hopes to push through some final measures and appointments before his GOP majority disappears, congressional Republicans may not be in much of a mood to legislate after the "thumping" they took in last week's elections.

The president's top priorities are legalizing his warrantless surveillance program, extending his tax cuts, Senate confirmation of John Bolton as United Nations ambassador and, the least controversial item, Senate approval of Robert Gates to succeed departing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

With so much to do, the postelection session could last until shortly before Christmas.

The session will be complicated by the fact that it will include House and Senate members who were defeated in last week's elections, which resulted in complete Democratic control of Congress for the first time since 1994.

"I don't think they're going to be in much of a mood to legislate," said Norm Ornstein, co-author of a new book, "Broken Branch," which describes the current Congress as a dysfunctional, deeply divided institution. "Don't be surprised if they pass a continuing resolution [to temporarily keep government programs funded at their current levels] and get the hell out of town."

Budget battle

That may be too much to expect from a Congress that has operated for more than a decade in an atmosphere of strong partisanship — and has yet to pass a budget for much of the federal government.

The fiscal year began Oct. 1, but Congress has passed only two of the 11 annual spending bills for the government, for defense and homeland security.

A "continuing resolution" for the other nine appropriations bills expires at the end of the week. One option is another stopgap measure to continue the current levels into January, when Democrats will take over. The president, however, has urged Republicans to complete work on the spending bills to prevent the Democrats from changing his spending priorities for various agencies before the next budget cycle in 2007.

Wiretap stalemate

Bush also wants Congress to pass legislation legalizing the program he secretly initiated through the National Security Agency after the terrorist attacks of 2001 to eavesdrop on terrorist suspects in the United States without a warrant.

Democrats have argued that the program, as currently constituted, violates existing laws. "It needs to be done lawfully and with adequate checks and balances," said Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), who will take over as Senate Judiciary Committee chairman in January.

Even so, the administration plans to continue making its case that the program is a vital tool to fight terrorism. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is set to argue the case next weekend in a speech at the U.S. Air Force Academy.

Bolton bash

Democrats have blocked Senate confirmation of John Bolton to be U.N. ambassador since he was nominated by Bush in March 2005, arguing he is ill-suited for such a diplomatic role. Bolton is serving on a temporary basis because Bush sidestepped the confirmation process by nominating him during a congressional recess.

Bush wants Bolton confirmed by the Senate before the Democratic takeover, and on Sunday, White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten argued on ABC's "This Week" program that Bolton "has been a good ambassador" and "deserves confirmation."

Sen. Joe Biden (D-Del.), who will take over the Foreign Affairs Committee chairmanship in January, countered that if the president truly intends to be more cooperative with the new Congress, he should nominate someone else for the U.N. post. Bolton "doesn't even have the votes of a Republican-controlled committee" in the lame-duck Congress, Biden said, citing the opposition of Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), who was defeated Tuesday, to the nomination.

Rumsfeld replacement

Replacing Rumsfeld may be one area where Republicans and Democrats can agree before the end of the year. The Senate Armed Services Committee is scheduled the week of Dec. 4 to begin hearings on the confirmation of former CIA director Robert Gates. And Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), who will replace Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) as the committee chairman in January, said he will work with Warner "to see if [Gates' confirmation] can be achieved."

In his weekend radio address, Bush said Gates is an "agent of change" and "will provide a fresh outlook on our strategy in Iraq." Gates has been a member of the Iraq Study Group, which is looking at alternative approaches to the increasingly unpopular war.

House leadership

With House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California in line to become speaker of the House in January, the race to fill the post of House majority leader under the Democrats pits the current No. 2 Democrat, Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, against Rep. Robert Murtha of Pennsylvania. Hoyer claims most Democratic incumbents support his bid, but Murtha, who led the Democratic charge against the administration's war policies, says he is "working diligently" to win the post.

DOJ_NMG_0092759

The job of House Majority Whip is expected to go to Rep. Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.), only the second African-American in U.S. history to rise to such a height in the Congress. Former Rep. William Gray (D-Pa.) served as majority whip in the early 1990s.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the architect of the Democratic takeover of the House, will take the No. 4 spot in the leadership, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

On the GOP side, House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has announced he won't remain in the GOP leadership. That sets up a race for House minority leader between the current No. 2 Republican, Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, against Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee. Pence argues that Republicans lost the Congress because "we lost our way." Similarly, Boehner contends that "the Democrats didn't win the election, we lost it." Both have promised to lead a return to the principles of limited government.

Georgia Republican Rep. Jack Kingston of Savannah is seeking the chairmanship of the House Republican Conference, which develops the party's national congressional strategy. The position currently is held by Rep. Deborah Pryce of Ohio, who is still awaiting the results of her re-election bid.

The Democratic House leadership elections are scheduled on Thursday, the Republicans' on Friday.

Senate leadership

Democrats will select Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada to be the Senate majority leader in the new Congress on Tuesday. Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) is expected to remain in the No. 2 spot as whip. Sen. Byron Dorgan of North Dakota will remain chairman of the Democratic Policy Committee and Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, the top strategist in the Democrats' Senate takeover, will serve another term as chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Senate Republicans will pick their leaders Wednesday, and Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) is unopposed to become the GOP leader, succeeding Bill Frist of Tennessee, who is retiring. Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) says he has enough commitments to win election as Senate minority whip, the No. 2 post. But Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi, who lost the GOP leadership post to Frist, has been calling colleagues to assess support for a comeback.

Setting Aside Differences (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck, David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress returns today for a lame-duck session that may also test the wings of the Democratic majority taking over in January.

Republican leaders, still in power, faced a mountain of work unfinished when members left town to campaign. Amid postelection promises of bipartisanship, the coming weeks are an opportunity for the parties to show a willingness to put aside past power struggles and work together.

House and Senate leadership elections this week could yet be influenced by this same pressure, and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) surprised many last night by publicly endorsing Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) to take her place when she moves up to be the new speaker next year. A Marine veteran of Vietnam, Mr. Murtha has been an outspoken critic of President Bush's Iraq strategy. But the 74-year old lawmaker was a strong ally of the president's father during the first Gulf War, and as someone with a long history of trading votes with Republicans on the House floor, Mr. Murtha could be an asset to an otherwise largely liberal leadership team.

The president, after the setbacks in last week's elections, has his own stake in making progress during the session. This evening, the House will take up a Vietnam trade bill that Mr. Bush hopes to take to Hanoi when he leaves tomorrow for a summit of Asia-Pacific rim leaders. He also wants Congress to return after Thanksgiving to complete confirmation of Robert Gates, his nominee for defense secretary, whose hearings before the Senate Armed Services Committee begin the first week of December.

Mr. Gates's nomination to succeed departing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has been generally well received, but bipartisanship will have its limits in the White House effort to win Senate approval for John Bolton to continue as ambassador to the United Nations. He has served in a recess appointment that expires when Congress adjourns, no later than January, and a fight is brewing over whether to keep or replace him.

The added time needed to deal with these issues opens the possibility Congress may reach a compromise on major unfinished appropriations bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. There is a $5.5 billion gap between the Senate and House bills, but resolving the issue is a shared goal for the administration and Democrats, who would like to clear the decks before taking over next year.

Toward this end, the House will vote to extend to Dec. 8 a stopgap funding resolution that has kept the government operating since last month. The Senate is prepared to act quickly, too, and start talks on a bill funding veterans' medical care as well as housing and health-care for military families.

DOJ_NMG_0092760

Lawmakers also will test the waters on several stalled business-backed items that have bipartisan support. The House just Friday added to its schedule tonight a vote on a Senate-passed bill backed by biomedical companies and university researchers that would make it easier to prosecute animal-rights activists whose protests lead to property damage and personal injury.

Separately, biotechnology and venture-capital firms have hopes for authorization of a $1 billion fund to encourage the development of new vaccines and treatments for illnesses such as anthrax and smallpox. Republican and Democratic Senate aides met last week to hammer out differences on the bioterrorism bill, backed by Sens. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) and Richard Burr (R., N.C.). The proposal, a version of which already passed the House, stalled amid objections from some Democrats, but now it has been added to Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid's list of priorities for the lame-duck session.

On the tax side, high-tech companies and major manufacturers such as Boeing Co. are pressing for renewal of a research-and-development tax credit that was set aside in the Republicans' pre-election drive to cut federal estate taxes. The R&D tax credit, which would be increased and extended through 2007, is part of a larger $39 billion package of popular tax breaks, such as college-tuition deductions. And the Internal Revenue Service, preparing its 2006 tax forms, needs answers soon on whether they will be extended.

Eric Ueland, a top aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) said he "wouldn't rule out" the possibility that some members will want to try again to pass a permanent cut in the estate tax, slated to jump back up after 2010. The potential is there for a bipartisan compromise, albeit with a smaller reduction than what Republicans have offered thus far. But the estate tax is still such a sensitive issue for liberal Democrats that it would be very difficult in the time remaining to strike a deal.

Mr. Ueland said staying into December could revive hopes of completing Senate action on a nuclear-power pact with India. But just to get the Vietnam trade bill through the Senate before the president leaves for Asia tomorrow will require Mr. Reid of Nevada to corral his Democratic members. Other matters are so contentious that the soon-to-be-majority will simply use Senate procedures to block consideration until it is in power in January.

For example, President Bush reiterated last week that he wants Congress to give him the authority to conduct warrantless wiretapping of terrorism suspects. But Democrats have lodged strong objections to the proposal.

The stiffest fight may center on the Bolton U.N. nomination if Mr. Bush presses it. Democrats say Mr. Bush should alter course and nominate someone less hard-charging and with greater finesse in handling sensitive diplomatic matters. Making the rounds of Sunday talk shows, White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, however, showed no sign of backing down.

"He has done a terrific job there," Mr. Bolten said on CNN's "Late Edition." "He has helped lead the U.N. Security Council to good resolutions on Lebanon, on North Korea, a variety of other issues. So he has actually been a very effective U.N. ambassador and I think the country is well-served to have him where he is."

Some on Capitol Hill, though, appear unpersuaded. Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R., R.I.), whose vote would most likely be needed to move the nomination out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, last week told reporters in his state that he wouldn't support Mr. Bolton in the lame-duck session. Sen. Joseph Biden (D., Del.) who is expected to head the committee in the new Congress yesterday called for the White House to withdraw the nomination.

"There's a lot of competent people," Mr. Biden said on ABC's "This Week." "Send someone new up, Mr. President...He's going to lose."

To be sure, the House is an easier place for the Republican leadership to score political points on the way out the door. Speaker Dennis Hastert's office suggested that looking ahead to 2008, Republicans may decide they would benefit from another round of voting on warrantless wiretapping or making Mr. Bush's tax cuts permanent.

But if the new Congress is as open as Democrats promise, partisan political points may be less important than being able to build effective bipartisan coalitions.

In their own leadership races this week, the greatest focus among House Republicans appears to be in the race for the whip post now held by Rep. Roy Blunt. The Missouri Republican, who flirted with stepping down at one point, faces a conservative challenge from Rep. John Shadegg (R., Ariz.), and if Mr. Blunt falters in his race, his deputy, Rep. Eric Cantor (R., Va.), could yet emerge as a younger alternative able to reach out to Democrats.

Ms. Pelosi's public endorsement raises the stakes in what many in Washington had dismissed as an improbable race by Mr. Murtha against Rep. Steny Hoyer (D., Md.), the current Democratic whip and a more seasoned member of the leadership.

Her letter shows her loyalty to a man who has backed her rise in the leadership -- and against Mr. Hoyer. "I respect her decision as the two are very close," Mr. Hoyer said, still confident he will win.

But the release of the letter will also influence freshmen Democrats coming to Washington this week for the caucus elections. Friday, Mr. Hoyer claimed support from 21 freshmen, and by countering with Ms. Pelosi's endorsement, the Murtha camp chose to play its ace in hopes of reversing this tide. It could be a costly move for Ms. Pelosi, but it also suggests the race could be a lot closer than Mr. Hoyer's camp has said.

DOJ_NMG_0092761

GOP Pressed On Offshore Drilling Limits (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP, November 12, 2006

The Democrats' return to power is increasing pressure on House Republican leaders to accept a limited expansion of offshore oil and gas drilling.

Supporters of such exploration say the next Congress, with Democrats in control come January, probably will not tamper with the long-standing drilling bans that have protected most coastal waters for a quarter-century.

A stubborn standoff has festered for months between the House and Senate over developing more of the oil and gas resources in the Outer Continental Shelf. The dispute is expected to be an issue in the final days of the Republican-run Congress this week when lawmakers meet in a lame-duck session.

The proposal is of great importance to Louisiana and three other Gulf Coast states. They stand to reap hundreds of millions of dollars under changes to the way the government shares royalties from oil and gas taken from the Gulf of Mexico.

House Republicans pushed through a bill that would open coastal waters for drilling everywhere unless a state objects. That essentially would end a ban on such drilling that Congress has imposed annually for the past 25 years in most areas outside the western Gulf.

Even drilling supporters said there was no chance that measure can pass the Senate, which has approved a compromise: opening 8.3 million acres in the east-central Gulf, no closer than 125 miles of land, and leaving other areas alone.

House Republicans, however, have refused to consider the Senate version — until now, after last week's election that drove the GOP from power. Among the incumbents who lost was one of the leading cheerleaders for the broader House bill, Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif. He is chairman of the House Resources Committee, which developed the measure.

House leaders have not said whether offshore drilling will come up this week, but pressure to do so has mounted.

President Bush said he wants the issue on the agenda. Senate GOP and Democratic leaders want the House to pass their bill and send it to the White House. A broad coalition of industries that depend heavily on natural gas has urged approval now of the Senate's plan.

The Senate bill would begin sale of leases in the 8.3 million acre area within a year. Actual production probably would not start for several years after that.

"This is not a choice between two bills ... but between getting something done or doing nothing at all. The time has run out on compromise," said the Consumer Alliance for Energy Security, an industry group that includes energy and timber companies, chemical makers and manufacturers.

"We're sending a message as strong as we can. We're pushing them very hard to get it done," said Jack Gerard, president of the American Chemistry Council. He says more domestic production is needed to drive down natural gas prices.

The legislation dramatically would shift how the government shares royalty from offshore oil and gas production. Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Texas would get a substantial windfall.

The House bill eventually would give as much as three-fourths of royalties collected by the government to any state that allows offshore drilling.

The Senate bill would increase royalties for Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Texas from less than 2 percent to 37.5 percent. In 2017, this royalty share would apply to all oil and as produced in the Gulf, not just from the 8.3 million acres newly opened.

Louisiana expects eventually to get an annual flow of more than $650 million a year, compared with about $32 million now from production in state-controlled waters, according to the state's congressional delegation.

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., says the additional money is needed to restore the Gulf Coast. Its barrier islands, wetlands and levees were ravaged by storms, including Hurricane Katrina.

"This is to provide a reliable stream of revenue so that the Gulf Coast states can secure an independent source of revenue to build these levees and restore this coastline," she said in an interview.

She fear that if the measure is not passed now, its chance of becoming law is slim.

Aside from Landrieu, few Democrats have shown much interest in broadening offshore oil production. Even limited expansion in the east-central Gulf worries many lawmakers; they see it as a step toward lifting the long-standing drilling ban in East and West Coast waters and off Florida's Gulf Coast.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., in line to be House speaker next year, strongly opposes lifting the drilling bans. She also has expressed concern about the revenue sharing provisions, although she has given guarded support to the Senate bill.

DOJ_NMG_0092762

Other lawmakers, including Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., who will head the Energy and Natural Resources Committee next year, oppose the royalty changes. They say money collected from oil and gas taken from federal waters should stay in Washington.

Don't Force An Energy Bill (NYT)

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

President Bush's call for the lame duck Congress to pass pending "bipartisan energy legislation" before it leaves Washington forever is a very good example of why the House and Senate should limit their work in this final session to as few measures as possible. Congress needs to pass the budgets it failed to get done before the elections. And since no time should be lost in the Bush reassessment of Iraq, the Senate should consider the nomination of Robert Gates to be defense secretary.

And that should be the extent of the agenda.

The energy bill Mr. Bush apparently had in mind is in fact two bills, one in the Senate and another in the House. Both would authorize increased offshore drilling for oil and natural gas. But there are huge differences between them.

The Senate bill, co-sponsored by Mary Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, is a narrowly drawn measure that would open a section of the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas exploration and use part of the royalties to help rebuild Louisiana's battered wetlands and barrier islands. This page, setting aside earlier misgivings, has supported her bill because of its limited scope and its demonstrably worthy environmental objectives.

The House bill, by contrast, is a broad, mischievous and badly conceived piece of work sponsored by Richard Pombo, Republican of California, that, in a stroke, would lift a long-standing federal moratorium on oil and gas drilling along the entire American coastline. The bill has been vigorously opposed by most state governors from Maine to California.

There has always been a danger that the two bills would go to a conference committee where — the Senate's assurances notwithstanding — the usual horse-trading would produce a bad bill much along the lines of the House measure. That danger may now be greater. Mr. Pombo's defeat in last Tuesday's election raises the distinct possibility that he will make one last desperate effort to help his friends in the oil and gas industry before he retires into well-earned political obscurity.

The terrain during a lame duck session is notoriously treacherous. Our suggestion, therefore, is that Congress take a deep breath and postpone any energy legislation until next year. At that point, Ms. Landrieu, whose party will be in charge, can try again. Alternatively, she could work with other leaders to produce a true energy bill — a comprehensive measure that would also seek to reduce consumption by encouraging more efficient cars and alternative fuels. As Ms. Landrieu concedes, drilling is only part of the energy equation. That is especially true for a country that uses one-quarter of the world's oil while holding less than 3 percent of its reserves.

Several such bills have already been introduced in the Senate, with considerable bipartisan support. This is where Congress — and, one hopes, a newly receptive Mr. Bush — should put their efforts in the new year.

The Lame-Duck Congress (WP)

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

ALAME-DUCK congressional session when both the House and Senate are about to change hands isn't, as a general matter, the right time to make important policy decisions. When it reconvenes this week, the 109th Congress should concentrate on finishing up the business of the 109th Congress -- primarily, passing the 11 remaining spending bills for the 2007 fiscal year, which started in October. The temptation for Republicans will be simply to approve a continuing resolution keeping this year's spending at 2006 levels, leaving the new majority to make the tough choices when it takes over in January. But this would be an abdication of responsibility, forcing government agencies to limp along without knowing their final budgets. It would create a logjam for the new Congress, which will simultaneously have to be staffing up, dealing with the president's 2008 budget proposal and working on an expected emergency spending bill early next year.

Another pressing task should be to give the District of Columbia full voting rights in the House. The moment is right for this to happen, thanks in large part to the efforts of Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) to broker an agreement that would create a new seat in the District along with a new congressional district in Republican-leaning Utah. Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. has said he will call a special session of his state's legislature to create a new, at-large congressional district. This is a deal that would be fair to District residents without advantaging either party. We hope that President Bush, who appeared unfamiliar with the issue when he was asked about it at his news conference the other day, has been fully briefed and will be fully supportive.

There are other important items on the congressional to-do list -- as well as some that are "to-don'ts." Confirmation hearings and, if possible, a vote on the nomination of Robert M. Gates to become the new defense secretary would avoid delaying Mr. Gates's start in that important job. Congress should also approve normalization of trade relations with Vietnam in advance of the president's trip there this week and extend an expiring trade deal that provides benefits to key South American countries. The House has already approved a nuclear agreement with India; the incoming Senate Democratic leader, Nevada's Harry M. Reid, has put that item on his priority list as well, and the Senate ought to act on it. Having let slip through a provision setting a termination date for the inspector general for Iraqi reconstruction, Congress should pass a measure to fix this mistake.

DOJ_NMG_0092763

Mr. Bush mentioned some other matters last week that would be better left for the new Congress. We would like to see carefully crafted legislation to provide a legal framework for the administration's warrantless surveillance program, but the measures that have been proposed so far go overboard in giving carte blanche to the administration. This is an important subject -- and one that ought to be taken up by the 110th Congress. Meanwhile, the president's last-ditch push to win confirmation of controversial U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton during the lame-duck session isn't a particularly good omen of presidential willingness to compromise with Democrats. Mr. Bolton's nomination is a matter the White House would do better to drop, for the lame-duck session and beyond, if Mr. Bush is serious about that new tone he talked about the day after the election.

Blocked: Bye-Bye To Bolton? (NSWK)

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - The White House and the new Democratic majority in Congress are ready to play hardball. Already they are tussling over John Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. President George W. Bush gave Bolton, an outspoken conservative, a temporary "recess appointment" to the U.N. post last year after Democrats and GOP moderates blocked his Senate confirmation. Bolton's interim job runs out at the end of the year, and minutes after the president's postelection lunch with presumptive House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, the White House asked the Senate to confirm Bolton permanently during a forthcoming lame-duck session. But Joe Biden, the Senate Democrats' incoming Foreign Relations chair, signaled that the Dems will continue to block Bolton—unless the administration turns over a set of ultrasecret National Security Agency intercepts that Bolton requested. Bolton said he needed to find out the names of Americans mentioned in them; Bolton's critics want to be sure he wasn't spying on subordinates.

GOP moderate Lincoln Chafee, who lost his Senate seat, also signaled his continuing opposition to Bolton, virtually guaranteeing the nomination will die in this Congress. To date, the administration has refused to give Dems the documents they want; three Capitol Hill officials, who asked for anonymity due to the sensitive subject, said Bolton's prospects will be even bleaker next year when Dems take over Senate control. The White House is currently standing by Bolton. But speculation is already circulating that he could be replaced by Zalmay Khalilzad, U.S. ambassador in Baghdad, or Paula Dobriansky, an under secretary of State.

Other Bush aides given recess appointments could face similar fates. At the Defense Department the temporary appointment of Peter Flory, an assistant secretary whose brief includes nonproliferation and Star Wars policies, also expires by the end of this year. Senate Dems blocked a vote on his confirmation last year, complaining that Flory had dealings in 2002 with Ahmad Chalabi's controversial Iraqi National Congress, and that the Pentagon was stonewalling Senate requests for documents. Other recess appointees who need Senate approval to keep their jobs beyond the end of next year include Julie Myers, head of Homeland Security's plainclothes investigation bureau; State Department refugee coordinator Ellen Sauerbrey, and C. Boyden Gray, U.S. ambassador to the European Union. Emily Lawrimore, a White House spokeswoman, said: "President Bush is encouraging members of the Senate to confirm these highly qualified individuals as soon as possible."

Bush Stands By Keeping Bolton As U.N. Ambassador Despite Opposition (WP/AP)

By John Heilprin

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

President Bush will not relent in his defense of John R. Bolton, his nominee for U.N. ambassador, despite unwavering opposition from Democrats who view Bolton as too combative for international diplomacy, aides said yesterday.

The Senate's top Democrat said lawmakers have more pressing matters than Bolton to address in their lame-duck session before adjourning. "I think we should go to things that we can work together on," Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

But two of Bush's top advisers said that the White House is not backing down from pursuing Senate approval for Bolton to continue in the job.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Bolton has done a remarkable job. "He's proven the critics wrong on all the charges they've leveled against him," Bartlett said on "Fox News Sunday."

"I think if he actually was able to get a vote in the full Senate, he would succeed," White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten said on ABC's "This Week."

DOJ_NMG_0092764

Bush gave Bolton the job temporarily in August 2005, while Congress was in recess. That appointment will expire when Congress adjourns, no later than January.

The White House resubmitted Bolton's nomination on Thursday. Finding a replacement for Bolton would come at a sensitive time for the Bush administration. It is counting heavily on U.N. diplomacy to help confront North Korea and Iran over their nuclear programs and to end fighting in Sudan's Darfur region.

Last week, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, said he saw "no point in considering Mr. Bolton's nomination again."

And Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.), who lost on Election Day, said he would not end his opposition to Bolton. That probably would deny Republicans the votes needed to move the nomination from the committee to the full Senate. Republicans now lack the 60 votes needed to force a vote.

Democrats said yesterday that Bush should alter course now and nominate someone less hard-charging, with greater finesse in handling sensitive diplomatic matters.

"There's a lot of competent people. Send someone new up, Mr. President," Biden said on "This Week." "He doesn't even have the votes in the committee. He doesn't even have the votes of a Republican-controlled committee today. We're going to have a hearing on him. There is going to be a vote on him. He's going to lose."

In the president's view, however, Bolton "has turned out to be a very effective representative at the U.N. and, in fact, has turned out to be something his critics expected him not to be," Bolten said. "He's turned out to be a good consensus builder, and it's been reflected on resolutions on North Korea, in Lebanon, in other ways."

Bolten played down speculation the administration might go around the Senate and find another way for Bolton to continue to represent the United States at the United Nations, perhaps by finding an alternative means of paying his salary or appointing him to serve as an acting or deputy U.N. representative.

"I don't know about that," Bolten said. "Our effort is going to be to try to get him confirmed in the ordinary course."

Bolton And Bipartisanship (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

So let's see. Democrats retake the Senate, and their first act of "bipartisanship" is to declare that they'll deny a confirmation vote to U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton. And now, say the arbiters of Washington manners, President Bush is supposed to show his willingness to compromise by withdrawing Mr. Bolton's nomination.

If Mr. Bush obliges, he'll be taking a big step toward turning last week's GOP defeat into a rout. Mr. Bolton has performed in exemplary fashion as a recess appointee these last two years, winning plaudits from everyone except those who admire Kofi Annan and Hugo Chavez. He has followed State Department orders and argued forcefully for U.S. policy.

The opposition to Mr. Bolton is based on nothing save vindictiveness. Republican Lincoln Chafee, who would have lost his GOP primary without White House support and who finally did lose last week, now says he won't vote for Mr. Bolton though he had once supported him. Mr. Chafee is a mystery wrapped in a muddle even to himself. Democrats Chris Dodd and Joe Biden are trying to show that any political appointee who refuses to bend to their wishes can't be confirmed. They know other Democrats would vote to confirm Mr. Bolton if he made it to the Senate floor.

Having had one recess appointment, Mr. Bolton can't get another one and be paid. But he could retain his position and be paid if Mr. Bush names him to a non-confirmable post at State and then assigns him to the U.N. Ambassador's duties. Now, that's a compromise.

Carmakers Seek More Attention From Bush (USAT)

By Justin Hyde

USA Today, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — When the heads of Detroit's automakers finally meet with President Bush at the White House Tuesday, they will press for more recognition of their issues, from the rising cost of retiree health care to the advantages a weak yen gives the Japanese.

The three — General Motors CEO Rick Wagoner, Ford Motor CEO Alan Mulally and Chrysler Group CEO Tom LaSorda — also will attempt to draw distinctions between themselves and foreign automakers whose U.S. branches generate record profits. The meeting should “enhance the president's understanding of the importance of the domestic auto industry to the economic health of the United States,” General Motors Vice Chairman Bob Lutz said in a recent interview.

“What I'm looking forward to is just sharing with (Bush) the state of our industry and also talking about competitiveness going forward,” Mulally said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0092765

All sides expect no firm commitments from the scheduled 45-minute session, which will include Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Al Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Friday that Bush plans to use the meeting to "reaffirm his support for the American auto industry." Snow said Bush also will thank them for their progress on flexible-fuel and hybrid vehicles.

The three topics that will likely dominate the meeting are health care, trade and energy. The automakers also are expected to share concerns about the yen's artificially low value, which helps Japanese firms' profits and hurts U.S. rivals.

Bush last met with the heads of Detroit's automakers in Michigan in 2003, as he canvassed the country to build support for his tax-cut package.

The last White House meeting was in 1997, when auto and union executives warned President Clinton that the Kyoto greenhouse gas reduction treaty could hurt their business.

Renewable Fuels May Provide 25% Of U.S. Energy By 2025 (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A new Rand Corp. study showing the falling costs of ethanol, wind power and other forms of renewable energy predicts such sources could furnish as much as 25% of the U.S.'s conventional energy by 2025 at little or no additional expense.

A second renewable-energy report soon to be released by the National Academy of Sciences suggests wood chips may become a plentiful source of ethanol and electricity for industrial nations because their forested areas are expanding, led by the U.S. and China.

Because use of renewable fuels to replace oil and cut emissions of carbon dioxide is an area on which Congress's coming Democratic leadership and the Bush administration agree, the studies are likely to hasten efforts to increase production incentives next year, either in a new energy bill or a farm bill. (See related articles.1)

"We hope it will help policy planners rethink the context," said Reid Detchon, executive director of the Energy Future Coalition, a foundation-funded bipartisan group. The coalition sponsored the study by Rand, a nonprofit research group known primarily for defense studies.

The Rand study concludes that because prices for gasoline, natural gas and coal are likely to remain high, their cost advantage over renewables will erode, furthered by the hope that ethanol from farm wastes will be available by 2020.

Renewable fuels now produce only 6% of the nation's energy, and about half of that comes from hydroelectric dams. The study assumes renewable-energy costs will keep dropping at the rate of recent years. It says raising the use of renewables to 25% of all U.S. energy consumed would reduce U.S. reliance on oil by about 20% or the equivalent of the imports from Saudi Arabia and Venezuela. The study says the expected growth of energy-related emissions of carbon dioxide, thought to be artificially warming the atmosphere, would be cut by two-thirds over the next 19 years.

Rand researchers modeled more than 1,500 economic scenarios and found that in most cases, increasing the use of renewable fuels -- which don't enlarge the atmosphere's carbon-dioxide buildup -- would be cheaper than federal regulations forcing the reduction of carbon-dioxide emissions, about a third of which come from vehicles.

The study notes there has been "little systematic analysis" of the costs of renewable fuels. Much of the debate has consisted of optimistic projections by environmental groups and doubts expressed by some academic skeptics, who say that making ethanol from corn consumes nearly as much energy as it produces and could raise food prices. Ed Murphy, a group director for the American Petroleum Institute, said policy that assumes there will be substantial improvement in ethanol technology "could be foolish and costly."

The Rand study's cost estimates assume progress will continue on making ethanol from farm wastes, wood chips and other forms of biomass that are much cheaper and more plentiful than corn. Given the interest in so-called cellulosic ethanol, more than 100 companies from the agricultural, chemical and biotechnology sectors will begin a three-day meeting here today.

The study on the growth of forests says forests in 22 of the 50 countries with the largest wooded areas are growing. Destruction of forests in tropical nations, however, continues, with Brazil and Indonesia experiencing the greatest losses.

Write to John J. Fialka at john.fialka@wsj.com2

True Blue Populists (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092766

Senator George Allen of Virginia is understandably shocked and despondent. Just a year ago, a National Review cover story declared that his "down-home persona" made him "quite possibly the next president of the United States." Instead, his political career seems over.

And it wasn't just macaca, or even the war, that brought him down. Mr. Allen, a reliable defender of the interests of the economic elite, found himself facing an opponent who made a point of talking about the problem of rising inequality. And the tobacco-chewing, football-throwing, tax-cutting, Social Security-privatizing senator was only one of many faux populists defeated by real populists last Tuesday.

Ever since movement conservatives took over, the Republican Party has pushed for policies that benefit a small minority of wealthy Americans at the expense of the great majority of voters. To hide this reality, conservatives have relied on wagging the dog and wedge issues, but they've also relied on a brilliant marketing campaign that portrays Democrats as elitists and Republicans as representatives of the average American.

This sleight of hand depends on shifting the focus from policy to personal style: John Kerry speaks French and windsurfs, so pay no attention to his plan to roll back tax cuts for the wealthy and use the proceeds to make health care affordable.

This year, however, the American people wised up.

True to form, some reporters still seem to be falling for the conservative spin. "If it walks, talks like a conservative, can it be a Dem?" asked the headline on a CNN.com story featuring a photo of Senator-elect Jon Tester of Montana. In other words, if a Democrat doesn't fit the right-wing caricature of a liberal, he must be a conservative.

But as Robin Toner and Kate Zernike of The New York Times pointed out yesterday, what actually characterizes the new wave of Democrats is a "strong streak of economic populism."

Look at Mr. Tester's actual policy positions: yes to an increase in the minimum wage; no to Social Security privatization; we need to "stand up to big drug companies" and have Medicare negotiate for lower prices; we should "stand up to big insurance companies and support a health care plan that makes health care affordable for all Montanans."

So what, aside from his flattop haircut, makes Mr. Tester a conservative? O.K., he supports gun rights. But on economic issues he's clearly left of center, not just compared with the current Senate, but compared with current Democratic senators. The same can be said of many other victorious Democrats, including Bob Casey in Pennsylvania, Sheldon Whitehouse in Rhode Island, and Sherrod Brown in Ohio. All of these candidates ran on unabashedly populist platforms, and won.

What about Joe Lieberman? Like shipwreck survivors clinging to flotsam, some have seized on his reelection as proof of Americans' continuing conservatism. But Mr. Lieberman won only through denial and deception, for example, by rewriting the history of his once-fervent support for the Iraq war and Donald Rumsfeld. He got two-thirds of the Republican vote, but managed to confuse enough Democrats about his positions to get over the top.

Last week's populist wave, among other things, vindicates the populist direction that Al Gore took in the closing months of the 2000 campaign. But will this wave be reflected in the actual direction of the Democratic Party?

Not necessarily. Quite a few sitting Democrats have shown themselves nearly as willing as Republicans to bow to corporate interests. Consider the vote on last year's draconian bankruptcy bill. Mr. Lieberman voted for cloture, cutting off debate and ensuring the bill's passage; then he voted against the bill, a meaningless gesture that let him have it both ways. Thirteen other Democratic senators also voted for cloture, including Joe Biden, who has just announced his candidacy for president.

The first big test of the new Democratic populism will come over reform of the 2003 prescription drug law. Democrats have pledged to repeal the clause in that law preventing Medicare from negotiating lower drug prices. But the fine print of how they do that is crucial: Medicare reform could be a mere symbolic gesture, or it could be a real reform that eliminates the huge implicit subsidies the program currently gives drug and insurance companies.

Are the newly invigorated Democrats ready to offer a real change in this country's direction? We'll know in a few months.

Return To Rubinomics? (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

During their long years in the wilderness, Democrats lashed out against trade and globalization, even though denying the economic case for trade is like pretending that tax cuts pay for themselves. Now that they have won Congress, the Democrats must prove that they are more than the mirror image of their opponents. This means reviving the pro-market centrism of the Clinton era -- a spirit that lives on in the form of the Hamilton Project.

The Hamilton Project is the brainchild of Robert Rubin, Treasury secretary under Bill Clinton. Rubin's great virtue was to be as free of ideology as is possible in politics and to recruit a team of clever pragmatists to work for him. Not every Cabinet secretary would choose an intellectual bulldozer as deputy -- particularly one with a talent for political incorrectness. But Larry Summers could get to the right answer faster than most people could get out of bed, and that's what Rubin cared about.

DOJ_NMG_0092767

Two years ago, Rubin teamed up with Peter Orszag, a laser-brained economist at the Brookings Institution. He no longer controlled the Treasury, but he persuaded a number of fellow Democratic grandees to finance a center for Rubinomics in exile; and Orszag served as policy director, commissioning a series of creative pragmatists to grapple with the nation's economic challenges. Anyone who laments the watery generalizations of the House Democrats' election platform should check out http://www.hamiltonproject.org/ . It is proof that Democrats do have sophisticated ideas. They just need congressional leaders to adopt them.

During the recent congressional campaign, Democratic candidates mostly had the right diagnosis and the wrong prescriptions. They saw that middle-class and poor Americans have not experienced wage gains during the past five years of growth, and they saw that families are one health crisis away from financial hardship. But the Democrats' remedies -- bashing Wal-Mart, railing against globalization -- offered little more than symbolism for the poor and middle class while promising damage to the economy.

The Hamilton people are just as ready to acknowledge that Americans are hurting. They note that the probability of an average family experiencing an income drop of half or more has jumped from 7 percent to 17 percent since the early 1970s; and that the average spell of unemployment has gone from 12 weeks to 16 weeks since the 1960s. But the Hamilton people have a better solution than protectionism.

Their first prescription is to encourage workers to save for themselves. A simple reform -- requiring companies to make enrollment in a retirement plan the default option -- would greatly boost savings, since many workers currently don't enroll not because they don't want to but because they don't get around to it: One series of experiments found that making participation the default boosted coverage for newly recruited low-income workers from 13 percent to 80 percent. A recent law facilitated automatic enrollment in 401(k) accounts but did not require it; and the law did nothing for the more than 70 million workers at companies that don't offer pension plans but that could nonetheless enroll workers in IRAs.

The Hamiltonians also advocate reform of government savings incentives. The current system of tax deductions favors the rich, because deductions are worth most to people in the highest tax brackets. A janitor who saves a dollar gets no help from the government, whereas a chief executive who saves a dollar gets a 35-cent tax subsidy. The Hamiltonians would replace this upside-down system with tax credits that are worth the same to everyone, irrespective of their tax bracket.

The Hamiltonians also have ideas on unemployment insurance. The existing system is designed to protect workers who lose jobs, though in practice eligibility restrictions ensure that only one in three gets covered. It is not designed to help workers who find new work at a much lower wage -- even though the resulting hardship lasts longer. So why not create a new borrowing mechanism to help workers get through temporary layoffs, and use the savings to provide government insurance to workers who suffer acute wage losses?

In keeping with the Rubin pragmatism, some Hamiltonian ideas violate Democratic shibboleths. One paper demonstrates that teacher quality has nothing to do with whether a teacher is certified and argues that school principals should have the freedom to fire ineffective junior teachers -- which would not thrill the teachers unions. But nearly all the Hamilton proposals have three things in common. They would reduce the inequality that Democrats emphasized on the campaign trail. They would not bust the budget. And they would promote economic growth. If the political system can't make use of ideas that tick all these boxes, there is something desperately wrong with it.

Democrats: Identify Pork Sponsors (USAT)

By Peter Eisler, Kathy Kiely

USA Today, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats aim to open the next Congress in January with a new rule that identifies lawmakers who use legislative “earmarks” to help special interests — a change Republicans promised but didn't implement.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi said her first agenda item after being elected House speaker will be a vote to require sponsors of earmarks to be identified. Currently, lawmakers can remain anonymous in sponsoring an earmark, which is language in a bill that directs funds or tax benefits to a business, project or institution.

“There has to be transparency,” the California congresswoman told USA TODAY last week. “I'd just as soon do away with all (earmarks), but that probably isn't realistic.”

Pelosi said some earmarks “are worthy,” and they can be a legitimate way for Congress to force fiscal priorities on the White House.

House Republican leaders adopted a disclosure rule in September, but no earmark sponsors have been identified under the rule because it effectively exempted bills that dictate spending for 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0092768

Congress begins a lame-duck session today to consider unfinished 2007 appropriations bills. Those bills could give members another chance to insert anonymous earmarks. Regardless, the Republican rule expires at year's end, so Democrats would have to pass their own disclosure requirement.

Earmarking has drawn complaints from groups such as the National Taxpayers Union that say anonymity encourages wasteful spending. Conservative groups and some GOP lawmakers, such as Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., have said Republicans' failure to bring accountability to the process helped fuel the party's losses last week.

David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, cited earmark disclosure as one of several “needed reforms” that Republicans should back in the new Congress. “We hope that the party in which most of us have invested our trust will learn the right lessons” from the elections, he said.

Last month, a USA TODAY investigation found that many special interests got earmarks after hiring lobbyists who were relatives of lawmakers or staffers affiliated with the House and Senate appropriations committees.

According to the Congressional Research Service, the number of earmarks in appropriations bills has tripled in the past decade to about 16,000. One famous example was an earmark that set aside millions for a “bridge to nowhere” — a span over a remote Alaskan waterway to a sparsely populated island.

“You can't have bridges to nowhere for America's children to pay for,” Pelosi said. “Or if you do, you have to know whose it is.”

Speaker-to-be Is No Stranger To Earmarking (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — When the House passed a massive spending bill last November, Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi made sure her constituents knew what they were getting.

"Pelosi Secures $115 Million for San Francisco Transportation, Housing, Science and Arts," she proclaimed in a news release.

It wasn't an unusual announcement. Like many of her colleagues in Congress, Pelosi for years has celebrated bringing home the bacon to her district.

But now — as Pelosi prepares to take over the House after an election in which scandal helped drive Republicans from power — she is promising changes to the controversial practice of earmarking.

Earmarks are spending provisions dropped into bills — often anonymously, at the last minute and without public scrutiny. They were at the center of several high-profile scandals that undermined the GOP this year, when earmarks benefited special interests.

Pelosi has not been linked to any impropriety. And not all the federal funding Pelosi boasts about came from earmarks. But the presumed new House speaker has proved a champion practitioner of the earmarking process over the years.

During the last congressional session, her district received far more earmarks than a typical district, according to Taxpayers for Common Sense, a nonpartisan watchdog that tracks congressional spending.

Pelosi has helped direct tens of millions of dollars to subway and bridge projects in San Francisco. She has secured money to restore a historic schooner and convert the old San Francisco Mint into a history museum.

Citizens Against Government Waste, a critic of such "pork-barrel" spending, has calculated that Pelosi's district received nearly $31.3 million through earmarks in the last two fiscal years.

Among the biggest earmarks identified by the group were $5.6 million for the UC San Francisco neurology department and $4 million for Hunters Point Naval Shipyard. Both were inserted into the 2006 defense spending bill.

Three years ago, the San Francisco Chronicle reported that Pelosi had secured $1 million for the University of San Francisco's Leo T. McCarthy Center for Public Service and the Common Good, which was started by her longtime advisor and campaign treasurer.

At the time, the 10-term congresswoman from California's 8th District said the center had received the funding on its merits.

Pelosi has defended her earmarking, including at a news conference in March. "There are many earmarks that are very worthy," she said. "All of mine, as a matter of fact."

And she has reaped the rewards. San Francisco's largest newspaper has extensively covered the millions of dollars in federal money she has helped bring home.

Pelosi says there is a distinction between earmarks for public projects, which she defends and are typically publicized, and those she calls "special-interest earmarks."

"It is the special-interest earmarks that are the ones that go in there in the dark of night that they don't want anybody to see, and that nobody does see, and that are voted upon," she said in March.

DOJ_NMG_0092769

Special-interest projects, which helped fuel several recent congressional scandals, are often anonymously slipped into spending bills by lawmakers at lobbyists' behest.

Pelosi's approach to the issue is certain to come under renewed scrutiny. In one of her first acts as speaker, she has pledged to crack down on earmarking.

"I would just as soon do away with all of them," she told reporters this week.

This year, Pelosi was among those who assailed Republicans' use of the practice.

And when the House adopted a rule in September requiring authors of some, but not all, earmarks to be identified, she called it a "political gimmick to make it look as if something is happening."

The current Democratic proposal would not prohibit earmarks, but it would expand the requirement to identify earmarkers.

"It won't take long for the American public to realize that Nancy Pelosi and company were all talk and no action on earmark reform," said Kevin Madden, a spokesman for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

"Pelosi has been one of the biggest proponents and beneficiaries of pork spending."

Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider dismissed the criticism, promising that under Pelosi's leadership earmarks would not be abused as she said they were under the Republicans.

But budget watchdogs, who decried the GOP majority's use of earmarking over the last 12 years, are watching warily.

When a group of them sent Pelosi a letter last week noting that they were encouraged by her "stated support for real earmark reform," they closed with a warning: "We hope you and your colleagues will show the same dedication to enacting these reforms in the majority as you did to promoting them in the minority."

Reid Pledges Earmark Reform, But May Benefit (LAT)

By Chuck Neubauer And Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid vows to make reform of congressional earmarks a priority of his tenure, arguing that members need to be more transparent when they load pet projects for their districts into federal spending bills.

But last year's huge $286-billion federal transportation bill included a little-noticed slice of pork pushed by Reid that provided benefits not only for the casino town of Laughlin, Nev., but also, possibly, for the senator himself.

Reid called funding for construction of a bridge over the Colorado River, among other projects, "incredibly good news for Nevada" in a news release after passage of the 2005 transportation bill. He didn't mention, though, that just across the river in Arizona, he owns 160 acres of land several miles from proposed bridge sites and that the bridge could add value to his real estate investment.

Reid denies any personal financial interest in his efforts to secure $18 million for a new span connecting Laughlin with Bullhead City, Ariz.

"Sen. Reid's support for the bridge had absolutely nothing to do with property he owns," said Rebecca Kirszner, Reid's communications director. "Sen. Reid supported this project as part of his continuing efforts to move Nevada forward."

But some Bullhead City property owners and local officials say a new bridge will undoubtedly hike land values in an already-booming commuter town, where speculators are snapping up undeveloped land for housing developments and other projects. Experts on congressional spending say Reid's earmark provides yet another sign of the need for reform.

"It's a really bad idea for lawmakers to earmark projects when they have a financial interest that could in any way be affected by it," said Norman Ornstein, coauthor of "The Broken Branch" a recent book that examines earmarking and other practices.

Ornstein said he did not have enough information to fully evaluate the Reid deal. But, he said, "we already have too many examples — including a number of Southern California representatives — who are very directly using this process to enrich themselves."

Said Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, a nonpartisan watchdog that tracks congressional spending, "Unwittingly, the taxpayer may have helped inflate the value" of Reid's property.

Earmarking allows congressional leaders, committee chairs and other insiders to insert narrowly targeted spending orders into pending legislation without going through the normal budget review process. Members of both parties defend earmarking as a way for Congress to get attention for local concerns when executive-branch agencies are unresponsive.

Earmarking was at the heart of the case against former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe), now in prison for using his congressional seat to secure federal funding for individuals who provided him personal benefits. It was also the basis for much of the wealth amassed by criminal lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who referred to the appropriations committee as "the favor factory."

DOJ_NMG_0092770

Reform has been difficult to achieve in part, critics say, because leaders of both parties encourage earmarking to build popularity at home and power among fellow Congress members.

Reid is not the only powerful member known to use the practice. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a former appropriations panel member, has used earmarks prodigiously.

The minority leader of the new Senate, Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), is an active earmarker, as is current Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who last year secured funding for a highway interchange near property he owned outside Chicago. (He too has claimed there is no connection between his earmarks and personal land holdings.)

Last week, when Reid's status rose as Democrats took control of the Senate after the midterm election, the senator promised, like Pelosi, to make earmark reform a top priority when party members caucused.

"With Democrats running Congress, we are in a much better position to achieve real transparency and openness," said Kirszner.

In earlier years, Reid has boldly claimed credit for getting earmarks for his constituents. Last year, he boasted of securing $300 million in earmarks in the transportation bill.

When pressed about his position on earmarks in an interview on public television in January, Reid acknowledged abuses, but added: "There's nothing basically wrong with earmarks. They've been going on since we were a country."

Actually, earmarks have skyrocketed in recent years, from 1,439 in 1995 to 15,268 last year, according to a Senate estimate.

The proposed bridge between Laughlin and Bullhead City was not on the priority list sent to local members of Congress by either the Nevada or Arizona transportation agencies.

But beginning in 2003, local supporters of the bridge — which would be the second span connecting the two towns — found a receptive audience when they approached some members of the Nevada and Arizona congressional delegations. Civic leaders argued that an additional bridge was needed because traffic on the existing connector bridge, on the northern edge of Bullhead City, had become overwhelming.

Laughlin consists mainly of casinos and hotels, and has little housing or shopping. Most of the casino workers live across the river in Bullhead City, which also has shopping and a hospital. Elected officials say both communities would benefit from a second bridge.

Reid's land, three to five miles from several proposed sites for the second bridge and near the local hospital, is undeveloped. New housing is springing up around it.

Acting on a request from the town of Laughlin, Reid, a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee's transportation subcommittee, in 2003 secured $500,000 for preliminary studies.

Last year, Rep. Jon Porter (R-Nev.), supported by Rep. Trent Franks (R-Ariz.), got $2 million for the bridge inserted into the House version of the transportation bill.

By the time Congress approved the $286-billion transportation bill, $18 million more in bridge funding had been added. Reid took credit in a news release for securing money that would kick the project into high gear. The bridge, still in the planning stages, is projected to cost $30 million to $40 million.

Arizona's two Republican senators voted against the entire transportation bill as pure pork.

Nowhere in Reid's statements about the project was any mention of his Bullhead City land holdings; he does list it on his Senate financial disclosure forms. He valued the Arizona land at $500,000 to $1 million in his most recent disclosure, which reported total assets of at least $2.2 million.

Reid's interest in the Arizona land dates back more than 20 years and, according to his staff, has been a long-running headache. He paid about $150,000 for 100 acres of the Bullhead City parcel, and his longtime friend Clair Haycock bought the remaining 60 acres for $90,000.

Californians who bought the property from the two in the early 1990s defaulted on a $1.3-million note and returned the land to Reid and Haycock.

In early 2002, Haycock sold out to Reid for $10,000, or about $166 an acre.

At the time, the Mohave County assessor valued the entire parcel at $339,620, or more than $2,000 an acre.

The low price resulted from Haycock's need to sell and Reid's lack of interest in buying, the two men said.

The investment "had been a losing proposition for about a decade running," Reid's staff said.

Haycock, who owns Haycock Petroleum Co. of Las Vegas, said in an e-mail that he needed to sell his share to liquidate a company pension plan, which owned the property.

He said in a statement that he "expected nothing from Sen. Reid" in return for selling him the property.

"Sen. Reid has never taken any official action to provide personal financial benefit to me, and I would never have asked," Haycock said.

DOJ_NMG_0092771

City and county officials say that land values have been rising in Bullhead City as developers and speculators discover the area.

"Once they build a bridge, values will go up," said Frank Capotosto of the Mohave County assessor's office.

"A new bridge will increase value because there would be better circulation, " said Pawan Agrawal, public works director and city engineer for Bullhead City.

"A lack of a bridge depresses our growth."

California businessman Ken Renfroe recently bought property near Reid's that he intends to develop in five years or so. He believes that a new bridge will increase property values.

"I am sure it has already had a positive influence," he said of the proposal.

He paid $240,000 for 37.52 acres, an average of $6,396 an acre, records show.

Some other local real estate owners, however, question whether the bridge would increase land values.

Reid's office referred inquiries about land values to developer Robert Bilbray, a Reid supporter who works in the LaughlinBullhead City area.

Bilbray disputed the notion that Reid could stand to gain from the bridge construction.

Site plans have not been finalized, he said, and some proposed locations could decrease Reid's property value.

"The concept that Sen. Reid's property in Bullhead City, Ariz., will gain in value from another bridge between Bullhead City and Laughlin is ludicrous," he said.

'There Is No Reason To Wait' (USAT)

By Pete Stark

USA Today, November 13, 2006

Democrats won both houses of Congress last Tuesday because Americans supported our pledge to change direction on several major issues, including the Medicare Part D prescription drug benefit.

There is no reason to wait. True, it is a complex problem, and 100 legislative hours is less than three weeks.

Consider, however, the middle-income senior who suddenly hits the "doughnut hole" and must come up with $2,850 in out-of-pocket cash for a drug to ease his or her cancer burden. For that person, quick congressional action might save a life.

I believe we must start work immediately to improve this incomprehensibly complicated plan, which overpays and deregulates private plans to the detriment of the beneficiaries and taxpayers.

The same Republicans who certified its cost as $400 billion over 10 years, knowing the true figure was north of $550 billion, generated some of the polls showing satisfaction with Part D.

Yes, premiums are lower than expected, not from market competition, but from massive Medicare subsidies to the insurance industry. With less than 3% overhead, universal coverage and lower prices, a Medicare-run plan could offer true competition. Medicare payments for physicians and hospitals have created no noticeable increase in the bankruptcy filings by them in the past decade. Why immunize the pharmaceutical industry from competition?

The Republican administration never even tried to save money. It forbid any negotiation on price or availability of drugs at the behest of the pharmaceutical industry. We can do better.

Former Health and Human Services secretary Tommy Thompson, faced with the anthrax threat, took just over a month to negotiate a 50% reduction in the price of the drug Cipro. There is no reason that Medicare cannot do the same and provide a drug benefit similar to my Blue Cross benefit or the various plans offered to USA TODAY employees.

If not now, when?

Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., is the top Democrat on the House Ways and Means health subcommittee.

Pelosi On Drugs (WSJ)

By Alain Enthoven And Kyna Fong

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

Nancy Pelosi has promised that when the Democrats come into control of the House, they will repeal the ban preventing Medicare from negotiating directly with pharmaceutical companies, within the first 100 hours. She must expect that this legislation will bring down drug prices dramatically. In fact, it is not obvious that allowing the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies will lead to lower prices than those achieved by private drug plans. There are several good reasons that government negotiations may not decrease drug costs.

First, negotiations are a bargaining process. The relative balance of bargaining power determines at which price the deal is struck.

DOJ_NMG_0092772

People often confuse market power with bargaining power. The thinking goes, the larger the share of the market the buyer represents, the greater the bargaining power and thus the lower the prices negotiated. That line of reasoning fails with drugs, however, because the seller is frequently a monopolist so it cannot be threatened with replacement by a substitute. Instead, the only threat is exclusion from the market.

Rather than market share, a party's bargaining power is determined simply by its ability to say no, to walk away from the table without an agreement. Whether the government or a private drug plan has greater bargaining power is not clear. Which can walk away more easily and declare that some brand-name drug will not be covered on the formulary? Private plans like Kaiser or United are able to negotiate deep discounts with pharmaceutical companies precisely because of the plans' ability to say no -- the ability to include some drugs and to exclude others, allowing the market to judge the resulting formulary. On the other hand, when the government negotiates, its hands are tied because there are few drugs it can exclude without facing political backlash from doctors and the Medicare population, a very influential group of voters.

In fact, the government negotiating on behalf of Medicare beneficiaries may lead to some unintended adverse consequences. Since direct-to-consumer advertising is legal in the U.S., there is nothing preventing pharmaceutical companies from funding a torrent of advertisements for the "latest and greatest" drug, thereby creating a strong demand within the Medicare population for coverage of the drug. How firm can the government stand when negotiating for a drug being clamored for? This is not the sort of bargaining power that will lead to lower prices.

Secondly, by acting as one large buyer, the government will cause price discounts to become more expensive for pharmaceutical companies. In other words, the minimum price that the pharmaceutical company is able to accept increases. All else equal, this will lead to higher, not lower, prices. When private drug plans are negotiating individually with pharmaceutical companies, those companies have the power to "price discriminate," meaning they can charge lower prices to some drug plans and higher prices to others. This ability allows for large discounts. If Pfizer is able to give a deep discount to Kaiser without giving a similar discount to United, then it is less costly for Pfizer to give Kaiser that discount. If, however, Pfizer can give a deep discount to Kaiser only if the same discount is granted to all other Medicare drug plans, then the discount becomes very expensive.

Experience with the Medicaid best-price rule, passed as part of OBRA '90, provides both empirical and anecdotal evidence of price discounts becoming more expensive when buyers' discounts are forcibly linked together. The best-price rule states roughly that Medicaid will be granted a price for a drug that is the lowest price offered to any buyer of that drug. If that price is not low enough, Medicaid receives a fixed discount off the average price. In effect, the best-price rule transforms all private discounts negotiated between a pharmaceutical company and a drug plan into public discounts for Medicaid. Research by academics, along with a slew of anecdotal evidence reported in the press, suggests that after passage of the Medicaid best-price rule, the days of deep discounts to private drug plans have been numbered. Instead, for most drugs the dispersion in prices has declined significantly and the overall level of prices has increased. Even with products for which there are therapeutic substitutes available, price competition has become less intense.

All that aside, many will argue that, clearly, government negotiations lead to lower prices -- just look at Canada, or Britain, or France. True, those governments may obtain lower prices than the public pays in the U.S., but the real question is: Do those governments negotiate lower prices than what would be negotiated were smaller groups of buyers able to deal individually with pharmaceutical companies? Moreover, a great advantage that governments in other countries have over the U.S. government is the ability to control entry. Without direct-to-consumer advertising, citizens in other countries don't even hear about new drugs until the government has approved the drug and negotiated an amenable price. Interestingly, with the expansion of the Internet and unrestrained information flow, other governments have been facing new challenges. Earlier this year, a well-publicized legal battle brought by a U.K. woman against the NHS's decision not to cover Herceptin for early-stage breast cancer has compelled the NHS to reverse its original decision and to offer coverage for that drug.

Finally, there is the familiar economic argument that the market-determined price is the only fair price. How can the government determine what price is "fair," what price appropriately reimburses pharmaceutical companies for all their research and development efforts? How can the government determine what prices will encourage the right levels of future innovation? The government negotiating prices only leaves room for additional gains through political lobbying and campaigning, activities at which pharmaceutical companies have proven themselves rather adept.

Congressional Democrats need to be careful in making the logical leap from market share to bargaining power. Empowering the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies is not necessarily equivalent to achieving lower drug prices. In fact, neither economic theory nor historical experience suggests that will be the outcome. Members should think carefully before jumping on the bandwagon -- this promise may bring just the opposite of what was ordered.

Mr. Enthoven is a professor emeritus at the Graduate School of Business at Stanford, where Ms. Fong is a doctoral student in economics.

DOJ_NMG_0092773

Congress's Sci-tech Agenda To Shift Under Democrats (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, November 13, 2006

For clues to whether bipartisan cooperation in Washington will take root or disappear from the table as quickly as the china after last week's get-acquainted lunches at the White House, watch how some key science and technology issues play out.

Ordinarily, broad science goals - such as better science education or the American Competitiveness Initiative - draw bipartisan support. But there are some divisive science topics on the Democrats' early agenda - namely embryonic stem-cell research - and these highly charged science and environmental issues will be one barometer of the durability of cross-aisle cooperation.

"If this stated spirit of bipartisanship is to occur, one of the best places to look is going to be in the area of science and technology," says Roger Pielke Jr., director of the Center for Science and Technology Policy Research at the University of Colorado at Boulder. "If it doesn't occur in science and technology, I wouldn't expect that it's likely to occur elsewhere."

The potential for fractiousness exists in a number of policy areas where the ideas of the new Democratic majority differ from those of Republican lawmakers or the Bush administration. Among them are funding for research into alternative-energy sources, what to do about global warming, the future of the space program, and charges that the Bush team has muzzled federal scientists and ignored scientific results in crafting environmental and public-health regulations.

Players who say they felt disenfranchised when GOP lawmakers dominated Capitol Hill view the Democrats' post- election ascension as an opportunity. Several environmental groups are slated to hold a joint press conference Monday laying out their collective agenda to address issues ranging from grazing on public lands and the state of national parks. They are expected to push for measures to curtail global warming that are tougher than the voluntary approaches the Bush administration has offered so far.

In the House, Democrats are identifying a series of hearings they want to hold that deal with these themes. In the Senate, Barbara Boxer (D) of California is slated to take the helm of the Senate Environmental and Public Works Committee. Last Thursday, in a briefing with reporters, she said she aims to draft legislation that contains elements of a California-like approach to curbing emissions of greenhouse gases. The state aims to cut greenhouse-gas emissions to 1990 levels by 2020.

The midterm election, which unseated several moderate Republicans, gave the GOP delegation a more conservative tone, analysts say. And several incoming Democratic freshmen take conservative positions on a number of issues.

Still, some environmental groups are optimistic that their issues will at least get a hearing. At best, they will find allies among the more-conservative freshmen.

"At least on some of the environmental issues - energy security, environmental health issues, even global warming - these are not always liberal versus conservative issues," says Karen Steuer, vice president for government affairs at the National Environmental Trust in Washington. "In the last Congress, we could frequently work in a bipartisan fashion [with individual Republican lawmakers] on a fair number of environmental issues." The barriers came at the doorstep of the GOP leadership, which "refused to bring our issues to the floor for a vote," she says. "We couldn't even get an honest debate and a vote."

With a presidential election only two years away, it may be unrealistic to expect large-scale changes in science or environmental policies, several analysts say. Instead, they continue, look for oversight hearings that are more robust.

One issue expected to receive more scrutiny involves what has come to be called the GOP's war on science. Inspectors general at NASA and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration are investigating allegations that political appointees have tried to muzzle scientists whose views, based on their research, run counter to Bush administration policy. In other cases, critics charge that political appointees at regulatory agencies such as the Environmental Protection Agency have disregarded the best available science in crafting environmental regulations that are weaker than critics say they should be. Many states are in open revolt against the EPA's rules for emissions of mercury and particulates, for example, opting to set up their own tougher regulations.

Another area ripe for tighter oversight is NASA and the president's Vision for Space Exploration, adds Ray Williamson, with the George Washington University Space Policy Institute. In hearings before the House Committee on Science, lawmakers from both sides of the aisle have expressed support for the effort in general. But, he notes, they worry that the White House isn't giving NASA the money it needs to do the job without sacrificing other important activities.

Pelosi Backs Murtha For Majority Leader (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092774

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, in line to become speaker of the House, stepped into a postelection power struggle among fellow Democrats on Sunday with a letter of support for Rep. Jack Murtha in the race to pick a majority leader.

"Your presence in the leadership of our party would add a knowledgeable and respected voice to our Democratic team," Pelosi, D-Calif., wrote Murtha. The Pennsylvania lawmaker is widely viewed as an underdog in a two-man race with Maryland Rep. Steny Hoyer in this week's leadership elections.

Murtha issued a statement saying, "I am deeply gratified to receive the support of Speaker Pelosi, a tireless advocate for change and a true leader for our party and our country."

Hoyer has been second-ranking in the Democratic leadership behind Pelosi the past four years. He issued a statement saying he was confident he would win the race.

"Nancy told me some time ago that she would personally support Jack. I respect her decision as the two are very close," Hoyer's statement said.

Pelosi and Hoyer have long been rivals within the party caucus, while she and Murtha are allies of long standing.

Murtha, a former Marine who is respected for his knowledge of defense issues, gained national attention last year when he said U.S. troops should be withdrawn from Iraq.

Murtha announced last fall he intended to run for majority leader if Democrats won control of the House, a pre-election jab at Hoyer at a time the Marylander was pledging support for Pelosi.

Both Hoyer and Murtha traveled on behalf of Democratic candidates during the campaign. Hoyer's office said he visited 82 congressional districts and raised or contributed $8.2 million to the party's candidates in the months leading to the elections. No comparable figures were immediately available for Murtha's efforts.

Since the election, Hoyer has released letters of support in the leadership race from senior Democrats as well as from more than half of the incoming lawmakers who won their seats last week.

In her letter, Pelosi began by noting that Murtha had requested her support. Noting his opposition to the war, she added, "Your leadership gave so many Americans, including respected military leaders, the encouragement to voice their own disapproval at a failed policy that weakens our military and makes stability in that region even more difficult to achieve."

One of Hoyer's supporters, Rep.-elect Baron Hill of Indiana, depicted Pelosi's letter as good news for the Maryland lawmaker. Hill said the letter was a statement of personal intent, adding, "She's not asking other members to vote for Murtha."

Pelosi Endorses Murtha As Next Majority Leader (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) endorsed Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) yesterday as the next House majority leader, thereby stepping into a contentious intraparty fight between Murtha and her current deputy, Maryland's Steny H. Hoyer.

The unexpected move signaled the sizable value Pelosi gives to personal loyalty and personality preferences. Hoyer competed with her in 2001 for the post of House minority whip, while Murtha managed her winning campaign. Pelosi has also all but decided she will not name the ranking Democrat on the House intelligence committee, Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.) to chair that panel next year, a decision pregnant with personal animus.

Pelosi had been outspoken about her frustration with Murtha's declaration that he would challenge Hoyer, currently the House minority whip, for the majority leader post long before Democrats had secured the majority. Many believed she would remain on the sidelines, just as Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) did earlier this year when three Republicans vied for the post of House majority leader.

But in her first real decision as the incoming speaker, Pelosi said she was swayed by Murtha's early stance for a withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq. Her letter of endorsement yesterday made clear that she sees Iraq as the central issue of the next Congress and that she believes a decorated Marine combat veteran at the helm of the House caucus would provide Democrats ammunition in their fight against congressional Republicans and President Bush on the issue.

"I salute your courageous leadership that changed the national debate and helped make Iraq the central issue of this historic election. It was surely a dark day for the Bush Administration when you spoke truth to power," she wrote. "Your strong voice for national security, the war on terror and Iraq provides genuine leadership for our party, and I count on you to lead on these vital issues."

Murtha responded, "I am deeply gratified to receive the support of Speaker Pelosi, a tireless advocate for change and a true leader for our Party and our country."

Pelosi's decision could be a significant blow to Hoyer, who has worked for years to move up in the Democratic leadership. Political handicappers had regarded Hoyer to be the strong favorite when House Democrats meet Thursday to choose a majority leader for the 110th Congress. Although Murtha's stance on Iraq has made him a hero among many grass-roots party activists, his positions against abortion and gun control have pushed many House liberals into Hoyer's camp, including the leader of the Out of Iraq Caucus, Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.).

DOJ_NMG_0092775

Hoyer's camp counts 21 of the roughly 40 incoming freshman Democrats as committed supporters. Many freshmen believe the Democrats should stick with the team that brought them to the majority, said John Sarbanes, who was elected last week to represent central Maryland in the House.

Hoyer also has the strong support of many of the party's conservative "Blue Dog" Democrats, who worry about Murtha's involvement in the Abscam bribery sting in 1980 and what they see as his freewheeling style on the House Appropriations Committee, where he has openly advocated for the interests of his district and his political supporters.

Some of Hoyer's supporters put the best face on Pelosi's intervention, saying Murtha would not have asked for a public letter of support if his campaign were not in trouble.

"I don't think it's significant," said Rep. Dennis Cardoza (D-Calif.), a leading Blue Dog and Hoyer supporter. "Everyone already knew she was supporting Murtha. I don't think this will have much of an impact. Steny's going to win this fight."

But Murtha has garnered the support of some influential Californians close to Pelosi, including Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), a liberal firebrand who will chair the House Education and the Workforce Committee.

In a statement, Hoyer said he remains confident he has the votes.

"Nancy told me some time ago that she would personally support Jack. I respect her decisions as the two are very close," he wrote. "I am grateful for the support I have from my colleagues, and have the majority of the caucus supporting me. I look forward to working with Speaker Pelosi as Majority Leader."

Another potentially fractious vote in the House Democratic Caucus was settled late last week when Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the outgoing chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, decided against running for House majority whip. Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.), the only African American in the House Democratic leadership, had already announced his candidacy.

Emanuel instead will stand unopposed for the job Clyburn will vacate, House Democratic Caucus chairman. In his announcement, he appealed for party unity ahead of Thursday's leadership elections.

Supply Side Can Mike Pence Win? (WSJ)

By Stephen Moore

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- If Rep. Mike Pence, the fourth-term Republican from Indiana, wins his bid this Friday for House minority leader, he will become the second most influential conservative in Washington, behind President Bush. The leadership contest, of course, does not take place in a vacuum. The congressional Republicans are engaged in a desperate search for a new revolutionary, a Newt Gingrich figure to help them rediscover who they are and what they believe in. One story about Mr. Pence suggests that he might just be the man:

"The president said, 'Mike, I really need your vote for my prescription drug bill," Mr. Pence recalls of his first-ever meeting in the Oval Office. "And I responded, 'With all due respect, Mr. President, I didn't come to this town to create new entitlements, but to rein in the ones we already have.'" A few days later, this wet-behind-the-ears sophomore congressman captained a conservative revolt that fell one vote short of killing the hugely expensive legislation.

That wasn't the first time this maverick bucked his party leadership and his president. His first spending vote in the House was against the No Child Left Behind education bill that the Bush White House still considers one of its crowning achievements. His reasoning: "Why are we federalizing schools and education?"

Neither of these incidents endeared Mr. Pence to Karl Rove or the Bush White House. But perhaps his principled stance is in need more than ever.

"My colleagues know that I have never hesitated to support this president when I thought that he was right even on difficult issues like the war," Mr. Pence told me in an interview last week. "But I have never hesitated to oppose vigorously and publicly when I thought that the policy of the Bush administration ran contrary to the principles of limited government." Translation: Expect some intraparty fireworks if Mr. Pence wins.

Mr. Pence believes that his party got trounced last week because of its embrace of what he derisively calls "big government Republicanism." He laments: "For the past four years there has been a growing sense among voters that Republicans, who had come to Washington, D.C. to shrink government, instead settled for an agenda of running government in a slightly less expensive way than the Democrats." (By the end, they weren't even doing that.) Returning Republicans to their Reagan roots is Mr. Pence's obsession. "I believe in my heart that the greatest scandal in Washington is runaway federal spending."

DOJ_NMG_0092776

The silver-haired Mr. Pence is most known as a free-market conservative who fought to make the Bush tax cuts bigger and the Bush spending smaller, and he relishes the idea of taking on the trade protectionism of the Democrats. On immigration, he rejects as economically wrongheaded the Pat Buchanan isolationism of the party. He wants a border security bill that includes expanded legal immigration and a system to allow illegal workers to go back home and secure a green card for re-admittance if they have a willing employer who will hire them.

The closed-border Republicans have screamed "amnesty" -- a policy Mr. Pence says he's "dedicated to preventing." It says a lot about his likeability and conservative credentials that even his highest-profile opponent on the immigration issue, Tom Tancredo, is a Pence supporter in the leadership race.

One complication for Republican leaders is that over the next two years a legacy-minded Mr. Bush might work to make bipartisan deals with a Speaker Nancy Pelosi -- on questions like minimum wage, health care and entitlement reform. Mr. Pence sees the House Republicans' game plan for winning back the majority as pretty much the opposite: to oppose such deals whenever they deviate from Reagan principles.

"The duty of the Republican minority as I see it is to contest and where possible defeat the liberal agenda of the Democratic Party and Speaker Pelosi," he stresses. "But I think that we will only defeat the Democratic agenda by presenting positive, substantive reforms based on Republican values for every major legislative initiative of the Democratic majority -- whether the issue is the economy, security or values." There's a definite spirit of combativeness, not cooperation -- thank God.

Mr. Pence seems to have corralled most of the support from major conservative voices, ranging from Rush Limbaugh to Paul Weyrich. John Berthoud, the president of the National Taxpayers Union, gushes: "Mike Pence is one of the few Republicans of late we could always depend on to take the principled position, not the K Street position." He adds, "He's the obvious choice. When you've got a Roger Clemens, you put him on the mound."

Not everyone sees Mr. Pence in that all-star light. The complaint on Capitol Hill is that he can be a self-promoter and a media hound. In America's most secure redoubt of egomania, the U.S. Congress, that often foments envy. Some of Mr. Pence's critics charge that for all his self-righteous anti-big-government talk, he voted "aye" for the mega-spending farm bill of 2002 to benefit his Indiana farmers. Mr. Pence's response: "I'm 99% conservative and 1% collectivist" -- though he does say one of his goals this year is a genuinely free-market farm bill.

His opponent in the leadership race, John Boehner of Ohio, is a conservative himself, and well-liked. He was majority leader this past year, and did an admirable and thankless job of cleaning up the House stables in the aftermath of the Tom DeLay and Jack Abramoff scandals. Mr. Boehner is a far better fundraiser than Mr. Pence. But still, he's not the new face many Republicans are searching for.

Here, the betting odds are with Mr. Boehner. It's tough to topple the incumbent party powers, though the members may want to remember that the first step toward winning control of the House in 1994 was voting out the old regime and putting in visionary leaders like Newt Gingrich and Dick Armey.

Can Mike Pence win? That depends on how many of his colleagues fully understand how much trouble they're in.

Mr. Moore is a member of the Journal's editorial board.

A GOP Unchanged (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

The depleted House Republican caucus, a minority in the next Congress, convenes in the Capitol at 8 a.m. Friday on the brink of committing an act of supreme irrationality. The House members blame their leadership for their tasting the bitter dregs of defeat. Yet the consensus so far is that, in secret ballot, they will reelect some or all of those leaders.

In private conversation, Republican members of Congress blame Majority Leader John Boehner and Majority Whip Roy Blunt in no small part for their midterm election debacle. Yet either Boehner, Blunt or both are expected to be returned to their leadership posts Friday. For good reason, the GOP often is called "the stupid party."

While an unpopular Iraq war and an unpopular George W. Bush were primary causes of last Tuesday's Republican rout, massive public disapproval of the Republican-controlled Congress significantly contributed. While abandoning conservative principles, the spendthrift House had become chained to special corporate interests represented by K Street lobbyists.

This malaise is embodied in the avuncular speaker, J. Dennis Hastert, whose consistent response to accusations of failed leadership has been 20-minute lectures to closed-door party conferences pleading for Republican unity. As expected, Hastert is leaving the leadership now that the party is in the minority. But his departure leaves the other leaders in place, with their colleagues reluctant to turn them out.

That reluctance is typified by Rep. Eric Cantor, a 43-year-old third-term congressman from Richmond who has been his party's chief deputy whip for four years since being appointed by Blunt after only two years in the House. His voting record is solidly conservative, and he belongs to the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC). At the same time, Cantor is well regarded in all sectors of the party, and members see him as the principled kind of rising politician that Republicans desperately need.

DOJ_NMG_0092777

But Cantor is not seizing this post-election moment to seek an elected leadership position. On the contrary, he has been supporting Blunt for reelection as whip out of loyalty to his mentor and patron. Bright and able though he is, Cantor has drunk the Kool-Aid in viewing the Republican Party as a private club where personal loyalties must transcend all else.

Blunt, like Hastert, was handpicked for leadership by Tom DeLay, the dominant Republican in Congress until his politically inspired indictment in Texas last year. When DeLay resigned as majority leader, the party's lobbyist-connected establishment decision was to promote Blunt from whip to leader and make Cantor the whip. But with the feeling that some change was needed, Boehner defeated Blunt for the top job, and Blunt kept the second-ranking post. In fact, Boehner's ties to K Street are even stronger than Blunt's, and he seemed to lose interest in reform once he became majority leader.

Rep. Mike Pence, the chairman of the RSC and a leader of reform, is an underdog candidate opposing Boehner. Rep. John Shadegg, Pence's predecessor at the RSC, who finished third in the race for leader in February, is running uphill against Blunt for whip on a reform platform. The conventional wisdom on the Hill is that, at best, only one of them can win, because the Republicans would not dare elect two conservatives to the two top House leadership positions.

In fact, the voting records of Boehner and Blunt are nearly identical to those of Pence and Shadegg. The difference between them was demonstrated Thursday when Blunt went to the Heritage Foundation to campaign for his retention as whip. He delivered a defense of earmarking, echoing the House appropriators' claim that the elimination of earmarks would do "nothing but shift funding decisions from one side of Pennsylvania Avenue to the other."

That is the view that led Republicans to earmark a "Bridge to Nowhere" and hundreds of other projects in competitive districts, hoping it would save them on Election Day. The House has been a place where Rep. Don Young (a notorious Alaska porker) was setting national transportation policy, where the "cardinals" on the Appropriations Committee established earmarking records, where the pharmaceutical industry had a pipeline to party policy and where even Speaker Hastert was making personal profits on an earmark. Maybe that's what Republicans want to retain, even in the minority.

© 2006 Creators Syndicate Inc.

Post a Comment

Comments: (Limit 5,000 characters)

Comments that include profanity or personal attacks or other inappropriate comments or material will be removed from the site. Additionally, entries that are unsigned or contain "signatures" by someone other than the actual author will be removed. Finally, we will take steps to block users who violate any of our posting standards, terms of use or privacy policies or any other policies governing this site. Please review the full rules governing commentaries and discussions. You are fully responsible for the content that you post.

In New Senate, The Middle Rules (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 13, 2006

For Democrats, who swept back into power in both the House and Senate last week, the pledge to govern in a bipartisan way may not be postvictory rhetoric. At least in the Senate, it's a mandate of the math.

While an effective 51-49 majority allows Democrats to organize the Senate - Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernard Sanders of Vermont ran as independents - it is still nine votes short of the 60 votes now needed to advance controversial bills on issues ranging from taxes to the Iraq war.

"Nothing can be accomplished in this town unless it's on a bipartisan basis," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, after meeting with President Bush and Vice President Cheney at the White House on Friday.

"The only way the American people will know if President Bush is sincere, the Democratic Congress is sincere, is with results. And we're willing to give it a try," he added.

The terms of the Democrats' narrow victory make a politics of the center even more imperative. Most of the new Democrats in the Senate won by running as moderates or fiscal conservatives.

"They were carefully chosen not to reflect the liberal mainstream of the Democratic Party, but to reflect the more conservative mainstream of their states," says Rhodes Cook, a political analyst in Washington.

"It might be a return to the days when Democrats were technically a majority party, but when you put Republicans together with southern Democrats, they were the majority," he adds.

DOJ_NMG_0092778

Then, there's Ben Nelson. Last year, the Nebraska Democrat voted against a majority of his party more than half the time, according to a survey by Congressional Quarterly. But so did Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R) of Rhode Island. The two men often canceled each other's vote.

However, this year, Chafee lost. If past is prelude, that means a 50-50 Senate on many votes, with Vice President Cheney, as Senate president, breaking ties. New coalitions

While Senate Democrats are expected to lock arms over issues such as the minimum wage, there may be a new centrist coalition on issues including immigration, national security, and privacy rights.

Incoming freshmen Amy Klobuchar in Minnesota, Jon Tester in Montana, and Bob Casey in Pennsylvania defined themselves as moderate, independent voices, often at odds with Democrats in Washington. A former Navy secretary in the Reagan administration, Jim Webb upset Sen. George Allen (R) of Virginia on a campaign that showcased independence.

Rep. Benjamin Cardin (D) of Maryland, who will succeed retiring Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D), was one of the few House Democrats willing to work with Republicans on issues such as pension reform.

Conservative activists say that the centrist base of the new freshman class will limit how far the national Democratic Party can advance a more radical agenda.

"If people ran as liberals, I would be afraid for my issue [cutting taxes]. But there are very few Democrats who won running as liberals against conservative Republicans," says Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform.

For six years of the Bush presidency, Democrats have focused on blocking GOP initiatives. The next two years will showcase that Democrats can also govern, say party leaders in both the House and the Senate. Democrats' legislative agenda

Democrats plan to advance a legislative program in the first 100 days of the 110th Congress that includes increasing the minimum wage, passing all the 9/11 Commission recommendations, cutting the cost of student loans, lifting the 2003 ban on negotiating lower drug prices for seniors through Medicare, and promoting energy independence. They're also gearing up for hard-hitting investigations on issues ranging from the Iraq war to the nation's energy policy. Beware of intraparty disputes

If the party can deliver only gridlock in the next Congress, they will quickly lose those moderate and independent voters who delivered last week's victory, say activists with the Democratic Leadership Council (DLC), a centrist think tank.

"If Democrats are smart, they can make these new and 'returned' Democratic voters part of an expanded party and an enduring national majority," argues a DLC position paper, "What's next for Democrats?" released Nov. 10.

"That's why we should all be wary of intraparty arguments that Democrats did well simply by 'fighting' or maximizing partisan differentiation from the Republicans, or that they can paste together a majority by insisting on ideological unity and ignoring parts of the country or parts of the party - e.g., 'red states' - that call for a more diverse and inclusive message," the paper states.

"Make no mistake: Our joy today will vanish if we can't produce for the American people," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D) of New York, who, as chair of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, recruited and helped fund Democratic candidates in the 2006 election cycle.

"If we can keep our focus on the average American family, we will stay the majority for a generation," he added. Senate Democratic leader: Nimble on his feet

As a boxer in high school, Harry Reid - now in line to be majority leader of the US Senate in the 110th Congress - trained for the boxing ring by running up steep grades, with his coach following behind in his car.

"They knew that if they stumbled or fell and did not promptly get up and continue, there was a good chance they would be run over," says Senator Reid's coach and mentor, former Nevada Gov. Mike O'Callaghan.

It's good practice for his next job: leading what its members like to call the world's greatest deliberative body. Two former majority leaders describe the job as "herding cats."

"The election is over. It's time for a change. It's time for open government. It's time for transparency. It's time for results," Reid said after Republicans conceded the seat in Virginia, giving Democrats their majority last week.

It's a job he didn't expect. When it was clear that then-majority leader Tom Daschle had lost his reelection bid in 2004, Reid summoned the stunned caucus to regroup. "We've got to talk about the future of our caucus," he said to Deputy Democratic leader Richard Durbin of Illinois, who credits Reid with "patching up some rifts in our caucus that had been around for a long time."

Known for his grasp of highly complex Senate procedure, Reid has always functioned better behind the scenes than in front of a camera. It was Reid who led the secret negotiations with Vermont Sen. James Jeffords over his defection from the GOP, which flipped control of the Senate to the Democrats in June 2001.

As minority leader after the 2004 elections, he often set majority leader Bill Frist back on his heels with surprise parliamentary moves. He famously called the Senate into "secret" session in November 2005 to demand that the Senate intelligence committee complete its stalled probe into whether the intelligence on weapons of mass destruction in Iraq had been politically manipulated.

DOJ_NMG_0092779

In the past two years, he has repeatedly derailed Republican initiatives, including holding Democrats in line to block a GOP bid to tie a permanent repeal of the estate tax to a bill raising the minimum wage.

He's also one of the few senators who still practices the art of the filibuster. On Nov. 19, 2003, Reid stunned Frist and Senate Republicans by holding the floor for nine straight hours in a bid to defend the right to filibuster judicial nominations. Sustained by judicious sips of water, he read from his book about his hometown, "Searchlight: The Camp That Didn't Fail."

Reid has also made some celebrated errors, such as publicly boasting that Democrats had "killed the Patriot Act."

While critics have tried to link Reid to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff - Reid accepted nearly $70,000 in contributions from Abramoff's tribal clients - so far, charges of wrongdoing haven't stuck. But a disclosure last month by the Associated Press that Reid had violated Senate rules by failing to report a 2001 land transfer that later netted him $700,000 prompted Reid to amend his financial disclosure statements.

Array Of Fresh Faces Set For 110th Senate (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

The Senate today will welcome 10 new faces soon to join its ranks -- eight Democrats, one independent and one Republican. They include a novelist and former Navy secretary, three soon-to-be former House members, a state treasurer and an organic farmer.

Much like new college freshmen, the group arrives this week for orientation -- but theirs is into the new Democrat-controlled 110th session of the Senate.

Six Democrats in the new group defeated Republican incumbents to help usher in that new majority.

Sen.-elect James H. Webb Jr. of Virginia defeated Sen. George Allen in an extremely tight race. Mr. Webb, a decorated Vietnam veteran, is a former Republican who was Navy secretary under President Reagan. The 60-year-old is a strong opponent of President Bush's invasion of Iraq and switched parties because of it. Mr. Webb also has written six novels.

Bob Casey Jr., Pennsylvania's treasurer and son of a popular former governor, ran as an anti-Bush agent of change, defeating conservative Rick Santorum, the Senate's third-ranking Republican. But the 46-year-old Mr. Casey, a two-term state auditor, is more conservative than his party on some issues, including abortion.

Republicans lost their most liberal senator when Rhode Island's Lincoln Chafee was defeated by former Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse, a 51-year-old staunch Democrat. Mr. Whitehouse, who also was a U.S. attorney under President Clinton, ran a stridently anti-Bush campaign, but because Mr. Chafee frequently bucked the president, some surmise the voting patterns of this Senate seat may change little.

From the "Big Sky country" of Montana comes Jon Tester, the president of the state Senate who also grows organic wheat, barley and hay on his family farm there. The 50-year-old from Big Sandy -- population 710 -- demands a plan to bring the troops home from Iraq, is pro-choice and supports embryonic stem-cell research. He is pro-gun and will likely be outspoken on agriculture issues.

Claire McCaskill, who won one of the nation's tightest Senate races this year, is the Missouri state auditor and defeated Republican Sen. Jim Talent. As auditor she sought to root out wasteful spending, and because her Senate race centered on the embryonic stem-cell research debate, the 53-year-old will likely continue to push that.

Rep. Sherrod Brown, a House member since 1992 and former Ohio secretary of state, defeated Republican Sen. Mike DeWine. Mr. Brown, a liberal who earned a 100 percent rating last year from the liberal Americans for Democratic Action, has sponsored bus trips to Canada to buy cheaper prescription drugs and opposes the North American Free Trade Agreement and the Central American Free Trade Agreement. The 54-year-old author of two political books is also an Eagle Scout.

The Senate also will welcome a few Democrats who are replacing retiring Democrats. Amy Klobuchar, 46, is the first woman elected to the U.S. Senate from Minnesota and replaces retiring Sen. Mark Dayton. The two are "both are staunch Democrats with a solid progressive record," said Minnesota Democratic Farm Labor Party Chairman Brian Melendez.

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, Maryland Democrat, leaves the House and enters the Senate after defeating Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in a race to replace retiring Democrat Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes. Mr. Cardin, 63, served on the House's tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, where he blasted Republicans' Medicare prescription-drug plan as "a raw deal for seniors" and fought against the Republican Party's Social Security plan.

Finally, Rep. Bernard Sanders, 65 and a self-described "democratic socialist," enters the Senate as the longest-serving independent in the history in the House of Representatives, having been first elected in 1991. Like his predecessor, independent Sen. James M. Jeffords, he will caucus with the Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0092780

The lone new Republican is Tennessee's Bob Corker, former mayor of Chattanooga who keeps the seat of retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist in Republican hands. Mr. Corker, a 54-year-old businessman, became the state finance commissioner in the mid-1990s and as mayor cracked down on overspending and instituted merit-based bonuses for teachers.

McConnell Had Hoped To Be Majority Chief (AP-Y)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, November 13, 2006

It may go without saying that the job of Senate minority leader isn't exactly what Sen. Mitch McConnell had envisioned for himself after the elections.

While the Kentucky Republican regrets Democrats' control of Congress denies him the chance to become the next Senate majority leader, he sees the GOP carving out a significant, albeit slightly different role.

"We'll be able block or shape legislation. My preference of course is to accomplish things," said McConnell, who is now running unopposed to be Senate Republican leader.

When the new Senate convenes in January, Democrats will control 51 seats to Republicans' 49. The close split means Republicans still will have significant power, because it often takes 60 votes to pass legislation.

"Forty-nine is a pretty robust minority. I've been there when we were at 42," said McConnell, who currently holds the No. 2 position of whip in the Senate GOP hierarchy and is expected to succeed retiring Tennessee Sen. Bill Frist as GOP leader.

Republican senators are to pick their leaders on Nov. 15. Utah Republican Sen. Robert Bennett said McConnell has been methodically planning for the top job, fending off potential challenges along the way.

"Brick by brick, he built a firewall," Bennett said, adding that McConnell also has "the best political instincts of any of the people on the leadership team."

